THE Public may be surprized at finding a Ninth and Tenth Volume of STATE TRIALS publish'd, after so voluminous a Collection already set forth; yet, if they consider, it is above thirty Years since the Seventh and Eighth Volumes were printed, and the great Number of Trials for Treason, Murder, Perjury, Forgery, &c. which have happened since that time, likewise a Rebellion within that Period (always productive of many Trials) their Admiration must cease.

Besides, Gentlemen must have observed, in the Course of their Reading, a great many Trials have happened for different Crimes and Offences, which have never yet appeared in Print, but have been locked up in the Studies of those who either took them, or had them taken in Short hand: Those falling into other Hands, by Deaths or otherways, have either been purchased, procured, or generously sent in towards compleating this useful Work;—such as Matthew's Trial for High Treason, in printing Vox Populi, Vox Dei, in 1719, which has lain dormant near fifty Years;—Hales and Kinnerley's Trials in 1728, for forging promissory Notes, in the Names of Robert Gibson and Samuel Edwards, Esquires (both Members of Parliament), and publishing them as true ones, for large Sums of Money, wrote on frank'd Covers given them to send into the Country;—Huggins and Bambridge's Trials, who were Wardens of the Fleet, with Corbett the Tipstaff, and Aston the Keeper of the Marshalsea Prison, who were all prosecuted in 1729, for Murder, by Order of his Majesty, on an Address from the House of Commons for that Purpose;—Mr. Franklin's Trial, in 1730, for printing and publishing a Libel entitled, A Letter from the Hague; with several other Trials which were taken at large, with the Speeches of the Court and Counsel, are now first printed from Manuscripts, and inserted in this Collection.

All the printed Trials, at full length, that we could hear of (and we have frequently advertised to procure them) published since the Seventh and Eighth Volumes, are brought into this Work, with great Additions to most of them, either by Arguments on the special Verdicts, Counsel's Opinion on some of the Cases, or Accounts of the Prisoners Behaviour and dying Speeches, &c. and though several small Trials, or Parts of Trials and Proceedings, have been printed or procured in Manuscript, and were too minute to be inserted in the Body of it; yet, in order to preserve even them from being buried in Oblivion, we have given them a Place in the Appendix; for these scarce Pieces are of Value, and not to be collected but with great Difficulty and Expence; and it is hoped some Gentlemen of the Law, on reading them, will furnish some Speeches or Arguments towards compleating them, in case this Work comes to another Edition.—In this Appendix are likewise inserted two Trials in Corporation Causes, now first printed from Manuscript, viz. New-Romney and the Port of Hastings, which were argued by some of the most eminent Counsel then at the Bar; the first before the Lord Chief-Justice Eyre, and the latter before Lord Hardwicke; which were not procured time enough to be inserted in the Body of the Work.

Some Trials in this Collection cannot (properly speaking) be called State Trials, yet may be deemed good Precedents, and determine many Points of Law; therefore have their Use, and were thought too material to be omitted; and it would be confining the Collection in too narrow a Compass, to insert only STATE TRIALS. But as the former Collection, in Six Volumes, published by Solomon Emlyn, Esq. (who wrote that admirable Preface prefixed to the first Volume, and published Hale's Pleas of the Crown in Folio) met with general Approbation, we have endeavoured to follow his Steps, and take in such Trials, for Murder, Perjury, Forgery, &c. as have been published at large; for all Trials (even in these Cases) are Helps to History, setting forth the true State of the Case on both Sides, and are useful to the Gentlemen of the Law as well as Historians, as they give the Opinions of the greatest Lawyers on the different Points brought before them.

This Work will receive considerable Addition from that upright Judge Mr. Justice Foster, who, in his Cases on the Crown Law, has given the Public several Resolutions and Determinations of the Court on some of the Trials of the Rebels, which are added after each of their Trials; but the greatest Use made of that judicious Author, is his Speech on pronouncing the Judgment of the Court, in the Case of the King and Macdaniel, and his Gang of Thief-takers (which is inserted after the Arguments of Mr. Hume and others on their special Verdict, which Arguments were never before printed); and also on the Question put to the Judges, by the House of Lords in Earl Ferrers's Case,

“ 1. Whether a Peer, indicted of Felony and Murder, and tried and convicted thereof before the Lords in Parliament, ought to receive Judgment for the same, according to the Provisions of the Act of Parliament of the Twenty-fifth Year of his Majesty's Reign, intituled, An Act for better preventing the horrid Crime of Murder? ”

“ 2. Supposing a Peer, so indicted and convicted, ought by Law to receive such Judgment as aforesaid, and the Day appointed by the Judgment for Execution should lapse before such Execution done, whether a new Time may be appointed for the Execution, and by whom? ”

As the Affair of Mr. Annesley and Lord Anglesea made a great Noise, some Years ago, and occasioned four Trials, carried on at a vast Expence, we have inserted them here. First, Mr. Annesley's for the Murder of Mr. Egglestone at Staines in Middlesex; Second, that of Lord Anglesea, and others, tried in Ireland, for an Assault on Mr. Annesley, Mr. Mac Kercher, and others; Third, so much of the Trial in Ejectment, in Ireland, between Mr. Annesley and Lord Anglesea (which Trial at large is in almost every Hand) as will make the Reader entire Master of the whole Affair; with the Speeches and Opinions of the Lord Chief Baron Bowes, and the other Judges, at full Length, in that remarkable Cause; which will serve for an Introduction to the Trial of Mrs. Mary Heath (Lady Altham's Woman) who was tried for Perjury, for the Evidence she gave on that Trial in Ejectment. The Acquittal of this Woman seems to have put a stop to the further Proceedings at that time; and since Mr. Annesley's Death, we do not hear they are as yet revived.—The Trial of Elizabeth Canning, for Perjury, is here printed, though in a much fuller and larger Manner than it ever appeared in before this Publication.

As Scotland is Part of the united Kingdoms, and their Trials are conducted in a very sensible Manner, though their Method of Proceedings are different from ours, (in not bringing their Witnesses into Court to be examined, only reading their Depositions taken in Writing on Oath) yet we shall insert three or four of the most principal of them, to shew their Method of proceeding, and the Reasoning and Learning of their Advocates.

Some People may wonder we have not obtained some of the modern Trials, as Dr. Henzie for High Treason; the Cock-Lane Ghost, &c. Our Answer is, we should have been very glad to have obtained them; they would have been a great Addition to the Work, from the great Learning of the Judge that tried them; but we never could hear they were ever printed or taken in Short-hand; and as to the former, he made no Defence or called any Evidences; so it could not be a Trial of any Consequence; but if any one has a mind to peruse the Law Proceedings against him, in the Court of King's Bench, he may find them in Mr. Burrow's Reports, Vol. I. part iv. p. 642.

We hope the candid Reader will excuse such Errors as he may find in this Work occasioned by the Editor's Distance from the Press, and judge favourably of this Collection (made more for Amusement than Profit), which, in all Probability, had never seen the Light, if the Editor had not, at great Trouble and Expence, undertaken it.

I.

The Trial of RICHARD NOBLE*, Gent. for the Murder of JOHN SAYER†, Esq. and of Mrs. MARY SAYER, for Petty Treason, and Mrs. MARY SALISBURY, for aiding and abetting the said Murder; at the Assizes held at Kingston upon Thames, in Surry, before the Right Hon. the Lord Chief Justice Parker, March 12, 13, 1712-13.

ON Thursday Evening, March 12, Richard Noble, Mary Sayer, and Mary Salisbury, were arraigned for the Murder of John Sayer, Esq. upon their several Indictments; and pleaded Not Guilty; and were told by the Court, to prepare for their Trials next Morning at six o'Clock.

On Friday Morning at Six, the Court sat, and the Prisoners were set to the Bar; when Mr. Noble moved to put off their Trials, for that Mr. Bull, a very material Evidence for them, was not come down.

Court. That must be proved by the Oath of somebody, and that he was served with a Subpœna to attend here. Upon which Mr. Lindsey, one of the Attornies, concerned for the Prisoners (for they had many) deposed, That he filled up a Subpœna for serving Mr. Bull, but did not serve it himself; that a Messenger was sent at twelve o'Clock, Yesterday, to London, to serve it, but was not returned. Mr. Noble also alledged, That Mr. Page, the Counsel, another material Witness, was not come, and that he was served with a Subpœna, and they looked for him every Hour; and called Mr. Lindsey to prove this.

Mr. Lindsey deposed, He served Mr. Page with a Subpœna last Sunday, and that he thought he would have been down at the Trial.

The Court told Lindsey he should have taken care to have had his Witnesses ready, and that there was no Affidavit made of their being material Witnesses; and reprimanded Lindsey for his Neglect, and ordered the Trial to go on.

The Queen's Counsel, Mr. Serj. Commyns, with Mr. Nott, set forth how heinous the Crimes of the Prisoners would appear to be, but what aggravated their Crimes, was their endeavouring to procure Witnesses to perjure themselves; and called ‡

Daniel Reeves, who being sworn, proved, That one James Hannon, an Irishman, (who stands committed for this Offence) on Thursday before the Trial, came to him, and shewed him Copies of the Examinations taken before the Coroner, of Samuel Derham, Thomas Gardner, and John Cox, three of the most material Witnesses, to prove the Murder. Hannon then gave him Half-a-Crown, and desired him to procure, or hire two other Men to swear with him, against those Examinations, and promised him two Guineas for himself; and the other two Men were to have what Reeves could agree with them for, and that Mr. Noble would give Reeves a larger Satisfaction than what he thought he would, or could expect.

Friday Evening following, Hannon came to him again, and gave him another Half Crown, to spend upon Derham, Gardner, and Cox, and ordered him to make what Agreement he could with them, to stifle and buy off their Evidence; and the next Day, Saturday, Hannon came to Reeves again, to know what Progress he had made, and invited him to Dinner on Monday, and to bring the other two Men he was to hire with him; Hannon gave him a Note, of his own Hand-writing, where he lived, which was at Number 10. in College-street, Westminster. On Monday Morning Hannon came to Reeves again, and gave him a Writing in the Nature of an Affidavit, drawn up on Stamp Paper (by the Prisoners he said), which he, and the two Men he pretended he had hired, were to swear before a Judge, and gave him nine Shillings more in Money; whilst Hannon was thus tampering with this Witness (Reeves), he intimates it to the Prosecutor's Attorney, and after having got this Affidavit from Hannon, he shuffles off from dining with him, but promises to meet him in the Afternoon; and carries the Affidavit to the Prosecutor's Attorney; when it was settled between them, that when Hannon came again, Reeves should appear steady and zealous in the Affair, and a Warrant should be procured to apprehend him. Accordingly Hannon came, and a Warrant having been procured from Justice Hartley, instead of the two Persons, Reeves was to procure to forswear themselves, two Constables appeared; and Reeves said to Hannon, These are my two Friends. Hannon embraced them very civilly. When a third Constable entered, Reeves seized Hannon's Sword, and asked the other Constables, if they charged him with Hannon? They replying, Yes, he was seized, and carried directly before Justice Lade in Southwark; where, upon his Examination, he denied the Fact, and prevaricated greatly; was kept in Custody that Night, and next Morning committed to the Marshalsea for want of Bail.

The Words of the pretended Affidavit were as followeth

"George Smith and Samuel Shipman, both of the Parish of St. Buttolphs, House-keepers, and Daniel Reeves, of the Parish of St. George's, Southwark, maketh Oath, That on or about the 29th Day of January last, these Deponents saw Mr. Cox, and Mr. Hill, the Constables, with several other Persons in Company with Mr. Sayer, the deceased, to go from Mr. Sherlock's House in the Mint, a Brandy-Shop, to one Mr. Twyford's House, wherein they entered; and on their being asked, What their Business was? Refused to tell; and these Deponents heard the deceased Mr. Sayer, as he went into the said Twyford's House, threaten, or say, that he would be revenged on that Villain Noble, and on his Wife, and that he would kill them, or be killed; and these Deponents saw the Deceased go up Stairs, and come down again, leaving both the Constables above Stairs; and on his coming to the Parlour-Door, where Mr. Noble was, drew his Sword partly out, and said, Damn you, you Villain, now I ave found you out; and instantly pulled at the Door, and broke off the Bolt that was withinside the Door, and thereupon the deceased after his Sword was almost wholly drawn out, stepped backwards, and, in about a Minute, went to go down the two Steps into the Parlour, and seemed to be pushed down; and then some said, he was in a Fit, fetch him some Water; but these Deponents say, that they stood very near the Deceased, yet could not see, nor could they believe, that any other Person, considering the Situation of the Place, and the little Door being but part open, could see who gave the said Wound: And these Deponents farther say, they know Mr. Derham to be a poor, necessitous Taylor in the Mint, of a most infamous Character, and are certain he was not in the House till after the Deceased was wounded; and the Sword which James Terry, the Deceased's Footman, and others there, said gave the said Wound, was taken up in the Kitchen; and further say, That before the Deceased broke open the said Door, they saw the said Terry, with a Cane in one Hand, and a Brass-hilted Sword, undrawn, in the other Hand.

"And lastly, These Deponents heard the said James Terry abuse the said Mrs. Sayer, giving her very bad Words; he also told her, That rather than fail, he would offer his Service to the Sheriff to hang her, and that he would soon see the End of her; and she answered, Sirrah! It is hard to be abused by the Master and the Man too; and these Deponents being in the Room when the Deceased fell down, heard Mrs. Sayer say no other Words; but believe they should, if she had said any."

Jeremiah Barnard deposed, That he was summoned to Kingston Assizes, on the Jury on Life and Death; and that one Luke Jones, a Waterman, carrying Mr. Stagg, an Attorney, by Water, on Friday the 6th of March, and telling him, Jerry Barnard was summoned on the Jury; Mr. Stagg ordered him to tell Barnard, if he was not got off the Jury, Stagg could help him to 20l. Jones asked Stagg on what Account? Stagg answered, If he would bring in the Gentleman who killed the Man in the Mint, Not Guilty; all which Jones told this Witness by Stagg's Order; Stagg farther said,

* This Mr. Noble was the Son of Mr. Noble, who kept a well-frequented Coffee-House at Bath, and had an Estate of about 60l. per Ann. gave his Son a liberal Education, and put him Clerk to an Attorney at the Devises, in Wilts; when Noble was out of his Clerkship, he took Chambers in New-Inn, London, and there practised as an Attorney; he was introduced by a Gentleman of Honour, to transact Mr. and Mrs. Sayer's Affairs, (for they had various Disputes) the Gentleman little thinking he would have made so ill an Use of his Recommendation: But Mr. Noble was a gay, amorous, young Fellow, about twenty-eight Years of Age, and what any Woman would have liked, and he soon found out Mrs. Sayer's Disposition, went off with her, and lived with her in various Lodgings in a scandalous Way.

† This John Sayer, Esq. was Lord of the Manor of Biddlefen, in Bucks, a Gentleman of about 1000l. per Ann. Married in 1699 Mary, Daughter and Co-heir to Admiral Nevil, (whose Relict married Col. Salisbury) and had 3000l. to her Fortune. Mr. Sayer, on the Receipt of 1000l. was to settle 50l. per Ann. Pin-Money, and for every 1000l. was to settle 100l. per Ann. in Trustees. She was a very agreeable, sensible Woman, had some Wit, but too much Spirit; they had not been married long, before she quarrelled with him, and parted Beds; then by Intercession of Friends came together, and parted again. In short, she carried on a Criminal Conversation with two or three others, before she came acquainted with Mr. Noble.—Though Mrs. Sayer will appear so vicious and wicked in the ensuing Trial, yet some few Years after the Murder of her Husband, and the Execution of her Gallant, she married again an eminent Physician in London.

‡ This Trial is printed from what was published at that Time, (1713) and though not so perfect as it would have been, if it had been taken in Short-hand, yet it will receive considerable Additions from the Case of Mr. Noble, By a Barrister at Law, and Mr. Noble's Speeches; printed afterwards.

they having a £1000 and upwards, and would spend it all on the Jury to save his Life; for it lay in the Breast of the Jury only; because they had been with the Queen to get a Pardon, and they could not get one. This Evidence was objected to by Noble, as being only hear-say Evidence.

Luke Jones being sworn, proved Mr. Stagg's talking to him, as above, and his telling Bernard what Stagg offered him, &c. Upon this the Tipstaff was sent for Mr. Stagg, but he was not to be found, so a Summons was ordered to be taken out against him, to attend the Lord Chief-Justice, at his Chambers in London.

These bad Practices being discovered, the Court ordered the Jury, summoned on this Trial, to be all set aside; and a Jury sent for from the Nisi prius Bar; when each Person called over was sworn, and asked, Whether they had been wrote to, or in any manner applied to, on behalf of the Prisoners at the Bar, or either of them? When they all declared in the Negative; and on calling over the Jury, the Prisoners challenged peremptorily to the Number of Seventy-five, viz. Mr. Noble, 20; Mrs. Salisbury, 20; and Mrs. Sayer, 35. Mr. Noble, and the other Prisoners, declared they knew nothing of Hannon, and that he was not employed by them; and that they detested such vile Practices, and hoped it would make no Impression on the Court to their Prejudice.

The Jury being sworn, were

James Comber, Esq.	Jonathan Wiltshire,	Philip Becham,
Edward Chalkhill,	Edward Exall,	John Hind,
Henry Wakford,	Thomas Fox,	Robert Wood,
Edward Parkhurst,	John Bandford,	John Potterton.

Mr. Noble moved the Court, that he might be tried separately and apart from the Ladies, for that his Crime, and theirs, were distinct Things; but the same was over-ruled. Then their Indictments were read, Richard Noble, Gent. Mary Salisbury, and Mary Sayer, Widow, were indicted; He, for the Murder of John Sayer, Esq. on the Twentieth Day of January, Anno 12, Annae; Mary Salisbury as present, aiding, assisting, and abetting the same; and Mary Sayer, Widow of the Deceased, for Petty Treason, as being present, aiding, assisting, and abetting the Murder of her said Husband; and the said Richard Noble was also indicted on the Coroner's Inquest for the said Murder of John Sayer, Esq. and also on the Statute of Stabbing; and being severally arraigned, pleaded Not Guilty, and the Jury charged with them all jointly. — Then the Witnesses were called.

John Farrington swore, That he was an Officer to the Sheriff of Middlesex, and had a Warrant delivered to him at the Suit of the Deceased, against the Prisoner at the Bar; that he arrested Mr. Noble, at his Chambers in New-Inn, and when he was arrested, Noble declared, and said, God damn him, if he had Mr. Sayer the Plaintiff there, he would stick his Sword through his Body; and he would do so, whenever he saw him again. When he arrested the Prisoner, he was ill, and the Deceased (the Plaintiff) ordered him not to take him out of his Chambers, but to treat him civilly; that whilst he had him under Arrest, Noble said, He would send Sayer out of the World the first Opportunity; and the Witness could not help saying, You have had much of his Goods, and lain with his Wife, and why would you do so? And Noble answered, Damn him, he would.

Mr. Noble objected to Farrington's Evidence, for that he swore against him out of Malice; because when he had him under Arrest, he extorted Ten Guineas from him, under pretence of Civility-Money, for which the next Term after, he moved the Court of King's-Bench against him, who made him refund the Money.

The Court said, It must be left to the Jury, what Credit they would give to his Evidence.

Justice Peters swore, that in 1709, a Duel was stirred up by the Contrivance of Mrs. Salisbury and Mrs. Sayer, between their two Husbands, the Deceased and Colonel Salisbury, and the Challenge wrote by Mrs. Sayer (though sent by Mr. Sayer). But when they met, the Colonel told his Son-in-Law (Sayer), as they were going in a Coach behind Montague House to fight, Jack Sayer, I should get no Honour by killing of you; but thou shouldst know, what all the World knows; Thy Wife and my Wife are two damn'd Whores, and they want to get rid of us both. The Colonel, being a good Swordsman, might kill Sayer, and afterwards be hanged for it: This Colonel Salisbury told me soon after. Mr. Noble objected to this Evidence, as being only Hear-say, and therefore could not affect either of them.

Joanna Manly (Servant to Mr. Sayer), That in August 1709, after Mr. Noble's Acquaintance with Mrs. Sayer, the Deceased went to Holland, and returned about Lady-day, during which time, Mrs. Sayer was big with Child, and her Mother, and her Sister Mrs. Nevil, were privy to it; and during Mr. Sayer's Absence; that Mrs. Sayer carried off her Master's Effects and Money, to a great Value, and that this Witness, several times saw the two Prisoners, Mr. Noble and Mrs. Sayer, in Bed together; and after her Master's Return, her Mistress, Mrs. Sayer, desired her to give her Master some Poison, and said, that if this Witness would not get it, she would get it herself.

Penelope Howell, another Servant, swore, That she was sent, by the Prisoners, for Two-penny worth of Laudanum, to make the Deceased sleep, and bringing word, that the Apothecary said, that Quantity was enough to make any body sleep their last Sleep, the Prisoners bid her hold her Tongue, a Slut, and give it as directed.

Anne Scoffin, the Midwife, swore, That on the 5th of March 1711-12, Mrs. Sayer was delivered of a Male Child by Dr. Douglass; that she passed for a Widow, and that Noble and she were Brother and Sister: This Child was nursed at Hoxton, died and was buried there. Mrs. Sayer was delivered in a Court in Brooke street, Holborn; that there was great Familiarity between Mr. Noble and Mrs. Sayer, and that the Child was like Mr. Noble, and she believed him to be the Father of it.

Mr. Martin swore, That he knew the Prisoners Mr. Noble and Mrs. Sayer; Mr. Noble desired him to take a convenient Lodging for her to lie in at; which he did, and she was delivered of a Male Child, about the 5th of March 1711-12, by Dr. Douglass, in the Presence of Mrs. Scoffin the Midwife, at a House in a Court in Brooke street Holborn.

Francis Cox, That he is one of the Constables of the Parish of St. George the Martyr, in the Borough of Southwark; that on the 29th of January last, the Deceased, John Sayer, Esq. with two other Gentlemen, came to his House with a Warrant from Sir Charles Cox, for taking into Custody the Body of Mary Sayer his Wife, who, Mr. Sayer said, was gone from him without his Consent, and lived in a loose, scandalous Manner. That as he went to execute the Warrant, he called on Thomas Hill, another Constable, to assist him, after which they both went into the Mint; and this Witness being informed by Mr. Sayer, that he believed his Wife was at Twyford's House, in George street, in the Mint; this Witness, having found out Twyford's House, he knocked at the Door, and Twyford refused opening the Door at first, till he said, he was a Constable, and had a Warrant to search for a suspected Person in his House, and that he would not hurt a Hair of his Head; then Twyford opened the Door to the Constables, and they beckoned to their Assistants, and all went in, Mr. Sayer running in after the two Constables; when Mr. Sayer went up Stairs, and there the Deceased said, he saw some of his Wife's Cloaths, and that he believed she was in the House; and whilst this Witness went into another little Room, Mr. Sayer, and the other Constable and Assistants went down Stairs; and before this Witness got down, he heard a great Noise and Screaming out, in a Room below, whereupon he made great Haste down, when the other Constable and others, cried out to him, Mr. Sayer is dead, and the Gentleman that killed him was breaking out backwards to make his Escape; whereupon this Witness went round the House into the Garden to secure him, where he found a naked Sword in the Hand of Mr. Sayer's Footman, eight or nine Inches bloody, and Mr. Noble, Mrs. Sayer, and Mrs. Salisbury, being in the Room together, he apprehended them all, and carried them before Ralph Hartley, Esq. Justice of the Peace, who committed them to the Marshalsea.

Thomas Hill, the other Constable, swore much to the same Purpose. That he went with Cox the other Constable, with a Warrant to Twyford's House; that Mr. Sayer went up Stairs first, and then came down, and he followed him; and at the Foot of the Stairs, there being a Door leading into the Back-Room, Mr. Sayer laid hold of the Door, and pulled it open, and immediately the Deceased fell a little back, and laid his Hand on his own Sword, but did not draw it above a Foot, for want of Strength. This Witness then pushing into the Room before Mr. Sayer, Mrs. Salisbury fastened on his Collar, and endeavoured with all her Might, to keep him out of the Room; and as soon as he got in, Mr. Sayer endeavoured to follow him immediately, but could not, fell down, and never spoke more. There was only Mr. Noble, Mrs. Sayer, and Mrs. Salisbury in the Room; and Noble was breaking open the Glass-Door to make his Escape: The Deceased being on the Ground, this Witness at first thought him in a Fit only, and Mrs. Sayer said, It was only a Sham, and he was not hurt; but he presently saw the Wound on Mr. Sayer's Left-side, whereof he immediately died, and believes Noble gave the Wound with his own Sword, which was bloody, and no other Sword drawn at that Time; that Mrs. Sayer desired him to be civil to Mr. Noble, whom he had then apprehended; but she took no Care of her Husband.

James Terry (Servant to the Deceased about eight Years) swore, That staying below in the Kitchen, he saw Mr. Sayer come down first, and laid his Hands on the Top of the Door at the Stairs-Foot, going into the ParLOUR, and endeavoured to pull it open; but as soon as it was a little Way open, he saw a naked Sword come through against his Master's Body, and he ran to his Master, and his Master fell back into this Witness's Arms, and clapping his Hand on this Left-side, said, I am dead, or killed, or such like Words. The Sword was left in his Master's Body, and fell out on the Ground, and verily believes his Master received a Wound on the Left-side of his Body from Mr. Noble, at the Time his Master opened the Door a little Way, of which he instantly died. This Witness took up the Sword, which had a mourning H it; and seeing Twyford go round the House into the Garden, followed him, when he heard the Glass Windows break, and saw the back Door open, Mrs. Sayer in the Garden, Mrs. Salisbury standing on the Door Step, and his Master lying on the Ground; he then said to his Mistress, Lord Madam, What have you done to my Master? He's dead; and you have killed him. His Mistress said, O you Rogue, I'll be reveng'd on you too. Afterwards, he saw the Wound on his Master's Left Pap, which he saw probed, and was four or five Inches deep. This Witness farther deposed, That his Master had no Sword drawn, at the Time he received the Wound, nor afterwards; and that no Words passed between him and the Party who gave the Wound.

Thomas Gardner, the Constable's Assistant, swore, That there being a Door at the Foot of the Stairs in Twyford's House, he saw Mr. Sayer lay his Hand on the Door, and endeavour to pull it open; and as the Door was a little open, he saw Mr. Noble in grey Cloaths within the Room, and with a naked Sword in his Hand thrust at the Deceased, through the Part of the Door that was open, and gave him a Wound on the Left-side of his Body; and that Mr. Sayer had no Sword drawn, neither did any Words pass between the Deceased and Mr. Noble, that gave the Wound; but the Deceased afterwards endeavoured to draw his own Sword, then by his Side in the Scabbard, but could not pull it above half Way out, for want of Strength, and immediately fell down; and as he was falling, the Witness heard Mrs. Sayer say, that the Deceased had a great many sham Fits, and that this was one of them, or such like Words; and when the Constables were taking the Prisoners away, Mrs. Sayer asked Noble, My Dear, have you got my Watch? He answered, My Dear, I have it in my Pocket.

Thomas Derham deposed much to the same Purpose; and several other Witnesses swore to the same Effect, particularly Captain Altorn, and Mr. Anthony Sherlock; who likewise swore, that Twyford should tell them, that he told the Prisoner, the Constables were come either for him (Noble) or himself; and that he told Noble, he might go away if he pleased.

The Coroner appeared, and produced the bloody Sword, which was stained with Blood about five Inches, and appeared to be Mr. Noble's Sword, with which he killed the Deceased. A Surgeon also swore, that the Wound was the Occasion of his Death, and gave a Description of it to the Jury; and the Coroner's Inquest found it Wilful Murder against all three.

The Evidence for the Crown being all examined, the Prisoners were called upon to make their Defence.

Mrs. Sayer said, She was parted from her Husband, on account of his Ill-usage of her; that he gave her the foul Disease, and that they parted by mutual Consent, and she had a separate Allowance, and Articles of Separation were drawn and signed by each of them; that she knew nothing of any Constables coming to Twyford's House, or that there was any Warrant against her; that Mr. Noble being there was merely accidental, and that he came to her about her own private Business, being her Attorney; and that the Wound giving the Deceased, was done in an Instant, and the knew nothing of it, till Mr. Sayer fell down; that several of the People had sworn against her out of Malice and Spite; but utterly denied her telling the Maid to get Poison to give to her Husband; and so far from aiding or abetting Mr. Noble, if she had seen his Sword drawn, or known his Intentions, she would have done her utmost to have prevented his killing Mr. Sayer.

Mrs. Salisbury said, She attended her Daughter, in the Mint, which she thought a private Place, from the Repentment of Mr. Sayer, who threatened her Daughter's Life; That she had no Malice or Ill-will against Mr. Sayer, and wished they would have lived happily together; but he used her excessive ill, and gave her the foul Disease, which obliged her Daughter to go from him; that she knew nothing of any Constables being in the House, or any Warrant out against her Daughter; that Mr. Noble came there that Day to dine with them, and to endeavour a Reconciliation between Mr. Sayer and his Wife; that she knew nothing of the Wound being given, she being at the Window; that it was done in an Instant, and she did not know it, till she heard Mr. Sayer fall.

Mr. Noble declared, He had no Ill-will or Malice against the Deceased; that Mr. Sayer had used his Wife barbarously, had beat her, and gave her the foul Disease; and aggravated the Deceased's Carriage towards his Wife. He set forth the Deed of Separation, and the Marriage Articles, arguing, That upon that Deed, he did not question Mrs. Sayer would be thought a Person sole and apart from her Husband at the time of his Death; that Mr. Sayer could not, with any Justice, pretend his Wife had robbed him, or run away with his Jewels, &c. she having a Right to them, they being reserved to her by the Marriage Articles, and that the Deceased could have no Pretence to retake either them, or his Wife; as to her, she was forced to go from him, on account of his Ill-usage of her, and was lawfully separated from him; he justified his being in Mrs. Sayer's Company, as being her Attorney, and Trustee; that he was with her at the Time of the fatal Accident in private, about Business with her and Mrs. Salisbury; that he then heard an extraordinary Noise in the House, and there seemed a Confusion, and Crowd of People assembled together in the House, but he could not tell for what; he owned, he knew Mr. Sayer was in the House, for he heard his Voice before the Door was broke open; the Deceased breaking open the Door by pulling off the Bolt, and one Hinge, surprized him, and the Prisoners; that they all retired to the Back-Door thinking to escape, but were not able to get it open; and hearing such a Clamour and Noise without, he was flung into a Terror and Confusion, arising from such a desperate Place as the Mint; that he then drew his Sword, and stabbed the Deceased as he was entering the Door of the Room; where he, Mrs. Sayer, and Mrs. Salisbury were; that he did not doubt justifying what he had done, notwithstanding the aggravating Circumstances alleged by the Counsel, for that the Deceased came with an illegal and ill-grounded Warrant, and that Twyford the Landlord never told him Constables were at the Door; that he knew the Deceased sought his Life, he having before drawn his sword on him, and once brought a Pistol to his Chambers, on purpose to shoot him. He set forth, That he was recommended to do Mrs. Sayer's Business by a Gentleman of Honour, and that he had often endeavoured and solicited an Accommodation between Mr. Sayer and his Wife; that the Articles of Separation were drawn and executed before he was employed as Mrs. Sayer's Attorney; and that Mrs. Salisbury had engaged him to come over that very Day, to solicit a Reconciliation; and that he never declared, he would stick Mr. Sayer whenever he saw him; and that Farrington, the Officer, swore out of Malice against him.

The Prisoners then called some Witnesses, proving the Marriage Articles, and Deed of Separation.

Then Mr. Noble called a Witness, who deposed, That the Deceased, some time ago, broke open the Door upon the Prisoner, Mrs. Sayer, to kill her with his Penknife; that this Witness was well acquainted with Mrs. Sayer, during Noble's Conversation and Acquaintance with her, and never knew her to be with Child, or that she was bigger than usual; that the Prisoner, Mrs. Sayer, before her Acquaintance with Mr. Noble, was endeavouring for a Divorce, in Dockers-Commons; and that the Deceased several times beat his Wife, and some time since went to Mr. Noble's Chambers, with a Pistol in his Hand, to kill him; and that this Witness met the Deceased upon the Stairs, going up to Mr. Noble's Chambers, which Passage he had told to several others; and he proved Noble's wresting the Deceased's naked Sword from him, when he offered to stab him, or run him through the Back; and that the Deceased was cured of the foul Disease.

* As to the Legality of the Warrant, or whether proper Notice was given by the Constables, seems determined in Curtis's Case, taken from Mr. Justice Foster's Reports, Page 135, which is cited at large, as being applicable (in part) to this Case of Noble's.

The Case of Richard Curtis.

HE was indicted at the Summer Assizes 1756, for the Town and County of Newcastle upon Tyne, for the Murder of William Atkinson. Upon the Trial the Case appeared to be, that a Process in the Nature of a Capias ad Satisfaciendum issued against one Charles Cowling out of the Town Court, directed to Joseph Dixon, a Serjeant at Mace belonging to the Court; who got John Suretees, another Serjeant at Mace, to go and execute it for him. Suretees accordingly went to Cowling's Work-shop adjoining to his House, and taking hold of him told him that he had an Execution against him. Cowling demanded a sight of the Process; which being refused, Cowling, with the assistance of the Prisoner, by force and violence rescued himself.

Suretees immediately acquainted Dixon with what had happened; and thereupon Dixon prevailed upon the Mayor's Officer to insert the Name of Suretees in the Process; and Suretees then went before a Justice of the Peace for the Town and County, and made Information on Oath, that he did by virtue of the said Process to him and Joseph Dixon directed, apprehend the said Cowling, who by Wrestling and Strokes got out of his Hands and made his Escape.

The Justice thereupon granted a Warrant, directed to all Serjeants at Mace, Constables, and other Officers within the said Town and County, reciting the Process already mentioned; that Suretees had that Day arrested Cowling by virtue thereof, and that Cowling had by Wrestling and Strokes rescued himself, and commanding all Officers, &c. to apprehend the said Cowling, and to bring him before the Justice who granted the Warrant, or any other Justice of the Peace of the Town and County, to be dealt with in the Primitives as the Law directeth.

Upon the receipt of this Warrant, Dixon and Suretees (who were both Serjeants at Mace) went back to Cowling's Work-shop, taking with them the Deceased and one Coulson as their Assistants. They found the Shop Doors shut; and calling to Cowling, who was there with the Prisoner, informed him that they had an Escape Warrant against him, and required him to surrender; otherwise they said they would break open the Door.

Cowling refused to surrender; and the Prisoner looking out at the Window with an Ax in his Hand, swore that the first Man that entered should be a dead Man. Dixon, however, with Coulson and the Deceased, broke open the Shop Door; and the Deceased, being foremost in entering the Shop, the Prisoner at one Blow with the Ax, on the left side of the Head, killed him on the Spot.

Upon this Evidence the Prisoner was found Guilty of Wilful Murder. But some Gentlemen of the Profession, expressing their Doubts to the Judge who tried him, he respited Execution till the Opinion of the other Judges could be had on the Case.

In Trinity Term 1757, Eleven of the Judges had a Conference on the Case, and Nine of them, with whom Justice Wilmot, who was absent, concurred, were clearly of Opinion that the Defendant is Guilty of Murder. Two of the Judges held it to be Manslaughter. All the Judges present at the Conference agreed that the Justice's Warrant, though obtained by very unwarrantable Practice on the part of Dixon, and by Perjury on the part of Suretees, was a legal Warrant for the Arresting Cowling for a Breach of the Peace. For in Cases wherein the Justice of the Peace hath Jurisdiction, and in this he undoubtedly had, the Legality of his Warrant will never depend on the Truth of the Information whereon it is grounded.

They likewise agreed, that Peace-Officers, having a legal Warrant to arrest for a Breach of the Peace, may break open Doors after having demanded Admittance, and given due Notice of their Warrant.

The Point on which they divided was, Whether in this Case such due Notice had been given?

The Nine Judges were of Opinion, that no precise Form of Words is required in a Case of this kind. It is sufficient that the Party hath Notice that the Officer cometh not as a mere Trespasser, but claiming to act under a proper Authority. And if after this notice, he be resisted, and he or any of his Assistants killed in consequence of such Resistance, it will be Murder; provided it cometh out in Evidence that the Officer had a Legal Warrant.

The

Eliz. Saunders, Servant at the Red-Lyon, in George Street, in the Mint, swore, she was in the Backside of her Master's House a-washing, when the two Constables came to Twyford's House; that they knocked at the Door, and refused to tell their Business, or whom or what they wanted; that she went in with the Constables, and Mr. Sayer, to Mr. Twyford's House, and nobody else with them; that the Deceased came into the House, with his Sword drawn about three Inches out, went up Stairs with the Constable, and came down again by himself, had his Sword then drawn, swore he would make an end of the Prisoner, Mr. Noble, broke open the Door and went into the Room, and fell down dead; all which she saw, she being in the Kitchen; but did not know how he died.

Two Men swore, That Mr. Sayer ran into the House, with his Sword drawn about four Inches; swearing he would kill the Prisoner, Noble; and in other Points, agreeing with those Particulars mentioned in the Affidavit which Mr. James Hannon endeavoured to suborn Reeves to swear to.

Others were called to invalidate the Evidence given by Farrington, of the Prisoner Noble's swearing to stick the Deceased whenever he met him.

Others swore, they were frequently in Company with the Prisoner Noble, and Mrs. Sayer, and never knew any disorderly, or unbecoming Behaviour between them, but thought the Prisoner Noble attended her only as her Attorney.

Several were called to the Character of Mr. Noble, and gave him a very good one; and that they never heard any Ill of him.

Others were called to the Characters of Mrs. Salisbury, and Mrs. Sayer, who said, they never knew any Ill of them, particularly a Lady, a Neighbour to Mrs. Sayer, in Lisle-street; who said, she thought her a decent, well-behaved Woman.

The Evidence on both Sides being gone thro', Mr. Noble, the Prisoner at the Bar, desired he might have Counsel as to a Point of Law; Whether the Warrant to apprehend Mrs. Sayer was not illegal; and whether by that Warrant, they could enter and break open the Door upon the Prisoners in another's House; and whether what he did was not in his own Defence? Counsel being granted him, they insisted, "That this Warrant was illegal, though from a Justice of the Peace; that it was ill-grounded, and made without legal Authority; that without any legal Authority, a Multitude came into the House; that the Prisoners had no Notice they were Constables, or had any legal Warrant to apprehend Mrs. Sayer; that the Deceased broke open the Door upon the Prisoners, which was an Assault upon them; and the Prisoner, Noble, hearing such a Tumult and Noise, and Numbers breaking in upon him, he drew his Sword in his own Defence, and unfortunately stabbed the Deceased."

Therefore hoped his Lordship would direct the Jury to find a Special Verdict.

There were some Debates between the Counsel, whether the Prisoners knew the Constables were at Twyford's House? Upon which the Queen's Counsel called up again other Witnesses, some of which were examined before; one proved that Twyford, the Man of the House where the Prisoners were, told him some Days after the Murder, That immediately upon the coming in of the Constables, he ran through his Garden round the House to the Back-Door, and told Mr. Noble, the Constables were come, and wanted either him, or himself; that he opened the Back-Door to the Prisoners, Noble, and said to him, Sir, you may go your way if you please.

Upon this, Twyford's Examination taken before John Lade Esq. a Justice of the Peace, was read; "That he told Mr. Noble the Constables were at the Door, and wanted either him (Mr. Noble) or himself; and that he opened the back Door to him, and said, (loud enough for him to hear) 'Sir, you may go out, or go your way, if you please, or Words to that Effect.'"

Others swore, they heard Twyford say the same thing, when he was before the Justice.

John Janeway, of Suffolk-Place in the Mint, Thomas Austen, Francis Cox, and John Wadsworth, all of St. George's Parish, all swore, they heard Twyford say the same, before the Coroner.

The Evidence being finished, the Court said, that the Warrant being ill-grounded was not material, illegal it could not be; for it was granted by a Justice of the Peace, on the Oath of a Person, that Mr. Sayer had been robbed of Goods, &c. to a considerable Value, and Mr. Sayer could justify searching for and taking his Goods; and apprehending his Wife, wherever he could find them; that it is plain by the Evidence, that the Landlord, Twyford, told the Prisoner, Noble, the Constables * were come either for him (Noble) or himself, and told told him he might go away if he pleased; therefore he might pretty well tell what they came about, considering how scandalously he had lived for some Time past with the Deceased's Wife.—If he had been there innocently, or with a good Intention, as he pretends, why did not he voluntarily surrender himself to the Constables; but the many Declarations the Prisoner had made against the Deceased, seemed to carry Rancour and Malice against him; that it was certain the Prisoner, Noble, knew Sayer was in the House; for he has owned he heard his Voice before the Door was broke open; therefore it seemed a determined Thing in him to destroy Mr. Sayer, who was killed, and if you believe the Evidence, by the Prisoner, Noble's own Hand.

The Chief-Justice summed up the Evidence with great Clearness and Impartiality, and seemed to direct the Jury to find Noble Guilty; and there being not sufficient Evidence to convict the other Prisoners, for the Shortness of Time would not allow of any consulting or confederating together to destroy the Deceased, directed them to be acquitted. The Judge behaved with great Patience and Temper during this whole Trial, which lasted from six o'Clock in the Morning, until one next Morning; when the Jury were admitted to have some Refreshment at the Bar, while the Court was sitting; then an Officer was sworn to keep the Jury, who went out between One and Two on Saturday Morning, but did not agree on their Verdict till the same Morning about Ten o'Clock; which was, that Richard Noble was Guilty on all three Indictments; Mary Sayer, and Mary Salisbury, Not Guilty.

On the Acquittal of the two Ladies, they behaved so overjoyed, as to be taken Notice of by the Court, who reprimanded them for their indecent Behaviour.

Counsel then moved that Mrs. Salisbury and Mrs. Sayer might not be discharged, without giving sufficient Bail to appear at any Time within Twelve Months, to answer to any other Indictment, or an Appeal. The Court ordered they should give sufficient Bail for their Appearance, themselves in £1000 a-piece, and their Sureties in £500 each, who were Mr. Stephen Hodges, Mr. Joseph Stocker, Mr. Thomas Arne, and Mr. John Hodges. Upon their being discharged, the two Ladies returned to London in a Coach, taking with them the Turnkey, to prevent any Insult from the Mob, which was pretty numerous. Whilst in the Coach, the Ladies seemed overjoyed at their Deliverance, and told the Turnkey, That the Affair turned out just as they would have had it.

Monday, March 16th, the Prisoner Noble was brought to the Bar, and asked what he had to say why Judgment should not be given, and Execution awarded? On which he moved in Arrest of Judgment,

My Lord, I humbly move in Arrest of Judgment, for that I apprehend I have had a Mis-trial, and that my Trial has been contrary to the Law of England, in that we were severd in our Challenges, and yet were tried together by the same Jury; and said, that in Charnock, King, and Keys's Trial, [Vide State Trials, Vol. IV.] Lord Chief-Justice Holt said, 'You may challenge Thirty-five peremptorily, without Cause; but if you do not all agree in the same Challenge, ye cannot be tried together by the same Jury, but the Court must separate you, and try you every one singly.' And quoted other Parts of the Trial, and desired that his Counsel might speak to it.

But the Court over-ruled the Motion, alledging, that the Lord Chief-Justice Holt's Reason, in the Case of Charnock, King, and Keys, was, that in case each of them severally challenged Thirty-five, three Times thirty-five would amount to One Hundred and Five, and then they must be obliged to sever them, (as the Court were near obliged to have done in the present Case) for default of Jurors.

Then Mr. Noble made the following Speech to the Court.

My Lord,

I AM soon to appear, and render an Account of my Sins to God Almighty; If your Lordship should think me guilty of those Crimes I have been accused, and convicted by my Jury, I am sure, then, your Lordship will think that I stand in need of such a Preparation, such a Humiliation for my great Offences, such an Abhorrence of my past Life, to give me Hopes of a future one; that I am not without Hopes that it will be a Motive to your Lordship's Goodness, that after you have judged and sentenced my Body to Execution, you will charitably assist me with a little Time for the Preservation of my Soul.

If I had nothing to answer for, but killing Mr. Sayer with precedent Malice, I should have no Need to address myself to your Lordship in this Manner. It is now too late to take Advantage by denying it to your Lordship, and too near my End to dissemble it before God. I know, my Lord, the Danger, the Hell, that I should plunge myself headlong into; I know I shall soon answer for the Truth I am now about to say, before a higher Tribunal, and a more discerning Judge than your Lordship, which is only in Heaven; that I did not take that Advantage to kill Mr. Sayer, by a Thought or Apprehension, that I could do it under Umbrage of the Law, or with Impunity; and nothing was more distant from my Thoughts, than to remove him out of the World to enjoy his Wife (as was suggested) without Molestation: Nor could any one have greater Reluctance, or Remorse, from the Time of the Fact to the Hour of my Trial, than I have had, though the Prosecutors reported to the contrary; for which I heartily forgive them.

The Person making such Resistance after such Notice, doth it at his own Peril. He acteth avowedly and deliberately in Defiance of the ordinary Course of Justice. And therefore it will be no Excuse on his Part to say, that he did not know or believe that the Officer came armed with a proper Authority. This Rule is founded on the Policy of the Law, and upon every Principle of Government.

The Judges who differed thought that the Officers ought to have declared in an explicit Manner what Sort of Warrant they had.

They said that an Escape doth not ex Vi termini, nor in the Notion of Law, imply any Degree of Force or Breach of the Peace; and consequently the Prisoner had not due Notice that they came under the Authority of a Warrant grounded on a Breach of the Peace. And for Want of this due Notice the Officers are not to be considered as acting in Discharge of their Duty, but as mere Trespassors.

On this Question alone the Case turned.

But a few of the Judges who conceived the Fact to be Murder, were of Opinion that it would have been so, even admitting that the Officers could not have justified the breaking open the Door. Here was no Arrest actually made; the Officers, even admitting that due Notice had not been given, had committed a bare Trespass in the House of Cowling, where the Prisoner happened to be; no Trespass done to the Property of the Prisoner, no Attempt on his Person.

But admitting that a Trespass in the House with an Intent to make an unjustifiable Arrest on the Owner, could be considered as some Provocation to a Stander-by; yet surely the knocking a Man's Brains out, or cleaving him down with an Ax on so slight a Provocation, savoureth rather of brutal Rage, or, to speak more properly, of Diabolical Mischief, than of Human Frailty. And it ought always to be remembered, that, in all Cases of Homicide and sudden Provocation, the Law indulgeth to Human Frailty, and to that alone.

Besides the Circumstance of the Prisoner's standing with the Axe in his Hand, declaring before any Attempt to enter the Shop, "That the first Man that did enter should be a dead Man," sheweth it to be an Act of Deliberation as well as Cruelty.

And where the Circumstances of Deliberation and Cruelty concur, as they do in this Case, the Fact is undoubtedly Murder; as flowing from a wicked Heart, and Mind grievously depraved, and acting from Motives highly Criminal. Which is the genuine Notion of Malice in our Law.

My Counsel obliged me to say on my Trial, That I heard Mr. Sayer's Voice before he broke open the Door; I told them, as I now tell your Lordship, That I did not know it was him, 'till he was breaking in at the Door, and then, and not before, was my Sword drawn, and the Wound given, which Wound, as Dr. Garth informed me, was so very slight, that it was a thousand to one he died of it.

When I gave the Wound, I insensibly quitted the Sword; by which Means I left myself open for him to have done what was proved, and was so likely for him to have effected, viz. to have stabbed me, which are Circumstances that manifest the Greatness of my Surprise.

When I heard the Company run up Stairs, I was alarmed, and in fear; the Landlord telling me, instantly thereupon, that the House was beset either for me or himself, added to my Confusion: I then never thought or intended to do mischief; but first bolted the Fore-Door, and then bolted and padlocked the Back-Door, (which was half glazed) and began to fasten the Shutters belonging to it, designing only to screen myself from the Violence of the Tumult. When he broke open the Door, and not till then, I perceived and knew he was present: And his former Threats and Attempts, which I so fully proved on my Trial (and could have proved much fuller, had not Madam Salisbury's Evidence been taken from me), made my Fear so great, and the Apprehension of my Danger so near, that what I did was the natural Motion of Self-Defence, and was too sudden to be the Result of precedent Malice; and I solemnly declare, that I did not hear or know from Twissford the Landlord, or otherwise, that any Constable was attending the Deceased, till after the Misfortune happened.

It was my Misfortune, that what I said, as to hearing the Deceased's Voice, was turned to my Disadvantage by the Counsel against me; and that I was not intitled to any Assistance of Counsel to enforce the Evidence given for me, or to remark upon the Evidence given against me, which, I do not doubt, would have fully satisfied your Lordship and the Jury, that what happened was more my Misfortune than my Design or Intention.

If I had been able, under that Concern, to remark upon the Evidence against me, that Mr. Sayer was but the tenth Part of a Minute in breaking open the Door, it could not then be well supposed by the Jury, that I was preparing myself, or putting myself in Order to do Mischief, which are Acts of Fore-thought and Consideration, which require much more Time than is pretended I could have had, from the Time I discovered Mr. Sayer; for even from his Entry into the House, to the Time of the Accident, did not amount, as I am informed, to more than the Space of three Minutes. But I did not discover him before the Door gave Way.

I wish it had been my good Fortune, that the Jury had applied that to me, which your Lordship remarked in Favour of the Ladies, That the Matter was so very sudden, so very accidental, and unexpected, that it was impossible to be a Contrivance and Confederacy, and unlikely that they could come to a Resolution in so short a Time: I do not remember your Lordship distinguished my Case, as to that Particular, to be different from theirs, nor was there Room left for it; for it is impossible for your Lordship to believe, that I dreamt of Mr. Sayer's coming thereat that Time; but, on the contrary, I fully proved to your Lordship, that I went there upon another Occasion, that was lawful and beneficial for the Deceased; and I had no more Time to think or contrive, than the Ladies had to agree, or consent.

If any Thing could be construed favourably on the Behalf of such an unfortunate Wretch as myself, I think the Design I had some Time before begun, and was about finishing that Day, might have taken away all Suspicion of Malice against Mr. Sayer.

Must it be thought, my Lord, that I only am such a Sinner that I cannot repent, and make Reparation to the Persons I have injured? It was not denied, but I strongly solicited a Reconciliation between Mr. Sayer and his Lady; and if this had tended to procure me an easier Access to Mrs. Sayer, it would have been such a Matter of Aggravation against me, that it could not have escaped the Remark of the Counsel against me, nor the Sharpness of the Prosecutors present in Court; with both I transacted, and to both I appealed, particularly to Mr. Nott, to whom, but the Day before the Accident, I manifested my Desire of having them live together again: And therefore, my Lord, it should be presumed I laboured to be reconciled, and not to revenge myself on Mr. Sayer.

Your Lordship, I hope, will observe so much in my Favour, that it was so far from being a clear Fact in the Opinion of the Jury, that they fate up all Night, and, believing there was no Malice at that Time, told your Lordship, they intended, and were inclinable to find it Man-slaughter; and doubting the Legality of the Warrant to find it Special.

I hope this will touch your Lordship's Heart so far, as not to think me so ill a Man, as to deserve what the best of Christians are taught to pray against, a sudden Death.

I confess I am unprepared; the Hopes of my being able to make a legal Defence, and my Endeavours therein, having taken up my Time, which I wish I had better employed, I beg Leave to assure your Lordship, upon the Words of a dying Man, that as none of the indirect Practices to get or suppress Evidence were proved upon me, so they never sprang from me; and I can safely say, that my Blood, in a great measure, will lie at their Door that did it; because it drew me under an ill Imputation of defending myself by Subornation of Perjury.

I would be willing to do my Duty towards my Neighbours, as well as God, before I die.

I have many Papers and Concerns (by reason of my Profession) of my Clients in my Hands, who will suffer if they are not put into some Order. And nothing but these two Considerations could make Life desirable under this heavy Load of Irons, and restless Remorse of Conscience for my Sins.

A short Reprieve for these Purposes, I hope will be agreeable to your Lordship's Humanity and Christian Virtue; whereupon your Lordship's Name shall be blessed with my last Breath, for giving me an Opportunity to make Peace with my Conscience and God Almighty.

Then the Court passed Sentence on him, and told him he should be allowed a reasonable Time for the Purposes he mentioned, which they hoped he would make a good use of; and ordered his Execution for Saturday, March 28. When the Gaoler came (with a Barbarity natural to those Fellows) to load Mr. Noble with Irons, he was very much confounded; for though he had given, he said, near 200*l.* to all the Crew about him to have some Favour, they loaded him with the heaviest Irons, and cursed him as they were putting them on. Thus the Ladies left the dear Partner of their Pleasures and Perils bound with harder Chains than those of Love, his Hands manacled, his Legs fetter'd, his Friends abandoning him, his very Counsel and Solicitors declaring, they would not have been concerned for him had they known of the Adultery; yet all this he bore with uncommon Patience, but shewed great Concern for being so basely deserted by the very Women, who brought upon him all his Misfortunes.

He behaved very decently, whilst under Sentence of Death; and would often say, he did not think his Crime Murder in the Eye of the Law, and continually exclaimed against Farrington, the Bailiff's Evidence. One Thing was very particular, Mrs. Sayer came to Kingston, the Day before he was executed, in the Disguise of a Servant-Maid, and sent a Letter to him, giving him Notice she was come, and so disguised, that if he would see her, she could come easily to him, notwithstanding the Orders the Gaoler had not to admit her. Noble, on reading the Letter, did not seem averse to seeing her; but the Divines who attended him, persuaded him from it; and he sent her word, That he was a Man still, and liable to Passions; she had Time, and might repent; but he had but a very short Time, and that must be employed about the Concerns of his Soul. It is certain, he saw neither of the Women after his Conviction, though they were soliciting a Reprieve for him all the Time.

Accordingly, Saturday, March 28, 1713, he was executed at Gallows-Hill, near Kingston; when he delivered the following Account to the three Clergymen that attended him.

The true Copy of the original Paper signed by Mr. Richard Noble, which he designed for his Last Speech, delivered, to Mr. Cooke, Curate of Kingston, and Ordinary of Surrey; another to Mr. Broughton, Vicar of Kingston; and a third to the Rev. Mr. L'Herondell: With a particular Account of his Behaviour some Days before his Execution, by all the aforesaid Clergymen.

An Account writ by Richard Noble, the Afternoon before his Execution.

I HAVE, since my Confinement (under Sentence of Death) to this very Hour, been under the greatest Expectation of a short Reprieve; especially, for that I was credibly assured the Lord Chief Justice Parker had promised to grant it for my Clients Sake, in case they would make Affidavit before him, of their having Papers and Writings in my Hands; which Condition (I am told) was perform'd on their Part.

If such Promise was made, I heartily forgive him in not performing it.

This Disappointment I assign as the true Reason of my being very brief in the Account, which otherwise might have been incumbent on, or at least have been expected from me to have enlarged upon.

I have been often told, that it hath been reported I have acted criminal Indecencies with Mrs. Salisbury and Mrs. Elizabeth Nevil (the Mother and Sister of Mrs. Mary Sayer), and that both or one of them were, or was privy to, or countenancing of such unlawful Acts of mine with the said Mrs. Sayer. I think it my Duty to declare, as I do, that such Report is false.

As to the murdering Mr. Sayer, I do declare, that Mrs. Salisbury, or Mrs. Sayer, did not draw the Sword with which I unfortunately killed him: Nor was either of them aiding, directing, or advising of such Murder: Nor did either of them open the Door whereat I killed him; tho' the contrary hath been suggested to me by one of the Sisters of the Deceased.

I am told, that it is reported I was married to Mrs. Sayer whilst we were in the Marshalsea, and that she hath been with me since my Condemnation. I do declare, that such Reports are false, and that I never was married to the said Mrs. Sayer.

As to what relates chiefly to myself, Time will not permit my saying so much as I intended. I hope that my Dying Words may make a deep and sensible Impression on the Minds of such Persons as may read this Paper, that such as are going on in a Course of Sin, may be awakened from their Lethargy, and deterred from the Continuance in, or Commission of any known Sin against the Living God; but more especially those who have been Partners with me in my Sins.

I would not extenuate or palliate the Crime of Murder which I committed: Therefore must say, that though the Fact was committed under the greatest Surprise, and without any premeditated Malice, or Design, by removing him out of the World to have the freer Access to his Wife, (which gave me reasonable Hopes of my escaping the Justice of human Laws); yet I must own, that the Judgment of God, in bringing me to this deserved and shameful Death is very just; and I do declare, that I never had, nor ever knew that Mrs. Salisbury, Mrs. Sayer, and Mrs. Nevil, or any of them, had any Design to kill Mr. Sayer by Poison, or otherwise.

I have secretly and wilfully committed many great and most heinous

VOL. IX.

Sins against God, besides that for which I am now to die. God suffered me to act those Sins for several Years, without punishing me himself, or suffering me to fall under the Hand of human Laws. I had frequent Checks of Conscience to recal and restrain me from committing further Sins; but I stifled or diverted those good Thoughts, and continued the Practice of my beloved Sins with Pleasure.

I indeed have made many Resolutions to God of Repentance and Conversion, but soon broke through them, which is a great Aggravation of my Offences; and those Sins, and those Aggravations undoubtedly justly provoked God to suffer me to act that horrid Crime, for which I am now to die.

I heartily beg Pardon of the Relations of the Deceased, for the Injury done them by the Murder of Mr. Sayer.

I heartily beg Pardon of all others that I have injured by any secret or open Means.

I heartily forgive every Person that has done me any Injury; especially those who strained their Consciences to affect me on my Trial. I pray God give them Grace to repent of those and all other Sins; lest by such and other Provocations against God, they destroy both their Bodies and Souls.

I have had very good Help and Instructions from some worthy Divines, and other good Christians that have attended me since my Condemnation; who have (I believe) done my Soul much Good, for which I am very thankful; and may God have the Glory by it, and they their due Reward.

I have (since my Condemnation) occasionally been under the utmost Disorder and Perplexity, for having so many and such great Sins to repent of in so short a time; but as my Endeavours for a longer Time have proved ineffectual, so I hope that God Almighty will accept, in his great Mercy, that small Space which he, in his wise Providence, hath thought fit to allow me.

And whereas I have been told, that I was thought to be one of the Sect of the Free-Thinkers, I do utterly deny the same, and that I ever so much as read any Book published by the Free-Thinkers.

Perhaps it may be observed, that this my Dying Speech is not so paradoxical as that which I spoke when I received Sentence of Death. Then I was in hopes of preserving my Life; but now, being satisfied to the contrary, my Thoughts are turned another way (to wit) to make my Peace with my Conscience and my God.

But as to the Truth of this my Dying Speech, I call God Almighty to witness, that I know not of the least Falsity therein, as I hope for eternal Salvation.

March 27.

RICHARD NOBLE.

BEING under the Obligations usual on those, that receive Papers from Dying Persons to be published, and having faithfully discharged our Trust therein, we have found some other Reasons to subjoin to it a further brief Relation of Mr. Noble's Behaviour and Conduct during the last Week of his Life, wherein we all frequently visited him.

So far as any or all of us could possibly discern, or collect from his many Answers and Declarations from his whole Discourse, and the Tenor of his constant Devotion, he repented from the Bottom of his Heart of the manifold and heinous Sins of his Life; that Crying Sin especially for which he died.

He professed an unshaken Belief of the Truth and Importance of the Christian Religion, and a steadfast Faith in, and Reliance on the only atoning Merits of his Redeemer.

He was desirous, and resolute to die in the Communion of the Church of England, and in perfect Charity with all the World; he appeared under a calm Resignation to the Sovereign Will of God, and not without increasing Hopes of Pardon, as his Death approached nearer; to the very Article of which his Disposition was such as himself had often prayed for.

We pray to God, that these last Sentiments of his (who is cut off by the just Judgment both of God and Man, in the 28th Year of his Age) may have that happy and peculiar Effect, which (next to his own Salvation) he constantly had in view; the reclaiming those in particular (we mean) who have at any time, or in any manner, been Partners or Associates with him in Wickedness. We find this briefly hinted in his Paper; but we know, he thought on it frequently, and laboured much about it. We could produce Instances and Proofs of all we say: But we hope this general Account will suffice to answer the Importunity of some; and perhaps to silence the importunate Clamours of others, who have added very false, as well as needless Aggravations to his Guilt.

March 30, 1713.

Thomas Cooke, Ordinary of Surrey and Curate of Kingston.

John Broughton, M. A. Vicar of Kingston.

F. Alex. L'Herondell, Chaplain to one of Her Majesty's Regiments.

The following Case being reckoned curious, and a proper Addition to Mr. Noble's Motion in Arrest of Judgment, is here inserted.

The Case of Mr. Richard Noble impartially considered: Abstractly from the Man, or Crime, but merely as to the Law, in relation to the Motion by him made, on Monday the 16th Day of March, 1712, at Kingston Assizes, in Arrest of Judgment: And the Reason given for over-ruling the same confused. By a Student of the Inner-Temple.

RICHARD NOBLE, Gentleman, Mary Salisbury, and Mary Sayer, Widow, were indicted; he, for the Murder of John Sayer, Esq. on the 29th Day of January, Anno 11^o Annæ Reginae; Salisbury, as present, aiding, assisting, and abetting the same; and Mary Sayer, Widow of the Deceased, for Petty-Treason, as being present, aiding, assisting, and abetting the Murder of her said Husband; and the said Noble, on the Coroner's Inquest for the Murder of the said John Sayer, and for Manslaughter on the Statute of Stabbing: And on Thursday the 12th Day of March, 1712, were severally verally arraigned, and severally pleaded Not Guilty, and put themselves on Trial, to which they were brought the next Morning; and on their Trial they severally challenged of those returned to serve upon the Jury, viz. Richard Noble 20, Mary Salisbury 20, and Mary Sayer 35, peremptorily; after which a Jury was sworn, and charged with them all jointly; and on a long Hearing found Richard Noble Guilty of the Facts in the Indictments, and also on the Coroner's Inquest; and found Mary Salisbury and Mary Sayer Not Guilty.

Whereupon, on Monday following, the 19th of March, Richard Noble was set to the Bar, and demanded what he could say, why Judgment should not be given, and Execution awarded? Upon which he moved in Arrest of Judgment in these or the like Words:

My Lord, I humbly move in Arrest of Judgment, for that I apprehend I have had a Mis-Trial, and that my Trial has been contrary to the Law of England, in that we severed in our Challenges, and yet were tried together by the same Jury: And, to warrant this Opinion, I have in my Hand the Trial of Mr. Charnock, King, and Keys. There were, my Lord, then upon the Bench, the Lord Chief Justice Holt, the Lord Chief Justice Treby, the Lord Chief Baron Ward, Mr. Justice Nevill, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Rokeby; and there the Lord Chief Justice Holt, directing himself to the Prisoners, said thus: "Look ye, you that are the Prisoners, every one of you has the Liberty to challenge Thirty-five of those that are returned to serve upon the Jury that is to try you, without shewing any Cause: Now, if you will all join in the same Challenge, then we can try you all together as you are altogether jointly in the same Indictment, and save the Time and Trouble that will otherwise be unavoidable; but if you will not join in the same Challenge, but every Man challenge for himself, as by Law he has Liberty to do, we must be forced to try you single; and therefore we would know of you, whether you design to join in your Challenges or not." State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 566.

And in the same Page, "I tell you, what the Law is in such Cases; you may, every Man of you, challenge Thirty-five peremptorily, without Cause; but if you do not all agree in the same Challenges, ye cannot be tried together by the same Jury, but the Court must separate you, and try you every one single."

And again, "Do you understand what is said to you, Mr. King and Mr. Keys? Every one of you may, without shewing any Cause, except against Thirty-five of those that are returned of the Jury, which are to try you, if you have no mind that those should be sworn; but then, if each of you do severally challenge Thirty-five, ye cannot be tried by the same Jury."

And there is a Case to the same purpose in one of the Year-Books, I think it is in 9 E. IV. fol. 27, but desire that my Counsel may speak to it. This is the Substance of what Mr. Noble then said; upon which, being asked who were his Counsel? He answered, Mr. Darnall and Mr. Bonwick, who were by the Court readily assigned to be his Counsel; but (for what reason I cannot well apprehend) could neither of them be prevailed on to speak to it.

So that although it was agreed and allowed, that the Words were as full and clear as they could be penned, the Court soon over-ruled the Motion, alledging, That the Lord Chief Justice Holt's Reason in the Case of Charnock, King, and Keys, was, that in case each of them severally challenged Thirty-five, three times Thirty-five would amount to One Hundred and Five, and then they must have been obliged to sever them (as the Court were near obliged to have done in the present Case) for Default of Jurors; And Mr. Noble, after a Speech by him, tending to obtain a short Reprieve, had Judgment given against him.

I have, as carefully as I could, fairly and indifferently stated the Case, and shall now proceed to consider it as briefly as possible.

Challenge of a Juror is an undoubted Right of the Subject, and was at the Common Law; and therefore, it is to be presumed, to have been as ancient as Trial by Juror, and was unquestionably at first allowed in favorem Vitæ, and to give the Prisoner an Opportunity, as it were, to chuse his Jury, so as he exceed not the Number prescribed by the Law: And, consequently, I take it, at the Common Law, every Man, of right, might and still may, the same having been altered by no Statute that I can find, as to a Commoner, demand to be tried single, although jointly indicted in the same Indictment with others; and that for these Reasons, among others:

First, For that in case an innocent Person should unhappily be indicted with a Criminal, it might be a means to prevent the Jury, from the Evidence given against the Criminal, to be inveigled or drawn aside, to give too hard a Verdict on the Guiltless.

Secondly, For that when a Pannel is returned, the Prisoner (who, as was said before, may in a manner chuse his Jury) will otherwise be deprived of that Right: As if two or three are indicted, and the first perceive that in the Beginning of the Pannel there are such returned, as he has great reason to suspect are partial, but by challenging has a Prospect to bring himself to those in the Pannel, which he has reason to apprehend are indifferent; if, when he has challenged the Number the Law allows him, and his Hands, as it were, tied up, the other indicted with him shall come in and take off all those indifferent Men, and so leave him over to those he had as much (or more) reason to suspect as those he had before challenged; which is a Mischief, and that the Law abhors, for the Juror returned may have Malice to one, and be indifferent as to the other; and so is the 9 E. IV. fol. 27. and the Plaintiff or Prosecutor no ways prejudiced, for he might have sued several ven. fac. and thereby have been aided. And so is the Book expressly.

Thirdly, For that the Court cannot accept of a joint Plea, nor receive a joint Verdict; but the Plea of Not Guilty, although it be the General Issue, yet in its Nature and Effect is Several.

And so in Trespas against Several; they may every one come and plead several Pleas by several Attornies, and have several Trials: And reasonable, for otherwise a Plaintiff might join one in the Action, who could oblige all the others to stand or fall by his Confession, Defence, or Plea. And as in Trespas they may sever in their Pleas, so in Treason or Felony Not Guilty is a several Plea, nay, and amounts to a Special Plea; and the Prisoners, or any of them, shall have the same Advantages, as if he or they had pleaded specially to all Intents and Purposes whatsoever. Dr. & St. cap. 48. fol. 150, 151, 152.

From whence I argue, That it is the Right of every Subject to demand and have a separate Trial, in criminal Cases, if so he be minded. For,

If Three are indicted of Felony, one challenges whole Number Twenty, and those Twenty are to be drawn, that is, set aside and not suffered to pass upon the other; and the second challenge Twenty, those are to be drawn or set aside in like manner; and the third challenge likewise Twenty, who must by the same Rule be likewise drawn or set aside, as to all; this will amount to Sixty challenged by the first; and as the first and second Prisoners have the Benefit of the Challenges of the third, so has the third the Benefit of theirs. This tantamounts to a Challenge of Sixty by each, and thereby endangers their being pressed or hanged for challenging above the Number prescribed by the Law; which the Court is by no means to suffer.

An Appeal against Beauchamp, and several others, who plead Not Guilty, and one ven. fac. for all issued return, &c. at which Day one of the Defendants challenge a Juror peremptorily, and the other Defendants say nothing, the Juror shall be sworn against them, and the Reason there given is, for that otherwise they might be delayed of their Acquittal for ever; a Mischief, Inconvenience, and Wrong: And therefore the Book goes on, and says, If Covin be between me and two others, that I bring an Appeal against them and another, to the end the other shall be detained in Prison, &c. in that Case, if I have a joint ven. fac. &c. and one challenge peremptorily; and if he remain for default of Jurors, then at another Day may the other do in the same manner; and then, when they have taken their peremptory Challenges, still one of them may challenge with Cause, and I will commit this Challenge, &c. and so the Three shall remain in Prison for ever. If the Challenge of one shall be for all, &c. And the Doubt there was, Whether the Court could sever them, it being in an Appeal, and the ven. fac. joint? And by all the Justices of the one Bench, and the other, it was held, That because the ven. fac. was joint, the Challenge of the one is for all, for that he could not be drawn as to one, and taken against the other; and the Plaintiff ought to have had several ven. fac.

And afterwards the Plaintiff challenged the Array, which was quashed; and the Plaintiff prayed several ven. fac. against every one of them to the Coroners; which, by Justice Jenny, he could not have in that Case, for this reason only, because the Plaintiff had elected to have a joint ven. fac. The Plaintiff notwithstanding prayed to have several ven. fac. at their Peril. Which plainly shews, that the Law was against them as to the other. 9 E. IV. fol. 27.

And it was there said, That at a Gaol-Delivery, if an Inquest be demanded to pass upon two or three Men, and one challenge peremptorily, then the Clerk ought to sever the Felons, every one by himself. And there seemed to be a Difference (and so is the Book) where there are several Plaintiffs, &c. because if a Man be found favourable to one, he is favourable to both, for that their Title is joint: But otherwise it is of Defendants, where a Man may have Favour or Malice to one, or not; or be indifferent to the other. 9 E. IV. fol. 27.

Appeal against the Principal and Accessary, who plead Not Guilty, and the Accessary challenge the Array, and the Principal said nothing; and because the Array was quashed on his Challenge, Hankford would not take the Inquest against the other; and the Reason was, because the ven. fac. was joint, and the Plaintiff might have had several ven. fac. 4 H. IV. 58.

And in Banco Reg. Thimelby and Gray were arraigned on an Indictment of Robbery, as Principals, who severally pleaded Not Guilty, and severally put themselves upon their Country; upon which a ven. fac. was returned this Term, and the Jury appeared, and Three of the Jury were sworn against both, and Thimelby challenged the four next without Cause, or without saying peremptorily; and Gray would not challenge them, for which Thimelby was withdrawn from the Bar; and the Four who were challenged by Thimelby were sworn against Gray, and so many more, till Twelve were charged on him, who found him Guilty: And Saunders moved, Whether this was a right Trial or not? For that there was but one ven. fac. awarded, nor but one Pannel returned; and one Juror cannot be drawn out of the Pannel, and in the same Pannel be allowed: But by the Opinion of all the Justices of both Benches, the Trial was good, for that no Judgment was given, that the Jurors that were challenged by the one should be drawn, but, that they should stand aside for a time; and were not clearly discharged by the Court; and for that the ven. fac. for the King differ from ven. fac. in an Appeal. Dyer, fol. 152, pl. 8.

And although in 1 H. V. 10. it is ruled by the Opinion of the Court, that a Juror on Indictment may be challenged by one of the Defendants, and stand against the other, &c. that is, it is no Principal Cause of Challenge in one Defendant to say the other Defendant had before challenged him. And so is the Book to be taken, and the Law is agreeable thereto, and the Reason there given fully explains it so to be intended, viz. for that they are several Pannels and Inquests in Law; and therefore, if one Defendant had appeared on an Indictment, and the other Defendant had made Default, yet the Court would have proceeded against him who appeared, although it may be otherwise in an Appeal.

Which plainly proves the Court ought to sever the Prisoners on Indictment, where they will not join in their Challenges.

And in the Trial of the Regicides; Harrison, Scroop, Jones, Clements and Scot were set to the Bar to be tried, and Sir Thomas Allen was called and sworn; then Sir Joshua Aib was called, and Mr. Scroop excepted against him: then Sir Jeremy Whicheot was called, and Mr. Harrison excepted against him; James Halley, Esq. being next to be sworn, Mr. Scot excepted against him: Whereupon the Court (speaking to the Prisoners) said, "If you will not agree in your Challenges, we must be forced to try you severally." And Henry Mildmay, Esq. being called next, Mr. Scroop excepted against him: Whereupon the Court said, "We must needs try them severally, therefore set them all aside but Harrison." Which was done, and the several Persons which before had been called and excepted against, were again called, and excepted against by Mr. Harrison. Trial of the Regicides, State Trials, Vol. II. p. 313. And so in Mr. Scroop's Trial.

Jones, Scroop, Scot, Gregory, Clements, and Carew being set to the Bar, Sir Thomas Allen was called, and his Hand being on the Book, Scroop challenged him; and thereupon the Lord Chief Baron spoke thus to the Prisoners: "That you may not mistake, if you challenge in this manner, and do not join in your Challenges, we must try you severally, one after another: I must tell you the Course of the Law; if one Challenge one, and another challenge another, we must sever, and go to Trial one by one. Call the next." The Clerk called Sir Henry

Henry Worth, and Scroop challenged him; upon which the Lord Chief-Baron replied, "Then we must go on severally, set all aside but Mr. Scroop." And directing himself to Mr. Scroop, said farther, "Mr. Scroop, you may challenge particularly whom you will, till you come to Thirty-five; if you go beyond that Number, you will lose the Benefit of the Law."

And in that of Carrow, Scot, Jones, and Clements: They being at the Bar, the Lord Chief-Baron demanded of the Prisoners, Whether they were all agreed as to their Challenges? Who answered, No. "Then" (said the Lord Chief-Baron) we must do as before, sever you, and go to Trial severally." And directed, that the Three should be taken away, and that Mr. Carrow should be let stand at the Bar.

And indeed, through the whole Course of the Proceedings on the Trial of the Regicides, the Court took great Care of the several Prisoners, that none of them might be any ways prejudiced, either by challenging too many (viz. more than the Law allows) of the Jury, or any other Forms of Law, as a Matter perfectly incumbent on the Court to observe, take care of, and prevent.

And now I beg Leave to observe, that the Reason the Court gave in Noble's Case, was not that the Lord Chief-Justice Holt grounded his Opinion on; for that in Fol. 1. of Charnock's Trial, it appears that above eight-score were by the Sheriff returned to serve on that Jury, consisting of Baronets, Knights, Esquires, and Gentlemen; so that it plainly appears (they having been called over, sitting the Court) that in case each of the Prisoners had challenged Thirty-five, amounting to One Hundred and Five in all; yet would there have been a sufficient Number of Jurors, to wit, above Fifty-five, left to have passed upon, and tried the Prisoners.

And the Words of the Lord Chief-Justice Holt in Mr. Charnock's Trial, "We can try you all together, as ye are all together jointly in the same Indictment, and save the Time and Trouble, that will otherwise be unavoidable; but if you will not join in the same Challenges, but every Man challenge for himself, as by Law he has Liberty to do, we must be forced to try you single, and therefore, &c." can bear no other Construction, for the Word unavoidable is, what must happen or come to pass, notwithstanding any Accident or intervening Circumstances or Conjunction whatsoever: And, in that Sense, I make no Question, his Lordship spoke them; for otherwise, several other Expressions, no Doubt, would have occurred, and been used by his Lordship, as it might be necessary, and the like.

The often Repetition of the same Thing, has also a great Weight to enforce this Observation.

And this Reason clearly to me appears, to be the Foundation of the Case in the Commentaries, that though the Pannel be joint on Indictment, and Tales awarded, yet the Court (who are ever to be of Counsel for the Prisoners, to give them Law and Justice, 2 Inst. 178, and not permit any Inconvenience to happen to them in Forms of Law, Trial of Charnock & al. 7. Dr. & St. c. 48. p. 150, 1, 2.) may and (as I humbly apprehend) ought, in case the Prisoners sever in their challenges, to sever the Pannel, and prevent not only the Inconvenience in that Case mentioned, but many other. Plow. Com. 100, 101. H. P. C. fol. 256. Octavo Edition.

And this is the more to be relied on, for that in an Appeal against one Woodlark, the Defendant took so many Challenges, that the Jury remained against the Defendant, by Default of Jurors, and resolved, that in an Appeal of Murder, Rape, or Felony, there may be had a larger Number than the principal Pannel returned immediate, viz. what Number the Justices please to award, in regard the Defendants may challenge peremptorily; and therefore the Justices award a Tales of 40. 14 H. VII. fol. 716. tit. Appeal. And so of an Indictment. Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 257, 8vo. — Finch's Law, c. 36. fo. 415. and that the Stat. W. II. c. 38. does not extend to Criminal Cases or Indictments. Vane's Case, Kelyng 7. 16.

And the Practice has constantly been, and was so resolved at the Restoration, by a great Number of Justices, upon mature Deliberation, That if several Prisoners be put upon one Jury, and they challenge peremptorily, and sever in their Challenges, that then he who is challenged by one is to be drawn against all, because the Pannel being joint, one

Juror cannot be drawn against one, and serve for another; but in such Case the Pannel might be severed, and that the same Jury may be returned between the King and every one of the Prisoners, and then they are to be tried severally, and there the Challenge of one Prisoner is no Challenge to disable the Juror so challenged against another. And the Case of Dr. Ellis's Servant, Plow. Com. 100, 101. was agreed to be good Law, as to the severing the Pannels in that Case. And accordingly, in the Trial of Harrison, Scroop, Carrow, and other the Regicides, who challenged peremptorily, and severed in their Challenges, the Pannels were severed, and they were tried severally. Kelyng's Reports, fo. 9, 10. State Trials of the Regicides, Vol. II. p. 308, &c.

And throughout all the Books there appears to be no Dispute, but that where the Prisoners on Indictment challenge severally, the Court ought to sever them in their Trials. But it plainly appears, the only Question was, How, or in what Manner that was to be done, the ven. fac. and Pannel being joint? But that Objection being once removed, the Law is plain, That the Trials in all such Cases are to be severed, or the Prisoners cannot legally be tried at all.

And therefore I humbly submit it to the Judgment of the Learned in the Law, whether, in the principal Case, (not as to the Fact, which I pretend no ways to meddle with) although Judgment has passed on the Prisoner Noble, yet he having before Sentence moved this Matter in Arrest of Judgment, and likewise, as I have been credibly informed, (my coming into Court being just after that was over-ruled) having desired and earnestly pressed to be tried separately and apart from the other two, there be not Room to respite Execution till the Point be settled, and Consideration had what may be necessary farther to be done therein. And the rather, for that in the Case of Hopkin Hugget, on a special Verdict found at a Gaol-Delivery at Newgate, 25 April, 1666, 18 Car. II. on an Indictment of Murder, to this Effect: That John Berry, and two others with him the Day and Place, &c. had de facto, but without Warrant (for aught appeared) impressed a Man, unknown, to serve in the Wars against the Dutch Nation; that thereupon, after the unknown Man was impressed, he, with the said John Berry, went together quietly into Cloth-Fair; and the said Hopkin Hugget and three others walking together in the Rounds in Smithfield, and seeing the said Berry and two others, with the Man impressed, going into Cloth-Fair; instantly pursued after them, and overtaking Berry and the impressed Man, and the two other Men, required to see their Warrant, and Berry shewed them a Paper, which Hopkin Hugget and the three others said was no Warrant; and immediately the said Hopkin Hugget and the three others drew their Swords, to rescue the said Man impressed, and did thrust at the said John Berry, and thereupon the said John Berry, and the two others with him, did draw their Swords and fight together, whereupon the said Hopkin Hugget did give the Wound, &c. to the said John Berry, whereof he instantly died: And if upon the whole Matter the said Hopkin Hugget be guilty of Murder, they find so; if of Manslaughter, they find so, &c. And afterwards the Opinion of all the Judges of England, met at Serjeants-Inn, in Fleet-Street, being desired in the Case, (having had Copies of this Special Verdict sent to them) whether they held it Murder or Manslaughter? And there being a Difference in their Opinions, viz. the Lord Chief-Justice Bridgman, Lord Chief-Baron Hales, Mr. Justice Atkins, Tyrell, Turner, Brown, Archer, and Rainsford, were of Opinion as then advised, but not to be bound by it, that it was no Murder, but only Manslaughter; and gave some Reasons to support their Opinions: But the Lord Chief-Justice Kelyng, Mr. Justice Twissden, Wyndham, and Morton, were of another Opinion, and held it to be Murder, and gave their Reasons for it: After which Difference the Lord Chief-Justice Kelyng granted a Certiorari, to remove the Cause into the then King's-Bench, to be argued there, and to receive a final and legal Determination. And although all the Judges of the Court were clearly of Opinion it was Murder, yet it being in a Case of Life, they did not think it prudent to give Judgment of Death upon him, but admitted him to his Clergy. Kelyng's Reports, fo. 59, 60, 1, 2.

So very tender were the Judges in the Case of Life, not only well to be advised, but even against their own Opinions, and that when they were very clear in it, to give Judgment in Favour of Life, although in a Case of Murder.

II. The Trial of Major JOHN ONEBY, at the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey, before the Right Honourable Sir FRANCIS FORBES, Knt. Lord-Mayor of London, Mr. Baron HALE, Sir WILLIAM THOMPSON, Knt. Recorder of London, and others his Majesty's Justices, March 1725-6, for the Murder of WILLIAM GOWER, Esq.

JOHN Oneby, of St. Martin's in the Fields, Gent. was indicted, for that he, on the 2d Day of February, 12 Geo. at the said Parish, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice fore-thought, made an Assault upon one William Gower, Esq. and that he the said John Oneby, with a Sword which he then and there held drawn in his Right Hand, the said William Gower in and upon the left Part of his Belly, near the Navel, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice fore-thought, did strike and thrust, giving the said William Gower, then and there, with the said drawn Sword, in and upon his said left Part of his Belly, near the Navel, a mortal Wound of the Length of one Inch and a half, and of the Depth of ten Inches; of which mortal Wound the said William Gower lived in a languishing Condition, from the 2d Day of February to the 3d Day of the said February; on which 3d Day of February, the said William Gower, at the Parish aforesaid, of the said mortal Wound did die; and that the said John Oneby, the said William Gower feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice fore-thought, did kill and murder."

He was a second Time indicted, on the Coroner's Inquisition, for the said Murder.

Thomas Hawkins. On the 2d of February, between Nine and Ten at Night, Mr. Blunt, the Deceased, the Prisoner and myself, went from Will's Coffee-House to the Castle-Tavern in Drury-Lane, where, in about half an Hour, Mr. Rich came to us. After the fourth Bottle, the Prisoner called for a Box and Dice; the Drawer said, they had none in the House, Why then, says the Prisoner, bring the Pepper-Box. The Drawer brought it, and Dice were laid upon the Table: but I don't know by whom. We played low, nobody setting above half a Guinea, and yet I had no great Inclination to game, and especially to set the Prisoner; and therefore, after a trifling Loss I declined the Play. The Prisoner appeared disgusted at it, and asked me, why I refused? I told him I should use my own Pleasure, whether it was agreeable to his Humour or not. The Rest continued playing. The Deceased lost 30s. Mr. Rich said, Who will set me three Half-Crowns? Upon which the Deceased took something out of his Pocket, and laid it on the Table, but concealed it with his Hand, and said, I'll set ye three Pieces; and then taking his Hand away, we saw three Half-pence. This was not offered to the Prisoner; but he appeared to be much affronted. He said, That is very impertinent to set three Half-pence. The Deceased said, What do you mean by impertinent? And the Prisoner replied, You are an impertinent Puppy; and presently snatched up a Bottle, and threw it at the Deceased's Head, and it beat some Powder out of his Wig, but did him no Hurt. He in Return, tossed a Glass or a Candlestick, I can't tell which, at the Prisoner; but it did not reach him. They both rose up together, and went to their Swords, which hung up in the Room. The Deceased being quickest got his Sword first, and drew it, and stood still in a Posture of Defence, at a good Distance from the the Prisoner, who was advancing, and was drawing his Sword to meet him; but Mr. Rich stepped in between, and prevented him. Then the Deceased threw away his Sword, and they all sat down again, and drank for about half an Hour; when the Deceased offering his Hand to the Prisoner, said, We have had Words, Major, and you was the Aggressor; but let us agree. The Prisoner answered, No, damn ye! I'll have your Blood! And then turning to me, he said, Hawkins, you was the Occasion of this. Why then, says I, if ye have done with him, and have any thing to say to me, I am your Man, and I'll see you out. No, says he, I have another Chap first. In about half an Hour after this, which was near Three in the Morning, the Company broke up. I went out of the Room first, and Mr. Blunt, and Mr. Rich were next after me. When I came into the Street it rained, and I run under a Penthouse, where I stood a little while; but not having a Chair ready, and seeing none of the Company come out, I returned to the Room, where I found the Deceased wounded, and leaning on a Chair in a languishing Condition. He died the next Morning. I knew him intimately, and I don't believe that there was a sweeter temper'd Man in the World.

John Rich. I, the Prisoner, the Deceased, and some others, went together to see the new Tragedy of Hecuba; we sat in the Pit. The Deceased and the Prisoner appeared to be good Friends all the Time of the Play; and as soon as it was done I left them; but met them again at the Castle Tavern in about half an Hour. The Prisoner and I called for a Box and Dice; which not being to be had, he called for a Pepper-Box, and it was brought; I saw Dice lying upon the Table, but don't know how they came there. I said, Let us play low. Some Words past between the Prisoner and Mr. Hawkins. I laid down three Half-Crowns. The Major set me. I threw Seven was the Main, and Six the Chance. The Deceased put down three Half-pence against me, and said, Here, I'll set ye three Pieces. The Prisoner damned him, and called him an impertinent Puppy. Sir, said the Deceased, I am not afraid of ye, and he that calls me a Puppy is a Scoundrel. At these Words, the Prisoner threw a Bottle at him. It brushed his Wig as it passed, and he in return tossed a Glass. They both got up together; but the Deceased being nimblest, jumped on the Table, and reached his Sword first; and then stepping down, he drew, and stood ready to defend himself, but made no Offer to push. In the mean time, the Prisoner took down his Sword and Cane, which hung together; and there being the Table and a Chair between them, he came round the Table, and was going to engage with the Deceased; but I stepped between them, told the Prisoner, who was drawing his Sword, if he made a Longe, it must be through my Body, which, as I was unarmed, would be wilful Murder. The Deceased then threw away his Sword, and they both sat down again. The Deceased put his Hand forward, and said, Come, Major, let us be reconciled, Words in Heat may be forgot and forgiven. The Prisoner answered, God damn you, you lie—I'll have your Blood, by God! And then, turning to Mr. Hawkins, he said, This is all along of you. Mr. Hawkins answered, Then I am your Man; and the Prisoner replied, No, I have another Chap to deal with first. When we all got up to go, the Prisoner hung his great Rug-Coat upon his Shoulders, and I think buttoned it in one or two Places. Mr. Hawkins went out first, Mr. Blunt next, the Deceased followed him; I, the Deceased, and the Prisoner came last: but he was hardly out of the Room, when he called to the Deceased, Hark ye, young Gentleman, a Word wif ye. The Deceased turned back, they both re-entered the Room. The Door was immediately shut fast. I heard a Clashing of Swords, and a loud Stamp on the Floor, which I guessed was made by the Prisoner, he being a very heavy Man. Mr. Blunt and I stepped back, and endeavoured to get in; we could not readily open the Door; but the Drawer coming to our Assistance, we made an Entrance, Mr. Blunt first, and I close behind him. The Prisoner was then next to the Door, and standing with his Sword drawn in his Right Hand, the Point of it being towards the Deceased, whom he held by the Shoulder with his Left Hand. I think the Deceased had then no Sword in his Hand, at least I saw none; and I soon afterwards found it close to the Wainscot, behind the Folding of the great oval Table. It was bloody and greasy four or five Inches from the Point. The Deceased closed with the Prisoner; but in such a manner, as if he rather fell towards him through Weakness, than otherwise, which makes me think the Wound was given him before we came in. We put him into a Chair, and sent for a Surgeon. As I held up my Hand to part them, I felt a little Prick through my Coat, by the Prisoner's Sword; but I believe it was done accidentally. Mr. Blunt at the same time clapt his Hand on his Belly, and said he was dangerously wounded; but I am ignorant by what Means. I told the Prisoner, when we came out of the Room, that I was afraid he had killed the Deceased, No, says he, I might have done it, if I would; but I have only frightened him. But suppose I had killed him, I know what I do in those Affairs; for if I had killed him To-night, in the Heat of Passion, I should have had the Law on my Side; but if I had done it at any other Time, it would have looked like a set Meeting, and not a Rencounter. I advised him however to make off, for fear of the worst.—I asked the Deceased on his Death-Bed, if he received the Wound fairly? He answered faintly, I think I did—but—I don't know—what might have happened—if you—had not—come in.

Michael Blunt. From the Play we went to Will's, and thence to the Castle, where we were very merry and friendly, till the Dice were called for. We played low, but Mr. Hawkins soon declined; upon which the Prisoner said to him, Why do you come into Company, when you won't do as others do? Mr. Hawkins answered, Don't trouble yourself about me, I'll do as I please.—The Deceased set three Half-pence: the Prisoner said it was damned impertinent; and some other Words passing, he flung a Flask at the Deceased, who in return tossed a Glass or a Candlestick. They took their Swords, but were prevented from engaging, and so they sat down again; the Deceased offered his Hand to be reconciled, upon which the Prisoner gave him very ill Language, and swore he would have his Blood. As this made me apprehensive that their Quarrel would break out again the next Day, I invited the Company to dine with me, in hopes to bring on a Reconciliation, and prevent future Mischief. The Prisoner answered my Offer with, No, G---d damn ye, I'll dine with none of ye. Are ye angry, Sir, says I, Have ye any thing to say to me?—Or me? says Mr. Hawkins.—Or me? says Mr. Rich.—No, he had nothing to say to any of us.—This was about Two or Three in the Morning. And after we were all come out of the Room, I heard the Prisoner call the Deceased back; and they were no sooner got into the Room again, but the Door was flung to, with great Violence, and I heard the Clashing of Swords. When I got in, which was with much Difficulty, I did not see that the Deceased had any Sword in his Hand, but he was sinking forward; and I, by going to assist him, received a Wound in my Belly, which I was afraid was mortal; but I cannot tell how, or by whom it was given, though I think it could not be by the Deceased, because he had no Sword; and besides, was not in a Condition to do it.—A Surgeon being in the House, gave me his immediate assistance.

Mr. Shaw, the Surgeon. I found the Deceased languishing in a Chair. His Intestines appeared at the Wound, and by being exposed to the Air began to mortify. When I had dressed him I sent him Home; but the next Day I found a second Rupture of the Intestines. He died soon after; and that Wound was the Cause of his Death.

Prisoner. A Wager was laid betwixt Mr. Rich and Mr. Blunt, concerning Mr. Mills's acting the Part of Cæsar in the Play of Julius Cæsar, and it was lost by Mr. Blunt. After this a Box and Dice were called for, but not by me; the Drawer said he had Dice, but no Box; upon which, somebody called for a Pepper-Box. I flung a Main at 12d. and passed it about. Mr. Hawkins refusing, I said, I thought there was as good Fellowship in a little Play, as in altogether Drinking: Then we played for Half-a-Crown or three Shillings; and when the Box came round again, the rest likewise refused to play; at last, the Deceased offered to set three Half-pence, which I said was very impertinent. He called me Rascal; You impertinent Puppy, says I, what do you mean by that? Upon which, he threw a Glass at my Head, and drew upon me. I told him, he acted basely in drawing upon me, when it was he that gave the Affront. After this I put on my Great Coat, and was going out. Mr. Hawkins had slipped away, and the rest being gone out of the Room, the Deceased pushed the Door to, and drew upon me, and wounded me in the Knee, and cut my Fingers. I parried and closed with him; he endeavoured to stab me in the Back; at which Time Mr. Blunt came in, and received a Wound in his Belly, which must have been by the Deceased's Sword.

John Barnes, the Drawer. I threw the Prisoner's Great Coat over his Shoulders, as he was going out. Mr. Hawkins came out first, and asked if his Chair was at the Door? I said, Yes. Mr. Blunt followed, and I went down to unbar the Door; the rest of the Company not coming, I went back and met Mr. Rich; he bid me open the Door; I thought he meant the Street-Door, and was turning that Way again; but he swore at me, and told me the other Door: I opened it, and went in first, and the Deceased and the Prisoner were both with their Swords in their Hands, pointing towards each other. The Deceased closed with the Prisoner in a manner as if he was rather falling than pushing; and the Prisoner with his Left Hand had hold of the Deceased, who, as soon as we parted them, was so weak that he could not stand. I did not see him bleeding when I came into the Room, though I cried out to the Prisoner, For God's Sake what are ye doing?

Prisoner. Did not you see the Deceased offer to stab me in the Back? Barnes. No.

Mr. Burdet, a Surgeon. The next Day in the Evening, the Prisoner sent a Coach to my House with a Letter for me, informing me that he had been wounded in a Rencounter, and desiring me to come to him. I went, and found him in Bed at the House of Mrs. Gardiner in Dean-Street, near Red-Lion-Square, where he had concealed himself. He had one Wound below his Knee an Inch and half long, another on his Buttock, two of his Fingers were cut in the first Joint, and he shewed me three or four Holes in his Breeches; but none of his Wounds were above a Quarter of an Inch deep, and that in his Leg had but just raised the Skin.

Mrs. Gardiner. The Prisoner came to my House about Two o'Clock in the Morning: He was bloody, and upon searching him, I found a Wound in his Buttock as deep as my Finger, and I dressed it for him.

Court. The Evidence is plain, that the Prisoner gave the first Provocation; and it is not denied, that he afterwards killed the Deceased. The Question is, Whether from the Time the Prisoner threw the Bottle, to the Time the Deceased received the Wound, there was any Reconciliation? If there was not, I think it can be no less than Murder.

The Jury found there was no Reconciliation; but not being satisfied as to the Murder, they agreed upon a Special Verdict.

The Counsel on both Sides attending, they stated the principal Points of the Evidence for the Consideration of the Judges.

What the Prisoner's Counsel drew up, was to this Effect:

"We find that the Prisoner, the Deceased, and Three more met at the Tavern, where they all appeared very friendly.—A Box and Dice were called for,—they played some Time together, till Mr. Rich said, Who will set me three Half-Crowns?—The Deceased put down three Half-pence, and said, I'll set ye three Pieces.—The Prisoner said, That's impertinent.—The Deceased answered, He that says I am impertinent, is a Rascal.—The Prisoner threw a Bottle, and the Deceased threw a Glass,—They both got up, and took their Swords; but one of the Company stepped in, and prevented their engaging.—They sat down again to drink,—staid about an Hour, and then the Company broke up.—The Prisoner put on his Great Coat—They all went out of the Room.—The Prisoner and the Deceased returned, the Door was shut, and the Clashing of Swords was heard."

The Counsel for the King stated the Evidence to the following Purpose:

"We find, that on the 2d of February the Prisoner, the Deceased, and Three others were in Company at the Castle Tavern, and continued in a peaceable manner for about two Hours.—The Prisoner then called for a Box and Dice; but none being to be had, he called for the Pepper-Box, which was brought.—Dice were found upon the Table;—they played at Hazard.—Mr. Rich asked, who would set him three Half-Crowns? The Deceased in a jocular manner laid down three Half-pence, and said, There's three Pieces.—The Prisoner called him an impertinent Puppy, and threw a Bottle at him, which missed him, but brushed his Wig.—The Deceased tossed a Glass or Candlestick at the Prisoner, which did not hit him.—They both rose up, and took their Swords; but were prevented from fighting.—They sat down again.—

The

"The Deceased offered to be Friends with the Prisoner; but the Prisoner answered, No, God damn ye! I'll have your Blood, by God!—In about an Hour after this, the Company all went out of the Room; but the Prisoner called to the Deceased, and said, Young Gentleman, a Word with ye.—They both returned into the Room,—the Door was shut with Violence, and the Clashing of Swords was heard.—We find that from the Time that the Bottle was flung, to the Time of the breaking up of the Company, there was no Reconciliation."

These two rough Draughts being compared, and some Alterations being made, a third was drawn up, which was agreed to and signed by the Jury, and was to this Tenor.

Special Verdict.

"That upon the 2d Day of February, 1725, the Prisoner and the Deceased were in Company, together with John Rich, Thomas Hawkins and Michael Blunt, in a Room at the Castle Tavern in Drury-Lane, in the County of Middlesex, in a friendly manner. That after they had continued thus for two Hours, Box and Dice were called for; the Drawer said, he had Dice but no Box; and thereupon the Prisoner bid the Drawer bring the Pepper-Box, which he immediately did: And then the Company began to play at Hazard; and after they had played some time, the said Rich asked, If any one would set him three Half-Crowns? Whereupon the Deceased in a jocular manner laid down three Half-penny Pieces, and then said to the said Rich, I have set you three Pieces, and the Prisoner at the same time set the said Rich three Half-Crowns, which the said Rich won: and immediately after the Prisoner, in an angry manner, turned about to the Deceased, and said, It was an impertinent Thing to set Half-pence, and that the Deceased was an impertinent Puppy for so doing; to which the Deceased answered, Whoever called him so was a Rascal. That thereupon the said John Oneby took up a Bottle, and with great Force threw it erga prædictum Willielmum Gower; which Bottle did not hit the said Gower, but brushed his Perriwig, as it passed by his Head, and beat out some of the Powder; whereupon the Deceased immediately after tossed a Candlestick or Bottle erga Prædictum Johannem Oneby, but did not hit him with the same: Upon which the Deceased and the Prisoner both rose up to fetch their Swords, which then hung up in the Room; and the Deceased drew his Sword, but the Prisoner was prevented from drawing his by the Company; and the Deceased thereupon threw away his Sword, and the Company interposing, they sat down again for the Space of an Hour. That at the Expiration of an Hour, the Deceased said to the Prisoner, We have had hot Words, but you was the Aggressor; but I think we may pass it over; and at the same time offered his Hand to the said John Oneby, to which the said John Oneby answered, No, damn you, I will have your Blood. They further find, that afterwards the Reckoning was paid by the Deceased, the Prisoner, Rich, Hawkins and Blunt; and all the Company, except the Prisoner, went out of the Room to go home; and the Prisoner remaining alone in the Room, called to the Deceased in these Words, Young Man, come back, I have something to say to you; whereupon the Deceased returned into the Room, and immediately the Door was flung to and shut, and thereby the rest of the Company were excluded; and then a Clashing of Swords was heard, and the Prisoner, with his Sword, gave the Deceased the mortal Wound mentioned in the Indictment, of which he died the next Day. They further find, that at the breaking up of the Company, the Prisoner had his Great Coat thrown over his Shoulders; and that he received three slight Wounds in the Engagement; and that the Deceased being asked, upon his Death-Bed, whether he received his Wound in a manner, amongst Swordsmen, called fair, answered, I think I did. That from the time of throwing the Bottle, there was no Reconciliation between the Prisoner and the Deceased. And whether this be Murder or Manslaughter, the Jury pray the Advice of the Court, and find accordingly."

The Prisoner being carried back to Newgate, remained very easy, for about a Twelve-month, having no Irons on, and lodged in a commodious Room; and as the Prosecutor had taken no Steps towards bringing on the Hearing of the Special Verdict, he grew pretty confident it would be determined Manslaughter, and sec'd Counsel to move the Court of King's-Bench for a Concilium, to be made for arguing the Special Verdict before the Court; which being ordered, a Certiorari pro Rege was brought (a); and the Prisoner being at the Bar, it was made a Concilium, the Court being of Opinion that it could not be made a Concilium in his Absence; and in Hillary Term, 13 Geo. I. it was argued by Serjeant Darnall for the King, and Serjeant Eyre for the Defendant.

Serjeant Darnall. In order to consider whether this be Murder or Manslaughter, I shall premise that which is not to be disputed, that every malicious Killing is Murder, and that Malice may be either express or implied: This is Malice implied in the Act itself, because there was no reasonable Provocation; there was nothing but Words passed between them, till the Prisoner threw the Bottle at the Deceased; and it has been often resolved, that, in point of Law, Words are no Provocation. But if Words were a sufficient Provocation; yet it appears, the Prisoner began with Words as well as Acts. The calling Mr. Gower an impertinent Puppy was previous to the saying or doing of any thing by Mr. Gower, that could give Offence to the Prisoner: If the setting of Half-pence was a Thing to be resented, the Affront was to Mr. Rich, and not to Mr. Oneby, whose Bet to Rich was not at all affected by what was done by Mr. Gower. And that it is Murder in this Defendant, I think cannot be disputed, after the Judgment of the Court in Mawgridge's Case (inserted at the End of the next Trial); there the Bottle thrown by Cope hit Mawgridge, and broke his Head; here, the Candlestick or Bottle tossed by Gower, did not hit the Prisoner at the Bar: That was a sudden Conflict; this a deliberate Act, after a Disposition to Peace manifested by Mr. Gower, and a Continuance of Malice in the Prisoner for above an Hour after the first Conflict. What was done here by Mr. Gower would have been justifiable in him, even if the Candlestick had hit the Prisoner: and so it was resolved in Mawgridge's Case; for there the Bottle returned by Mr. Cope did hit the Defendant, and broke his Head. And as the Act done by Mr. Gower was justifiable in him, it follows, that it can be no foundation to excuse or mitigate the subsequent Killing by Mr. Oneby. The Case put in Mawgridge's Case of an Assault by A upon B. B draws his Sword, and pursues A to the Wall, where A in his own Defence kills B; this is held Murder in A, though it has many strong Circumstances in favour of A, which are not in this Case. But I apprehend, it is not necessary to rely barely on this Point, that there is Malice implied in the Act; since it plainly appears, upon the State of the Case, that here is express Malice. When the Deceased was desirous to end the Matter amicably, the Prisoner replies, No, damn you, I will have your Blood: This explains and goes through the whole Fact, and proves the subsequent Killing to be malicious.

I do therefore insist, that the taking it either way, either as a Killing out of Malice implied, or Malice express, it is Murder; and that this upon the Fact is a Killing of Malice implied, and upon the Prisoner's own Words coupled with the Fact, it is Malice express, and consequently Murder.

Serjeant Eyre, for the Defendant. The Question is, what degree of Homicide this is; and I apprehend it to be but Manslaughter: The Distinction is, that if the Killing be of Malice fore-thought, it is Murder; if on a sudden Occasion, it is but Manslaughter; and that I take to be this Case: In 3 Instit. 51. Malice premeditated is defined to be, when one compasseth to kill another, and doth it sedato animo: On the other hand, Manslaughter is the doing it without Premeditation, upon a sudden Brawl, Shuffling, or Contention. 3 Instit. 57.

The Law has ever been indulgent to the Passions of Men; Ira furor brevis est, and therefore as a Madman, the Party is excused for what he does in a sudden Transport of Passion. I do admit, that bare Words are no Provocation; but yet they will serve to explain the Nature of the Combat, and shew whether it was sudden or not. The calling the Prisoner a Rascal, was what no Man of Honour could put up; and as this was the Beginning of the Quarrel, the Fighting was as sudden as the reproachful Words. If the Prisoner had stabbed Mr. Gower, upon speaking the Words; and Gower had done nothing, I believe it would have been Murder; but here was a regular Fight, an Interchange of Blows, and so it comes up to the Case put in Kelyng 55. of a Combat between two of a sudden Heat; where if one kills the other, it is but Manslaughter.

The Law has fixed no certain Time, when it shall be presumed the Passions of Men are cooled. The Case in 12 Co. 87. must take up a longer time than this; for there the Boy ran three Quarters of a Mile to his Father, and told his Story, and after that the Father provided himself with a Cudgel, and had as far to go in pursuit of the other Boy; and there is this Difference between that Case and the Case at Bar; that there the Adversary was out of Sight, but here he continued in Presence, which must rather inflame than abate the Passion.

The Words made use of by Mr. Gower carry an Imputation on Mr. Oneby, which might provoke him afresh; the telling him, he was the Aggressor, was not likely to make an End of the Quarrel: And that is plain, from the Manner in which Mr. Oneby understood them, who would never have said so harsh a Thing to his Friend Mr. Gower, if he had been at that Time in any degree Master of himself.

It is not found by the Verdict who began, after Mr. Gower returned into the Room: It is not likely the Prisoner began, because he had his Great Coat thrown over his Shoulders; and as to the shutting the Door, it is stated to be done immediately on Mr. Gower's returning, and is likelier to be done by him that came into the Room, when the first Conflict happened. It appears Mr. Gower was the readiest to draw his Sword; it was actually drawn, and the Prisoner's was not; and since it is not stated, who drew first the second Time, I think it ought to be explained by the first.

To make it Murder in the first Instance, it must be done with a Weapon that would endanger Life. The Bottle in Mawgridge's Case was full of Wine, and it hit him (Cope) so violently that he never spoke more. But for any thing appearing upon the Verdict, this might be only a small Oil-Bottle, usually set upon Tables in Public-Houses; and might perhaps be empty before it was flung. The Case of Mr. Turner, which is taken notice of in Comb 407. was held Manslaughter upon this Reason, because the Clog was not such an Instrument, from a Blow with which it was likely Death should ensue. But supposing the Bottle to be as big and as full as Mawgridge's Bottle, yet no harm was done by it here, as there was in Mawgridge's Case. Here was no drawing the Sword eo instante, as Mawgridge did; which occasioned the Judges to lay the returning the Bottle by Mr. Cope out of the Case, and construe the immediate drawing the Sword, as an Intent to supply the Mischief, which the Bottle might fall short of; and even, in that Case, one great Man differed from the rest of his Brethren.—So that Mawgridge's Case is materially different from this. There the Intention from the first throwing the Bottle was to commit Murder, here it was otherwise. There the first Bottle hit, here it missed. There the Murderer's Intent was immediately carried into Execution, here was a long Interruption. The Deceased needed not have returned, if he had not been equally disposed to combat; and he himself said it was a fair Combat, which there was no Pretence to say in Mawgridge's Case.

Serjeant Darnall replied. The Words on both Sides must certainly be laid out of the Case; if not, Puppy was worse than Rascal, because it is the Name of a Beast. If Mr. Gower took Oneby to be the Aggressor, the Condescension was greater in him; it is no more than saying, I, who have been injured, am ready to pass it by. I do not find it was at all relied upon in Mawgridge's Case, that the Bottle was full; and as to the Case in Comberbatch, Turner's Servant there had committed a Fault; for which he was liable to be corrected: The Deceased's Declaration was only that he received the Wound by a fair Push.

The Court said nothing upon this Argument, but appointed another to be before all the Judges of England. And in Easter Term following (May 6), it was accordingly argued by Mr. Lee for the King, and Mr. Kettleby (Serjeant Baynes, who was retained, being ill) for the Prisoner, to the same Effect as the former Argument. Str. Vol. II. 770. The Prisoner not being present in Serjeant-Inn (Chancery-Lane), as he was in Court upon the first Argument; this last being only to have the Advice of the other Judges.

Trinity Term, 13 Geo. I. and 1 Geo. II. 1727.

Monday, June 12. Mr. Oneby being brought to the Bar from Newgate to hear the Resolution of the Court, the Chief Justice Raymond (b) delivered the Opinion of the Judges, in the following manner.

(a) Sir John Strange's Reports, Vol. II. p. 766, 767, 768.

(b) From Lord Raymond's Reports, Vol. II. p. 1435, and following Pages.

The King vers. John Onoby.

AT the General Sessions of the Peace, held at Hicks-Hall, for the County of Middlesex, 28th Day of February, in the 12th Year of his Majesty's Reign, John Onoby, of St. Martin's in the Fields, Gent. was indicted, for that he, the 2d Day of February, 12 Geo. at the said Parish, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice afore-thought, made an Assault upon one William Gower, Esq. and that he the said John Onoby, with a Sword, which he then and there held drawn in his Right Hand, the said William Gower, in and upon the left Part of his Belly, near the Navel, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice afore-thought, did strike and thrust, giving the said William Gower, then and there, with the said drawn Sword, in and upon his said left Part of his Belly, near the Navel, a mortal Wound; of which mortal Wound, the said William Gower, lived in a languishing Condition, from the said 2d Day of February, to the 31 Day of the said February; on which 3d Day of February, the said William Gower, at the Parish aforesaid, of the said mortal Wound, did die; and so the Jurors find, that the said Onoby, the said William Gower feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice afore-thought, did kill and murder. Which Indictment being delivered to the Justices of Gaol-Delivery for Newgate, the said John Onoby was arraigned thereupon, and pleaded Not Guilty. And upon the Trial, which was had before Mr. Baron Hale, and Sir William Thompson, Recorder of London, the Jury found the Special Verdict following, viz.

"That the said John Onoby, and the said William Gower, together with John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt, were in Company together in a Room in the Castle-Tavern, in the Parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in a friendly Manner; that after the said John Onoby, William Gower, John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt, had continued together in the said Room, for the Space of two Hours, a Box and Dice were called for; whereupon the Drawer said, that he had Dice but no Box; and that thereupon the said John Onoby commanded the Drawer to bring a Pepper-Box, and accordingly a Pepper-Box and Dice were brought; that immediately after, the said John Onoby, William Gower, John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt, began to play at Hazard; and after they had played half an Hour, the said John Rich asked, if any of the Company would set him three Pieces of Money, called Half-Crowns; that thereupon the said William Gower, in a jocular Manner, set three Pieces of Money, called Half-pence, and then said to the said John Rich, that he had set him three Pieces; that the said John Onoby, at the same Time, set the said John Rich three Half-Crowns, which the said John Rich won; and immediately the said John Onoby, in an angry Manner, turned to the said William Gower, and said to him, that it was an impertinent Thing to set Half-pence; and further said to the said William Gower, that he, the said William Gower, was an impertinent Puppy in so doing; to which the said William Gower then and there answered, that whosoever called him so was a Rascal; and thereupon the said John Onoby took up a Glass-Bottle, and with great Force threw it at the said William Gower; but the Glass-Bottle did not strike the said William Gower, but passing by near his Head brushed his Peruke, which he then had upon his Head, and beat out some of the Powder out of his Peruke; that thereupon the said William Gower, immediately after, tossed a Glass or Candlestick at the said John Onoby, but the Glass or Candlestick did not hit the said John Onoby, upon which, both the said John Onoby and William Gower presently rose from their Seats, to fetch their Swords, which then hung up in the Room; and the said William Gower, then drew his Sword out of the Scabbard, but the said John Onoby was hindered by others of the Company from drawing his Sword out of the Scabbard; whereupon the said William Gower threw away his Sword, and by the Interposition of the said John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt, the said William Gower and John Onoby sat down again, and being so set down, continued for the Space of an Hour, in Company with the said John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt; that after the Expiration of that Hour, the said William Gower said to the said John Onoby, We have had hot Words, but you was the Aggressor, but I think, we may pass it over; and at the same Time the said William Gower offered his Hand to the said John Onoby; to which the said John Onoby then answered the said William Gower, No, damn you, I will have your Blood; that afterwards the Reckoning was paid by the said John Onoby, William Gower, John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt: And that the said William Gower, John Rich, Thomas Hawkins, and Michael Blunt, went out of the said Room, with an Intent to go home, leaving the said John Onoby in the Room; that the said John Onoby, so as aforesaid, remaining in the Room, called to the said William Gower, Young Man, come back, I have something to say to you; that thereupon the said William Gower returned into the said Room, and the Door of the Room was immediately flung to, and shut; by reason of which shutting of the Door, all of the said Company, besides the said William Gower and John Onoby were shut out of the Room, and that then after shutting of the Door, a Clashing of Swords was heard; then the Jury find, that the said John Onoby gave the said William Gower, with his Sword, the mortal Wound in the Indictment mentioned, of which he died; but they further find, that at the breaking up of the Company, the said John Onoby had his Great Coat thrown over his Shoulders, and that the said John Onoby received three small Wounds in the fighting with the said William Gower, and that the said William Gower being asked upon his Death-Bed, Whether he the said William Gower had received his Wound in a Manner among Swordsmen called fair? Answered, I think, I did: And they further find, that from the Time the said John Onoby threw the Glass-Bottle at the said William Gower, there was no Reconciliation between the said John Onoby and William Gower: And whether this is Murder or Manslaughter, the Jury pray the Advice of the Court: And if, &c."

So that the Question upon the Special Verdict is, Whether John Onoby, the Prisoner at the Bar, is guilty of Murder or Manslaughter?

A great deal of Time was spent in drawing up this Special Verdict;

(a) Judge Foster's Reports, p. 138, 313, 315, Hugget's Case.

(b) This Case of Mawgridge, being so frequently quoted in this, and the next Trial; and as every Gentleman may not have Kelynge's Reports ready at Hand to turn to, we have inserted the whole Case from Kelynge, p. 117 to p. 136.

for although the Trial at the Old-Bailey was in the Beginning of last March was twelve Months, yet the Record was not removed into this Court, till Henry Term last, towards the End of which Term, it was argued by Counsel on both Sides; and another Argument being desired by the Counsel for the Prisoner, we thought it proper to desire the Opinion of all the rest of the Judges; and for that Purpose, it was argued before all the Judges, at Serjeants-Inn-Hall in Chancery-Lane, upon the 6th Day of May last, which was as soon as all the Judges could meet, by reason of the Intervention of the Circuits. And after mature Consideration had upon a Meeting of them, they seriatim gave their Opinions, and came to this Resolution unanimously, not one of them dissenting, and which I have Authority from them to declare, viz.

That John Onoby, the Prisoner at the Bar, upon the Facts found upon this Special Verdict, is guilty of Murder.

Without entering into a nice Examination of the several Definitions or Descriptions of Murder, as they are found in the old Law-Books, as Bracton, Britton, and Fleta, where the Wickedness of the Act is aggravated by the Circumstances of Secrecy or Treachery, Murder has been long since settled to be the voluntary killing a Person of Malice prepense; and that whether it was done secretly or publicly. Staudf. Pl. Cor. 18. b. 3 Inst. 54.

But then it must be considered, what the Word Malice in such Case imports. In common Acceptation, Malice is took to be a settled Anger (which require some Length of Time) in one Person against another, and a Desire of Revenge. But in the legal Acceptation, it imports Wickedness, which includes a Circumstance attending an Act that cuts off all Excuse. By 25 H. VIII. c. 3. for taking away Clergy, it is enacted, That every Person who shall be indicted of the Crimes therein-mentioned, and thereupon arraigned, and stand mute, of Malice or of Frowardness of Mind, shall lose the Benefit of his Clergy. Now in that Place, Malice can never be understood in the vulgar Sense; for the Party cannot be thought to stand mute, out of a settled Anger, or Desire of Revenge, but only to save himself: and therefore such standing Mute, and refusing to submit to the Course of Justice, is said to be done wickedly, i. e. without any Manner of Excuse, or out of Frowardness of Mind.

This Malice, an essential Ingredient to make the killing a Person Murder (to use the Expressions of Lord Chief-Justice Coke, and Lord Chief-Justice Hale, whose Authority hath established them), must be either implied or express; and says Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown 44. this implied Malice is collected either from the Manner of doing, or from the Person slain, or the Person killing. As to the two last, there is no Occasion, at present, to take them into Consideration.

I. As to the first, viz. from the Manner of doing, as Hale expresses it, or as Holt, Chief-Justice (Vide Mawgridge's Case postea) says, from the Nature of the Action: 1. Wilfully poisoning any Man implies Malice. 2. If a Man doth an Act, that apparently must do Harm, with an Intent to do Harm, and Death ensues, it will be Murder. As if A runs with a Horse, used to strike, amongst a Multitude of People, and the Horse kills a Man, it will be Murder; for the Law implies Malice from the Nature of the Act. 3. Killing a Man without a Provocation is Murder; as if A meets B in the Street, and immediately runs him through with a Sword, or knocks out his Brains with a Hammer or Bottle. And if angry Words had passed in that Case between A and B, yet it would have been Murder in A, because Words are not such a Provocation, as will prevent such a Homicide from being Murder; Lord Morley's Case, Kelynge 56. and State Trials, Vol. VII. 4. The Law will imply Malice from the Nature of the original Action, or first Assault, though Blows pass between the Parties, before the Stroke is given, which occasions the Death. As if upon angry Words or abusive Language between A and B, of a sudden A, without any Provocation (for angry Words or abusive Language in such a Case is looked on as none), draws his Sword immediately, and makes a Pass at B, or strikes at him with any dangerous Weapon, as a Pistol, Hammer, large Stone, &c. which in all Probability might kill B, or do him some great bodily Hurt, and then B draws his Sword, and mutual Passes are made, and A kills B, this will be Murder, for the Act was voluntary; and it appears from the Nature of it, that it was done with an Intent to do Mischief; and therefore since in all Probability it might have occasioned B's Death, or done him some great bodily Harm, the Law implies Malice prepense; and the Resistance or Passes that were made by B, were but in the Defence of his Person, which was violently and cruelly attacked. And this was the Resolution of Kelynge, Chief-Justice, Twisden, Windham, and Morton, Justices in Hopkin Hugget's Case, Kelynge 62 (a). And though in the principal Case, the eight other Judges differed in Opinion from the four Judges in the King's-Bench; yet, to this Opinion of the Four, the eight Judges did agree, as Kelynge took it. And this was the true Reason of Mawgridge's Case. The Judgment in which Case is a great Authority in this Case, that not being so strong a Case as the present Case. It was indeed objected by the Counsel for the Prisoner at the Bar, in their Arguments in the present Case, 1. That Mawgridge's Case was a single Case, that the Judgment in that Case had carried Murder further than it had ever been carried before. 2. That it was not determined with the unanimous Opinion of all the then Judges, for one very great Judge of the then Twelve, viz. Lord Trevor differed from the other Judges, and held it was only Manslaughter. But upon our meeting to consider of this present Case, all the Judges unanimously agreed, that Mawgridge's Case was undoubted Law (b), and that that Judgment was a right and just Judgment, so groundless was that Infination, which had been made (for such an Infination there was) in Westminster-Hall, that some of the present Judges were of Opinion, that the Judgment in Mawgridge's Case was not a legal Judgment.

And this is as much as is necessary, rather more than is necessary, to be said as to implied Malice, since there will be no Occasion in this Case to look out for Malice implied.

II. Malice express is a Design formed of taking away another Man's Life, or of doing some Mischief to another, in the Execution of which Design Death ensues. And this holds, where such Design is not formed against

against any particular Person; as if A having no particular Malice against any particular Person, comes with a general Resolution against all Opposers; if the Act be unlawful, and Death ensue, it is Murder. As if it be to commit a Riot, to enter into a Park, Lord Dacre's Case H. P. C. 47. Moore 86. Sav. 67. So if A goes with a Resolution to kill the first Man he meets, and meeting B, kills him, it is Murder with express Malice: yet A had not declared any Malice against B, nor against any particular Person. Much more it will be express Malice, when the mischievous Design is formed against any particular Person, which may be made evident, as well by Circumstances as by the express Declarations of the Person killing. As that he would be revenged of B, or that he would have his Life, or have his Blood; and some time after he kills B. And that such Declarations spoken seriously, or deliberately, or after Time for Reflection, manifest an express Malice, no body can doubt.

Having thus briefly mentioned that known and settled Rule, that there must be either Malice express or implied, to make Murder, and also some Instances of what is one and what the other of them; I come to the present Case before us.

All the Twelve Judges were unanimous in Opinion, That as the Facts are found in this Special Verdict, it appears, that the Prisoner at the Bar had express Malice against Mr. Gower, when he gave him the mortal Wound, of which he died: 1. Mr. Gower did nothing that could reasonably raise a Passion in Mr. Oneby. He gave him no Provocation whatsoever; for when Mr. Gower set the three Half-pence, he set them against Mr. Rich, and that in a jocular manner; therefore that was no Affront to Mr. Oneby. 2. Upon that Mr. Oneby turned to Mr. Gower in an angry manner, and gave him abusive Language, and called him impertinent Puppy; the Answer of Gower was not improper, nor more than what might be expected, that whosoever called him so was a Rascal. 3. That as Oneby had before begun with Gower, by giving him abusive Language, so he then took up the Glass-Bottle, et magna cum vi, threw at Gower, and beat the Powder out of his Peruke; if it had killed Gower, it had certainly been Murder; upon which Gower tossed a Glass or Candlestick at Oneby. And the Difference of finding in the Special Verdict is observable: Oneby threw the Bottle at Gower, magna cum vi; Gower only tossed the Glass or Candlestick at Oneby. 4. When they fetched their Swords, Gower did it only to defend himself; for the Verdict finds, that though Gower drew his Sword first, yet the Prisoner at the Bar, being hindered by the Company from drawing his Sword, Gower thereupon threw his Sword away. 5. By the Interposition of the Company, the Prisoner at the Bar and Mr. Gower sat down again, and continued in Company for an Hour; after which Mr. Gower said, We have had hot Words, but you was the Aggressor, but I think we may pass it over, and offered his Hand to the Prisoner; that the Prisoner at the Bar was the Aggressor, is true, and that in a violent manner: This was sufficient to have appeased Mr. Oneby; but what is his Answer? No, damn you, I will have your Blood. There is an express Declaration of Malice, an express Declaration of a Design of taking away Mr. Gower's Life. These Words are incapable of any other Construction. These Words shew his malicious Intent, even in throwing the Bottle at first; they are spoken an Hour after the first Action, and are spoken with Deliberation. The next Fact the Jury find is; that afterwards (not particularly finding what Interval of Time passed between the speaking these Words, and what is found next) that Mr. Gower, Rich, Hawkins and Blunt went out of the Room with an Intent to go home, leaving the Prisoner at the Bar in the Room; that the Prisoner remaining in the Room, called to the said William Gower, saying, Young Man, come back, I have something to say to you. These Words also shew a plain Deliberation; and being attended with the Circumstances found before, and what follows immediately, import Contempt; young Man are insolent and imperious; come back, and import a Repentment he had conceived against Mr. Gower, about which he had something to say to him. For what Purpose did the Prisoner stay, after all the Company had left the Room to go home? It was to say something to Mr. Gower. What is that? Why, as soon as Mr. Gower is returned into the Room, the Door was immediately flung to and shut, and the rest of the Company shut out; and then after shutting the Door, a Clashing of Swords was heard, and the Prisoner gave Mr. Gower the mortal Wound, of which he died.

These immediate, subsequent Facts shew, what it was the Prisoner had to say to Mr. Gower; it was to carry the malicious Design, he had before declared he had against Mr. Gower, into Execution, viz. to have his Blood; and he had it, for he gave him the Wound of which he died.

To go further: If the Prisoner had Malice against Mr. Gower, though they fought after the Door was shut, the Interchange of Blows will make no Difference; for if A has Malice against B, and meets B, and strikes him, B draws, A flies to the Wall, A kills B, it is Murder. H. P. C. 42. Kelynge 58.

Nay, if the Case had been, that there had been mutual Malice between the Prisoner and Mr. Gower (which does not appear to have been on the Part of the Deceased) (a) and they had met and fought upon that Malice, the killing Mr. Gower by the Prisoner had been Murder. H. P. C. 47. 1 Bulstr. 86, 87. Hob. 121. Crompt. 21.

The Judges were all of Opinion, upon the Facts found in this Verdict, there appeared to be express Malice in Oneby against Mr. Gower; and then Oneby killing Gower, having such express Malice against him, they were all unanimous, and clear of Opinion, that this was plainly Murder.

Having thus mentioned the Reasons, upon which we ground this present Resolution, I shall next consider, if any of the Objections made by the Counsel for the Prisoner are in answer to these Reasons, or take off the Force of them.

The Counsel for the Prisoner, Mr. Oneby, insisted, that upon the whole Verdict, the Case was no more than that from a slight Occasion; passionate Words arose, mutual Reproaches passed; the Quarrel was sudden, mutual Assaults were made; and on a sudden fighting, in Heat of Passion, the Prisoner killed the Deceased, which can be no more than Manslaughter.

That such Fact could amount to no more than Manslaughter; thy cited the known Case, that if A and B fall out upon a sudden, and they presently agree to fight, and each fetches his Weapon, and go into the Field and fight, and one of them kills the other; this is but Manslaughter, H. P. C. 48. 3 Inst. 57. because the Passion was never cooled.

In this Case (said they) it is plain the Quarrel arose on a sudden; Mr. Oneby's Passion was raised, and that it is not found by the Jury to have ever been cooled; and therefore the Words, Mr. Oneby spoke, No, damn you, I will have your Blood, &c. were only Words of Heat, spoke under the Continuance of the first Passion. And they further insisted, that the Law had fixed no Time, in which the Passion must be took to be cool; but that depends upon Circumstances, of which the Jury are the proper Judges. In this Case, the whole Time that passed, between the Quarrel, and giving the mortal Wound, was but little more than an Hour; and it has been adjudged, that the Passion shall not be took to be cooled in very near that Time. 12 Co. 87. Cro. Jac. 296. H. P. C. 48. Rowley's Case, where the Child of A beat the Child of B. B's Child, all bloody, ran home to his Father; B, the Father, ran Three-quarters of a Mile, and beat the Child of A; by means whereof he died: This was adjudged to be only Manslaughter; yet there must have been a considerable Time after B was provoked by the Usage of his Child before he killed A's Child, because he ran Three-quarters of a Mile; yet it being one continued Passion raised in B, upon the beating of his Child, it was held this was only Manslaughter. And in this present Case, to shew the Passion of Mr. Oneby, which was suddenly raised, was not cooled, the Counsel for Mr. Oneby observed, that the Jury had expressly found that there was no Reconciliation between Oneby, the Prisoner, and Mr. Gower, the Deceased, from the time Mr. Oneby first threw the Bottle.

This I take to be the chief Objection, upon which the Counsel for the Prisoner principally relied.

In answer to this Objection, I must first take notice, that where a Man is killed, the Law will not presume that it was upon a sudden Quarrel, unless it is proved so to be; and therefore in Legg's Case, Kelynge 27. it was agreed, upon Evidence, that if A kills B, and no sudden Quarrel appears, it is Murder; for it lies upon the Party indicted to prove the sudden Quarrel.

In the next place, from what I have said before, it appears, that though a Quarrel was sudden, and mutual Fighting before the mortal Wound given, it is by no means to be took as a general Rule, that the killing a Man will be only Manslaughter. It is true, if reproachful Language passes between A and B, and A bids B draw, and they both draw (it is not material which of them draws first), and they both fight, and mutual Passes are made, Death ensuing from thence will be only Manslaughter, because it was of a sudden, and each ran the hazard of his Life. But there is a wide Difference between that Case, and where upon Words A draws his Sword, and makes a Pass at B, or with some dangerous Weapon attacks him, and then B draws, and they fight, and A kills B; there, though there was a Quarrel upon abusive Language, and there was afterwards a mutual Fighting, yet since A attacked B with a Weapon or Instrument, which might have taken away B's Life, though they fought afterwards, that will be Murder. And this was agreed by all the Judges in the present Case.

But for the Argument's Sake, and it is only for Argument's Sake, and to give the Objection made by the Counsel for the Prisoner its full Force; if it should be looked on here, that what is found in the former Part of the Verdict was upon a sudden Quarrel, and only the Effect of Passion; yet, if it appears upon the Special Verdict, that there was a sufficient Time for this Passion to cool, and for Reason to get the better of the Transport of Passion, and the subsequent Acts were deliberate, before the mortal Wound given, the killing of the Deceased will be Murder.

And all the Judges were of Opinion, that, upon Consideration of the Facts found, it appeared, there had been sufficient Time for Mr. Oneby's Transport of Passion to cool, and that he had deliberated; and that the killing of Mr. Gower was a deliberate Act, and the Result of Malice Mr. Oneby had conceived against the Deceased.

But before I mention their Reasons, I must lay down this Proposition, which they all agreed, viz. that the Court are Judges of the Malice, and not the Jury; and that the Court are also Judges upon the Facts found by the Jury, whether if the Quarrel was sudden, there was Time for the Passion to cool, or whether the Act was deliberate or not.

Upon the Trial of the Indictment, the Judge directs the Jury thus: If you believe such and such Witnesses, who have sworn such and such Facts, the killing the Deceased was with Malice prepense express, or it was with Malice implied, and then you ought to find the Prisoner guilty of Murder; but if you do not believe those Witnesses, then you ought to find him guilty of Manslaughter only; and so according to the Nature of the Case, if you believe such and such Facts, the Act was deliberate, or not deliberate; and then you ought to find so and so. And the Jury may, if they think proper, give a General Verdict, either that the Prisoner is guilty of Murder, or of Manslaughter. But if they decline giving a general Verdict, and will find the Facts specially, the Court is to form their Judgment from the Facts found, whether there was Malice or not, or whether the Fact was done on a sudden Transport of Passion, or was an Act of Deliberation, or not.

Although there are many Special Verdicts in Indictments for Murder, there never was one, where the Jury find in express Terms that the Act was done with Malice, or was not done with Malice prepense; or that it was done upon a sudden Quarrel, and in Transport of Passion; or that the Passion was cooled or not cooled; or that the Act was deliberate, or not deliberate: But the Collection of those Things from the Facts found, is left to the Judgment of the Court. Holloway's Case, Palm. 545. Cro. Car. 131. W. Jones 198. So in the Case cited by the Counsel for the Prisoner, Cro. Jac. 296. Rowley's Case, the Jury find the Fact, but don't find in express Terms, that the Father, whose Child was beat, killed the other Child in a sudden Heat of Passion; but that was left to the Judgment of the Court, upon the particular Facts found.

But then it is objected, that the Law has fixed no Time, in which the Passion must be supposed to be cooled. 'Tis very true, it has not, nor could it, because Passions in some Persons are stronger, and their Judgments weaker, than in others; and by Consequence it will require a longer Time in some, for Reason to get the better of their Passions, than in others: but that must depend upon the Facts, which shew whether the Person has deliberated or not; for Acts of Deliberation will make it appear whether that violent Transport of Passion was cooled or no.

But thus far the Resolution of the Judges have already gone; and it has been adjudged, that if two fall out upon a sudden, and they appoint to fight next Day, that the Passion by that Time must be looked on to be cooled; and in such Case, if they meet next Day, and fight, and the one kills the other at that Meeting, it has been often held to be Murder. Hale P.C. 48.

(a) The Verdict implies the contrary: For He offered him his Hand, &c.

To go a little further. If two Men fall out in the Morning, and meet and fight in the Afternoon, and one of them is slain, this is Murder; for there was Time to allay the Heat, and their Meeting is of Malice. So is Legg's Case, Kelynge 27.

At the Meeting of all the Judges, before Lord Morley's Trial by the Peers, for the Murder of one Hastings, they all agreed, that if upon Words two Men grow to Anger, and afterwards they suppress that Anger, and then fall into other Discourse, or have other Diversions, for such a reasonable Space of Time as in reasonable Intendment their Heat might be cooled; and some Time after they draw upon one another, and fight, and one of them is killed; this is Murder, because being attended with such Circumstances, it is reasonably supposed to be a deliberate Act, and a premeditated Revenge upon the first Quarrel. But the Circumstances of such an Act being Matter of Fact, the Jury are Judges of them, Kelynge 56. The Meaning of which last Words is, that the Jury are Judges of the Facts, from which those Circumstances are collected. But, as said I before, when those Facts are found, the Court is to judge from them, whether they do not shew the Act was deliberate or not.

Lord Morley upon his Trial by the Peers was acquitted; and after that, in Easter Term, 18 Car. II. Broomwich, who was indicted as a Principal, in being present, aiding, and abetting Lord Morley, in the Murder of Hastings, was tried at the King's-Bench Bar. The Quarrel was at a Tavern; but it was proved, when the Quarrel was at the Tavern, that Lord Morley said, If we fight at this Time, I shall have a Disadvantage, by reason of the Height of my Shoes; and presently after they went into the Fields, and fought; Lord Morley killed Hastings: But while they were fighting, Broomwich made a Thrust at Hastings, and Lord Morley closed in with Hastings, and killed him; and (says the Book) this was held as clear Evidence of their Intention to fight, when they went out of the Tavern; and the Quarrel being only about Words, and fighting in a little Time after, it was held Murder by all the Court. And there need not be a Night's Time between the Quarrel and the Fighting, to make it Murder, but such Time only, as it may appear not to be done on the first Passion; for Lord Morley considered the Disadvantage of his Shoes; and the Court directed the Jury that it was Murder in Broomwich, being present, and aiding; but the Jury acquitted him. 1 Sid. 277. reports the same Case, and says, that the Court, in the Direction to the Jury, laid it down, that after the Provocation in the House, they say, this is no convenient Place (and so have Reason to judge of Convenience), and appoint another Place, though the Fight is to be presently; this is Murder, for the Circumstances shew their Temper.

In H. P. C. 48. if A and B fall out, A says he will not strike, but will give B a Pot of Ale to touch him, B strikes, A kills him; Murder.

Two quarrel; the one says, if you'll go into the Field, I will break your Head, and there one kills the other; Murder. Crompt. 25. p. 49.

Two fall out on a sudden in the Town, and they by Agreement go into the Field presently, and one kills the other; Murder. Crompt. 23. fol. 31.

From these Cases it appears, that though the Law of England is so far peculiarly favourable (I use the Word peculiarly, because I know no other Law that makes such a Distinction between Murder and Manslaughter), as to permit the Excess of Anger and Passion (which a Man ought to keep under, and govern) in some Instances to extenuate the greatest of private Injuries, as the taking away a Man's Life is; yet in those Cases, it must be such a Passion, as for the time deprives him of his reasoning Faculties; for if it appears Reason has resumed its Office; if it appears, he reflects, deliberates, and considers, before he gives the fatal Stroke, which cannot be, as long as the Fury of Passion continues; the Law will no longer, under that Pretence of Passion, exempt him from the Punishment, which from the Greatness of the Injury and Heinousness of the Crime he justly deserves, so as to lessen it from Murder to Manslaughter. Let us see, therefore, whether upon this Special Verdict it appears, that the fighting and killing Mr. Gower was only done in Heat of Passion, or was a deliberate Act. By what I observed before, it plainly appears it was a deliberate Act. But to recapitulate in short; after the Words had passed, and the Bottle was thrown by the Prisoner, and Swords drawn; by the Interposition of Friends they sat down, and continued in company for an Hour (a reasonable Time under those Circumstances for the Passion to cool); and after that Hour expired, the Deceased says, We have had hot Words, but you was the Aggressor; but, I think, we may pass it over; and at the same time offered his Hand to the Prisoner, which was enough to have appeased the Prisoner: To this Mr. Oneby answered, No, damn you, I'll have your Blood; Words expressing Malice, not Passion: Then, when the Company went out of the Room, the Prisoner stayed, and called the Deceased back; Young Man, come back, I have something to say to you: The Door immediately was shut, clashing of Swords was heard, and the Deceased received the mortal Wound from the Prisoner at the Bar. The Prisoner's Words shew, what was his Intention, viz. to take away Mr. Gower's Life; and the Killing him may properly be said to have been done upon Deliberation and Consideration.

The Counsel for the Prisoner in their Arguments insisted, that there were several Circumstances found in the special Verdict in favour of the Prisoner, which were a Foundation for the Court, to construe the other Expressions to be only Words of Heat; and that what he did was in the Heat of his first Passion, which was never cooled, and not out of Malice. As 1. It is found, that at the breaking up of the Company, Mr. Oneby had his Great Coat thrown over his Shoulders; from whence it would be a Strain, to think he then intended to fight with Mr. Gower. 2. It might be Mr. Gower, who shut the Door, who came back after he was out of the Room, the Jury not having found who shut the Door. 3. That it was found, there was no Reconciliation between them, from the throwing the Bottle at Mr. Gower. But as to the first of these Objections, considering the Words the Prisoner used after this, and after the Deceased was out of the Room, and what followed, since the Jury have found this Fact, without saying any more about it, the natural construction is, that this was only used by the Prisoner as a Blind to the Company, to conceal from them his real Intention, till they were gone out of the Room. As to the second; it stands uncertain upon the Verdict; but it is an Uncertainty, which can have no Influence upon the present Determination; for if Mr. Gower had shut the Door; that would not alone have materially altered the Case. As to the third; since express Malice before appeared to be in the Prisoner, the finding that Fact does not import, that the first Heat of Passion continued only, but that the Malice continued.

The Counsel for Mr. Oneby farther objected, that it appeared there was a mutual Fighting after the Door was shut; for it is found that he received three slight Wounds; then it is not found, who drew first, or made the first Assault, after the Door was shut; and it was possible a new, sudden Quarrel might then rise, in which Mr. Gower might be the Aggressor, and therefore the Special Verdict was uncertain in a material Point. The Answer to which is, what is said in Legg's Case, Kelynge 27. cited before; that if A kills B, and no sudden Quarrel appears, it is Murder; for it lies on the Party indicted, to prove the sudden Quarrel; and therefore the Jury not having found any such Thing for the Prisoner's Benefit, it is to be took there was no such. This is said, supposing the latter Part of the Verdict could be considered, without regarding the former Part of it; and that when the Company went out of the Room, the Prisoner and Mr. Gower were reconciled: But however that might have been, here it appears there was no Reconciliation, and therefore there can be no Imagination of a new, original Quarrel in the Room after the Door was shut. And as to the slight Wounds the Prisoner received, that is immaterial; for he having Malice against Mr. Gower, though there was mutual Fighting, and the Prisoner was wounded, yet, when he killed Mr. Gower, it will be Murder.

The last Fact in the Special Verdict, which they relied on, was, when Mr. Gower was asked upon his Death-Bed, whether he had received his Wounds in a Manner among Swordsmen called fair? He answered, I think I did; whereby the Deceased shewed, he was satisfied the Act was fair. The Answer to which is plain; that if A have Malice against B, and they meet and fight, though the Fight is never so fair according to the Law of Arms, yet if A kills B, it will be Murder.

The Cases the Counsel for the Prisoner principally relied on, to make this Fact only Manslaughter, were Rowley's Case, 12 Co. 87. and Turner's Case, Comberbatch 407, 8.

As to 12 Co. 87. the Case was, that two Boys fighting together, the one of them was scratched in the Face, and he bled a great deal at the Nose; and so he ran Three-quarters of a Mile to his Father, who, seeing him very bloody, took in his Hand a Cudgel, and went Three-quarters of a Mile to the other Boy, and struck him upon the Head, upon which he died; and it was held but Manslaughter, for the Passion of the Father continued. And there is no Time, that the Law can determine, that it was so settled, that it should be adjudged Malice prepense. (Note, These are the Words of 12 Co. 87.)

To which the Answer is plain, for the Reason given in Gro. Jac. 296. which is the same Case, that the Father having no Anger before, but being provoked upon the Complaint and Sight of his Son's Blood, and in that Anger beating him, of which he died, the Law adjudged it to be upon that sudden Passion. But that is, considering what has been said before, clearly distinguishable from the present Case; besides it may be added, it was but a little Cudgel he struck with, from which no such fatal Event could be reasonably expected.

Turner's Case was this; his Wife complained the Boy not cleaned her Clogs, upon which Mr. Turner took up a Clog, and struck him on the Head, and killed him; and though there was no other Provocation, it was held only Manslaughter. But the Reason of that was, because the Clog was so small, there could be no Design to do any great Harm to the Boy, much less to kill him; and a Master may correct a Servant in a reasonable manner for a Fault. And Lord Chief Justice Holt, in Comberbatch 408. says, that in that Case, it was an unlikely Thing, meaning that the Clog should kill the Boy. The Counsel for the Prisoner, being apprehensive of the Authority of Mawgridge's Case, besides the Observations they had made, mentioned before, to induce the Court to look upon that Judgment, as not warranted by Law, endeavoured to distinguish the present Case from it, supposing it to be Law. And 1st, They said, that, in Mawgridge's Case, the Bottle hit Mr. Cope, and stunned him; but here the Bottle did not hit Mr. Gower, but only brushed some Powder out of his Peruke. 2^{dly}, In Mawgridge's Case, the Bottle was full of Wine; here it is not found to have been so, and therefore must be took to have been empty; and the Size of the Bottle does not appear, it might be very small. 3^{dly}, Mawgridge drew his Sword immediately after throwing the Bottle, without Intermission; here Mr. Gower's Sword was first drawn. 4^{thly}, Mr. Cope never drew; here Mr. Gower not only drew the first, but Clashing of Swords were heard, so there must have been fighting.

It is very true (so far as these Facts will make a Difference) this present Case is distinguishable from Mawgridge's Case; for that Case was determined only upon an implied Malice (but, as I said before, was very rightly and justly determined, as we all agreed), for strictly and properly speaking, although the Word Express-Malice is mentioned in the Reasons given for that Resolution, yet it was but Malice implied. But still this way of distinguishing the present Case from Mawgridge's, will be of no Service to the Prisoner, because, though all the Judges held this Case was distinguishable from Mawgridge's Case; it was in respect that this was a much stronger Case as to the Murder, the Jury having found Facts which shew Mr. Oneby had an express Malice against Mr. Gower. Upon the whole Matter, this Court, with the concurrent Opinion of all the other Judges, is of Opinion, that the Prisoner at the Bar, John Oneby, by this Special Verdict, is found guilty of Murder.

Memorandum. As soon as I had delivered this Resolution, I desired my Brothers Fortescue, Reynolds, and Probyn, that if they disapproved any thing I had laid down, they would express their Disapprobation; but they publicly declared, they concurred in omnibus.

Major Oneby, observing that great Strefs was laid on that wicked and malicious Expression of his to the Deceased, damn you, I'll have your Blood; he declared, that as he hoped to find Mercy at the Hands of Almighty God, he never made use of that Expression. He then prayed to be recommended to his Majesty's Clemency, in regard to his long and faithful Services in the Army. As to the first, the Court told him, that as the Words were sworn, and stood in the Special Verdict, his Allegation availed nothing: And to the second, That as that was a Court of Justice, he must apply elsewhere for Mercy.

The Prisoner being, after this Resolution pronounced, intitled by the Course of the Court to have four Days to move in Arrest in Judgment, he was sent back to Newgate, and a Rule for bringing him up to receive Judgment the End of the Week was made; before which Time, an Account came of the Death of his late Majesty at Osnabrug, the 11th of June. And afterwards, at the Time appointed by the Rule, he was brought to the Bar, and Judgment was pronounced against him, and Execution awarded (a). After which, a pretty strong Application was made to his Majesty King George the Second for a Reprieve; but he was pleased to declare, that the Judges having adjudged the Prisoner guilty of Murder, the Law should take its Course. In which Attempt, the Prisoner not succeeding, he killed himself in Newgate, in the Night before the Day appointed for his Execution, by cutting through the Great Artery in his Arm with a Razor, by which he bled to Death.

On Monday, the 19th of June, he was brought up, and objected, "That there was no Joinder of Issue, for want of a Similiter (b): but the Precedents in all capital Cases being in this Manner, the Objection was over-ruled. And Mr. Justice Fortescue, in a very serious Speech, pronounced the Sentence for his Execution; which was appointed for Monday the 3d of July. Upon the Morning whereof, he opened a vein, and bled to Death (c), to avoid the Infamy of an Execution."—He was buried in the Highway, with a Stake drove through his Body.

On his destroying himself, the following Account was published in a Narrative of his Life.

"John Onby—aged about 53 Years, was born at Barwell in Leicester-shire.—His Father was an Attorney, of an unblemished Character, and practised with great Success.—He took Care to bestow an Education on his Son John—as designing him for the Business of the Law; who accordingly served a Clerkship with a Gentleman of great Note and Eminence in his Profession: but proving a Youth of an aspiring and haughty Temper—his Head ran upon Things greater than the Provision they had made, or were capable of making for him.

"The Custody of the great Seal of England being committed to Sir Nathan Wright, a very near Relation of Mr. Onby's Mother; Application was made to this Gentleman, to bestow some genteel Employment on his young Kinsman.—But nothing greater than the Place of his Train-bearer could be procured.

"His great Spirit brooked with it for some Time, hoping that some"thing better would offer.—But as nothing did, he quitted the Lord-Keeper's Service, and took up a Resolution of going abroad into the Army.

"His Friends soon procured him a Commission, and he served in several Campaigns under the late Duke of Marlborough in Flanders, where he acquired the Reputation of a gallant Officer, he having distinguished himself in several Battles and Sieges, and received divers Wounds.

"He having once the Misfortune to quarrel with an Officer of Horse at Bruges, they went out together from the Camp, and fought. His Antagonist received a mortal Wound, and died the next Day. But this being done, as the People of Honour call it, fairly, Mr. Onby was called to a Court-Martial, and very honourably acquitted; and had now established that vain, empty Character, so much admired by too many in the Army, viz. of having felled his Man.

"The next Exploit of this Nature was performed by him at Port-Royal in Jamaica; where fighting a Duel with one Lieutenant Tooley, they were both desperately wounded. Mr. Tooley languished for about eight Months, and then died; but having been long before perfectly reconciled to Mr. Onby, the latter was never called in Question about his Death.

"Having served about 22 Years in the Army, and rising gradually, according to his Right of Seniority, he at length attained to the Rank of a Major in the Regiment of Dragoons, commanded by the Honourable Brigadier Honeywood. But upon the Peace of Utrecht—his Pay was curtailed, and a Stop put to his farther Preferment.

"In these Circumstances he returned to England, versed in all Kinds of Vice, particularly Gaming, to which he had much addicted himself in the Camp, and had there met several Revolutions of Fortune. Sometimes an auspicious Hand of Dice having enabled him to make an Entertainment for the chief Generals in the Army; his Ambition leading him to great Profusions that Way, when it has been in his Power. And at other Times his ill Luck has reduced him to scandalous Necessities. He now associated himself with the principal Gamesters of this Town, designing to support himself after their Example; and frequented all the public Places of Resort, where Gentlemen played, being seldom without Cards or Dice in his Pockets. And there is no Doubt, but it was he who conveyed the Dice upon the Table at the Castle Tavern, in Drury-Lane, which produced Gaming; the Consequence whereof was then the Murder of Mr. Gower; and since that, of himself."

III. The Trial of JAMES CARNEGIE of Finhaven, before the Court of Justiciary (in Scotland), held at Edinburgh, July 25, 1728, for the Murder of Charles Earl of Strathmore.

Intran.

JAMES CARNEGIE of Finhaven, Prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, Pannel, indicted and accused at the Instance of Susanna Countess of Strathmore, and Mr. James Lyon, Brother-German and nearest of Kin to the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore, with Concourse and at the Instance of Duncan Forbes, Esq; his Majesty's Advocate, for his Highness's Interest, for the Crime of WILFUL and PREMEDITATE MURDER committed by him upon the Person of the said Charles Earl of Strathmore, as is more fully mentioned in the Indictment raised against him thereanent, which is as follows: "James Carnegie of Finhaven, now Prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, you are indicted and accused at the Instance of Susanna Countess of Strathmore, and Mr. James Lyon, Brother-German and nearest of Kin to the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore, with Concourse and at the Instance of Duncan Forbes, Esq; his Majesty's Advocate, for his Highness's Interest: THAT WHERE, by the Laws of God, the Law of Nature, the common Law, and the municipal Law, and Practice of this Kingdom, as well as the Laws of all well-governed Realms, WILFUL and PREMEDITATE MURDER, and all MURDER and HOMICIDE, or being Art and Part thereof, are most atrocious Crimes, and severely punishable; yet true it is, and of Verity, That you have presumed to commit, and are guilty, Actor, or art and part, of all, or one or other of the foresaid horrid Crimes: IN SO FAR AS, having a causeless Ill-will and Resentment against the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore, you conceived a deadly Hatred and Malice against him; and shaking off all Fear of GOD, and Regard to the foresaid laudable Laws, on Thursday the Ninth of May, in this present Year, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Twenty-eight, or one or other of the Days of the said Month, about the Hour of Eight or Nine of the Night of that Day, or some other Hour of that Day or Night, upon the Street of the Town of Forfar, within the County of Forfar, you did, with a drawn Sword, or some other offensive or mortal Weapon, without the least Colour or Cause of Provocation then given by him, invade the said deceased Earl, who had no Weapon in his Hand, and did basely and feloniously murder and kill him, by giving him a Wound therewith in the Belly, some Inches above the Navel, which, by following the Thrust with a second Push, went through the Intestines and the Back, a little lower than where the said Weapon entered the Belly: Of which Wound, after great Pain, on Saturday immediately thereafter, or in some short Space thereafter, he died; and so was cruelly and barbarously murdered by you. AT LEAST, at the Time and Place above-mentioned, with a drawn Sword, or some other mortal Weapon, without any just Cause or Provocation, you gave the said deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore a Wound in the Belly, which reached through the Intestines and Back, wherethrough he soon after fell down, and died at the Time foresaid. AT LEAST, at the Time and Place above described, the said Charles Earl of Strathmore was with a drawn Sword, or some other deadly Weapon, feloniously and barbarously wounded, and of the said Wound died within a few Days thereafter; and you were art and part in his Murder. By all which, it is evident, That you are guilty, art and part, of the Crimes of WILFUL and PREMEDITATE MURDER and HOMICIDE, or one or other of them, at the Time and Place, and in the Manner above set forth. And which Facts, or Part thereof, or your being art and part of any of the said Crimes, being found proven by the Verdict of an Assize, in presence of the Lords Justice-General, Justice-Clerk, and Commissioners of Justiciary, you ought to be exemplarily punished with the Pains of Law, to the Terror of others to commit the like in Time coming."

Information for Susanna Countess of Strathmore, and Mr. James Lyon, Brother-German to the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore, and his Majesty's Advocate for his Highness's Interest, against James Carnegie of Finhaven, Pannel.

THE said James Carnegie is indicted and accused as guilty, art and part of WILFUL and PREMEDITATE MURDER; at least of MURDER and HOMICIDE: In so far as, upon the 9th of May last, upon the Streets of Forfar, with a drawn sword, he wounded the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore in the Belly, some Inches above the Navel; which Wound went through the Intestines and the Back, a little lower than where the said Weapon entered the Belly; of which Wound he died soon after.

The Indictment, in the first Place, charges the Fact as proceeding from a causeless Ill-will and Resentment the Pannel had conceived against the Defunct, who, at the Time the Wound was given, had done nothing that could be pretended as a Colour or Cause of Provocation: And a Circumstance is noticed, from which it may be inferred, that there was deadly Hatred and Malice; namely, That after one Push there was a second, whereby the Wound went quite through his Body.

There is a second Branch of the Indictment, in which the Circumstance of premeditated Malice and forethought Felony needed not to be libelled; and he is charged only with Murder or Homicide, as separately relevant. And, lastly, Art and Part is charged upon him.

At calling before the Lords of Justiciary, against the first Branch of the Indictment, it was excepted, "That the Indictment was too general, particular Circumstances not being expressed from which the causeless Ill-will or Resentment mentioned, and forethought and premeditated Malice could be inferred, whereby the Pannel was deprived of the Benefit due to all Pannels, when tried for their Life, to exculpate himself, by shewing, that if at any Time, prior to the Time mentioned in the Indictment, there was any Appearance of Grudge or Quarrel between the Defunct and him, there was an After-reconciliation and entire Friendship: And it was said, That general Libels ought not to be sustained."

To this it was answered, That a previous Grudge is charged, and that the deceased was invaded without the least Colour or Cause of Provocation; which is the strongest Evidence of Forethought, especially when joined with this other Particular, that the first Thrust was followed with a second Push, which was a Mark of inveterate and relentless Malice; and that it was sufficient to charge a previous Quarrel in general, which would be made appear by the Proof. Nor will it be found, that in Libels of forethought Felony, it is usual or necessary to libel all the Circumstances from which the Forethought may be presumed, especially when the species facti is charged in that Manner, as affords the Presumption of Forethought, setting forth, That the Wound was given without the least Colour or Cause of Provocation on the Part of the Defunct at that Time. Neither can it be thought unfair with regard to the Pannel, who if he had any relevant Ground of Exculpation, would have Access to prove Friendship with the Defunct, to take off any Charge of precedent Quarrels, whereof he could not be ignorant. And still there must be left Ground of Complaint, where no good Reason of Exculpation is offered, whereby the Pannel can be allowed to adduce Proof, which it is believed is, without Contradiction, the Case upon the first Branch of the Libel.

As to the two last Branches of the Indictment, it was alledged, "That several Circumstances attending the Fact complained of were concealed, which, when opened, afforded the Pannel plain and obvious Defences; and therefore it was intimated, That the Pannel, a Person disposed to Peace, and in entire Friendship with the Defunct, chanced to be in Company with him about the Time charged in the Indictment, with one John Lyon of Bridgeton, and others: That Bridgeton gave him the highest Provocation, not only by Words, but by proceeding so far, as to throw him into a Kennel, where the Pannel was in Hazard of perishing, being extremely drunk: That getting up, heated with Liquor, and to extremely provoked, he drew his Sword, and pursued Bridgeton, and that the Defunct thrusting himself between them, casually received the Thrust aimed at another."

From these Circumstances, it was pled for the Pannel, "That if he did kill the Defunct, it was a mere Misadventure, rather a Misfortune as [than] a Fault, and in no Event could subject him to the pœna ordinaria; for that, imo, In these Circumstances had he killed the said John Lyon of Bridgeton, the Pain of Death could not have been inflicted either by the Law of God, the Common Law, nor by the municipal Law of this Kingdom, neither by the Laws of other well-governed Realms; particularly by the Laws of our neighbouring Nation, in regard the Fact was done of Suddenty, by a Person in Drink, and highly provoked."

And, imo, As to the Law of God, Chap. xxi. Ver. 13. of Exodus was appealed to, where it is said, That if a Man lie not in Wait, there was to be a Peace appointed whither he should fly; which seemed to require Forethought. And the xxxvth Chap. of Numbers, Ver. 22. where it was said, That if any one thrust another suddenly without Enmity, the Congregation was to judge between the Slayer and the Revenger of Blood; from which it would seem, that Slaughter or Suddenty was not punishable by Death.

To this it was answered, That in the Law of God the general Rule was, Whoso sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed: And at the Hand of Man, and at the Hand of every Man's Brother, and at the Hand of every Beast was the Life of Man to be required, Gen. Chap. ix. That by the Law of Moses, Death of a Suddenty was plainly capital; nor had the Manslayer the Benefit of the City of Refuge, but where the Slaughter was mere Misfortune, and casual, which was plainly the Meaning of the Words in Exodus, If a Man lie not in Wait, but God deliver him into his Hand; which could not with any Propriety be understood of Slaughter committed, where the Intention and Design antecedit istum licet non con-gressum.

And this Matter is clearly explained in the xxxvth Chap. of Numbers, where he who smites with an Instrument of Iron, is called a MURDERER; and where it is said, That he who smites with a throwing Stone, or with a Hand-weapon of Wood, wherewith a Person may die, and he die, the Murderer is surely to be put to Death. And then the Law proceeds plainly to treat of Cases, where Death ensues from Strokes or Thrusts of a Weapon not deadly, and there it requires indeed Hatred and Enmity; but if it be done suddenly and without Enmity, or (which is remarkable) in the 23d Verse; With any Stone wherewith a Man may die, seeing him not, and was not his Enemy, nor sought his Harm; then the Congregation was to judge between the Slayer and the Revenger of Blood. From which 'tis plain, that Slaughter upon Suddenty, even without Forethought or previous Enmity, was capital by the Law of Moses, if the Wound was given with a lethal [deadly] Weapon, except when it was done by mere Chance, As by throwing a Stone, whereby a Man may die, the Person who throw it seeing him not, and so at no Time was his Enemy, or sought his Harm. And this is the Case mentioned, Chap. xix. Ver. 4. Deut. where it is said, Whoso killeth his Neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in Time past (which is limited by the Example immediately subjoined to Homicide merely casual), shall fly into one of these Cities, and live. Now, in the present Case, the Nature of the Weapon and of the Wound are such, as clearly exclude founding with any Colour upon the Disposition of the Law of Moses, though the Question were of the Pannel's claiming the Benefit of the City of Refuge. But neither is it an Argument of any Force to plead, that where the Benefit of the City of Refuge was granted, that by the Law of Nature the Crime was not capital; for the Revenger of Blood could never have been tolerated to kill without the City of Refuge, where innocent Blood was spilt, whereby the Land must have been polluted, and the Subjects were permitted impune, so notoriously to break in upon the established Laws of Nature; and therefore, though it is an Argument of unavoidable Force, that where-ever, by the Law of Moses, capital Punishments are allowed, such Punishments are lawful: But the Argument is not of equal Strength, that where the Powers of the Law were suspended by the jus asyli established by positive Precept, that therefore, in Countries where there is no such Privilege, either by the Laws of God, or the Laws of the Land, that there the Punishment is not to be capital, where the jus asyli could have been claimed.

2do, It was contended, "That by the Common Law, not only dolus, but propositum was necessary; and that Slaughter committed impetu et rixa were not to be punished capitally." And to this Purpose, the Authority of the learned Voet. was cited, who seems to say, That in rixa, if the Person cannot be discovered who gave the deadly Wound, the ordinary Punishment should not take Place.

But when this Matter is considered, it is plain there arises no good Argument for the Pannel from the Common Law: For though there is a Difference to be made between propositum and machinatio premeditata, and sudden Passion and Heat of Drink, determining the Will to commit the Crime; yet as Laws were made and became necessary, chiefly from the depraved Passions of Mankind, they cannot afford a sufficient Excuse against the ordinary Punishment of an atrocious Crime; and there is dolus, when a Crime is even committed of a sudden, although there be no Forethought: So it is commonly said, that Opportunity makes the Thief, and Theft is committed impetu, nevertheless not without dolus. Nor is it necessary to prove or libel a Forethought in the Commission of the Crime. In the same Manner Passion or Provocation may unfortunately determine the Will to the Commission of a horrid Crime; but it would be of dangerous Consequence to allow of Bloodshed under Colour of Passions which Men ought to subdue, or of Drunkenness which they ought to avoid, or of a sudden vicious Turn of Mind; and therefore, in the Roman Law, whoever committed Slaughter dolo malo, whether deliberately and upon Forethought, or of Suddenty, was to be punished ex lege Cornelia de Sicariis: And to show that it was sufficient, that the Design should only precede the Act from which Death followed, and not the meeting of the Persons, as the Acts of the Mind are only to be known by external Circumstances; the Kind of Weapon, in the same Manner as in the Law of Moses, was sufficient to found a Presumption of such propositum, as, joined with the Act of Killing, brought the Manslayer under the pœna legis Corneliae: So in the l. 1. § 3. ff. ad legem Cornelianam de Sic. it is said, Si gladium strinxerit, & in eo percusserit, indubitato occidendi animo id eum admisisse; and if prior Forethought had been necessary, the Kind of Weapon could not possibly have founded a sufficient Presumption: But as it manifestly made appear the Intention to kill, whether that Intention had its Birth from Passion or Drink, it was voluntary Slaughter, done dedita opera, and therefore to be punished capitally. And the Passage cited from the learned Voet. rather confirms this Doctrine, That if in rixa, which must suppose Suddenty, the Person who inflicted the mortal Wound was discovered, he was to be subjected to the ordinary Punishment. And the same Author, § 9. of that Title, observes, That though such as commit Slaughter, calore iracundiae, may be said impetu delinquere; yet there neque judicium, neque assensus animi, neque voluntas dest; and says, That a Person provoked by verbal Injuries, how great soever, was not free from the pœna ordinaria. And the Truth is, if Passion and Provocation were sufficient to excuse Slaughter, it were in vain to lay down the Rules so anxiously conceived in the Laws concerning the moderamen inculpatae tutelae, where the Slayer must prove that he was constitutus in periculo vitæ. And had the Case stood otherwise in the Roman Law, it could never have been doubted, when Jealousy was the Rage of a Man, and Adultery the highest Provocation against a Husband, and a real Injury; the Question could never have been stated to be determined by the Emperor, as in l. 38. ff. § 8. ad legem Julianam de adult. Whether a Husband, impetu tractus doloris, uxorem in adulterio deprehensam interfecerit, was liable to the pœna legis Corneliae de Sicariis? And who, by that Decision, upon the peculiar Circumstances of the Case was excused [exempted], and nevertheless made subject, si loci humilis, of being condemned ad opus perpetuum, and if honestior was to be condemned relegari in insulam. But as the Case must be determined upon the Law of Scotland, it is unnecessary to dwell too long upon the Arguments drawn from the Roman Law.

3tio, It was contended for the Pannel, "That by the Law of Scotland, Slaughter and Murder were of old different Species of Crimes, and only Murder

"Murder committed upon forethought Felony was properly computed Murder, and punished as such; but that Slaughter committed upon Suddenness, or chaud melle, and in rixa, was deemed only homicidium culposum, and not punishable by Death." And to support this Position, several Acts of Parliament were appealed to, by which it was statuted, That Murder was to be capitally punished; but chaud melle, or Slaughter committed upon Suddenness, was to be punishable according to the old Laws: And that in this Case, if the Pannel had even killed Bridgeton, at whom he aimed the Thrust, in the Circumstances above set forth, it was not Murder upon Forethought, but upon Suddenness and high Provocation.

To this it was answered, That this Doctrine, so directly contrary to the received Opinion, had little Countenance from the old Laws and Acts of Parliament, less from the constant Practice before the Act of Parliament King Charles II. in the Year 1661, and stood in plain Contradiction to this last Law, and the constant Practice and repeated Decisions of the Court of Justiciary from that Time down to this Day.

By the old Law, particularly Chap. 3. of the first Statutes of King Robert I. intituled, Men condemned to the Death should not be redeemed, IT IS STATUTED AND ORDAINED, GIFF ANY MAN, IN ANY TIME COMING OR BYGANE, IS CONVICT OR ATTAINTED OF Slaughter, REIF, OR ANY OTHER CRIME TOUCHING LIFE AND LIMB "COMMON JUSTICE" SHALL BE DONE UPON HIM, WITHOUT ANY RANSOME." Here Slaughter in general is mentioned, and Justice was to be done upon the Person convict of it, and the Punishment by the Title was plainly Death: So that, at common Law, Slaughter in general was capital. The next Paragraph does indeed save the King's Power (which must be the Power of pardoning), and the Liberties granted by the King to the Kirk and Kirkmen, and other Lords; which must be understood of special Immunities in the case of Manslaughter: For no Privilege was to protect against Murder upon Forethought; and the Exception confirms the Rule.

By Chap. 43. of the Statutes of King Robert III. it is statuted, THAT NA MAN USE ANY DESTRUCTION, HERSHIPS, BURNING, REIF, Slaughter, IN TIME TO COME, UNDER THE PAIN OF TINSSEL OF LIFE AND GOODS: Whereby the Pain of Death is clearly made the Punishment of Slaughter in general. And in the immediate subsequent Chapter, the Sheriff was to take diligent Inquisition of Destroyers of the Country, or such as had destroyed the King's Lieges with Herships, Slaughter, &c. and was to take Bail from them, if arrested, to compare at the next Justice-ayr; and if Bail was not given, the Sheriff was to put him to the Knowledge of an Assize: And gif he be taint with the Assize for sic an Trespasfour, it is said, HE SHALL BE CONDEMNED TO DEATH: Which seems only to relate to Manslaughter, and not to Murder upon forethought Felony, which was one of the Pleas of the Crown, to be tried only before the King's Justiciar; as is evident from Chap. 11. King Malcolm II's Laws; and Chap. 13 and 15. whereas Slaughter might be tried by the Sheriff, where there was a certain Accuser, as appears from Book I. of the Regiam Majestatem, Chap. 1. § 7, 8, 9.

There are sundry others of the old Statutes, that seem plainly to presuppose that Slaughter was capital, and particularly these of Alexander II. Chap. 2. § 3, 4, 5, 6. And so Stene, in his Treatise of Crimes, Tit. 2. Chap. 6. says, That Slaughter in rixa, or chaud melle, is generally punished by Death, and Confiscation of the moveable Goods pertaining to the Trespasfour; but with this Difference, that the Girth or Sanctuary was no Refuge to him who commits Slaughter by forethought Felony, but he should be delivered to the Judge Ordinary, to underly the Law: Which plainly appears from Act 23. Part 4. James V. whereby Masters of Girth are ordained to deliver up such Persons as are guilty of Murder upon forethought Felony. And it is in vain to found upon Law 90. Part 6. James I. which says in the End, GIFF IT BE FORETHOUGHT FELONY, HE SHALL DIE THEREFORE; because the Act relates to all Manslayers; and though that particular and most atrocious Species be mentioned, as that for which the Murderer should die, yet the Argument will not hold, That therefore no other Kind of Slaughter was capital: For it is there said in the general, That if the Slayer is taken with red Hand, the Law shall be done upon him within that Sun; which cannot be understood of a Crime not capital. And Sir George Mackenzie, in his Observations upon it, says, This may seem to imply, that Men die not for Murder committed without forethought Felony; but this holds not in our Law, for Murder, though committed without forethought Felony, is punishable by Death, except it was either casual, or in Self-Defence.

The Act 51. Part 3. James I. was improperly founded on by the Pannel's Procurators; for that Act does no more than extend the Difference between forethought Felony and chaud melle to all Transgressions as well as Slaughter; as Sir George Mackenzie observes upon that Law, where he says, That chaud melle, or homicidium in rixa commissum, is capital by our present Law.

That Criminals who resorted to, and took Sanctuary in Churches, had Protection, though their Crimes were capital, is extremely plain from Chap. 6. of the Statutes of K. Alexander II. where it is said, That Thieves and Reivers who fly to holy Kirk, if moved with Repentance, he confits that he has bewily sinned, and for the Love of God is come to the House of God for Safety of himself, he shall have Peace in this manner, That he shall not lose his Life nor Limb, but restore what he had taken, and satisfy the King, and swear upon the Evangel, That for thereafter, they shall never commit Reif nor Theft; but if he declared himself innocent, he was to be tried. And in the last Paragraph of that Chap. it is said, Moreover Manslayers, &c. if they fly, in manner foresaid, to the Kirk, the Law aforesaid shall be kept and observed to them.

There seems to have been this other Difference too, by the Books of the old Law between Murder upon Forethought and Slaughter, that the Trial of Murder was summar, whereas Manslaughter could not be tried till after forty Days, as appears by the Statutes of Robert II. from Chap. 3. to Chap. 9.

After the Reformation, when the jus asyli, formerly given to Churches, dropped, the Distinction between Murder and Manslaughter was looked on with less Attention, and Libels were commonly framed indifferently, for Murder, and Slaughter in general, without any Mention of forethought Felony; nor was it ever objected, that Malice or premeditate Design was requisite to make the Crime capital: And Criminals were punished to Death, where from the Proof there was not a Colour or Pretence of Forethought, or any premeditate Design; as will appear from looking into the Books of Adjournal. And many Instances might be given, particularly in the Case of Jean Currie against William Frazer, the last of July, 1641; where the Pannel was condemned upon an extra-judicial Confession, administered with other Circumstances; in which he set forth the Fact, that the Defunct and he had some little Quarrel about a Staff; and hearing that he had murdered his Brother, he came into a House where the Defunct was; and that either the Defunct, or some other that was by, took the Pannel by the Arm, to hold him: Having freed himself, he aimed a Stroke with a Whinger at the Defunct's Arm; but missing it, he struck the Defunct about the Pap: And upon this Proof, he was found guilty, and executed.

In the Case of Bruce against Marshall, the 3d April, 1664. Slaughter was libelled; and he was condemned upon his own judicial Confession: From which it appears, That he was so far from having any Forethought, that he suffered not only the greatest Provocation in Words, but was even beat with Hands and Feet by the Defunct while he was on the Ground; but at last getting up, and (as the Confession bears) being overcome with Passion, he drew a Knife, and struck at him in two several Places of his Body, whereby he died. And upon this Confession, where there was Suddenness, Provocation and Passion, he was brought in as guilty, and condemned to be beheaded.

The Law remaining somewhat uncertain concerning casual Homicide, and there being no longer any Benefit of Girth as formerly; in the Year 1649, an Act was past during the Usurpation, for removing all Question and Doubt that might thereafter arise in criminal Pursuits for Slaughter, ordaining, that the Cases of Homicide after following, viz. casual Homicide, Homicide in lawful Defence, and Homicide committed upon Thieves and Robbers, should not in Time coming be punished by Death, notwithstanding any Laws or Acts of Parliament, or any Practick made heretofore, or observed in punishing of Slaughter. And this past into a Law after the Restoration in the Year 1661; and at the same time, all Decisions given conform to this Act, since the 4th of February 1649 Years, are declared to be sufficient to secure all Parties interested, as if the Act had been of that Date; which was necessary, because the Acts during the Usurpation had been rescinded: And this Law has ever been looked upon as the Standard. And the Practice of the Court of Justiciary, since that Time, clearly demonstrates, that Slaughter of Suddenness, and Slaughter upon Provocation, which could not be brought under one or other of the Particulars there mentioned, have been taken to be capital.

The Procurators for the Pannel here observed, "That though in the Cases there mentioned, the Law ordained Slaughter not to be capital, yet it neither said, nor supposed, that the former Law, whereby Pannels were intitled to plead against a capital Punishment, was thereby abrogated, but only statuted in the Cases there mentioned."

To this it was answered, That the Narrative of the Statute was for removing of all Question and Doubt that may arise thereafter in criminal Pursuits for Slaughter, and consequently cannot be supposed to have left doubtful Cases, that the Pannel's Procurators must admit were not so clear as casual Homicide, and Homicide in Defence: nay, the Law seems to suppose pretty plainly, that all Slaughter by the Laws and Acts of Parliament, or Practicks, was capital, not declaring what was Law from any other Period than the Year 1649, but enacting the same with a non obstante, and judging it necessary to confirm the Decisions that had past, conform to that Act during the Usurpation, which would have been vain, if it had not been at least doubtful, whether casual Homicide, Homicide in lawful Defence, and Slaughter committed upon Thieves and Robbers, did not subject those guilty to the Pain of Death: And if those Degrees of Homicide were so much as doubtful, it is not possible to conceive that chaud melle, or Slaughter committed, ded ta opera, though without Forethought, was, by the Law of Scotland, not capital. Or if it should be supposed to have been doubtful, whether these last Degrees of Homicide were capital: that the Legislature, upon a Narrative, that all Question and Doubt that might arise hereafter in criminal Pursuits for Slaughter, should be removed, would have enacted in the clearer Cases, with a non obstante, and left the more difficult in the dark, as surely the greatest Advocates for Slaughter on Suddenness must admit, that, at least, it is more culpable than either Homicide merely casual, or Homicide in lawful Defence.

The Argument drawn from the Rubrick of the Act, which mentions Degrees of casual Homicide only, can conclude no more, than that the Title is imperfect; and it would be resting too much upon an Argument à rubro, to make it defeat what is said in the Law, That all Questions concerning Slaughter were thereby to be removed, and which opposes casual Homicide to Homicide in lawful Defence; and consequently cannot under the Words, casual Homicide, comprehend all Slaughter not upon forethought Felony. And Sir George Mackenzie in his Observations upon the Act takes notice, that the Title is very ridiculous, and consequently no Argument can be drawn from it.

One Thing may not be improper to notice, is, that if killing by forethought Felony was the only Species of Slaughter capital, the Crown was disabled from pardoning any capital Slaughter whatsoever, which does not appear to have been the Opinion of our Lawyers.

As to the Decisions subsequent to this Law, they will be found entirely agreeable to the Doctrine now laid down; Sir George Mackenzie observes, that tho' many Lawyers are positive, that tho' homicidium in rixa, even where the Author of the Plea is known, may by the Rigor of Law be punished by Death, yet that no Country uses this Rigor; yet he remembered, that in William Douglass's Case, this was urged, and albeit it was not proven that he was the Killer, yet the Assize found him guilty, and he thereupon died. This is a Case more favourable, than where the Person that gave the mortal Wound is known, though given suddenly, and even upon Provocation; and therefore shews what our Law is, and with how little Reason the Procurators for the Pannel maintain their Argument upon the Law of Scotland.

In the Case, his Majesty's Advocate against Nicolson, the 24th June, 1673. Murder and Slaughter, without Forethought, were charged upon Nicolson, the Pannel; and his Procurators pleaded the Benefit of the Act of Parliament anent casual Homicide, in the several Degrees thereof, he being in a Condition that he was not able to remember. To this it was answered, That the Defence was not relevant, in regard the Homicide could not be said to be casual, such as the Case of throwing of Stones over Dikes, and accidentally killing a Passenger: And the Pannel having afterwards proponed a Defence, That being in use to carry a Gun as a Fowler, and calling accidentally for Meat to his Dogs at a Mill, the Defunct fell upon him, and offered to secure him as a French Soldier, or fit to be one; in the Struggle, his Gun being half bent, went off, and killed the Defunct: Both the Libel and Defence were found relevant, and it appeared upon the Proof, that Nicolson was drunk, and that there was no previous Quarrel; but taking Exception at somewhat the Defunct said, he shot him with his Gun; and by the Verdict of the Assize, he was found guilty of the Slaughter committed upon the Defunct, and sentenced to have his Head struck off in the Grass-market; which shows that neither Drunkenness nor Suddenness is a relevant Defence against the pœna ordinaria in Slaughter.

And, in the Case of Murray contra Gray, 10th June, 1678, the Lords found the Libel relevant, and that there was no Necessity of any distinct Probation for proving premeditated Malice; which clearly shows that Slaughter, other than upon Forethought, was capital. And to show that Provocation and Passion are not received as Defences against the pœna ordinaria, a Multitude of Decisions might be brought, particularly in the Case of Aird, who was indicted in 1693, for the Slaughter of Agnes Bayne, having given her some strokes on the Side and Belly with his Foot, by which she fell into Fainting-Fits, and immediately died. The Defence was, great Provocation and casual Homicide: Provocation, in as far as she threw a Chamber-Pot in his Face; and when he gave her hard Words, she and her Neighbours fell upon him, and beat him; upon which he gave her the Strokes above-mentioned. And in that Trial it was argued, there was no animus occidendi, no previous Malice, no mortal Weapon; and the Texts from Scripture urged in defence of the present Pannel, and the Arguments from the civil Law, and from our own Acts of Parliament were urged: Nevertheless the Lords found the Libel relevant, repelled the Defences; and, upon the Proof, he was sentenced to die.

In the Case of William Carmichael in 1694, Drunkenness was founded on to excuse a pœna ordinaria, and Forethought was neither libelled, nor proven; and the Lords found the Libel relevant, and, upon the Proof, he was sentenced to be hanged.

In the Year 1695, George Cuming, Writer in Edinburgh, was indicted for the Crime of Murder or Manslaughter of Patrick Falconer; the Defences now offered for the Pannel, upon the Distinction in the old Law, between Forethought and chaud melle, were offered; nevertheless the Libel was found relevant, and the Assize returned a Verdict guilty of Manslaughter; upon which he was condemned to die.

In the Case of Burnet of Carlops, the 22d January, 1711, though a Defence was sustained, yet the Libel without Forethought was found relevant: And in that of Hamilton of Green, the 30th June, 1716, the Pannel offered to prove, That he was accidentally at the House of Thomas Arde, of whose Murder he is accused, at the Day libelled, with some of his Acquaintances, and had no deadly Weapon along with him; That he became inebriated to a great Degree, and having left the House, and returned to ask for the Slip or Cover of the Sheath of a Sword, the Defunct gave him most indecent, injurious and scurrilous Language, and persisting in it, the Pannel pushed, or struck at him with his Sword, having the Scabbard thereon, that he had Reason to believe had a Crampet upon it: And being still more and more provoked by repeated, injurious Words, to protect himself from further Insolence he had Reason to look for, the Pannel still remaining on Horseback, the Defunct rushed himself upon the Sword. And this circumstantiated Fact was offered to be proven. Nevertheless the Libel was found relevant, and the Pannel's hail Defences repelled, and, upon the Proof, was sentenced to have his Head severed from his Body; and was accordingly beheaded.

In the Case of Thomas Ross and Jaffrey Roberts, the 20th July, 1716, it was pled for the Pannels, that being Recruits lately come from England to Scotland, and not knowing the Way, they asked the Defunct the Road to Edinburgh, who refusing to shew it, and one of the Pannels expostulating with him, why he treated a Stranger so, that came to serve the King? He uttered very disrespectful Words with respect to his Majesty; and one of the Pannels having called him Villain for such opprobrious Expressions, he came up to Ross, and with his Fist gave him a Blow on the Face, and then pulled him down to the Ground, and beat him with a great Stick, to the imminent Danger of his Life, saying, That he should never go alive out of his Hands: And Roberts having come to his Assistance, and rescued him a little; Ross, the Pannel, gave the Defunct a Wound with a Knife, whereof he died. Ross pleaded There neither was nor could be forethought Felony, or premeditated Malice, against a Person whom he had never seen before: That it was committed upon Suddenness: That he had the highest Provocation, both verbal and real. Nevertheless, by the Interlocutor, Ross, the Pannel, his giving the Wound was found relevant to infer the Pain of Death. And the Defence from Provocation by Words, and receiving a Blow on the Face, being pulled down to the Ground, and beat with a great Stick to the Danger of his Life, jointly sustained relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment, was found to be elided by the Reply, That, at the time of giving the Wound to the Defunct, the Defunct's Hands were held by Jaffrey Roberts, the other Pannel. From whence, 'tis evident, that Slaughter upon Suddenness, in rixa or chaud melle, and by a Person who had received the greatest verbal and real Injuries, even beyond that of being thrown into the Kennel, of the Nature that is set forth into which the present Pannel was thrown, is by that Interlocutor found homicidium dolosum, and not culposum, but capital.

And, in a very late Trial, in the Case of Davidson, the Soldier, Slaughter upon the greatest Suddenness was sustained, and he was upon the Proof executed.

And the Judgment given in 1717, in the Case of Brock and Lindsay, determines this Point beyond all Dispute. These Pannels were accused of the Murder of one Anderson: And as the Libel did expressly set forth a Quarrel and a Struggling betwixt the two Pannels and the Defunct, which made it directly an homicidium in rixa; so the Pannels, at least Lindsay, offered a pretty strong Defence, namely, that the Defunct, without any Provocation, justled them, and struck at Lindsay, and beat him down to the Ground; and it was while they were on the Ground, the Wound was given. And the Defence was pled for two several Purposes: First, That the Crime was not capital, because no forethought Felony. And, 2dly, To intitle them to the Act of Indemnity, under which all Homicides were included, except wilful Murder, and Slaughter of forethought Felony. And the Interlocutor upon the Relevancy was in thir Words, Find the Pannels, or either of them, at the Place and Time libelled, their giving Archibald Anderson a Cut or Wound in the Neck or Throat, or other mortal Wound, with a Knife or other mortal Weapon, whereof he, the Defunct, soon thereafter died; or that the said Pannels, both or either of them, were art and part therein, relevant to infer the Pains of Death, and other Pains libelled: And repel the bail Defences for the Pannel, excepting that Defence pled upon his Majesty's gracious Act of Indemnity; against which the said Lords superseeded to give their Judgment, till the Conclusion of the Probation, and Return of the Verdict.

This then is an undoubted Authority, that Homicide may, by the Law of Scotland, infer the Pain of Death, though it be neither wilful Murder, properly so speaking, nor forethought Felony; otherwise the Court could not have found the Crime relevant to infer the Pains of Death, and at the same time reserve the Consideration, whether there was any forethought Felony, or not.

Upon this Interlocutor a Proof was adduced, and a Verdict returned, finding Lindsay, one of the Pannels, guilty; and yet the Court having resumed the Consideration of the Indemnity, found him intitled to the Benefit of it: That is, in other Words, they found the Crime was neither voluntary Murder, nor Slaughter of forethought Felony. So that 'tis plain, had not the Indemnity intervened, Lindsay must have suffered Death for killing, though there was no previous Design of Forethought.

And an Interlocutor upon the Relevancy, much to the same Purpose with the former one, was also pronounced, the 31st of August, 1721, in the Case of Samuel Matthews, a Soldier; where the Libel was found relevant to infer the Pain of Death, reserving the Consideration of another Act of Indemnity then pled for the Pannel.

It would be in vain, and lengthen a Paper already too long, to run through all the Decisions which shew, that neither the Drunkenness of the Pannel, nor Provocation given him, nor the Suddenness upon which the Fact was committed, can afford a Defence to the Pannel, to exculpate the Slaughter, or lessen the ordinary Punishment: And therefore the Pursuers shall leave the first Branch of the Defence with the Lords, with this Observation, that if it is really founded in Law, by looking into the Books of Adjournal, one would think our Law has hitherto been very ill understood.

2do, It was offered, what indeed is alone applicable in the present Case, "That if the Pannel intended only to wound or kill Bridgeton, and by Misadventure the deceased Earl of Strathmore was wounded, and of that Wound died, the pœna ordinaria was not to be inflicted."

It was answered, That according to the Rules of the civil Law, he who intending to kill one, kills another, is nevertheless subject to the pœna ordinaria; so Julius Clarus delivers his Opinion in his Receptæ Sententiæ, lib. 5. § homicidium, N. 6. where, after having taken notice, that the contrary was indeed the Opinion of some, adds, Sed certe ego si casus contingeret, illi facerem caput amputari. And the learned Mathæus, lib. 48. tit. de Sicariis, § 12. gives the same Opinion, observing that the Act is consummate, there is animus or Design of killing, and Death: That it would be a ridiculous Defence, that the Pannel intended to steal the Goods of one Man, but happened to steal those of another; or against Adultery, that he intended to defile one Man's Wife, and happened to light upon that of another: And he thinks 'tis as unreasonable to hope for Safety from this Defence, that the Meaning was to kill one, but another received the Stroke, and died.

Vet. in his Commentary agrees with them, lib. 48. tit. 8. n. 2. where he says, that there is no Difference, Sive vulnus in titium directum ab eo declinatum, Mævio in proximo stanti lethale fuerit, sive denique occidatur quæ cædis impediendæ causa, sese medium inter aggressorem & defendentem interposuerit: quia prævalet, quod principale est, nec error talis tollit aut occidendi animum, aut eadem lege Cornelia vindicandum. And for this not only founds upon the l. 18. § 3. & § ult. ff. de injur. and l. 5. § 1. ff. de serv. corrupto; but adds the Authorities of Farinacius, quæst. 125. n. 156 & 157. as also, that of Pachinæus, Carpzovius and Berlichius. and others. And this Opinion obviates the Defence, as put in its most favourable Light, which however would be of very delicate Proof, that the Defunct thrust himself between Bridgeton and the Pannel, and received the Stroke aimed at the other.

The learned Sande, lib. 5. tit. 9. defin. 6. which has this Title, Qui alium pro alio occidit, nihilominus ordinaria, l.g. Cornel. pœna afficiendus, says, after agreeing, that, according to the Roman Law, such Error would not have excused the Murder, Hæc sententia ubique usu obtinuit, & secundum eam, reus ad mortem condemnatus & decapitatus est, 17th November, anno 1621; and there alledges the Authority of Gomesius, Emanuel, Soir, and Carolus Molinæus, Qui alios cumulat, in his Book ad consuetudines Parisienses. And Sir George Mackenzie in his Criminals, tit. Murder, § 9. says, after stating the Question, "Yet I think he should die, seeing the Design of killing a Man, and not any particular Man, is Murder; and the Killer intended to deface GOD Almighty's Image, and to take from the King a Subject."

'Tis nothing to the Purpose, that some of the Authors who write upon the Roman Law, are of a different Opinion, in a Case not determined in Words by the Text, when the Bulk of the Commentators are of the other Side, the most recent and of greatest Authority; and when it appears to be received as a Rule by the Practice of Nations, that the ordinary Punishment should be inflicted. And it may not be improper to observe, that the Cases where Lawyers dissent from the received Opinion, are generally unjustifiable Homicide, that is, where the Bystander was killed, when the Killer intended to execute his Purpose in lawful Defence, and not in homicidio culposo, which is the highest the Pannel's Case could possibly be pled upon Provocation, according to any Opinion delivered by the strongest Advocates for the Question the Pannel pleads.

That it is not always necessary, that the Intention should be directed towards the Mischief done, in order to inflict the Pain of Death, must be evident from looking to the xxi. Chap. of Exod. Ver. 22. and 23. where, If a Woman with Child is hurt when men are striving, and Mischief follow, Life is to be given for Life. And the Kind of Killing now in question was plainly such as, according to the Law of Moses, would not have intitled the Slayer to the Benefit of the City of Refuge: For though in the xix. Chap. of Deut. Ver. 4. Who killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past, is said to be intitled to that Privilege; yet this is limited immediately with an Example of Manslaughter merely casual.

The Procurators for the Pannel insisted, "That this Kind of Killing was intirely casual, beyond, and without the Intention of the Party: That in the Case of Masson, in the Year 1674, Burnet of Carlops, and several others, where it appeared there was no Intention to Kill, the Punishment was mitigated."

It was answered, That where, from the Nature of the Weapon, and Means by which the Wound was given, taking all the Circumstances together, there was no Evidence or Presumption that the Pannel intended Death to any Person whatsoever; and the propositum was neither proved, nor could be presumed, as in the Case of Maffon. And in that of Burnt of Carlops, where Persons having Swords, only struck with Staves, it was held as approaching towards a casual Homicide. But that can never be pretended, when the Wound given as libelled was so clearly mortal, and the Instrument the most lethal [deadly]; and the Decision of Carlops, even with that Difference, stands single in the Books of Adjournal.

It was further contended for the Pannel, "That as animus occidendi, and Death following, are admitted to be necessary, in order to inflict the highest Punishment; so as from the Circumstances mentioned in Exculpation, 'tis evident there was no Intention against the Defunct: And it cannot be known whether the Pannel's Design was to kill Bridgeton, since he was not killed, or if the Wound would have been mortal, had the Sword reached him; and consequently the necessary Requisites to constitute a Murder, were not to be found here."

It was answered, That the Invasion with a mortal Weapon, with which the Defunct was killed, was a sufficient Proof in Law that the Invader intended to kill, since Death followed; and that there is no wounding by Measure, and Certainty not to kill. The Act implies dolus and Malice, which, with Death following, makes Murder, without any further Proof of an Act of the Will to kill; and there would have been as little Evidence that the Pannel intended to kill Bridgeton, if he had actually received the Wound and died, because it was possible the Sword might have pierced further than he intended; and if he did not design to kill Bridgeton, and killed the Defunct, he must have been the Person against whom the Mischief was directed. As indeed it may be argued from the Rage and Drunkenness pled in Excuse and Defence, 'tis possible that ex rabie he intended to kill whomever he met with; and if Rage from Passion and Drink is allowed to palliate Murder, 'tis impossible any one can be safe. And these very Circumstances, without which the Defence has not a Colour, must, at the same Time, give Evidence, that the Pannel's Intention of pursuing Bridgeton with a Sword, was to kill and destroy him; for he pleads them to excuse his killing of the Defunct, as sufficient Provocations to incite him to it.

The Law of England was frequently mentioned by the Procurators for the Pannel in the pleading, as what would justify the Arguments brought for them; and particularly it was said, "That all Killing of a Sudden by that Law, was only Manslaughter, and not Murder." But the contrary will appear, by looking into Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, Book 1. Chap. 31. of Murder, where he clearly distinguishes between deliberate Murder, and Murder committed on a sudden: And in this last Case, Malice prepensed is, by the Law of England, often implied, as Lord Chief-Justice Kylinge lays it down, Regina versus Mawgidge, and justifies it by the Case of Holloway, who espying a Boy that came to cut Wood, took him, and tied him to an Horse's Tail with a Cord, and then gave the Horse two Blows, whereby he run away, and broke the Boy's Shoulder, whereof he died; which must have been sudden, and was adjudged Murder. And pag. 130, he supposes A to have been provoked by B, and to have drawn his Sword, and made a Pass at him, when B had no Weapon drawn, but missed him; thereupon B draws his Sword, and passes at A, and there being Interchange of Passes between them, A kills B. I hold, says the Author, this to be Murder in A, for A's Pass at B was malicious, and what B afterwards did was lawful. Here is both Suddenity and Provocation, and yet, in the Opinion of that great Lawyer, it would have been held Murder. And in the present Question, neither Bridgeton, nor the Deceased, had any Weapon drawn.

And to shew, that according to the Law of England, the aiming at one, and hitting another, does not make Death following Manslaughter; in the End of the next Page he sets down the Case of Dr. Williams, a Welshman, who having a Leek in his Hat, upon St. David's-Day, a certain Person pointed to a Jack-of-Lent that hung up hard by, and said to him, Look upon your Countryman! At which Dr. Williams being enraged, took a Hammer that lay upon a Stall hard by, and flung at him, which hit another, and killed him: And though being indicted upon the Statute of Stabbing, it was resolved he was not within that Statute, because of the Kind of Weapon; Yet, says the Author, if the Indictment had been for Murder, I do think that the Welshman ought to have been convicted thereof (a).

And since the Pannel's Procurators insisted so much upon the Law of England, the Pursuers cannot but mention the Authority of one of those Lawyers, as to one of the Cases they themselves stated in the Debate, Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, Chap. 31, in fin. The Case is, That a Person shooting at tame Fowls with Intent to steal them, accidentally kills a Man; that Author says, That it is agreed it would be Murder, and not Manslaughter.

'Tis true indeed, that it would appear by the Law of England, as laid down in these Reports, that if there is Provocation, in some particular Cases, sufficient to alleviate the Act of Killing, it reduces it to a bare Homicide. But then no Provocation from Words is ever sustained, nor even Assaults, but upon this Ground, That he who was affronted or assaulted, might reasonably apprehend, that he that treated him in that Manner might have some further Design upon him, which resolves the Matter into a Kind of Self-Defence; and in this the Law of England differs from the Law of Scotland, which requires, in order to lawful Defence, and killing under the Notion of Danger from the Assailant, ut quis sit constitutus in Periculo Vitæ. But then there is no Pretence of apprehending dangerous Consequences, when the Party killed, or intended to be killed, was flying, and had no Weapon, as in this Case, and the Passion in such Circumstances resolves itself simply into Revenge, which no Law ever sustained to alleviate or palliate Murder; for there the Malice prepensed is clear and evident.

But then, if it be considered in the present Case, that the Party affronting or invading, is not only set forth to have fled, and to have had no Weapon in his Hand, but that he escaped; what Colour is there, upon these Principles, to alleviate the killing of a Person interposing to prevent the Mischief, when there was no Resistance upon the Part of any Person whatsoever, as in the Case of a Combat, and where it was voluntary as to the Person giving the Wound, in regard he could have stopped when Bridgeton fled, which cannot be said with regard to the Welshman who threw the Hammer.

To conclude this Matter, it appears pretty evident, the Circumstances offered in Exculpation afford, by the Law and Practice of Scotland, no relevant Defence, suppose the Person killed had been the Provoker, much less in the Case where the Person killed generously interposed to prevent the Mischief, having given no Colour or Cause of Provocation, having no Weapon, and where the Person, against whom the Invasion is said to be meant, was without drawn Sword, and flying: The Murder in these Circumstances must have proceeded either from Rage and Revenge, which no Law can ever favour, since Laws were made, and Judges appointed, that private Persons should not attempt judging in their own Case, and to bridle the unruly Passions of Men, or from set Purpose and Design to kill the Defunct, from former Resentment. And what adds to the Presumption of the last, is the Nature of the Wound, quite thro' the Body, and that the Sword went through the Back lower than where it pierced the Belly; which excludes all Possibility of pleading, that the Pannel's stumbling might have pushed it forward, because, by the Nature of the Thing, had he stumbled after the Sword pierced the Defunct's Body, it must have raised the Point of the Sword, so that it could not have pierced lower in the Back than in the Belly.

Upon the first Branch of the Libel, the Pursuers think it unnecessary to open the particular Circumstances from which the Pannel's causeless Ill-will and Resentment may appear against the Defunct; that is Matter of Evidence, and upon which no Interlocutor in the Relevancy can pass, and must lie in the Breast of the Assize: And against this Relevancy no Exception, or Colour of Exception can be pretended to lye. And as to the separate Relevancy, and Art and Part, what is offered to be proven, that the Defunct thrust himself in a Manner upon the Pannel's Sword: As it is of too delicate Proof, and was repelled in the Case of Hamilton of Green, it is believed the Lords can have no Regard to it. And as for the Drunkenness and Provocation, especially where the Provocation is said to have been given by a third Party; if it were sustained, it must turn up what have been thought the Foundations of the Law of Scotland, and stand in Opposition to all the Practice that can be discovered from the Books of Adjournal. And the allowing such Defences as might possibly have some Colour in the Law of England, to be proven, would be of dangerous Consequence in the Law of Scotland, where the Pursuers are tied up to a precise Relevancy: So that the Procedure in that Part of the Island, in Trials of this Kind, unless the whole Form of Trial were adopted in our Law, would open a Door for leaving Murders unpunished. The Law of Scotland alone can be the Rule in this Case; though, at the same Time, it is believed, that the species facti, as set forth by the Pannel, would be sufficient Warrant for a Verdict of Murder, even according the Laws and Practice of England. In respect whereof, &c.

CHA. ARESKINE.

Information for James Carnegie, of Finhaven, Pannel; against Susanna, Countess of Strathmore, the Honourable Mr. James Lyon, Pursuers, and his Majesty's Advocate, for his Highness's Interest.

THE said James Carnegie, of Finhaven, stands indicted before your Lordships of WILFUL and PREMEDITATE MURDER and HOMICIDE; in so far as, Having a causeless Ill-will and Resentment against the Deceased Charles, Earl of Strathmore, he conceived a deadly Hatred and Malice against him; and (on the Day libelled) "Did, with a drawn Sword, without the least Colour or Cause of Provocation then given by him, invade the said deceased Earl, and did basely and feloniously murder and kill him, by giving him a Wound therewith in the Belly, whereof he soon after died. At least, At the Time and Place described, the said Charles, Earl of Strathmore, was, with a drawn Sword, feloniously and barbarously wounded, and died of the said Wound within a few Days thereafter; and that the Pannel was art and part in this Murder. And the Indictment concludes, By all which it is evident, That you are guilty, art and part, of the Crimes of wilful and premeditate Murder and Homicide, or one or other of them, at the Time and Place, and in the Manner above set forth."

The Pannel was brought to your Lordships Bar, upon the 15th of July current, to plead to this Indictment, where he appeared under that deep Melancholy and Depressure of Spirit with which a Man and Christian must be loaded, who finds himself accused, not only of shedding of Blood, but of shedding the Blood of one, whose personal Character and Qualities drew, from all who had the Honour to know him, the highest Esteem and Regard; and for whom the Pannel himself had all the Honour, entire Friendship, sincere Affection, and high Respect, that either his Rank, personal Merit, or great Benevolence could call for; and of having done this barbarously, from premeditated Malice, deadly Hatred, and Felony fore-thought.

Your Lordships having put the Question to him, in the ordinary Way, What he said to the Indictment? He expressed himself in these Words:

My Lords,

I FIND myself accused by this Indictment of maliciously murdering the Earl of Strathmore; but as to any Ill-will, Malice, or Design to hurt the Earl, GOD is my Witness, I had none: On the contrary, I had all the due Regard, Respect, and Kindness for his Lordship, that I ever had for any Man. I had the Misfortune that Day to be mortally drunk, for which I beg GOD's Pardon, so that, as I must answer at GOD's great Tribunal, I do not remember what happened, after I got the Affront your Lordships will hear of from my Lawyers. One Thing I am sure of, if it shall appear that I was the unlucky Person who wounded the Earl, I protest before GOD, I would much rather that a Sword had been sheathed in my own Bowels. And further, I declare, That I do not so much as remember, that I saw the Earl after I came out of the Kennel, and even not so much as the drawing of my Sword; and therefore I cannot acknowledge the Libel, as it is libelled."

From these Words so expressed, it is evident, in what a dismal Situation of Mind this unhappy Gentleman must be. If what he hath said be true, he cannot be guilty of the malicious murdering the deceased Lord; yet he may have been the unhappy Instrument of his unfortunate Death; and what a bitter Reflection that must afford, all Circumstances, particularly that of Friendship, considered, will occur to every generous Man: It may produce Thoughts more afflicting than that of Death itself.

The Counsel for the Pannel, in the Entry to the Debate, judged themselves under a Necessity, from the great Honour all of them had for the Person of the deceased Lord; and always will have for those who remain of his Family, and from the particular Obligations of Friendship that some of them owed him in a more distinguished Manner, to declare, that if they had the least Apprehensions, that his Lordship's Death had happened by, or from any Design or Intention of the Pannel against his Life, that no Motive, even of Relation or natural Tie to the Pannel, would have induced them to open their Mouth in his Defence; but that Innocence is always presumed, and that the Circumstances, so far as yet appears, seem to set forth the Action as a Fatality, and not a Design, Justice and Duty called upon them to give their weak Assistance; until the Matter appeared in another Light.

The Fact, as laid in the Libel, is in very general Terms; and those Circumstances from which the Nature of the Action falls to be determined, and which are material for the Pannel's Defence, being entirely omitted, the Procurators for the Pannel were obliged to set forth the Case as it truly happened, according to the Information given them; which by our Law and Form, they are enabled to do, without owning the Libel, or admitting even those Facts, which, in the Recital, according to Information, they are led to narrate: And the Account given of it was,

"That, on the 9th of May last, the deceased Earl of Strathmore, the Pannel, and several others, were called to be present at the Funeral of a Daughter of Patrick Carnegie of Loures, a near Relation of the Pannel's; that they dined together at the Gentleman's House, where they drank a good deal, all in Friendship and Familiarity, without the least Appearance of Quarrel or Difference: That, after the Burying was over, they together with the Lord Rosehill, Mr. Thomas Lyon, and Mr. Lyon of Bridgeton, and other Gentlemen, went to one Clerk Dickson's, a Tavern in Forfar, where they drank pretty plentifully; and where the Pannel happened to be overtaken with too much Liquor: That all this while, nothing but Friendship appeared betwixt the deceased Earl and the Pannel; but that Bridgeton was, from Time to Time, bearing hard upon the Pannel; and, by the whole Tenor of his Conversation, endeavouring to fret or affront him.

"After this, the Pannel waited on the Lord Strathmore, at the Lady Auchterhouse's, where his Lordship went to visit, and Bridgeton followed them thither, and in that House began the former Way of Conversation, making the Pannel's Family-concerns the Subject of his Discourse, in the most provoking Manner, asking him in a jibing Way, to supply a Lord in the Company with Money, pulling him rudely by the Breast, and gripping him by the Wrist, and striking his Hand against the Table, telling him, he must give that Lord such a Sum at that Time; then insisting, That he should give him the Choice of his Daughters; and still gripping him, and dashing his Hand in the forehead rude manner, told him, he would have him promise to do so; and asking him, in an insolent way, What, would he not do it? Then telling him, if it were his Case, if he refused, he would maul him, shaking his Hand in the Pannel's Face. After this, in a ridiculing Way, desiring him to settle his Estate in a certain manner, since he had no Sons of his own; then upbraiding him with his Debt. All which, the Pannel bore with Patience, and endeavoured to ward off the Discourse, when Bridgeton still insisted in the most provoking Way. And that Bridgeton likewise used very great Rudeness to the Lady in whose House they were; particularly, when she in Civility offered him a Glass of Brandy, he, seeing the Pannel already overtaken with Drink, desired the Lady to give it to him, her Brother; and upon her saying that her Brother did not seem to want it at that Time, he gripped her by the Arm so rudely, as to make her complain, and swore, by GOD, her Brother either should drink it, or she should drink it herself; and persisted in this Way of doing, till the Lord Strathmore thought it proper to break off the Visit, and so went out of the House.

"That Finhaven and Bridgeton followed the Earl; and when they came to the Street, some Words passed, and Bridgeton used the Expression, God damn him, meaning the Pannel, and with that gripped him by the Breast, and pushed him into a dirty Kennel two Feet deep, over Head and Ears, where, in the Condition he was, he might have been smothered if a Servant of the Earl's had not helped him out, who at the same time expressed his Indignation at the Action he had seen, by these Words addressed to Bridgeton, Sir, though you be a Gentleman, you are uncivil.

"That Bridgeton, after having so flung the Pannel into the Kennel, leaving him there, walked forward; at the same time turning about, and folding his Arms across his Breast, scornfully laughed at him in that Condition.

"That the Pannel being helped out of the Kennel in manner foresaid, immediately drew his Sword, and, in a just Passion, pursued Bridgeton with a staggering Pace: And Bridgeton run towards the Earl of Strathmore, whose Back was then to him, and endeavoured to pull out his Sword; at which time the Pannel coming up with Bridgeton, made a Push at him; in which Instant the Earl turning hastily about, pushed off Bridgeton, and threw himself in the Way of the Sword, by which he received the fatal Wound."

These are the unlucky Circumstances of the Fact, as the Lawyers for the Pannel have been instructed to plead: And from it, as so stated, the Defence insisted upon for the Pannel was, That the Act of Killing is not Murder, nor capital, where there is no Malice nor Forethought against the Person killed, either proved to have been conceived and retained at any time preceding the Act of Killing, or presumed from the Circumstances to have preceded the Act immediately before the committing of it: But that in this Case there is no antecedent Malice specified or libelled; and therefore it must be taken for granted, that there was none. And as to presumed Malice immediately preceding the Act, that the Circumstances entirely exclude that Presumption; first, Because, as the Fact is laid, any Blow or Push that was intended, was made at, and designed for Bridgeton, and not against the Earl of Strathmore; and since the initium facti is to be considered, as well as the Event, a Push begun and intended against Bridgeton, could never be the Foundation of a Presumption of Malice against the Lord Strathmore, the Person killed, without which, the Killing could not be capital, but in this Case was merely casual and accidental, it having happened by the Earl's unluckily turning about in the Time of the Pannel's very Act of pushing against Bridgeton, whereby the Earl received the fatal Wound. 2do, That the Pannel could never be more criminal in having killed the Earl of Strathmore by a Thrust directed at Bridgeton, than he would have been if he had killed Bridgeton himself; but that so it was, that if he had killed Bridgeton, after the Provocation given in Manner above set forth, that it would have been construed only as casual or culpable Homicide, without Forethought, because done ex incontinenti, & ex subito impetu, & calore iracundie; yea, in some Measure in Self-defence, since the Pannel having been thrown into the Kennel; even to the Danger of being suffocated, he had Reason after that to expect the worst from Bridgeton, since no Gentleman will throw another into a Puddle, who is not supposed to be ready to go further; as he cannot but expect the strongest Retort of the Injury; and that the Pannel had the more Reason to think so; that Bridgeton immediately betook himself to the Earl of Strathmore's Sword, and endeavoured to pull it out, having none of his own, by reason that the known Ferocity of his Character and Behaviour is such, that the Country-Gentlemen of his Acquaintance decline to keep company with him, if he wear any Arms: In such case the Pannel was to expect the worst, and so was in some measure in his own Defence; altho' he may have exceeded the moderamen inculpatæ tutelæ; which Excess, in such Circumstances, would not be punishable by Death, but only by an arbitrary Punishment.

And in support of this Defence the Counsel for the Pannel shall now, in this Information, endeavour, though somewhat out of the Order of their pleading, to follow the Information given in for the Pursuers. And first, To show your Lordships, that Killing in such Circumstances was not capital by the Divine Law, or Law of Moses. 2do, That it was not capital by the Common Law, which we in great measure follow in Matters of that Kind. 3do, That it was not capital by our own ancient Law. 4to, That our ancient Law in that particular is not altered by the Statute of Charles II. 5to, That the Practice of the Court is not inconsistent, but agreeable to what is here pled. And 6to, That the Laws of our neighbouring Nations are for the most part consonant to those Principles, as well as the Judgment of foreign Courts.

And to begin with the Divine Law, it may be divided into two: First, The Law of Nature, which is the first of all Laws, and hath no other Author than God Almighty himself. 2do, His Will revealed by Writing, particularly in the Laws delivered by Moses.

And as to the Law of Nature, one of the first Principles seems to be, that every Action must be construed and regulated from the Intention of the Actor. Every Action whatever, except in so far as it is conjoined with the Will and Intention of the Agent, differs in nothing from the Action of an irrational Creature; yea, if we may so speak, as to call the Operation or Impulse of an inanimate Creature an Action, the Actions of Man separated from his Intention and Design as a rational Creature, differ in nothing from the Actions of Brutes, or the Impulse of Things inanimate; and consequently that Action, be what it will, can neither be Crime nor Virtue; it is a mere Impulse or Motion, not properly subject to Laws or Rules. But then, indeed, when it comes to be conjoined with the Intention, or, which is the same Thing, considered as the Action of a rational Agent, there it comes to be subject to Laws, to be considered as criminal or virtuous: Or if it appear to be accidental, so as to have depended upon no Will nor Deliberation of Reason, then it returns to be of the Nature of the Act of an irrational Creature, or inanimate Substance, and is subjected to no Penalty, nor yet capable of receiving a Reward. The plain Consequence of which is, that it is the animus alone that determines the Nature of the Act; and if the animus or Intention was criminal, then, by the Law of Nature, the Action itself amounts to a Crime. On the other hand, if it be good and virtuous, the Act is laudable by the Law of Nature, supposing even a bad Consequence should follow. But, in the third Place, If the Action truly arise from no Intention or Principle governing that Action, it is neither laudable nor punishable, it returns to be of the Kind already mentioned, the same with the like Act of an irrational Creature, or the Impulse of an inanimate Substance, moved by a Cause intrinsic to itself. And the Consequence of all this is, that by the primary Law of Nature, the Intention must make the Crime; and therefore if there appear no Intention to commit that particular Fact which happens to be complained of, it is not a Crime, notwithstanding of a bad Consequence; it is considered as a Fatality.

And the Application is plain to the present Argument, that if the unfortunate Act of killing the deceased Lord did not flow from any Intention to him directed; then that Act is not by the Law of Nature a criminal Act, however the antecedent Acts directed against another may be criminal. It is another Question, how far a rational Agent, versans in illicito, is bound for Consequences that did not fall under his Intention? We shall afterwards endeavour to shew, that that is neither a Question in the Law of Nature, nor in the Divine Law; but is a Question arising from the municipal Laws of particular Kingdoms, or at farthest from the Law of Nations, sometimes called the secondary Law of Nature.

As this Point, that the Intention directed towards the Act committed, must govern the Action, so as to render it criminal or not, according to the first Principles of the Law of Nature, seems to be pretty plain, if we retire our Thoughts from other After-laws; so indeed it is confirmed and illustrated by the written Law of God, as delivered by Moses, with regard particularly to the Question of Manslaughter. It is almost unnecessary to observe, that whether the Remedy against the penal Consequences of Actions, committed without Intention, was in form of an Absolvitor upon the Trial, or by having Access to a City of Refuge; it is the same Thing: The Question is, What was to be the Punishment that was to take effect? If the Punishment was to be stopt in that Form, by flying into a City of Refuge the Principle of Law is the same, as if the Effect had been to be stopt in any other way. And just so, as we will afterwards have occasion to notice, it is the same Thing as to our Law, whether the Manslayer was to be safe, by flying into Gyrrhor Sanctuary, according to the old Law, or now to be safe by a judicial Absolvitor or Restriction of the Punishment. And just so with regard to the Law of neighbouring Nations; it is all one, whether a Man is to be freed by Benefit of Clergy, or such other Form, if he is to be free. The Foundation

Question

Question is only, What was the Punishment that necessarily, annexum, falls to be inflicted upon a Homicide of such and such a Kind; and as in this Case, upon a Homicide committed without Forethought or malicious Intention directed against the Person that hath suffered? And therefore if, by the Mosaic Law, one in the Pannel's Circumstances was to have the Benefit of a City of Refuge, the Argument concludes, that by that Law he would not have been subjected to the Pain of Death. Indeed we believe we will be able to go a little further to shew your Lordships, that, according to the Opinion of the most learned Interpreters and Doctors of the Jewish Law, the Benefit of the City of Refuge was scarce necessary in such a Case as that which is now before you.

In the sixth chap. of Deut. the Cities of Refuge are appointed to be separated in the Midst of the Land, that every Slayer may fly thither: And this is the case (says the Text) of the slayer, which shall fly thither, that he may live: Whoso killeth his Neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past; or, as it is said to be more literally in the Original, from Yesterday the third Day. By this Text your Lordships see those two are conjoined as explicatory of one another, ignorantly whom he hated not in Time past; and so the Word ignorantly is put in opposition to Hatred in Time past; and by that means the Sense is plain, that by ignorantly is not meant, without knowing that he kills his Neighbour, but without a Fore-knowledge, a Foresight, a former Ratiocination and Design: In which Sense, Knowledge is most frequently taken, because it is impossible to maintain, that if a Man ignorantly kill his Neighbour, even whom he hated before, taking the Word ignorantly, in that Sense, of his not knowing that he kills him, or killing him by mere Accident, without his Knowledge, can be liable as a Murderer; because it is impossible to conjoin even previous Enmity with accidental ignorant Killing, so as to make out a Crime of Murder; that were exceeding inconsistent with every Principle of Reason, far more with a Law flowing from infinite Perfection. But then the Matter is fully explained by Ver. 11. of that same Chapter, which determines when a Man is not to have the Benefit of the City of Refuge; But if any Man hate his Neighbour, and lie in Wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and flieeth into one of these Cities: Then the Elders of his City shall send and fetch him thence, and deliver him into the Hand of the Avenger of Blood, that he may die. Here are both Sides of the Question put, the one fully to explain the other; the last to explain what is meant by ignorantly, whom he hated not in Time past. The last Text does by no means say, that if a Man smites his Neighbour whom he knoweth, although without Hatred, and without lying in Wait, and without rising up against him, that he shall surely die; but on the contrary, puts the Issue of his dying upon his hating of him whom he killed, and upon his rising up against him whom he did kill; and upon his lying in wait, that is, in other Words, upon his designing to take his Opportunity from a premeditated Malice: For indeed the Meaning cannot be that of a formal lying in wait, or lurking in a Passage where the Person was to pass; but he who designs the Thing, and takes his Opportunity, lies in wait in the plain Sense of the Text. Besides, the Word ignorantly very plainly imports, and carries under it that Case of a Man's killing, by Misadventure, one whom he did not intend to kill, that is plainly Ignorance as to him who was killed; and yet it will be true, that if he designedly kill one in place of another, mistaking the Person, but designing to kill that Person, as supposed to be the other, he does not ignorantly kill the Man whom he does slay, he kills him knowingly, although he mistake the Man.

Nor is it of any Importance, that the Examples immediately subjoined in the 5th Verse, are Instances of Slaughter intirely accidental; and where the Slayer did really not know that he killed, that is an Example, but not an Example exhausting the Rule, which the 11th Verse fully clears, as not extending the capital Punishment to all who came not under the Description in the 5th Verse, but to those alone who hated their Neighbour, lay in wait for him, and rose up against him.

And though this is plain enough from that Part of the Law, yet the Matter is indeed more fully explained in xxxvth Chap. of Numb. where there is another Ordinance as to Cities of Refuge, and they are appointed to be six; and the general Rule is set down, That every one that kills any Person unawares, may fly to those Cities. Nothing can be plainer than the meaning of killing unawares, that is, without Deliberation, unexpectedly, without Fore-thought, ex improviso, ex inconsultu: These are all synonymous, and accordingly the Septuagint Translation so renders the Words involuntarily; that is, involuntarily; and so likewise the Jewish Doctors have explained it, as will afterwards be noticed.

After this the Text goes on with an Enlargement or Amplification of that general Law, "And if he smite him with an Instrument of Iron (so that he die) he is a Murderer, &c. And if he smite him with throwing a Stone (wherewith he may die) and he die, he is a Murderer, &c. Or if he smite him with an Hand-weapon of Wood (wherewith he may die) and he die, he is a Murderer." These are the Amplifications; but then follows the Limitation in the 20th Verse. But if he thrust him of Hatred, or hurl at him by lying in wait, that he die; or in Enmity smite him with his Hand, that he die: He that smote him shall surely be put to Death; for he is a Murderer, &c. Here is the Limitation, he that killeth or thrusteth with an Iron-Weapon, is a Murderer, under the Limitation introduced by the Particle but, as an explicatory Exception to the Generality of the Rule, but if he thrust him with Hatred; that is, in other Words, that he is a Murderer, if he thrust him in Hatred: And therefore Commentators refer from this Text to the other in Deuteronomy, already cited, for Explication of this, where it is statuted, That if a Man hate his Neighbour, and rise up against him, and smite him; whereby they plainly understand, thrusting him of Hatred, as the same with rising up against him, and smiting him with Hatred, so as to comprehend every Manner of Killing with any Weapon; and consequently that this is not a distinct Manner of Killing, from what is expressed in the 16th Verse, but a Quality adjoined to the Manner of Killing, so as to make it Capital, viz. That it must be done in Hatred. And this is yet more clearly explained by the 22d and following Verses, where the Opposition is stated betwixt thrusting suddenly and of Enmity, with a direct Reference to the 16th, 17th, and 18th Verses, But if he thrust him suddenly without Enmity, or have cast upon him anything, without laying of wait; or with any Stone wherewith a Man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him that he die, and was not his Enemy, neither sought his Harm: then the Congregation shall judge, &c. and shall deliver the Slayer out of the Hand of the Avenger of Blood. There all the three Methods of Killing before-mentioned are referred to: Thrusting, properly applicable to the killing with a Sword, but without Enmity; casting any Thing upon him, without lying in wait, or Fore-thought, or with any Stone, wherewith a Man may die, the very Thing expressed in the 17th Verse, and from which he is deemed to be a Murderer; yet, if he was not his Enemy, neither sought his Harm, he is not a Murderer, he is not to die, but to be delivered from the Avenger of Blood. So that these three last Verses are a plain Limitation of all that went before; the Instrument, whatever it was, was to raise a Presumption, if a mortal one: But yet if it appear the Person was not thrust, or hurled at, or smitten in Enmity, &c. the Slayer was to be delivered from the Avenger of Blood.

Neither can it stumble your Lordships, that in the 22d Verse are these Words, seeing him not, as if this were one of the Requisites necessary for the Slayer's Safety, that he did not see the Man whom he thrust at, or killed with a Stone, though not done in Enmity: For, first, 'Tis impossible to imagine, that the Words, seeing him not, however they might refer to the Case of throwing a Stone, can have any Reference to the Words, thrusting without Enmity. How can a Man thrust at him whom he seeth not? Or, How can he smite him whom he seeth not, in any proper Sense of Smiting? And therefore it is plain, that as to the Thrusting, the only Limitation is, that it be done without Enmity. But, 2do, Your Lordships will observe, that the Word Him in that Sentence, seeing him not, is not at all in the Original; it is an Adjection of the Translator's, and, as such, is distinguished in different Characters in any correct Editions of our Bibles, and indeed is an erroneous Adjection: The Words should be only seeing not; and perhaps the Translations ought not at all to be by the Participle seeing, but, according to the Idiom of the Latin Language, by an Adjective, such as, improvidus, imprudens, or the like; and, according to our Language, by a Substantive and Adverb, such as, without foresight. And so the Septuagint does translate it in these Words, ex insidus, which, in our Language, is directly without foresight, that is, without Premeditation or anterior Design to give the Stroke. And so the Sense comes out, that where a Thrust or Blow of that kind is given, without Enmity, Foresight and Premeditation, or, in other Words, sine dolo, that there Death was not to follow, but the Slayer to have the Benefit of the City of Refuge. And that the most ancient Lawyers, and Jewish Doctors themselves, have understood the Scope of the Mosaic Law to be such, is the next Point we are to endeavour to shew your Lordships.

And, in the first place, We beg leave to refer to an ancient Treatise, called Mosaicarum & Romanarum Legum Collatio, last published by the learned Schulten, with his own Notes upon it; in the first Tit. of which, De homicidiis casu, V. voluntate, § 5. are those Words, Item de casualibus homicidiis Moyses legaliter dicit, Si autem non per inimicitias immiserit super eum aliquod vas non insidians, vel lapidem, quo moriatur, non per dolum (your Lordships will please mark those last Words) & ceciderit super eum, & mortuus fuerit, si neque inimicus ejus, &c. liberabitur percussorem. Here is directly set down, by way of Paraphrase, the Sense of the 23d Verse of the xxxvth Chap. of Numb. before cited; and in place of these Words, seeing not, the Paraphrase of this ancient Collator is express by these Words, non per dolum; which shews what Understanding he had of the Words, directly congruous to what we have above set down, and, as we apprehend, to be the Septuagint Translation; and this Paraphrase the Annotator approves of as the just Meaning of the Text.

But we beg leave to give your Lordships another great Authority, who founds his Opinion upon the Notions of the Jewish Doctors, or rather sets forth what they all agreed on to be the Import of the Mosaic Law on this Head, and that is the great and learned Selden, in his Treatise, De jure naturali & gentium, juxta disciplinam Hebræorum, Lib. IV. Cap. 2. The Title of which is, De homicidio involuntario, seu quod casu factum aut errore. There the learned Author takes notice of all the Texts upon this Subject, and of the Jewish Doctors who had wrote upon it, whose Names we need not trouble your Lordships to repeat, but refer to the Quotations Selden makes. That learned Author takes notice of three Sorts of Homicide, which he and the Jewish Doctors reckoned to be involuntary, according to the Mosaic Law, and not to be punished with Death: The First is, What is merely accidental. The Second is, Where the Killing was not merely accidental, but as he expresses it, prope accedens ad violentiam. The Third we beg leave to set down in his own Words, as coming up directly to our Case: *Tertia autem homicidii involuntarii species est, ubi qui alium occidit ex errore quidem aut ignorantia, quæ tamen prope accedit ad id quod spontaneum est seu voluntarium; veluti ubi quis alterum occidere volens, alterum jactu aliterve perimit, aut ubi jactu sive saxi sive teli in hominum cætum, cujus nec ignarus qui jecerit quis occisus: adeoque intervenit culpa latissima. Ex tribus hisce homicidiis involuntarii speciebus, nulla est quæ morte ex sententia forensi ordinaria, sive in Hebræo aliove circumciso, sive in proselyto domicilii, aut gentili alio puniretur. Nam in universum pronunciant, homicidium nullum, seu qui non sponte scelus patriaret, sic fore puniendum.* Yea, he goes further, That, in this last Case, according to the Jewish Doctors Opinion, there was no need of going to the City of Refuge, for that the Avenger of Blood had not a Power in that Case to kill.

We apprehend, nothing can be more direct or strong to the present Case, than that Authority which is laid down, as the universal Opinion of the Jewish Doctors, which we hope does deserve some Regard in the Interpretation of the Mosaic Law.

And this naturally leads us further to observe to your Lordships what we insinuated before, that the Question started by Roman and modern Lawyers, how far a Person that intends to kill one Man, is liable to the Pain of Death if he kill another, hath no Foundation in the Mosaic Law, either from the Texts, or the Opinion of those Jewish Doctors. As to the last, your Lordships see, that Selden from them, directly states the Case, ubi quis alterum occidere volens, alterum jactu aliterve perimit; and he and they determined that to be an involuntary Homicide, not punishable with Death; and we apprehend, that in this they are founded in the Words of all the Texts, If any Man hate his Neighbour, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally, that he die: Not one Word here of rising up against one and killing another; not a Word of hating one, and in consequence of that Hatred killing another: That was a Case which did not fall under that Law. The Hatred and the Rising-up, was, by that Law, to be against the Man who was killed; if another by Fatality happen to be killed, that was a different Case, it was an involuntary Homicide; the Crime there was not the Killing, but stood upon the rising up against against him who was not killed; and so the Punishment was for Invasion, but not for Killing. The Texts in the Book of Numbers are all to the same Purpose: If he smite him who is killed of Hatred, or burl at him by saying of wait that he die, or in Enmity smite with his Hand that he die, &c. where all the Rules are still directed towards the Person alone that is killed; and that of killing another, when the Stroke was not designed at him, is quite left out of the Case. And the Application of this Reasoning to the present, unhappy Accident, is too evident to need Enlargement. If it appear that the Push was aimed at Bridgeton, that the Enmity was against him, and not against the deceased Lord; then, whatever be the Constitution of the Roman, or more modern Laws, the present Case is quite out of the Description of the Mosaic Law concerning this Article of Manslaughter.

What hath been already said at so great Length, does fully obviate what is offered in the Pursuers Information in way of Answer. It is true, that the general Rule in the Divine Law is, Thou shalt sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; and so, by the Sixth Commandment, the Prohibition is general, Thou shalt not kill: Yet even the Commandment itself admits of Exceptions; such as, Killing in Self-Defence, and Killing in Execution of Justice, and Killing in Prosecution of just War, and the like. The other Rule likewise admits of Exceptions, not so as entirely to justify the Killing, and to make the Act lawful, but yet so as to excuse from the Pain of Death. The Texts already noticed are express, that a Man's Blood may be shed, and yet the Blood of the Shedder not be required on that Account. The Question is, Whether this misfortunate Pannel's Case comes not under the Exceptions? And that we have already discussed.

The Position, That, by the Law of Moses, "Death of a Sudden" was plainly capital, and that the Slayer had the Benefit of the City "of Refuge, only where the Slaughter was by mere Misfortune," is assumed without sufficient Foundation. 'Tis plain, that he who thrusts without Enmity, does not kill the Man by mere Casualty: The Act from which Death follows, is a voluntary Act, although without Enmity: And although the Killing is involuntary, and so can never be said to be merely casual in the Sense the Pursuers would take the Words; neither are the Words in Exodus, If a Man lie not in wait, but GOD deliver him into his Hand, in the least contrary to what hath been advanced: For it is most properly said, that where the Act is without the Design of the Killer, without Enmity, and without Hatred; that there, in so far as concerns the Killing, GOD hath delivered the Man into the Hand of the Slayer. The plain Meaning is, That where a Man is killed, not with Design, but that the Thing happens by the over-ruling Hand of Providence, permitting Things of that Kind, in his Sovereign Wisdom, and from his Supreme Power; that there the Person is delivered to Death by the over-ruling Hand of GOD. And where could ever this be more properly applied, than on the present melancholy Occasion, when the providential turning-about of the unfortunate, deceased Lord, occasioned his receiving the fatal Wound?

It is likewise a Position assumed without Reason, "That wherever a Man was killed by a mortal Weapon, that was Murder by the Mosaic Law." We hope we have already demonstrated the contrary. If Enmity and Fore-thought was required, (and we need only repeat that one Text, which expresses the Killing a Man with a Stone, wherewith he may die) there the Text declares the Stone to be a mortal Weapon; yet for all that, in case of the Circumstances mentioned in the other Verse, the Slayer was not to die, but to be delivered from the Avenger of Blood: And this single Consideration must be sufficient to refute such a Position. Is it not possible for a Man to use a mortal Weapon, where there is no Enmity, nor Design to kill the Person who is slain? If it be possible, as it certainly is, then can we imagine that a Law, so perfect as the Divine Law itself, could make a Man guilty of Murder, because of the Use of such a Weapon, where he really intended no more Harm, than a Man that used a Weapon of another Kind? Besides, that in truth every Weapon is a mortal Weapon with which a Man may be killed: And therefore, to imagine that the Divine Law laid such a Difference betwixt an Instrument of Iron, and one of another Kind, is certainly to go too far. The Law of GOD has put the Matter upon a much juster Footing, to wit, the Intention of the Person, which alone can distinguish his Actions.

The Pursuers also say, "That though the Argument is good, that wherever the Benefit of the City of Refuge was not competent, there the Crime was capital; yet it does not follow, that where the Power of the Laws were suspended by the Jus Asyli, that the Punishment is not to be capital in a Country where the Jus Asyli takes no Place."

But, with Submission, this is no solid Way of arguing: The Question hitherto treated is, What was the Law of Moses, with regard to Punishments in the Case of Manslaughter? If the Punishment in any Case was not capital, because of the Privilege of the Asylum, the Conclusion is just, that the all-wise GOD did not intend such Punishments should be inflicted for such an Offence, and the Form of granting the Protection for the Punishment, does not alter the Substance of the Law.

The next Point undertaken to be illustrated is, That Manslaughter, under such Circumstances as occur in the present Case, was not, by the Common Law, punishable by Death: And this Argument must indeed be divided into several Branches, such as, 1^{mo}, That culpable Homicide was not so punishable, and that Homicide committed upon such high Provocation, as was here given by Bridgeton, could amount to culpable Homicide only. 2^{do}, That, by that Law, the deceased Lord not having been intended to be killed, but the Invasion, whatever it was, intended against another; the killing the Earl was casual, or at worst culpable, not punishable with Death.

And as to the first of these Points, we shall not trouble your Lordships with Infinity of Laws and Opinions of Lawyers that might be adduced upon the Point, but only take Notice of some of the most remarkable, and which seem most apposite to the present Case. And in the first Place, The Foundation of the Roman Law on this Point, appears to have been laid down as early as the Days of Numa: For the Roman Writers take Notice of a Law of his in these Words; In Numæ legibus cautum est, ut si quis imprudens hominem occidisset, pro capite occisi & natus ejus in concione offerret arietem. This Law is taken Notice of by Pistareus, in his Annotations upon the fore-cited, ancient Treatise, comparing the Mosaic and Roman Law, with regard to this Head of Manslaughter, as agreeing precisely with the Law of Moses; and the plain Meaning of it is, That where a Man kills another, although culpably, yet if it be sine dolo per imprudens, he is not to suffer Death, but to make an Assythment to the nearest Relations of the Person killed: And the same Treatise takes Notice of a Rescript of Adrian's to the same Purpose, directed to Taurinus Ignatius, approving of a Judgment given in the Case of one Marius Evaristus, whereby the Proconsul had mitigated the Punishment of Manslaughter upon that ground, That suppose it was done per lasciviam, and culpably, yet it was sine dolo. The Words of the Rescript are, Pœnam Marii Evaristi recte, Ignate Taurinus moderatus et ad modum culpe; refert enim, & in majoribus delictis consulto alio quod admittatur an casu; & sane in omnibus criminibus distinctio hæc pœnam aut justitiam promovet debet aut temperamentum admittere. And Schulten, in his Annotations, explains what is meant by casu, in these Words; Per casum hic intelligitur fieri quod non sit dolo, quomodo et quod impetu sit, casu dicitur fieri, l. 1. §. 3. ad leg. Corn. de Siccar. Ubi pro causa, edictiones veteres & glossam recte haberi casu certissimum est. Which, by-the-by, shows how erroneous the Pursuers Interpretation of the Words casu and casual is, when they would restrict them to what is done by mere Accident.

The general Rules of the civil Law are plain on this Point, That it is the animus qui maleficia distinguit; That there can be no Murder, sine animo occidendi. But these general Topics need not be insisted on, where the Texts themselves are so express, such as not only these already mentioned, but even that l. 1. §. 3. ad leg. Corn. de Siccar. Divus Adrianus rescripsit, eum qui hominem occidit, si non occidendi animo hoc admisit, absolvere posse. And a little after, Et ex re constituendum hoc, nam si gladium strixerit, & in eo percussit, indubitate occidendi animo id eum admisisse. But then he adds the Exception, Sed si clavi percussit, aut cucuma in rixa: quamvis ferro percussit, tamen non occidendi animo, leniendam pœnam ejus qui in rixa casu magis quam voluntate homicidium admisit. It is true that the Pursuers, and indeed several of the Doctors, endeavour to turn this Text the other Way, by a plainly erroneous Interpretation, and wrong pointing of the Text. They pretend, "That where a Wound is given by a Sword, there the animus is undoubtedly presumed;" and so far right as to the Rule. But then the Law sets down the Exceptions; first, If the Stroke be clavi aut cucuma, suppose these be mortal Weapons wherewith a Man may die, yet because they are not Instruments expressly made for Death, the Presumption is, that aberat animus occidendi, unless Circumstances make it appear otherwise. Then the second Exception is in rixa, quamvis ferro percussit, although a Man strike with a Sword, yet if it be in rixa, suddenly, or upon a Provocation given, tamen non occidendi animo, leniendam pœnam, because in rixa, casu magis quam voluntate homicidium admisit. Those Doctors, indeed, who go wrong in the Interpretation of this Text, pretend, That the Meaning of quamvis ferro is not, although he strike with a Sword, but would make the Meaning to be, Although he struck with an Instrument of Iron, and so make the Word ferrum, and also those Words, in rixa, refer to other Words, clavi aut cucuma; so as that the Sense should be, if a Man strike, clavo aut cucuma in rixa, although these be Instruments of Iron, he is not presumed to have had the animus occidendi. But, with Submission, as both the learned Noodt and Schulten observe upon that Law, the Interpretation is strained, and indeed illiterate: For the Word ferrum is never used in Law in that Sense, but always does signify a Sword; and so the Expression is the same, but ornately repeated in other Words, as if the Emperor had said, in rixa quamvis gladio percussit: And so the Sense is, that the animus is in general presumed from the using a Sword, that it is not presumed where the Instrument is not an Instrument made for Death; but if the Killing happen in rixa, the animus is not presumed, although the Stroke be given with a Sword.

And this is likewise the Opinion of the learned Grotius, in his Annotations upon the Text, in Numbers above cited, Ver. 16. which, in the Latin Translation, is rendered, Si quis ferro percussit; on which Grotius hath this Note, Mors Ebraeorum multis verbis rem circumloqui. Sensus est; mortis esse pœnam qualicumque telo quis hominem occiderit. Ex telo presumitur malum consilium, nisi contrarium appareat. There your Lordships see that Author's Opinion is as we plead, that the using a mortal Weapon presumes the Design, but not presumptione juris & de jure; for he adds, nisi contrarium appareat.

The Rescript of the Emperor Antonine is likewise as express on this Head as can be, l. 1. Cod. de Siccar. Frater vester rectius fecerit, si se præsidi provincie obtulerit. Qui si probaverit, non occidendi animo hominem a se percussum esse, remissa homicidii pœna, secundum disciplinam militarem sententiam præsideret; crimen enim contrahitur, si et voluntas nocendi intercedat, ceterum ea quæ ex improviso casu potius quam fraude accidunt, fato plerumque non noxæ imputantur. Here the Emperor plainly sets down these two Things, first, That pœna homicidii est remittenda, si animum occidendi non habuerit. 2^{do}, That where the Thing is done ex improviso, there is no animus; that 'tis to be looked upon as done casu, by Fatality, rather than Crime: But nevertheless, that in such a Case there may be an arbitrary Punishment.

The Doctors of the Roman Law seem to be unanimous on this general Point. Carpzovius, one of the severest Criminalists, is most express upon it; Cessat porro pœna ordinaria homicidii, si culpa vel casu fuisset commissum homicidium; and goes on, quod adeo verum est, ut in homicidio lata culpa, dolo non equiparetur. Clarus is likewise as express upon this general Head; and such Shoals of others are by them quoted and referred to, that it were vain to repeat their Names, or trouble your Lordships with quoting their Words. We don't know that any Lawyer of Reputation differs upon the general Point.

But then indeed the Question comes, What is culpable Homicide? And whether the present Case falls under that Description? Which is next to be illustrated. And here we humbly insist, that where the Homicide is committed upon a sudden Quarrel, and Provocation given, especially by real Injury, and that Quarrel begun not by the Killer; that this is no more than culpable Homicide: And for this, in the first Place, we oppose the Law already cited, in rixa quamvis ferro percussit. And to the same Purpose is the first Law, §. 5. ff. ad finat. consult. Turpilianum, the l. 2. Cod. de abolit. and the §. 2. l. 16. de pœnis; the Words of which we shall not trouble your Lordships with repeating, because they are the common Texts founded upon by Doctors on this Head. We have likewise for us the Authority of all the ancient, moral Philosophers; such as, Aristotle, Plato, Plutarch, and many others, likewise commonly taken Notice of by the Lawyers on this Subject. It is true, some of the severest Criminalists, such as Matthæus and Carpzovius, don't admit the Rule in general, but still they admit as much as is necessary in the present Question: They don't allow, that where the the Killer is auctor rixæ, that he is at all to be excused, although the Killing happen in colere iracundiæ; but then most of them do admit it, if the Killer be not the auctor rixæ, but be the Person provoked, to whom a just Provocation has been given, especially by a real Injury: And so particularly Carpozovius, one of the severest, after he has argued at length against the general Point, concludes in his Quæstio 6. §§ 14 and 16. Nihil quoque adversatur regula aucta, quod scilicet delictum ira commissum, mitius puniri soleat; quia hæc regula de ira ex justa causa proveniente accipienda est: duplex etenim ira est, alia ex justa causa provenit, quæ si non in totum, tamen ex parte excusat, ut delinquens mitius puniatur; alia vero non provenit ex justa causa, quæ in nihilo excusat. Then he adds, Hæc distinctio communiter recepta est ab interpretibus, and cites several. And then concludes, Si ergo justa causa calorem iracundiæ præcedat, veluti si quis ab alio fuerit provocatus, aut alio modo offensus, tunc is qui ira et intenso dolore permotus, provocantem seu offendentem interficit absque dubio a pœna ordinaria liberabitur; secus vero si quis, absque justa et probabili causa iratus, aliquem occidat, de quo casu nō hic loquimur, qui pœna homicidii ordinariæ neutiquam est eximendus. And then takes Notice, that the Practice in the Court of Lipswick is agreeable to this.

There is an adjudged Case very apposite, published in a Book, called Alphonſi Villaguti Neapolitani Consultationes Decisæ, very learnedly resolved. It is the Decisio 29. We shall state the Case in the Words of the Author, Quidam nobilis Ragusinus fuisset verberatus, extra (sed prope) ecclesiam sanctæ crucis castri Gravosæ, a quodam alio nobili Ragusino, in eodem pacto evaginavit pugionem contra dictum verberantem, ac in fugam jam conversum & ipsum insequens, unico vulnere sibi inflixit in dicta ecclesia (quam ille ingressus fuerat) dictam ecclesiam egrediens sese in fugam dedit & cum dictis verberator, ex dicto unico inflixto vulnere intra dictam ecclesiam mortuus esset. The Case came to be tried, at least the Questions upon it, to be resolved by the said Alphonſus; where several Questions occurred, but those which are most applicable to the present Case are two: First, An huiusmodi homicidium in ecclesia perpetratum, fuerat dicendum voluntarium nec ne, eo quod dictus nobilis infectus fuisset illum cessantem a verberibus inferendis, ac sic unico vulnere inflixto interfecisset? The second Question is, An dictus nobilis prædicto modo ac de causa violans dictam immunitatem ecclesiasticam, veniat in foro seculari, & ecclesiastico pœna ordinaria plectendus, vel solum mitiori pœna? The Resolution upon the first Question is, That though, at first View, the Homicide might seem voluntary, Eo quod dictus nobilis, nemine ipsum compellente, fugientem hominem vulneraverit, nihilominus nullo pacto fore judicandum homicidium voluntarium, aut pro tali dictum nobil-m puniendum. The Reasons for this Resolution are set down with great Learning and Judgment, but are so long, that 'tis impossible to repeat them: First, They are taken from the Definition of voluntary Homicide. 2^{do}, From the Texts of the Roman Law, and the Opinion of Doctors. 3rd, From that Particular, that the Nobleman had been immediately struck before; on which the Words are remarkable, Ex hoc ergo articulo, apertissime elicitur homicidium huiusmodi fuisse casuale, & non voluntarium, nam nulla mora interjacente, evaginato pugione, ipse nobilis baculo percussus in secutus fuit dictum percussorem jam fugientem, & hoc pro honoris proprii redemptione, ut sic se tueretur ab injuria corporali recepta ex verberibus: After which follows a long Reasoning, all in the Pannel's Favours. And this Case we take the more Notice of, because the Pursuers pretended to make a Distinction betwixt the Case of a Wound given the very Moment a real Injury is done, and the like given after the Injurer has desisted from beating, and retired to some Distance; but there is no Difference, except the Interval be so long, as it can be supposed the Thought of the Person injured was cool. The other Question is likewise resolved in Favour of the accused, that in such a Case, not the ordinary Punishment, either ecclesiastical or civil, ought to take Place, but only the pœna mitior, and confirmed by very strong Reasons, which we cannot recite, but refer to.

Amongst other Authors that might be cited for supporting this Opinion, is the learned Voet, in the very Section cited by the Pursuers, ad tit. ad leg. com. de sic. n. 9. where, after he has said what is cited for them, that one killing another who has provoked him only by a verbal or slight Injury, vix est ut ab ordinaria pœna absolvendus sit; he adds, that if the Provocation was by an atrocious real Injury, that would be sufficient to mitigate the ordinary Punishment; and to confirm that, cites Mathæus Berlichius, &c. And the Reason given by these Authors for making this Allowance, in case of just Provocation, is exprest in these Words by Gothofred, ad l. 17. d. 1. Quod ei sit ignoscendum, qui provocatus se ulcisci voluit, quique justum dolorem prosequitur.

And indeed we apprehend this Opinion is founded in the first Principle of Nature; for scarce any human Constancy can suffer such high real Injury, without the Passions being inflamed: And although Killing is no Doubt an Excess in the Retortion of a real Injury, yet still it is but an Excess, and the Injury shews the Thing done without Design; and therefore, because of insuperable, human Weakness, the Punishment falls to be mitigated. And the Application to the present Case, as we apprehend, is obvious; Bridgeton had given the highest Provocation, not only by a Track of verbal Injuries and Endeavours to pick a Quarrel, but had committed the most provoking real Injury, to throw a Gentleman over Head and Ears in a dirty Puddle, in the Middle of a Town, and Sight of so many On-lookers; no Injury could be more provoking. Yea indeed there was more in it than an Injury only: One that was able to throw the Pannel into the Puddle in that Manner, was likewise able to have suffocated him there; if the Pannel had no Reason to expect otherwise, and therefore no Wonder if he betook himself to his Sword. And the other Circumstance noticed, that Bridgeton, immediately upon the doing the Thing, endeavoured to draw and make himself Master of my Lord Strathmore's Sword, gave the Pannel Ground to expect the worst; and so it may be doubted, if he was obliged to wait till Bridgeton should have an Opportunity to give him the Blow, even with a mortal Weapon. And when this is considered, the Fact goes further than a Retortion of the highest Injury: The Pannel was in some Measure put upon his Defence; and granting that his pushing at Bridgeton was an Excess, yet still that Excess falls only to be punished pœna extraordinaria.

All Lawyers distinguish Excesses of that Sort into three Kinds, that of Time, Place, and Weapon that is used; and Excess in point of Time is punished even with Death, where the Interval is great; because that Interval presumes Fraud and Deliberation: But here was no Excess of Time; the Thing was done ex incontinenti, when the Injury was fresh and recent. There is likewise Excess in point of Place, when the Injurer is allowed to retire to a considerable Distance from the Place where the Injury is given; and this in some Measure coincident with the other, because it implies an Interval of Time: Yet if it be not great, the Lawyers hold it to be only punishable arbitrarily. And then the third is the Excess in the Use of the Weapon, where there is no Interval of Time or Place; and that is always agreed to be punishable only arbitrarily, where the Provocation is high.

From what is said it seems plain, that if Bridgeton had received the Thrust; the Homicide would have been culpable only; and so it remains to be considered, if the Case comes out worse for the Pannel, because it was my Lord Strathmore that received the Wound, and not Bridgeton. And we apprehend it does not, but on the contrary, that this gives a great Strength to the Defence: And that because, 1^{mo}, The Push being designed at Bridgeton, shews that there was no Malice at my Lord Strathmore, neither premeditated, nor presumed from the giving of the Wound: For admitting it to be true; that in an ordinary Case, the giving a Wound with a mortal Weapon presumes the Dole or malevolous Intention; yet that can never be where the Push is pointed at another than him who by Fatality receives it. And so the Case comes out thus, That the Pannel in making one Push, could not design it at two Persons; and so if he designed it at Bridgeton, 'tis impossible to say he had a Design against my Lord Strathmore. It is plain in the Nature of the Thing, that the Design, tho' presumed from the giving the Wound, yet in point of Time it precedes the actual receiving of the Wound, altho' that Preceding or Precedence be but momentary; and therefore if, in the very Act of Pushing, the Design appears to have been against Bridgeton, it excludes all Pretence of any animus against another who received the Wound by Fatality, in the very Moment that the Design was pointed against the other.

And here your Lordships will likewise observe, that there can be no animus occidendi presumed at all against any Man, not even against Bridgeton himself; because the drawing a Sword, and pushing at a Man with it, does not of itself presume a Design to kill the Man pushed at, except the Wound, and Death actually follow: For it is from the Event of the Wound, and Death following alone, that the Intention is presumed. Therefore since Death did not happen to Bridgeton, the Law cannot presume an Intention to kill him; since the Foundation of the Presumption is removed, or did not happen. If the Blow had missed him, or had not killed, but wounded him; the Intention would not be presumed: And therefore it cannot here be presumed, as the Case happened; for there is no such Presumption in Law, as that Killing one presumes a Design to kill another; except where it appears that the Slayer killed one Man by Mistake, taking him to be another: As for instance, killing Caius in the Dark, when the Killer really believed him to be Titius; there indeed the killing of Caius presumes the Intention of killing Titius, although he was not actually slain: And therefore in that Case the Killer is indeed guilty of Murder. But 'tis quite another Case, where one Man is killed, not by Mistake for another, but by Fatality, when the Push was intended at another, whom the Killer knew, which is the Case in Hand. And therefore we do humbly insist, that it cannot be said there was an Intention to kill Bridgeton, since his Death did not follow. Neither can it be said there was an Intention to kill the Earl of Strathmore; because, though his Death did most unluckily happen, yet the intium, upon which the Intention must be founded, did not happen, the Push being made at Bridgeton; for those two must always concur, the Push made at the Man who dies, and the actual Death: And where it happens otherwise, the Death is a mere Fatality; not intirely innocent, because the Killer was so far faulty in invading the other; but then it is no more than an Invasion; it is not Murder from Malice presumed. No Presumption of Law can get the better of contrary Evidence: The Presumption of Law may be, That where a Man is killed, he was intended to be killed: But if from the Circumstances the direct contrary appear, that there was no Intention against him; this is Evidence which excludes the Presumption; and so there can be no Murder in the Case.

It is indeed a Case stated by the Lawyers, What should be the Consequence, if a Person intending to kill one Man, kill another? And we acknowledge they are greatly divided among themselves upon the Question; a great many of the ablest of them are in all Cases clear, that where one Man is killed, and another was designed, it cannot be Murder, because of the Want of an Intention against him. Bartolus, Farinacius, Gomesius, Menochius, and Numbers of others quoted by them, are plain in that Opinion, and give an Account of several Judgments of the Courts of Mantua, and Naplis, and others, to that Purpose; and Farinacius says, that it is the common Opinion, Et ab hac sententia in judicando non esse recedendum. And however other Lawyers may seem to differ, yet, in the first Place, the divine Law, for any Thing that can be found in it, is on this Side; because it plainly speaks only of beating him, and rising up against him who happens actually to be killed, and mentions no such Case as deserving Death, as this is of rising up against one Man, and by Fatality killing another. 2^{do}, That this was the Opinion of the Jewish Doctors, is plain from the Quotation already brought from Selden, where this very Thing of killing one Man in place of another is made part of the third Case stated of involuntary Homicide, and determined not to be capital. But 3th, Those Lawyers, who at first view seem to differ, do really not differ, when the Cases are distinguished: For what they plainly mean, is only where a Man by Mistake kills Titius, believing him to be Mevius. This we admit is capital, for Reasons before given; but not the other of killing one by Fatality, and not for another, but directing the Blow at the other.

But then your Lordships will observe, that all Lawyers agree in this, That wherever a Man is to suffer for killing one, when he intended to kill another; that can only be where the Forethought and dolose Intention to kill the other is certain, but not where the Invasion is ex impetu: And therefore, supposing one invade another, with an Intention to hurt, or percutere, as the Lawyers call it, but without a certain Evidence that his thorough Intention was to kill; there, supposing the Blow intended for one do kill another, the Killer cannot suffer Death: And which by-the-by shews your Lordships, that there is no such Presumption in Law, as, That because the Push killed the Earl of Strathmore, therefore the Pannel intended to kill Bridgeton; for if that were Law, then the Question could never occur, but would be inept, Whether a Man intending to kill one, and killing another with that Blow, is guilty of Murder, or is presumed to have intended to kill that other at whom the Stroke was intended? We shall trouble your Lordships only with two Authorities on this Point, which are very direct to the Case: The first is that of Barbichus, which we the rather notice, because he seems to be against us on the general Point; after discussing which, he hath these Words, speaking of his own Opinion, Fallit, si quis aliquem non occidere, sed percutere tantum, velens, alium præter intentionem percutiat ut moriatur. From this your Lordships see, that it is no consequence, That because the Thrust killed my Lord Strathmore, therefore it should be presumed the Pannel intended to kill Bridgeton: If that were true, that Lawyer's Position, from whom Nobody differs, must be direct Nonfense. And therefore since there is no other Evidence of a further Intention against Bridgeton than percutere, except it arise from the Death of my Lord Strathmore, and that his Death cannot presume it; we are directly under the Position the Lawyer lays down, That though my Lord was unhappily killed, yet the Pannel ought not to suffer Death, where it does not appear that he intended to do more than to push at Bridgeton at random, percutere, without a certain Design to kill.

But this is yet more plainly laid down by another very distinct Lawyer, Majurius Labio, in his Treatise called, Homicidia excusatus, cap. 35. where treating of this very Question, he first notices, that if the Killer was occupatus in re licita, such as defending against any Aggressor, which in some measure is the case here, that then he is not liable, although he chance to kill a third Party: But then he goes further, Aut etiam, ut amplius dicta extendamus, reus quantumvis in re illicita occupatus, tali tamen in casu constitutus fuit, ut si Caium interfecisset, non nisi culpæ reus futurus fuisset, ejusque loco cum infelici fato Sempronius lethalem acceperis ictum, magis est, ut reus hoc ipso causam suam non gravasse censeatur: cum enim Caii interfectione mortem meritis non fuisset, certe imprudentia atque in facto error magis eum à Sempronii cæde excusare debet: atque Caius potius, si is vel rixæ auctor fuerit, vel iracundiam alterius justam provocaverit, id quod inde secutum imputandum re. r. Here your Lordships see he is stating the Case of a Rixa, where one had given Provocation as Bridgeton did; he indeed supposes, that in such a Case killing the Provoker ought not to infer Death; much less, says he, the accidental killing of a third Party: And your Lordships will observe he asserts further, that the Provoker, or auctor rixæ, is rather to be judged guilty of the Slaughter.

And a little after, he comes yet closer to the present Case: Quod si tamen Caium adversarium occidere nollit, sed illi tantum nocere, Sempronium autem imprudenter se ictui obicientem, eo ipso interenerit, tunc certe imprudentia Sempronii delictum rei aggravare non debet; si enim is moderatorem rixæ se non obtulisset, corpusque suum subito & ex propinquo non objecisset, Caius a cadente forte remotior, non nisi vulnus aliæve noxam inde reportasset, unde Sempronio mors oblata est: excusandus ergo a tanto merito percussor tunc, cum occidendi animus hic non adfuisse apparet.

This is to apposite to the present Question, that one would think it were a Resolution on the Case: For by that your Lordships see, that notwithstanding one's being killed, the Author says it does not from thence appear, that there was an Intention to kill the other: The other, who, as being at a greater Distance, might not have been killed, might only have been hurt and wounded, although the Person that came unhappily in the way happened to be killed. This is just what we have pled, That it does not appear there was an Intention to kill Bridgeton, because he might not have been killed, but he might only have been hurt or wounded; and therefore the Pannel ought not to suffer Death, because of the Fatality of killing the deceased Lord, qui subito corpus suum ex propinquo objecit. And upon all those Grounds, we humbly insist, that if Bridgeton had been killed, there would have been no Place for a capital Punishment: But then separately, whatever be in that, that since it does not appear (nor cannot, since Death did not follow) that there was a certain Intention to kill him, the casual Killing of the Earl of Strathmore cannot be punishable with Death.

What has been said, fully removes any Argument that may be drawn from Sir George Mackenzie's Opinion, "That he who by mistake kills one for another, should die." For your Lordships see, that he speaks only of that Case, when one Man is certainly intended to be killed, but another is killed by mistake, being supposed to be him: That is not the Case now before your Lordships.

And in this Question, concerning the Pannel's Intention and Design, the Circumstance of his being overtaken with Drink, is a Circumstance that assists in the Argument. We do not say, that being drunk affords a Defence for killing; nevertheless it is a Circumstance whereby to show, there was no Malice or Dole, especially against the Earl of Strathmore; since every body may conceive, how easy it is for a Man that is drunk, pushing at one, even to stagger upon another, or not to have the Judgment and Presence of Mind to draw back, when that other suddenly throws himself in the way of the Thrust.

What is laid down by the Pursuers, in opposition to all this, in their Information, is so fully obviated, that it is quite needless to repeat their Argument; only whereas they say, "That if Killing, notwithstanding of Provocation, had not been capital, it could not have been a Doubt in the Common Law, Whether a Husband ought to suffer Death, who killed his Wife taken in the Act of Adultery?" But we apprehend, that the direct contrary Consequence follows, that if high Provocation had not afforded a Defence, then indeed there could not have been a Doubt the Husband must have died, because high Provocation was all that he had to plead: But the Doubt was, whether a Provocation of that kind, where there was no real corporal Injury to the Husband himself, was sufficient? And the Law determines that it was; and consequently establishes the Rule, That high and grievous Provocations ought to alleviate the Punishment.

The Brocard, That versans in re illicita tenetur de omni eventu, affords no Argument against the Pannel in this Case; nor indeed hath it been much insisted on by the Pursuers. 1mo, It is not true in many Cases. But, 2do, It holds in no Case, except with regard to Consequences or Events, that happen with regard to that Subject or Object, against whom or which the unlawful Act is directed: As for instance, if one sets fire to a House, he is guilty of Murder, if a Person happen to be burnt in that House; or if he undermine a House, he is liable for all the Goods that may be destroyed by its Fall; but he is not liable for any extrinsic Damage that may happen to another Subject casually and by accident: And therefore, suppose it were proved, that one unlawfully invading another, without a Design to kill, might in some Cases be liable, if Death followed; yet that can only be with regard to the Person he invades, but never with regard to what accidentally happens to another Person. And so Carpzovius explains the Matter, Qu. 1. §. ult. in these Words: Supra dicta enim (quod nempe danti operam rei illicitæ imputari debeat, quicquid fuerit præter ejus intentionem ex eo actu sicutum) procedunt tantum, quantum ad subjectum, circa quod versatur ipsa malitia illicitæ operantis, & quantum ad ea quæ illi objecto per se & immediatè junguntur, aut necessario sequuntur; non autem quoad illa quæ per accidens oriuntur, a re illa mala, cui opera datur. Besides, 'tis certain, that the Brocard is no Rule at all in the Matter of Manslaughter, otherwise there never could be such a Thing as culpable Homicide; which 'tis plain there is.

The next Thing to be considered is, What was and is the Law of Scotland concerning this Matter? And first, As to our ancient Law, the Pursuers seem to be the first that ever disputed, that according to it there was a Distinction betwixt Slaughter and Murder. Sir George Mackenzie is express upon it. By our Law, says he, Slaughter and Murder did of old differ, as homicidium simplex et premeditatum in the civil Law; and Murder only committed, as we call it, upon forethought Felony, was only properly called Murder, and punished as such; for which he quotes the express Statute, Parl. 3. cap. 51. K. James I. appointing that Murder be capitally punished, but chaud melle, or Slaughter committed upon Suddenty, shall only be punishable according to the old Laws, and several other Acts of Parliament, to which we beg leave to refer [See the Abstract of them at the End]; which expressly make the Distinction betwixt forethought Felony, and Slaughter of Suddenty: And though none of all these Laws particularly express the Punishment of Manslaughter, as they could not well do, because that was arbitrary according to Circumstances; yet, as Sir George observes, the Opposition and Distinction is established betwixt Slaughter by Forethought, and chaud melle, and the Punishment of the one to be less than that of the other: And therefore, we apprehend, we may leave this Point as clear and undoubted.

The Pursuer has endeavoured, to no manner of purpose, to set up others of our ancient Laws, in opposition to those observed by Sir George Mackenzie, such as the third Statute of King Robert I. which, with Submission, is nothing to the purpose: For, first, It does not concern capital Crimes only, but any Crime touching Limb, as well as Life. 2do, Though the Word Slaughter is mentioned, without adding by forethought Felony, yet the same Thing is added in other Words, when it says, touching Life or Limb, to which alone the Act relates, that is, forethought Felony; because Slaughter, by chaud melle, touched neither Life or Limb. The Title of the Act is, Men condemned to Death should not be redeemed. But what is that to the purpose, in a Question, Who should be condemned to Death, and who not?

The 43d Chap. of the Act of King Robert III. is as little to the purpose; for as it speaks of Hairships, Burnings, Reif, and Slaughter, 'tis very plain it means only wilful, premeditated Slaughter, otherwise it would follow, that not only wilful Fire-raising, but burning of a House by Neglect, or lata culpa, would infer the Pain of Death, which Nobody ever dreamed. And the next Paragraph makes it further clear, appointing Sheriffs to take diligent Inquisition, GIF ANY BE COMMON DESTROYERS OF THE COUNTRY, OR HATH DESTROYED THE KING'S LIEGES WITH HAIRSHIP, SLAUGHTER, &c. Can a Man be a common Destroyer by Slaughter, except where the Slaughter is supposed to be by forethought Felony? 'Tis certain he cannot; and therefore the Pursuers Procurators fall into a great Mistake in Law, when they say, that gif he be ken'd with the Affize, Si attentus fuerit per affizam tanquam talis malefactor, condemnabitur ad mortem, must relate to Manslaughter, because the Sheriff could not judge of Murder. It is directly otherwise: If he be attainted by the Affize as such a Malefactor, that is, as a common Oppressor by Slaughter, &c. he is to be condemned to Death. This is an Exception from the Rule, that Murder was to be tried by the Justice-ayr: This Law appointed it to be tried in that Way, in case the Person accused could find his Barras or Borgh to compare at next Justice-ayr; but if he could not, the Sheriff was immediately empowered to try: And by-the-bye, this does not concern particular Fact, but concerns that general Accusation of being a common Oppressor, like to the Case of a Sorner, or one habite and repute an Egyptian. Nor can the Lawyers for the Pannel find any Word in the Statutes of Alexander II. which the Pursuers refer to, that does in the least pre-suppose that Manslaughter was capital in them: The direct contrary appears, that Manslayers were to be tried, whether guilty of Murder or not; and if found not guilty, that they were to have the Benefit of the Gyrrh. And accordingly Skeen, in his Annotations, refers directly to the Acts of Parliament, which Sir George Mackenzie takes notice of, establishing the Distinction, and to some of the English Acts to the same Purpose.

As to the Passage cited from Skeen, in his Treatise of Crimes, tit. Slaughter, there is certainly a direct Blunder in the Printing; and instead of these Words, or casually by chaud melle, probably it ought to have been, not casually, or by chaud melle; for otherwise he directly contradicts himself, and cites Acts of Parliament which prove the very contrary of what the Pursuers would make him assert: Yea, the very next Paragraph establisheth the Distinction in these Words, SUA THAT THE GYRTH OR SANCTUARY IS NAE REFUGE TO HIM WHA COMMITS SLAUGHTER BE FORETHOUGHT FELONY; ergo, it was a Refuge to him that committed Slaughter, not by forethought Felony, and saved him even from the arbitrary Punishment of Manslaughter. And Skeen himself, in his Explication of the Words chaud melle, says it is in Latin rixa, an hoc, sudden tuitzie, or debate, which is opposed, as contrary to forethought Felony; and cites the Act James I. But how is it contrary in our Law, if the Effect and Punishment be the same? And upon the Words forethought Felony, he in like manner makes the just Distinction, and supports it by the Authority of Cicero, in his Treatise De Officiis, where he is writing, as a Moralist, and not as an Orator.

The Pursuers Answer to the 8th Act, 6 Parl. 7. 1. is quite trifling; for nothing can be plainer than the Opposition there stated betwixt forethought Felony and other Slaughter: And when the Act statutes, THAT IF IT BE FORETHOUGHT FELONY, THE SLAYER SHALL DIE, the Consequence is obvious, according to the plainest Rules of Logic, that if it be not forethought Felony, he shall not die, otherwise the Act is absurd. And as to Sir George Mackenzie's Observation upon these Words, it is certainly not so accurately placed as an Observation upon that Act, because it plainly relates relates to the Act of Charles II. and therefore falls to be considered, when we come to argue the Import of that Act.

The Pursuers Observation, by way of Answer to the 51st Act, Part 3. James I. is entirely nought; for if it extend the Difference between Forethought and chaud melle to all Transgressions as well as Manslaughter, then for certain it establishes the Distinction in the Case of Manslaughter; and so Sir George Mackenzie likewise says, in his Observations on this Act, as well as in his Criminals. And as to his further Observation, That chaud melle is by our present Law punishable by Death; that still refers to the Act of Parliament Charles II. and must be examined with it.

The Pursuers have further pled, "That the Benefit of the Sanctuary might be competent where Crimes were capital;" which he founds upon the Statutes of Alexander II. But this is not worth disputing; for if the Flying to the Sanctuary, joined with Repentance, and so forth, rendered the Crime not capital, it is all the same thing; that is, in effect, to render the Crime not capital only by another Form, but still the Substance remains, that according to the Law the Pain of Death was to be inflicted. At the same time that Statute concerning Reifs, whereby Repentance absolves from the Punishment, is somewhat peculiar, and does not at all contradict the other Laws, which make or suppose chaud melle not to be capital; and the last Part of the Statute, appointing, THAT IF MANSLAYERS FLY TO THE KIRK, THE LAW SHALL BE KEPT AND OBSERVED TO THEM, establishes the Point, that if they were not found Murderers by Forethought, they were to be returned to the Sanctuary, and freed from Punishment.

The Pursuers say, "That after the Reformation, when the jur assili was in effect abolished, then the Distinction betwixt forethought Felony and chaud melle ceased; and that it was never objected, that Malice or premeditate Design was requisite to make the Crime capital." And for this they take notice of two Cases, Currie against Fraser, July 1641, and Bruce against Marshall, April 1644. But in the first place, The Procurators for the Pannel with Reason say, That if that happened, it was an Error in Judgment; for since the Distinction was established by the old Laws, and that there was no Law at that time altering or repealing those old Laws, the Abolition of Popery, and of the Flying to the Kirk in consequence, was no Reason for judging contrary to the civil Laws that were still standing; and if an Escape of that kind happened, it must be attributed to the over-great Zeal, and, if we may be allowed to say it, a Sort of enthusiastic Keenness of those Times: And we do apprehend, that the Act 1649, and the Act of Charles II. were intended to correct the Errors that by too great Zeal had then crept in.

At the same time, as to the two Cases cited, they are nothing to the purpose; for as to the first, which is Fraser's, there was not one Circumstance pled or proved which could make the Slaughter chaud melle: But, on the contrary, it appeared direct premeditate Murder, no real Provocation, but a Quarrel about a Staff; a Murder committed in Revenge, upon the Slayer's hearing the Person killed had murdered his Brother, which plainly implied a premeditate Design. What Argument this can afford, is submitted. This indeed may be remarked, that the Case gives some Notion of the Spirit of the Times; the Presbytery took Evidence whether the Murder was accidental or wilful, they found it to be wilful, and no ways accidental; their having done so, was taken as Evidence in Court, and even the Wife of the Deceased was sworn as a Witness: Things, it is hoped, not to be drawn into example; only so far it shews, that even then it was a Consideration by the Presbytery themselves, Whether it was a wilful Murder or not? Which seems to point at an Establishment of the Distinction. But, in short, there is not one Circumstance in the whole Case that could exclude the Premeditation or Forethought, but all quite on the contrary.

The other Case of Marshall, in the 1644, is as little to the purpose; he was libelled for wilful Murder, and he confessed it, without pleading any Defence, because indeed he had none. He in his Confession adjoined some Circumstances which might have given some Colour, but indeed very little for a Defence: But he offered no Proof even of those Circumstances; and his own Declaration could be no Evidence of them. They were not intrinsic, but extrinsic Qualities of the Declaration. He had given repeated Stabs with a Knife. Where could be the Question that that was Murder? And these being all the Instances the Pursuers bring before the Act of Charles II. it is plain they prove nothing by them.

As to the Act, Charles II. [See the Act at the End] it is humbly insisted for the Pannel, That it introduces no new Law against any Person accused of Slaughter, but ascertains somewhat in their Favours, viz. "That casual Homicide, Homicide in lawful Defence, and Homicide committed upon Thieves, &c. shall not be punished by Death. And then further statutes, That even in case of Homicide casual, it shall be lawful to the Criminal Judge, with Advice of the Counsel, to fine him in his Means, &c. or to imprison him." This Law seems introduced to correct some Abuses that had been; whereby Homicides falling under some of those Descriptions, either had been punished with Death, or at least that it had been made a Doubt of, if they might not be so punished. What those Cases were, does indeed not appear from the Records, so far as the Pannel's Procurators know; but it seems such Cases, at least such Doubts, were. But then the Act does not determine what was meant by casual Homicide, and does by no means say, that nothing was to be reckoned casual Homicide, except that which was merely accidental; but, on the contrary, it leaves casual Homicide to be explained, according to the Construction of former Laws, whether our own Laws, or the Laws of other Nations.

2do, It is plain from the Act, that, by casual Homicide, something is understood quite different, at least beyond Slaughter merely accidental; for the Act is concerning the several Degrees of casual Homicide: And so even Homicide in Defence, and Homicide committed upon Thieves, &c. are brought under that general Description of casual Homicide; and these last Kinds are given as Exemplifications of the general Description; which shews, that casual Homicide was intended to be opposed only to Slaughter dolose, committed either by premeditate Forethought, or Malice presumed to be taken up from the Circumstances immediately preceding the Act; and therefore, however critical Exceptions may be taken to the Rule, yet materially there is no strong Objection lies to it, because when casual is taken in the extensive Signification, as opposite to fraudulent and dolose Slaughter, all the Species mentioned in the Act do properly enough fall under it, and are Degrees of casual Homicide. And indeed it is worth observing, and makes in this Case for the Pannel, that the Rubric cannot be said to have been indigested or adjected by mere Inadvertency, since the same Rubric is made use of in the Act 1649, and again repeated in the 1651, so many Years after.

And this Rubric affords another plain Argument, That the Legislative did at least consider that there might be Degrees of casual Homicide, and consequently they could not understand by that, only merely accidental Slaughter, strictly so called: Since there can be no Degrees of that; it is but one, and does not admit of Degrees. And therefore this is sufficient to shew, that more was meant than the Pursuers incline to admit; and if more was meant, that can allow of no other Construction, than to bring under these Words what the Lawyers call culpable Homicide, so as that your Lordships and the Jury may judge from Circumstances, whether the Slaughter is to be reckoned as casual, or really malicious, from Malice prepense.

The last Part of that Act of Parliament further enforces that Matter, which gives a Power not only to fine for the use of the nearest Relations, but even to imprison for casual Homicide. Now, how is it possible to believe, in Consistency with any Justice, that a Man might be imprisoned for a Fact intirely innocent, and no ways either culpable or criminal? Yet such Homicide merely accidental is: And therefore this shews to Demonstration that the Legislator understood, that under the Description of casual Homicide, such a Fact might come as carried a culpa along with it, and was not absolutely accidental or innocent.

And this being the plain Meaning of the Law, it must remain only to consider, whether culpable Homicide, or more particularly the present Case, does not, in a true and legal Sense, fall under the Words casual Homicide. And we hope we can be under no Difficulty to make that good, from what has been already said; first, That even by the Jewish Doctors and Interpreters of the Mosaic Law, Homicide without Hatred and Forefight, hath been called casual Homicide; the Passage above cited from the Collation of the Mosaic and Roman Law expressly shews it. 2do, All that has been said from the Texts of the civil Law, and Lawyers, prove it; since they directly call Slaughter, ex subito impetu, ex calore iracundiae, in rixa, where there was just Provocation, casual; casu magis quam voluntate fit; casu magis quam noxa imputandum: And all the rest of their Expressions plainly denominating all Slaughters casual in the large Sense, except that which is done doloso animo occidendi. 3tio, The Expressions in our own old Laws prove the same Thing; those Kind of Slaughters are called chaud melle or Chance-Medley, which is casual: And so Skene speaks, in the very Place the Pursuers have cited, Manslaughter committed voluntarily, by forethought Felony, or not (which ever of the Degrees be received) casually by chaud melle. There your Lordships see chaud melle is expressly brought under the Description of casual; and so that being the case, we are under the Letter of the Act Charles II. we are included under the first Branch of casual Homicide.

And as we apprehend this holds in general, so it holds more particularly in the Pannel's Case, where, whatever was designed against Bridgeton, yet, as to my Lord Strathmore, the Killing was casual, and therefore falls directly under the Words of the Statute.

It affords no solid Argument against us, that the Act of Parliament bears these Words, FOR REMOVING OF ALL QUESTION AND DOUBT THAT MAY ARISE HEREAFTER IN CRIMINAL PURSUITS FOR SLAUGHTER. For, 1mo, Those Words must still be understood with regard to the Particulars enacted upon, that it is for removing all Doubts as to those Particulars; for it can never be pretended, that this or any Act of Parliament could remove all Doubts, even upon unforeseen Cases, many of which might happen that could not fall under the Words of that Law: For instance, Homicide committed in suppressing a Mob, strictly speaking, falls under none of the Words; or Homicide committed in preventing the Escape of a Prisoner actually imprisoned, and endeavouring his Escape: And many other Cases may be figured. But, 2do, According to the Interpretation we insist upon, the Act of Parliament does remove all Questions, so far as human Eyes could foresee, if the Words (casual Homicide) be taken in the Sense we give them; and, on the contrary, it does not remove all Questions, if culpable Homicides, and this very Case be not included; for then the Law has statuted nothing upon them, either one way or other, but hath only statuted upon Murder merely accidental, Homicide in Defence, and the others therein mentioned. Besides, that it may be pled without any Stretch, that a culpable Homicide is a Species of Homicide in Defence; though not precisely in Defence of Life, it is in Defence against a further Injury threatened, and expected from the prior Injury already given: And on these Considerations, we humbly apprehend, the Act of Parliament makes nothing against the Pannel, but rather favours him, since the Question is anent a Homicide purely casual as to the Person that was killed: and which Consideration entirely distinguishes his Case from every other Case that hath been tried since the Act of Parliament. And it may not be improper to notice, that Sir George Mackenzie says, "The Word casual, in the Rubric of this Act, is taken in the lax Signification." And why not then take it in the same lax Signification in the statutory Part?

It is now proper to take notice of Sir George Mackenzie's Observations upon the 51st Act, James I. And in the first place, If Sir George be supposed to go as far in his Opinion as the Pursuers plead, we must beg leave to oppose the Law, and submit the Interpretation of it to your Lordships Judgment, as not sufficiently supporting his Opinion. 2do, Sir George says nothing against the Slaughter's being casual in the present Case, where the Blow was intended at one, and another struck by Fatality. 3tio, His Words do not go so far as the Pursuers would stretch them; for, in his Observation on the said 51st Act, he only says in general, That chaud melle, or homicidium in rixa commissum, is capital by our present Law: And so it is in many Cases; for instance, where the Killer is the Provoker, where he reiterates Strokes in such a manner, as to shew a Forethought and formed Design, although not premeditated for a long Interval of Time before: But Sir George does by no means say, that chaud melle or homicidium in rixa commissum, is in every Case capital; the contrary is most certain, as will appear from your Lordships Judgments afterwards to be noticed.

His Observation upon the 90th Act is no ways against us; he says, indeed, "That Murder, though committed without forethought Felony, is punishable with Death." By which he must mean premeditated Malice, Malice, and that is true; for no doubt Malice, where it can be presumed from the Act itself, and where the contrary does not appear from Circumstances, is punishable by Death, without further Forethought; but then he subjoins an Exception, which leaves the Matter where it was, except, says he, it be casual; that is, according to the Words of the Law: And so the Question remains, What is casual in the Sense of that Law?

The Pursuers use an Argument, which seems to be of no Force, "That if Manslaughter was not capital, then the Crown could not pardon any capital Slaughter; because by our Law the Crown could not pardon Murder." We might easily admit the whole, without hurting our Argument; for if it be true that the Crown could not pardon Murder, then it is likewise true that he could not pardon any Slaughter that was capital; because no Slaughter was capital but Murder: Nevertheless the Position, That the Crown could not pardon Murder, is not supported by Practice, and, we doubt, not by our Law; because in several Cases, even of Murder, the very Thing statuted is, THAT THE PERSON OF THE CRIMINAL SHALL BE IN THE KING'S WILL; consequently the King can pardon, as well as order to be put to Death.

The Pursuers, in their Information, next go on to mention a great many Cases that have been judged by the Court since the Act 1661; and the first mentioned is that of William Douglas, which appears in the Records, and is noticed by Sir George Mackenzie, and is indeed noticed by him as a Foundation for some Things, wherein he seems to go too far. But this Case will never deserve any Regard; it has always been looked upon as a hard one, and we are afraid a Reproach on the Justice of the Nation. But at the same Time the Fault did not lye on the Court; it was truly the Jury; for the Trial went in general upon the Art and Part; and there appears no particular Pleadings to this Purpose on record in that Case: So that what Sir George says of it must be from mere Memory of Things not thought fit to be recorded.

The next Case mentioned is that of Nicolson, in the 1673, which can never make for the Pursuers, because there your Lordships sustained both the Libel and the Defence, though indeed the Defence was not proved: And therefore, if the Pursuers say, that the Defence was upon chance melle, or culpable Homicide; the Case is with us, because your Lordships sustained the Defence. And although in Reality the Crime was proved to be wilful Murder, and the Defence not proved; yet so far it is on the Pannel's Side, that the Advocate insisted Nicolson was versans in re illicita, by carrying a Gun, which he acknowledged used to go off on half-bend; yet your Lordships sustained the Defence, "That the Gun went off in a Struggle." And if an Argument from a Lawyer's Pleading be good for any Thing, Sir George Mackenzie pled for the Pannel, in that Case, some of the very same Principles we now insist on, "That there was no Prejudice against the Person killed, and that the Gun went off in a Struggle." But indeed, the Case is naught in the Argument, and it seems strange why it is cited: It is true the Man was said to be drunk, and there was not a previous Quarrel; but then there was no Provocation, no justa causa iracundiæ, and no iracundiæ at all; but the Gun was twice deliberately snapped, and the third Time the Man was killed.

The third Case mentioned, is Murray contra Gray, yet less to the Purpose than any other: For there, the giving the Wound was libelled so far premeditate, that the Slayer followed the Person out of the House where he was, and killed him without any Provocation: And not one single Fact was pled in Defence, but a strange Demand made, that the Lords should make an Inquisition, in order to discover who was the first Aggressor; but it was not once pled that the Defunct was the Aggressor or Provoker. What can be the Meaning of citing such Cases?

The next Case cited is that of Aird, in the 1693; which indeed is something more to the Purpose, but yet does not answer the Pursuers Intention: For the Lords did not there find, that every Homicide was capital, except what was merely accidental; they indeed sustained the Libel, and repelled the Defences, which were mainly founded upon Provocation by ill Words from a Woman, and her throwing a Chamber-pot at the Pannel's Face, who was a Soldier: Which the Lords did not find sufficient to exculpate from the Libel, which bore reiterate Strokes to have been given the Woman in her own Door (which, by-the-bye, was hamesucken) she thrown over the Stairs, and pursued by the then Pannel. That Case was very singular: First, an Attack upon a Woman by a Soldier, who ought to have contemned Insults from the Female Sex, at least, not returned them with any Blows: No Injury of that Kind from a Woman can justify Blows given, much less reiterated Blows, and deliberately trampling to Death, throwing her over her Stair, and still continuing to pursue her: There, the presumed Difference of Strength, and Difference of the Sex, made such an Attack a barbarous Murder; just as an Invasion by a much stronger Man against a weaker, or by a Man against a Woman, although not with a mortal Weapon, would make a Blow with a mortal Weapon, given by such a Woman or weaker Person, come within the Description of Self-defence: Which is a Case that Lawyers state, although the same Thing would not be good, if they were of equal Strength, or that the Invasion was by the Woman, or Person of weaker Strength.

Another Case mentioned, is that of Carmichael in the 1694. But sure your Lordships must be weary of so many Cases, so little to the Purpose: For neither there, is there one Circumstance pled upon to exclude Forethought, or to show that the Thing was casual in any Sense; but some trifling Objections against the Form of the Libel: Only, indeed, Drunkenness, by itself, was founded on, which your Lordships did not sustain. And who can doubt it must be so?

The seventh Case mentioned by the Pursuers, is that of George Cumming the 1695. And upon looking into the Case, it must be owned, that it seems a very narrow, hard Case: But then the whole Burden of the Pursuers pleading turns upon this, That supposing there was a rixa, and that the Thing happened upon a sudden Quarrel; yet Cumming himself was the first Provoker, and the auctor rixæ, and therefore could not plead the Benefit even of Self-defence; which indeed brings the Case within what all Lawyers agree on. And had it not been for that Circumstance, 'tis impossible the Decision could have gone as it went: For in effect, the King's Advocate admitted the Defence, barring that Circumstance; but insisted upon that as what governed the Case. Yet still the Decision is narrow.

The Pursuers also mention the Case of Burnet of Carlops, anno 1711. But it is plainly against them; and it being to be noticed for the Pannel, shall not be dwelt upon here.

The next Case is that of Hamilton of Green, anno 1716; which does not all meet: For there a plain Murder was libelled, that the Pannel first made several Pusses with his Sword and Scabbard upon it; and not content with that, drew the Sword, and gave the Defunct the mortal Wound. And no Provocation was pled upon, on the Part of the Pannel, except what was verbal only. And the only real Injury, by striking with the Sword and Scabbard, was admitted to have been given by the Pannel. And though it was there pled, that the Defunct himself rushed upon the Sword, that was contrary to the Libel. And if the Fact had come so out, the Libel would not have been proved. And therefore, that Case does not all meet; for there were not sufficient Circumstances to exclude the Dole, or so much as to make a homicidium culposum.

Another Case they mention, is that of Thomas Ross, and Jeffery Roberts, 20th July, 1716; which makes against the Pursuers, as it is set forth by themselves: For there the Lords did sustain the Defence of Provocation by Words, receiving a Blow on the Face, being pulled down to the Ground, and beat with a great Stick or Car-rung, relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment. And though the Words, "To the imminent Danger of his Life," are insert, as they were pled in the Defence; yet that was not a Fact, but a Consequence inferred from the being struck with a Stick. And if the periculum vite had been the Foundation on which the Interlocutor went, then it must have been unjust; because no Man alive ever doubted, that a Man in Self-defence might lawfully kill, without being subject to any arbitrary Punishment whatsoever: But the Case was, that your Lordships found the Provocation and real Injuries reduced the Fact to a homicidium culposum. You indeed sustained the Reply, That the Defunct was held by Jeffrey at the Time of receiving the Wound, because that excluded the Defence of the Pannel's being upon the Ground when he gave the Wound, and made the Fact amount to Murder; because it never was doubted, but if one stab another, especially with a Knife, which is stabbing in the most barbarous Sense, when that other is held, and so put out of the State of doing further Injury, that is Murder by the Law of all Nations.

The Pursuers likewise mention a Case of Davidson, without noticing either Date or Circumstances; and therefore the Pannel must conclude there was no Defence proposed, exclusive of the Dole or Forethought.

The Case of Lindsay and Brock, the Greenock Taylors, is very far from putting the Case out of Doubt, or indeed touching it at all. The Case was, that the Defunct was enticed out of his House, and was attacked by two at the same Time; and when he and they were on the Ground, one of them, which came out to be Lindsay, stabbed him in the Throat with a Penknife. There your Lordships did not sustain the Crime as capital against them both, even upon the Art and Part, but only against the one who should appear to have given the Stab, and that came out to be Lindsay: But then indeed you found, not without Difference in Opinions, that nevertheless he had the Benefit of the Indemnity, upon this Foundation, that tho' the homicidium was dolosum, because of the Circumstances, yet it was not from Malice premeditate: And the Majority were of Opinion, that the Indemnity excluded nothing but premeditate Murder, and did not touch any Case done in rixa, notwithstanding the Person guilty might be the auctor rixæ. This does by no means determine any Question betwixt a dolosum and culposum homicidium; for that Fact was insisted to be dolosum, and indeed so found. 'Tis true, it proves that an Indemnity may reach even a homicidium dolosum, where the Dole arose immediately, and not ex intervallo; but that says nothing to this Question, nor is it proper to enter upon the Argument about the Indemnity, now that the Judgment is given.

The Case of Mathews, the Soldier, the Pursuers admit, was of the same Nature, and so needs no other Answer; only, That, in that Case, there were no Circumstances sufficient to exclude the Dole, or make it only a culpable Homicide.

These are all the Cases the Pursuers have mentioned, and, if Numbers would do, no Doubt there is enough; but your Lordships are to judge how far to the Purpose: And one Thing is remarkable with regard to them all, That not one of them touches the Case in hand, in so far as concerns the Slaughter's being casual as to my Lord Strathmore, the Invasion being intended against Bridgeton.

But now the Counsel for the Pannel beg leave to take notice of several Decisions, even since 1661, which directly establish the Point pled for the Pannel; and the first is Mason's Case in the 1674, to be seen in the Record; and also observed by Sir George Mackenzie. Mason was accused of killing Ralston, The Defences were three, first, That Ralston had followed Mason from House to House, at last put violent Hands upon him; whereby Mason was forced to throw him off, and that he fell against a Stool. 2do, That the Wound was not mortal, but Ralston died ex malo regimine. 3tio, That the Homicide was merely casual, and in Self-defence, Ralston being the Aggressor. The Lords sustained the Libel only relevant to infer the pœnam extraordinariam, and seperately sustained the other Defences to assilzie in totum, and remitted all to the Knowledge of the Inquest. Here your Lordships see, the Killing only sustained ad pœnam extraordinariam, without regard to the three Defences of casual Homicide, Self-defence, and dying ex malo regimine; for they are all sustained seperately to assilzie, even from the pœna extraordinaria: Here then was a culpable Homicide, sustained only ad pœnam extraordinariam, though neither merely casual, nor in Self-defence; and so there can be no Judgment more direct upon the Point now pled.

And here the Pannel must notice, once for all, That it makes nothing to this Question, That in that, and other like Cases to be mentioned, a mortal Weapon was not used; for it is one Question, What is sufficient to make a Homicide only culpable? And quite another, Whether, in our Law, there is such a Thing as culpable Homicide, though neither merely casual, nor in Self-defence? That of the using a deadly Weapon enters into the Argument, Whether a Homicide is dolosum or culpable only? But it makes nothing to the other Question, since Homicide may not be merely casual, although no mortal Weapon is used, as appears both from this Decision, and the Case of Bain, cited for the Pursuers.

Another Case is that of Grierison and others, 12th March, 1684; where the Pannels being accused of Murder, for killing the Defunct in a Scuffle; the Defence proposed was, That the Defunct was the first Aggressor, and did invade the Pannels, or one or other of them; and that William Grierison, or one or other of them, being standing before the Fire, the Defunct threw the said William, or one or other of them, in the Fire, and fell upon him himself; and then, after the Scuffle was over, the Defunct did rise, walked up and down, discoursed, and of new again beat the said William Grier-son, and threatened to kill him if he would not be gone; that the Defunct went in good Health to the Door thereafter. These the Lords sustained relevant to liberate from the ordinary Pain of Death. Here is another Decision in Point; the Crime was not found merely casual, or the Court must have allowed; at least, could only have imprisoned, and could have inflicted no other arbitrary Punishment. But that was not the Case, it was found culpable, and not merely casual; and therefore the Punishment restricted. Sure then it is not true in Law, that all Homicides are capital, unless they be merely casual.

A third Case, is that of Maxwell and others, 7th November, 1690, pursued for the Murder of John Russell, where the Court sustained this Defence, That there was a previous Combination to make a Convocation, in order to debar and keep out Mr. Walter Macgil, Minister of from entering into his Church that Sunday, in consequence of which a Convocation happened; and when they were required to disperse, they took the Keys from the Beadle, and beat the Notar, and the Minister's Wife, and others, before the Slaughter was committed, relevant to restrict the Slaughter to an arbitrary Pain. And found yet further, That if any actual Attempt was made, by throwing great Stones at the Minister, before committing the Slaughter, that that was sufficient to liberate from the Slaughter simpliciter. Sure the first Part of the Defence implied neither accidental Homicide, nor Self-defence, but a Provocation by real Injuries; yet the Court justly sustained it to restrict.

On the 6th November that same Year, another Judgment was given, very opposite to the Pursuer's Pleadings, in the Case of Captain Price and others, who were prosecuted for shooting one John Reid, a Tradesman of Glasgow, and Serjeant at that Time of a Guard kept in that Town. The Case was, That Captain Price, and others with him, had made some Disturbance in the House where they lodged, and committed some Rudeness to the Landlady and her Maid, which occasioned the Guard to be called; and when the Guard came, commanded by Reid, and entered the Room where Price was, he and his Company resisted the Guard, and one of them shot Reid dead. The Defence proposed was, "That before any Guard came, a Mob had begun to rise, and had gathered at the Door where the Officers were, who had shut the Door upon themselves, and cried out to shoot the Dogs, and Words to that Purpose: That when the Guard came, they did not know it was the Guard, but resisted and fired, from Apprehension that it was the Mob, and so killed Reid the Commander of the Guard." The Lords "sustained that Defence relevant to restrict the Libel." And in that Judgment, beside the Establishment of the general Principle, this may be observed, That Reid was killed by Mistake, as one of the Mob, and there neither was nor could be any Provocation from him; neither was it pled, That the Mob had given any real Injury, but only were gathered in a tumultuous Way, and uttering injurious Words: Yet the Court justly restricted the Libel; tho' it is plain the Slaughter was not accidental, except in so far as the Commander of the Guard was killed in Place of a Mobber. Neither was it Self-defence, because the Pannels had no Right to resist the Guard, only there was an Injury by the Convocation, and an Apprehension given of greater Injuries, though that Apprehension was not so idly founded.

The Case of Captain Wallace firing on the Boys from the Abbey, may likewise be noticed; but being a well-known Case, needs not be at length recited.

A fourth Case is that of Ensign Hardie, 6th June, 1701: He was accused of Murder, by giving repeated Thrusts, with a drawn Sword, to one Smith, who at the Time had no Arms, whereof Smith instantly died; and that he afterwards boasted of his Crime and Cruelty, telling other Gentlemen, That he had bowed his Sword upon the Person of a Fellow at Scarbridge. The Defence proposed, and sustained, was, "That the Defunct was the first Aggressor, and did take Hold of the Pannel's Horse-bridle; and when he was holding the Horse by the Bridle, did give the Pannel a Stroke over the Face with a Rung or Tree, and wounded him to the Effusion of his Blood; and that the Defunct beat the Pannel from his Horse." These were found relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment. And then the Reply was sustained relevant to elide it, "That the Pannel beat the Defunct on the Face with a twisted Rod, before he struck the Pannel." Here again the Point is fixed; no casual Homicide, nor Homicide in Self-defence: And so your Lordships had found by a former Interlocutor, wherein you repelled the Defence, when proposed as Self-defence, but yet restricted the Punishment, because the Homicide was culpable.

A fifth Case yet stronger, is that of the first of March, 1710: Peter Maclean, who was accused of the Murder of James Ewing, by shooting him dead with a Fowling-piece, when Ewing had no Arms in his Hand. The Defence sustained to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment was, "That the Defunct quarrelled the Pannel, under the Name of Rascal, how he durst carry a Fowling-Piece, and that if the Prince had his own, he durst not do so;" and adding these Words, "That her Majesty was but a Whore; and thereupon assaulted the Pannel for taking his Carabin from him." These are the Words of the Interlocutor; and it is so plain, that no Observation needs to be made upon it.

Another Case is that of Bathgate, 23d January, 1710: He was accused of murdering Andrew Braidwood, by throwing him down to the Ground, and giving him several Strokes and Bruises, whereof he died. Your Lordships "found the Libel only relevant to infer an arbitrary Punishment;" yet the Fact was not entirely casual, nor pled to be so: And you sustained the Defence, "That the throwing down libelled was only a Wrestling, out of no Malice, and that previous thereto the Defunct was violent and in the Habit of spitting Blood, relevant to elide the Libel in totum."

The Case of Govan, 3d March, 1710, is not so plain as the others above-mentioned; but yet it does assist in the Question: For there your Lordships sustained opprobrious Language and Invasion, by beating in a Scuffle, though without mortal Weapons, relevant to restrict the Punishment of killing with a Sword, even suppose the killing should be proved to have been without the Door of the House, when the last beating was only pretended to have been within the House; and so the beating must have been over before giving the Wound, and the Pannel employed in prosequendo, by way of Retortion of the Injury that had been given.

Another unanswerable Case is that of Carlops, January 8th, 1711; the Circumstances of which are so well known, that it is in vain to repeat them; sure it was neither accidental Homicide, nor Homicide in Defence: But the Lords sustained the Defence, That the beating was per plures commissum, in Conjunction with any two of the following Defences, viz. "That any beating committed by them was in a Tuzie or Rixa, in which they mixed themselves, to relieve a Youth in the Defunct's Grips, or in a Struggle with him. Or, separatim, That they had Swords about them, and only made use of Staves or Batons, relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment."

There is another Case likewise worth noticing, 18th December, 1712; the Case of Serjeant Davies, who was accused of the Murder of Mr. Robert Park—where your Lordships "found the Pannel his being alone, Time and Place libelled, and a Scuffle then happening betwixt the Defunct, with two or three more in his Company and the Pannel, and after a beating with Staves betwixt the said Men and the Pannel, the said Pannel his retiring, and calling for the Guard, and being mutilate in the Hand before he gave the said mortal Wound, relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment."

Another very late Case is that of Jasper Reysano, 14th December, 1724, where the Pannel being accused of killing Robert Lamb, by throwing him over the Stairs, without Cause or Provocation, whereby he was brained, your Lordships sustained it only "relevant to infer an arbitrary Punishment." Yet sure it was not accidental, far less in Defence. All which Cases plainly establish the Point, that even since the Act of Parliament, 1661, the constant Practice hath been to find culpable Homicides only relevant to infer arbitrary Punishment; and that there are Homicides not punishable with Death, though neither merely accidental, nor in Self-defence.

There is also a Case which deserves to be noticed as to that Point, of a third Party's being killed when interposing betwixt other two in a Scuffle: Which is the Case of John Graham, 1st December, 1712, where Graham was accused of murdering David Cochran. But your Lordship sustained the Defence, "That while he was attacked by Blyth with a drawn Dirk, the Pannel was in his own Defence with a drawn Bayonet; and that in the mean Time, the Defunct interposing as a Keddler betwixt them, did casually receive the Wound libelled relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment."

This Information having drawn to so great a Length, we are unwilling to trouble your Lordships with further References to the Laws of other Countries, particularly to the Law of England; although we apprehend the Law there does not differ substantially from our Law in this Particular, except it be in these; 1st, That Manslaughter is in effect not punishable at all in England, otherwise than by a Kind of elusory Punishment; 2^d, That in no Case dolus is presumed only from the giving the Wound, except upon the particular Statute of Stabbing: Whereas, indeed, it is in several Cases otherwise with us; culpable Homicide is punishable arbitrarily, and no Doubt in many Cases, where contrary Circumstances do not appear, the giving the Wound presumes Dole, and even by the Statute of Stabbing, the Killer hath the Benefit of his Clergy, if the Person killed give the first Blow or real Provocation, and that although the Provocation did not immediately precede the Act of Killing, if it happened at any Time of the Quarrel.

That by the ancient Law of England, Slaying a Man did not infer Death, yet perhaps not what we call Murder itself, seems plain from Affisa Henrici Regis apud Northampton, published by Selden, in his Janus Anglorum, Page 120. of the last Edition; by which it appears, that even Murder itself and Robbery, was punishable only by Mutilation, such as cutting off the Hand or Foot: And all their Law-books, as well as the daily Practice, establishes the Distinction betwixt forethought Felony, and slaying on Suddenty; yea of old, even a Murderer by Malice prepense seems to have had the Benefit of the Clergy, and that Benefit only taken away from such Murderers by the first Act, 23d Henry VIII. and their Books of Reports are full of the Examples that Slaughter on Suddenty is not Murder or capital. In Coke's Reports it is stated, that several Men playing at Bowls, two of them quarrelled, and a third, in Revenge of his Friend, struck the other with a Bowl, of which wound he died: This was held Manslaughter; for it was done upon a sudden Emotion, in Revenge of his Friend.

There likewise, two Boys combating together, one of them was scratched in the Face, and his Nose run a great Quantity of Blood; he went three Quarters of a Mile off to his Father; who seeing him all bloody, took in his Hand a Cudgel, and went three Quarters of a Mile to the Place where the other Boy was, and struck him upon the Head, of which the Boy died. This was held but Manslaughter; for the Ire and Passion of the Father was continued; and there was no Time determined in the Law that it was so settled, that it shall be adjudged Malice prepense in Law.

The Case of Mauvridge, set down at length by Lord Chief-Justice Keyling, in his Reports*, makes strongly for us; and we beg Leave to refer to the whole Treatise there set down, and particularly to the first Ground of Provocation, which he declares to be sufficient so as to alleviate the Act of Killing, and to reduce it to a bare Homicide: "He says, 'If one Man, upon angry Words, shall make an Assault upon another, either by pulling him by the Nose, or filipping upon the Forehead, and he that is so assaulted shall draw his Sword, and immediately run the other thorow, that is but Manslaughter; for the Peace is broken by the Person killed, and with an Indignity to him that received the Assault: Besides, he that was so affronted might reasonably apprehend, that he that treated him in that Manner might have some further Design upon him.'" Your Lordships see how close this is to the Case; The Insult and Indignity done by Bridgeton was vastly stronger than any thing here mentioned and having received such an Affront, he had Reason to expect worse; more especially when, as we offered to prove, Bridgeton was endeavouring to pull out my Lord Strathmore's Sword.

We must likewise humbly refer to several Cases set down by Serjeant Havokins, in his Pleas of the Crown, which fully agree with what we now plead; and particularly take notice of what he says, pag. 84. "If a third Person happen, accidentally happen, to be killed by one engaged in a Combat with another, upon a sudden Quarrel, it seems that he who kills him is guilty of Manslaughter only." And it would seem that there is even a Difference made, betwixt killing a Person that endeavours to interpose, if he tell that he comes for that Purpose, and killing one who accidentally is interposed betwixt the two contending Parties, which was my Lord Strathmore's Case: The Killing him who interposes to separate, if he give notice what he is doing, is reckoned worse than the Killing the other. And this Observation shews that the present Case is stronger than the above-cited Case of Graham, where your Lordships restricted it to an arbitrary Punishment. And what that Author observes, confirms a Distinction we have made, betwixt a Man quarrelling with another, and killing a third Party, where it is proved the Killer had a felonious Intention to murder the other, and the Case where that does not appear; for however, in the first Case, he might be guilty of the Murder of the third Party, yet if a Design to murder the Person he quarrelled with is not proved, then he can never suffer capitally for killing the third Party: And we have already endeavoured to prove, that that must be the Case as to Bridgeton, where he gave the Provocation, and no Act followed against him sufficient in Law to establish a Design of murdering him.

The Pursuers have cited the same Books, and Mauwridge's Case, as for them; but that we submit. The particular Cases of Holloway, and Williams the Welchman, spoke of by Keyling, are not at all to the Purpose: The Welchman's Case was no Judgment; but neither in that nor in Holloway's was there any real personal Injury, on which a great Stress is laid in all these Questions.

The Pursuers mention another Case stated, but never adjudged; A Person shooting at Fowls with an Intent to steal them, accidentally kills a Man; that will be Murder. This perhaps may be justly doubted. Sure it would be too severe. But supposing it were so, it is of no Importance: Stealing, even of Fowls, by the Law of England, is Felony of Malice prepenſe; And where a Man attempting to commit one Felony, does another, there is little Doubt but in strict Law he is guilty of the Felony committed (a). But what is that to the Case of a Provocation by a real Injury?

The Pursuers have quoted the Authority of Voet, and a Decision observed by him from Sande, to prove, that where one Man was intended to be killed, and another slain, the Crime is Capital: In which, no doubt, Voet differs from many as learned Lawyers, who are of the other Side. But his Opinion, and that of Sande, is obviated by what is already said: It is only in the Case of no Provocation or real Injury on the Part of him who was designed to be killed. And 2do, 'Tis always taken for granted by Voet, and all who are of that Opinion, that the Design of murdering the Person intended to be invaded, do appear and is proved: But we have already shewn, that cannot be said in the present Case.

The Pursuers pretended, That there was a Circumstance in the Libel which implied Malice against the Earl of Strathmore, viz. "That the Thrust given was followed by a second Push." But as there is nothing in this Fact, it may be the Subject of Imagination, but can never be the Subject of Proof, unless it were pretended, as it is not, that the Pannel drew back or out his Sword, and made a second Thrust; which will appear not to be true, from the Nature of the Wound; and the Thrust will be found to have been so momentary, that it was impossible. 2do, If any thing like that happened, it will appear, that there was no more in it, but the Pannel's staggering, or moving the Sword, by his Weight leaning upon it. 3tio, There is no Relevancy in it at all; the Fact being, That the Pannel pushed as at Bridgeton: And no Circumstance will make it appear, that he knew he had touched the Earl of Strathmore till some time after the Fatality was perfected.

The Pursuers further pretended, "That as they had libelled Malice, they would prove it from other antecedent Facts that had happened some Time before, whereby it would appear, that there was Enmity betwixt the Defunct and the Pannel."

It is answered for the Pannel, 1mo, That no such Facts being libelled, nor, to this Minute, condescended upon, either in the Debate or Information, they can by no means enter into the Proof, otherwise the highest Injustice would be done to the Pannel in this and every such Case: For if the pretended Facts, insinuating Malice, had been libelled, then it would have been competent to the Pannel to have elided the same by a proper Proof, to shew that they inferred no Malice on his Part; he might have proved Diffimulation or Reconciliation, and would have been prepared for that Purpose. But where such Facts are concealed, and may have happened at an unknown Distance of Time, 'tis impossible the Pannel can be prepared with proper Evidences. And though it is sufficient, in an Indictment, to libel Malice in general, in order to make a Relevancy; yet then it is always understood that the Pursuer intends no more than the presumed Malice arising from the Fact libelled: Neither can such Proof come in under the Head of Art and Part, because that can only have Regard to such Facts as happen at the Time of committing the Action complained of, and such as import a Share in the Action; but cannot reach to pretended Qualifications of Malice that happened the Lord knows when.

In the next place, the Pannel offers to exclude all Pretence of former Enmity, by proving, that, for some Time before, they had met from Time to Time occasionally, without any Marks of Enmity, but all the seeming Requisites of Friendship and Civility intervening; and particularly, that that very Day they had dined together, afterwards drunk together for a considerable Time, and visited together, in the Lady Auchterhouse's, a common Relation, with all Appearances of Friendship; and that the deceased Earl had kindly invited the Pannel and his Family to come and visit him and his, and made a Challenge of Kindness of it, That he was too great a Stranger. In the Case of Enmity, the Divine Law itself determines, when Hatred is to be presumed, and when not: "Whoso killeth his Neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in Time past; in the Heat of Anger, from Yesterday, the third Day," or, as in the Latin Translation, qui veri & nudius tertius nullum odium contra eum habuisse comprobatur. So that the very Friendship that passed that Day on which the unhappy Accident happened, excludes all Pretence of former Enmity, suppose there had been any seeming Differences, of which the Pannel is not conscious, far less of Malice, or any capital Enmity that ever was.

Upon the whole, though this fatal and melancholy Accident, which gives occasion to the Trial, does and must ly heavy on the Mind of the Pannel, and produce the strongest Sorrow and Regret in all that had the Honour to know the deceased Earl; yet the punishing the Pannel capitally for an Offence which happened casu magis quam voluntate, would be a very rigorous Extension of the Law. It is plain, from what is above said, that culpable Homicide, both by our Law and Practice, is punishable only arbitrarily, and comes under the general Description of casual Homicide in the Act 1661. No Case can be more pitiful or favourable than this, where the Death happened to a Person nowise intended to be hurt: And therefore 'tis hoped your Lordships will sustain the Defence pled, relevant to restrict the Libel to an arbitrary Punishment.

The above Affize being all lawfully sworn, and no lawful Objection in the contrary, the Pursuers for Probation adduced the Witnesses after deponing, viz.

Robert Hepburne, Hammerman in Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, That he was in the Town of Forfar,

(a) At the Lent Assizes at Chelmsford in Essex, 1763, two Sailors were convicted for the Murder of a Farmer: The Case was, the Sailors came to steal the Farmer's Fowls; the Farmer with his Son pursued them; one of the Sailors struck the Farmer several Blows on the Arm, which (though not likely) killed him. This was held to be Murder; because the Act they were about was unlawful; but the Sailors, after several Respite from Execution, received his Majesty's most gracious Pardon.

the ninth Day of May last, betwixt the Hours of Eight and Nine o' Clock at Night, where he did see the deceased Earl of Strathmore, Lord Rosehill, and Mr. Thomas Lyon my Lord Strathmore's Brother, walking in the Streets; and at the same Time did see Lyon of Bridgeton, and Finhaven the Pannel, standing near to the Lady Auchterhouse's House, upon the Street; what Words passed betwixt them, he being at a Distance could not hear; saw Bridgeton give Finhaven a Push with his Hand; and Finhaven fell in the Gutter; and he saw a Servant of the deceased Earl of Strathmore help Finhaven up out of the Gutter; and when Finhaven got up, he saw him draw his Sword immediately; but that Bridgeton coming up faster than Finhaven, he saw Bridgeton offer to draw my Lord Strathmore's Sword; but does not know whether he got it drawn, or not, but saw Finhaven draw his Sword before Bridgeton offered to draw my Lord Strathmore's; and when Bridgeton was coming up from the Place where Finhaven fell, he looked over his Shoulder, and seeing Finhaven with his Sword drawn, he went faster up to my Lord Strathmore, as said is; and when Finhaven came up, my Lord Strathmore being standing about a Pair of Butts from the Place where Finhaven fell, and when Bridgeton came up, and endeavoured to draw my Lord Strathmore's Sword, as said is, my Lord turned him about, and set Bridgeton aside, and made some Steps towards Finhaven, who would be at that Time about six or eight Ells from my Lord; and he did see my Lord endeavour to take Finhaven in his Arms when they met, and in a little after that, that he did see my Lord withdraw himself aside from the rest of the Company, and saw him put down his Breeches, and lift up his Shirt, and heard him say he had got a Wound, and repeated these Words three Times, and saw him put up his Shirt, and in a short Time thereafter saw my Lord fall to the Ground. And being interrogate, If he saw Finhaven the Pannel make a Thrust at my Lord Strathmore with a Sword? Deponed, He did not see him make the Thrust; but at that Time did see no other Sword drawn but Finhaven's; and after my Lord retired he saw several other Swords drawn. Deponed, That there was no other Company standing with my Lord but my Lord Rosehill, and his own Brother Mr. Thomas, before that Bridgeton and Finhaven came up: And that he saw all this that he has deponed upon, from his own Shop-door, which was about seven or eight Ells Distance from that Part of the Street where my Lord Strathmore was standing. And being interrogate, If he knows what came of Bridgeton, after he came up to my Lord? Deponed, That he knew not what became of Bridgeton after my Lord put him aside: And that there was as much Day-light as he could see what he has deponed upon: And that Finhaven the Pannel was in Boots; and that he was coming fast up after Bridgeton, but Bridgeton went faster towards my Lord; and that when my Lord Strathmore fell, he saw Thomas Adam, Maltman, take up my Lord from the Ground, and saw no other Body assisting. Deponed, He saw the Pannel's Sword twisted out of his Hand by Mr. Thomas, or my Lord Rosehill; but which of them, he knows not; and that it was after my Lord fell. And deponed, That he did see the Wound in my Lord's Belly, a little below the Navel; and that it was bleeding. Deponed, That he saw Finhaven, after his Sword was twisted out of his Hand, walk in his ordinary way of walking, towards the Lady Auchterhouse's House. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

Robert Hepburne.

AD. COCKBURN.

Nota, The Procurators for the Pannel having (before purging) objected to the above-named Robert Hepburne, why he ought not to be a Witness in this Case; because, since his Citation to be a Witness, he had expressed Malice and Ill-will against the Pannel in his Words, viz. "That he thanked GOD, he had now an Opportunity to hang him, and would do it if he could." And seeing these Expressions were clearly proven against him, by two concurring Witnesses, in Presence of the Court and Jury, they desired the same might be so marked in the Books of Adjournal. Which, and this Deposition, the Lords left to the Consideration of the Jury.

David Lord Rosehill, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, (being interrogate for the Pannel) That the Time libelled, the Deponent on the Occasion of a Burying, was brought in Company with the deceased Earl of Strathmore, the Pannel, and others; and together they dined in Mr. Carnegie of Lours's House; and after Dinner and the Burying was over, they together went to the House of Mr. Dickson, Clerk of Forfar, where they continued some considerable Time, drinking a Glass of Wine together; and after they left that House, they assembled in the House of my Lady Auchterhouse, in the same Town, the Pannel's Sister, where the deceased Earl had gone to make a Visit. Deponed, That during all that Day, and in the several Places where the deceased Earl, the Pannel, and the rest of the Company were, he the Deponent, observed nothing but great Civility and Friendship betwixt the deceased Earl and the Pannel. Deponed, That before they parted from the Lady Auchterhouse's, the Pannel appeared to the Deponent to be drunk, and far gone in Drink, to the Degree of staggering; and he observed the Pannel drink plentifully in these several Houses. Deponed, That he the Deponent, during the Time of his being with the said Company, was mostly engaged in Conversation with the deceased Earl, and had not the Occasion to observe what passed in Conversation betwixt the Pannel and Mr. Lyon of Bridgeton: And being interrogate about what he knew of the Character and Temper of the Pannel? Deponed, That, according to the Deponent's Knowledge of him, which had been of long Continuance, and particularly according to the Character he the Pannel bore in the Country, he was thought to be nowise quarrelsome in his Temper, but to be of a peaceable and good Disposition. Causa scientia patet. And this was the Truth as he should answer to God.

Rosehill.

D. ERSKINE.

William Douglas, lawful Son to William Douglas, late Provost and Chirurgion-Apothecary in Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined, and interrogate for the Pursuers, deponed, That on that Day whereon the deceased Earl of Strathmore was wounded, he the Deponent was at Forfar, and on the Streets, where he did see the Earl with my Lord Rosehill and Mr. Thomas Lyon his Brother, and at the same Time, he observed Finhaven and Mr. Lyon of Bridgeton standing together near to the Lady Auch-terhouse her Lodging; and so on thereafter looking about, he observed Finhaven leaning and falling backwards into a Kennel; and after getting out of it, which he appeared to the Deponent to do very soon, he drew his Sword, and with it went up to the Company where the Earl, Bridgeton, and the rest were; and at the first Sight, upon the Pannel's approaching to the Earl, Bridgeton and the rest, Bridgeton was then interposed betwixt the Earl and the Pannel; but all of a sudden and a clap (a), the Earl came to be interposed betwixt Bridgeton and the Pannel; and at the Time of the said Earl's Interposition, the Pannel was within the Length of his Sword at the Place where Bridgeton was standing; that is to say, had been standing. Deponed, That he did observe the Pannel make a Thrust with his Sword; and at the Time of so doing, the Earl was standing next the Pannel, and his Face towards him. Deponed, That the Earl received a Wound in his Belly, and after receiving it, he saw him pull his Shirt from under his Breeches, and at the same Time saw him bleeding, and soon thereafter his Lordship fell down, and he heard him say, that he had got it; and before the Earl fell, and while he was upon the Ground, he did observe his Brother Mr. Thomas, with his drawn Sword, twist Finhaven's Sword out of his Hand, after seeing and hearing some clashing of their Swords: But at the Time when Finhaven made the Push, as said is, he observed no other Sword drawn but Finhaven's; and at the Time when the Pannel recovered his Thrust, the Pannel and the Earl were very near one another: And all this Time, the Deponent was about the Length of this Room, or some more, distant from the said Earl and the Pannel, whose Sides were opposite to the Deponent; and after the Earl of Strathmore's Fall, and that his Brother Mr. Thomas, twisted the Sword out of the Pannel's Hand, the Pannel, who was in Boots, ran towards his Sister's Door: After the deceased Earl was carried to a House, and his Wound was dressed, he heard his Lordship say, that after the Sword entered his Belly, he the Pannel gave it a second Thrust. Deponed, That when he observed Finhaven falling into the Puddle, as above said, there was none standing with him or by him but Mr. Lyon of Bridgeton. And what he has above deponed, happened on the ninth Day of May last, about the Hour of Nine at Night. Causa scientia patet. And this was Truth as he should answer to God.

Will. Douglas.

DA. ERSKINE.

Andrew Douglas, also lawful Son to the said William Douglas, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, Deponed, That the Time and Place libelled, the Deponent saw John Lyon of Bridgeton push the Pannel upon the Breast, whereby the Pannel fell in the Gutter, which the Deponent apprehended would have taken him up to the Knee; that it was a very nasty Gutter; and that he saw the Pannel arise out of the Gutter, and immediately draw his Sword, by which Time Bridgeton was walking off towards my Lord Strathmore and others, who were standing upon the Street about the Distance of the Length of this Room from the fore said Gutter: And deponed, That he followed after Finhaven immediately, after standing a little while with his Comrades: And that before the Deponent came up to the Place where my Lord Strathmore and the other Gentlemen were standing, my Lord Strathmore had fallen upon the Street. And the Deponent being asked, how soon that happened? Deponed, That it was in a moment; and that when the Deponent came up as aforesaid, he saw Mr. Thomas Lyon and Finhaven engaged, and making Passes at other with their drawn Swords; which the Deponent explained to be only a clashing with their Swords; and that Mr. Thomas Lyon did very soon twist the Sword out of Finhaven's Hand; whereupon Finhaven ran away to his Sister's, the Lady Auchterhouse's Lodging, and the Door was shut after him. Causa scientia patet. And this was the Truth as he should answer to God.

Andrew Douglas.

AND. FLETCHER.

John Ferrier, Residenter in Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, That, at the Time and Place libelled, the Deponent having Occasion to go to water his Master's Horse, he saw Bridgeton and the Pannel, as they came out from the Lady Auchterhouse's Lodging, about the Bridge-stone near the Shambles, and there heard Bridgeton say to the Pannel, You must give me an Answer to my Question, which the Deponent heard was, If the Pannel would give his Daughter to the Lord Rosehill? And upon the Pannel's saying, No; Bridgeton asked him, If he would drink a Bottle of Wine, and if he would drink the King's Health? And upon the Pannel's refusing to do either, the Deponent saw Bridgeton take hold of the Pannel by the Breast, and violently push him into the Kennel; and heard Bridgeton at the same Time, say, Go, and be damnd, and your King George, whom you love so well. And thereafter Bridgeton walked towards my Lord Strathmore, Mr. Thomas Lyon, and my Lord Rosehill, who were standing upon the Street at some little Distance; and that Finhaven was helped out of the Gutter by a Footman of my Lord Strathmore's: And that upon the Pannel's getting upon the Streets again, he immediately drew his Sword, and ran up the Street after Bridgeton; and before Bridgeton had come the Length of the Place where the Lord Strathmore and others were standing, he looked over his Shoulder, and seeing Finhaven following him in manner above-mentioned, he run up to my Lord Strathmore, who, and the rest of the Company, had still their Backs turned to the Place from whence Finhaven and Bridgeton were coming: And that Bridgeton, upon his coming up to Strathmore, laid hold upon my Lord Strathmore's Sword, and endeavoured to pull it out; upon which my Lord Strathmore turning about pushed Bridgeton off, and in the mean Time Finhaven made a Push with his Sword at Bridgeton, and at that Instant he observed my Lord Strathmore pushing Bridgeton aside, and make a Step towards Finhaven; and observed at same time Finhaven, going on with his Push, to stagger forward with the Thrust upon my Lord Strathmore; and thereafter the Company went all through other (b), so that the Deponent could not see where the Thrust landed: And very soon thereafter the Deponent saw Mr. Thomas Lyon with his Sword ca' (c) Finhaven's Sword out of his Hand, which lighted at a good Distance upon the Street: Upon which Finhaven run off, staggering, towards the Lady Auchterhouse's Lodging, and had almost fallen upon the Street before he got in at the Gate; and much about the same Time the Deponent saw the Earl of Strathmore fall down upon the Street, and afterwards carried off, and that Thomas Adam and Janet Binnie were the first that came to his Assistance. Deponed, That the Kennel was deep and dirty, and that the Pannel was deep in it, but not freely covered: That when he arose, his Face was almost as black as his black Coat; and that while these Things past, the Deponent was riding upon the Side of the Street, betwixt the Gutter and the Place where the Earl of Strathmore and others were standing; and upon seeing the Beginning of this Accident, he stopped his Horse a little, till he saw as above-mentioned. Causa scientia patet. And this was the Truth as he should answer to God.

John Ferrier.

David Barclay, lawful Son to David Barclay, Brewer in Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deposed, That at the Time and Place libelled he saw Bridgeton push the Pannel into a Gutter, and saw a Servant raise him out of the Gutter: And when the Pannel got to the Street, he saw him draw his Sword, and go towards the rest of the Company, and Bridgeton was beyond the Earl of Strathmore, his Brother and Lord Rosehill, who were interposed betwixt the Pannel and Bridgeton, and did not see the Pannel push with the Sword, and saw a little after my Lord Strathmore fall upon the Street; and immediately after that saw Mr. Thomas Lyon, with a naked Sword, beat the Pannel's Sword out of his Hand, and the Pannel immediately run toward the Lady Auchterhouse's House, and got in at the Door. And deposed, That when Bridgeton thrust the Pannel into the Gutter, the Servant who lifted him up, said to Bridgeton, or some other Servant standing by, that he was uncivil, tho' he was a Gentleman: And that what the Deponent saw and heard, as aforesaid, was betwixt Eight and Nine o'Clock of the Evening of the Day aforesaid. Causa scientia patet. And this was the Truth as he should answer to God.

And the Deponent seeing his Master lying in the Gutter, quit his Horses, and came to relieve him, but found that my Lord Strathmore's Servant had helped him out before he came, and then he did see his Master draw his Sword, and go pretty fast forward, staggering, and saying, This cannot be suffered; then his Master came up to the Company, and saw him make a Push at Bridgeton; but that before his Master came up to them, he did see Bridgeton make an Attempt to draw my Lord Strathmore's Sword; and as Bridgeton was going toward my Lord Strathmore, he did see Bridgeton look over his Shoulder to Finhaven, and lookt as if he had been laughing. Whereupon the Deponent went towards Mr. Dickson's House, to which Place the Earl of Strathmore was carried; and then the Deponent met with, at least did see, Mr. Thomas Lyon and Bridgeton, but cannot be sure if my Lord Rosehill was with them, who went towards the Lady Auchterhouse's Lodgings: And Mr. Fletcher of Balnisknow told the Deponent, That he wanted a fore Hammer, to break open the Lady Auchterhouse's Door; whereupon the Deponent being a Magistrate, told, that it was his Duty to preserve the Peace, and prevent any illegal Proceedings, or bad Consequences therefrom. Deposed, That about a Month before the said Earl's Death, he the Deponent was occasionally at a Burial with the said deceased Earl and the Pannel, betwixt whom the Deponent observed nothing like Misunderstanding, but that their Carriage to one another was civil; and particularly remembers, that at the Time Finhaven drank a Glass to the Health of the Countess of Strathmore, and after drinking, threw up the Glass, which broke with its Fall; and this happened in the House of Clerk Dickson in Forfar: And when the Earl of Strathmore went to take his Horse, the Pannel and the Deponent waited of him. AD. COCKBURN.

Charles Carnegie, Brother-german to Patrick Carnegie of Lours, solemnly sworn, purged, examined, and interrogate, deponed, That he knew that there was not a very good Understanding betwixt the deceased Earl of Strathmore and the Pannel, and for the Space of two Years they had not visited one another; but he never did hear the Pannel express any Grudge or Resentment against my Lord Strathmore. Did hear that about two Years ago or thereabouts, there fell out some Mistakes in discoursing about a Bargain of Meal; and that the Pannel was, as he heard, that Night at Glamis, but went away next Morning about Four o'Clock; but he the Deponent was not present with them at said time; but did hear, that what happened betwixt them at that time, gave rise to some Misunderstandings.

SIR Alexander Wedderburn of Blackneth, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, That about the End of October, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Twenty-six, there was a Meeting of the Gentlemen of the Shire of Angus, concerning their Affairs, in the Town of Forfar, where the deceased Earl of Strathmore was chosen Preses of the Meeting; and that the Laird of Finhaven, who was there also, called down the Deponent to the Street, and expressed himself to this Purpose:
That he had met with several Difobligations from the Earl of Strathmore, of which there was just now an Instance, That the Earl being Preses of the Meeting, had kept him out of a Committee that was then chosen; That the Earl was his Debitor, and was owing him several Years annual Rents;
That he did not much notice, but that he would resent, or make the Earl repent what he had met with, or Words to that purpose: And this he said with an Asseveration, and desired the Deponent to acquaint the Earl with what he had said: But the Deponent refused it, and said they were all Friends together, and he would forget it against To-morrow. And deponed, That he, the Deponent, that same Night did speak to my Lord
Gray, to speak to my Lord Strathmore, to get Finhaven added to the Committee, saying, That would make all Things right; But my Lord Gray returned no Answer to the Deponent. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

William Douglas, late Provost and Chirurgion-Apothecary in Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed,
That upon the Ninth of May last, at Nine o'Clock at Night, the Deponent was called to the Earl of Strathmore, who had got a Wound; and having pained and dressed the Wound, he found it went in about three Inches and a Half above the Navel, and came out to the Back-bone, about two Inches below; that he first dressed the Wound in the Belly, and then that in the Back; that the Earl having asked his Opinion of it; he said he was not without great Hazard, and desired more Assistance; whereupon an Express was dispatched to Dundee for Physicians; that the Deponent thought the Wound mortal, and did not think any could recover of that Wound; the Earl lived about forty-nine Hours thereafter, and died upon the Saturday's Night, at Ten o'Clock, of the foresaid Wound.
Deponed, That the Earl said to him, That Finhaven had given him that Wound, and that after he gave the first Thrust, he pressed the Pomel of the Sword forward with his Breast; and that it was the Deponent's Opinion, from what he observed, whatever Sword had given that Wound, was either rusty or had a Nitch in, which brought out the Omentum without the Belly; and the Deponent afterward having seen the Sword, which was called Finhaven's Sword, he perceived a Nitch in it, some more than a Hand-brode from the Hilt. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

Thomas Crichton, Chirurgion-Apothecary in Dundee, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, That upon the Evening of the Ninth of May last, the Deponent was sent for from Dundee, to wait on the now deceased Earl of Strathmore, and arrived at Forfar next Morning about One o'Clock, and there saw the Wound the Earl had received, which appear'd to the Deponent to have been by a Sword, which had entered about three Inches and a half above the Navel, and had gone out at the Back, about four Inches from the Back-bone, a good deal lower than where the Sword entered; and the Deponent said the Wound was mortal to his Apprehension; and that the Earl of Strathmore died thereof, in about two Days after the receiving of it. And deponed, That the Defunct told the Deponent, that Finhaven had given him that Wound; that he did not believe he designed it for him, and yet there was one Circumstance which he could not account for, viz. That after the Sword had entered his Body, Finhaven pressed it forward, till their Bodies were close together. Deponed, That Bridgeton is a good deal taller than my Lord Strathmore was: And that my Lord Strathmore wore a fair Wig, and Bridgeton wore a black one usually. Causa scientia patet. And this is Truth as he should answer to God.

DR. John Wedderburn, Physician in Dundee, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, deponed, That he was called to wait on the Earl of Strathmore, when he received the Wound upon the Ninth of May last; and the Deponent saw him next Morning early; and upon viewing the Wound, it appeared to the Deponent to have been given by a three-cornered Sword, which had entered about three Inches above the Navel, and went out in the Back on the Left-side, some Inches from the Back-bone, and about two Inches lower than where it had entered; and the Wound was to the Deponent's Apprehension mortal; and accordingly the Earl of Strathmore died of that Wound upon Saturday Night, about two Days after he had received it; and the Deponent thereafter saw the Defunct opened, whereby it appeared, that the Weapon had passed through the Caul, the Gut-Colon, and the Plexus mesentericus. And deponed, That the Defunct told him, that he had an Impression, that the Person who gave him the Wound, had, by applying his Belly to the Pomel of the Sword, pushed it forward upon him. Deponed, That Bridgeton is of a much taller Stature, than my Lord Strathmore was; and that my Lord Strathmore usually wore a fair Wig, and Bridgeton a black one. Causa scientia patet.

[Follows the Witnesses for the Pannel's Exculpation.]

Margaret Carnegie, Lady Auchterhouse, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That on the Afternoon of the Ninth of May last, the Earl of Strathmore, Bridgeton, and Finhaven, were in the Deponent's House; she observed no manner of Difference betwixt the Earl of Strathmore and Finhaven; and that the Pannel and the other Company drunk my Lady Strathmore's Health twice over, and the Pannel tossed up the Glass; during that time Bridgeton was using rough Expressions to the Pannel, and was taking him by the Breast, and very rude to him; and that when a Glass of Brandy was brought, she desired Bridgeton to take a Dram, and he desired it should be given to Finhaven, her Brother; but she said no, for it did appear to her he did not want it, for he was then very drunk; and that Bridgeton took her the Deponent by the Wrist, and squeezed it hard, and said it would be no Difficulty to break it; and during the same Time, Bridgeton took Finhaven by the Arm, and struck his Hand down to the Table, and said, Will ye not agree to give one of your Daughters to Rosehill? And Bridgeton further said, If he was a young Man, and if Finhaven refused him one of his Daughters, he would maul him, and with that shook his Hand over him. And deponed, She never knew nor heard of her Brother's being quarrellsome. *Causa scientia

DR. John Kinloch, Physician in Dundee, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That on the Ninth of May last, after Lours's Daughter's Burial, the Deponent was in Clerk Dick-son's House in Forfar, in a Room with the Pannel, who asked the Deponent, if he would go into another Room, where the Earl of Strathmore was, to see his Lordship; and accordingly they went into the Room where the Earl was, and stayed there about an Hour, and drunk several Bottles of Wine together; and during that time, he saw nothing but mutual Civilities in the Company, without the least Appearance of Quarrels.

David Denune, Sadler, in Canongate, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That, in the End of February, or Beginning of March last, the deceased Charles Earl of Strathmore and Finhaven the Pannel, with another Gentleman, whom the Deponent did not know, came to the Deponent's House, called for a Dram, which the Deponent served them with himself: and the Earl first drunk to Finhaven and his Family, and then Finhaven drunk the Earl of Strathmore's Health and his Family's; and at several other times, when the Earl was not present, the Deponent saw and heard Finhaven drink to the said Earl of Strathmore's Health. Deponed, He has had Occasion often to see Finhaven, and be in company with him, and observed him always to be of a good Temper, and no ways inclined to Quarrels. Causa scientia patet. And

David Ogilvie, Son to Sir John Ogilvie of Inverquharity, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That he has had frequent Occasions of being in company with the Pannel, and has oft-times heard him testify his Respect and Regard for the late Earl of Strathmore, by naming and drinking to his Health; and particularly did hear him do so at his own House; in the Month of March or April last, when the Deponent was visiting him; that is to say, did hear him drink both to the Earl's Health and his Countess's. Deponed, That for these three or four Years past, he has been intimately acquainted with the Pannel, and observed

him always to be of a good and peaceable Temper; and the Character he always heard him get in the Country, was, That he was of a peaceable and good Temper, and no Ways quarrellsome. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

MR. John Martine, Minister of the Gospel at Othello, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That he the Deponent having had some Affair to do with the deceased Earl of Strathmore, as one of the Heritors within the Deponent's Parish, on which Account the Deponent went to wait of his Lordship at his House of Glamis, but had the Misfortune to miss him; and upon his Return, having waited of the Pannel, and spoke to him of the Affair, telling him how he had missed my Lord, and desired that the Pannel would fall upon some Expedient to bring either his Lordship, or some from him, to meet with the rest of the Heritors. Upon which the Pannel advised the Deponent once more to wait of his Lordship at Glamis; and for his Recommendation and Introduction, he would write a Letter to the Earl, and acquaint him in it, that he was the Bearer. Accordingly the Pannel did write a Letter to the Earl to the foresaid Purpose, which he delivered to the Deponent; and with it he the Deponent did again go to Glamis, and at that Time also had the Misfortune to miss his Lordship: Upon which he the Deponent delivered the Letter to one Mr. Greenhill, the Earl's Servant; and the Meeting of the Heritors holding upon the Wednesday thereafter, the said Mr. Greenhill came from his Lordship, and attended the Meeting: And deponed, That the writing of the foresaid Letter, and delivering of it, was about the End of March, or Beginning of April last. Deponed, That the Deponent has for these three Years past been intimately acquainted with the Pannel; and during the whole Course of his Acquaintance, he observed him always to be regular in his Life, and of a peaceable Temper and Disposition, which is the Character he bears in the Country. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

MR. James Maxwell, Minister of the Gospel at Forfar, solemnly sworn, purged, examined and interrogate, ut supra, deponed, That soon after the Earl of Strathmore received his Wound, the Deponent waited of him, and from him he went to the Prison and visited the Pannel, whom he found in great Disorder, and under the Impressions of Drunkenness, his Cloaths being all covered with Mire, and his Face besmired with Dirt; the Deponent helped him to take off his Cloaths, and sent for a Coat and some Linens of his own to put on, at least the Coat was his own, which he helped to put on him, and to wash and clean his Face. The Deponent spoke to him suitably to the Occasion of his Visit, both in respect to his Drunkenness, and what was published abroad he had committed upon the Earl of Strathmore, by giving him a Wound; upon hearing whereof, and the Deponent further saying, That he had to his great Satisfaction heard the Earl of Strathmore pray to God to forgive him: Upon this the Pannel fell into the greatest Disorder, tossing himself backwards and forwards upon a Table, and hanging his Head downwards, cried out, Good God! have I wounded the Earl of Strathmore, a Person for whom I had great Kindness, and against whom I had no Design. Causa scientia patet. And this is the Truth as he should answer to God.

MAWGRIDGE's Case in the Queen's-Bench, Term. Hill. 5 Anne Regine.

AT the Sessions of the Peace held at Guildhall, London, on the First of July, in the fifth Year of the Queen, John Mawgridge of London, Gent. was indicted, for that on the Seventh of June, in the same Year, he did feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice forethought, make an Assault upon William Cope, Gent. and with a Sword on the left Part of his Breast, near the left Pap, did him strike and pierce, giving him thereby a mortal Wound, of which the said William Cope did instantly die. Which Indictment being delivered to the Justices of Gaol-Delivery for Newgate, he was arraigned thereupon, and pleaded Not Guilty.

The Jury found this Special Verdict:

That William Cope was Lieutenant of the Queen's Guards in the Tower, and the principal Officer then commanding there, and was then upon the Guard in the Guard-Room; and that John Mawgridge was then and there, by the Invitation of Mr. Cope, in company with the said William Cope, and with a certain Woman of Mr. Cope's Acquaintance, which Woman Mawgridge did then affront, and angry Words passed between them in the Room, in the presence of Mr. Cope and other Persons there present, and Mawgridge there did threaten the Woman; Mr. Cope did thereupon desire Mawgridge to forbear such Usage of the Woman, saying that he must protect the Woman; thereupon Mawgridge did continue the reproachful Language to the Woman, and demanded Satisfaction of Mr. Cope, to the Intent to provoke him to fight: Thereupon Mr. Cope told him 'twas not a convenient Place to give him Satisfaction, but at another Time and Place he would be ready to give it to him, and in the mean time desired him to be more civil, or to leave the Company: Thereupon John Mawgridge rose up, and was going out of the Room; and so going, did suddenly snatch up a Glass-Bottle full of Wine then standing upon the Table, and violently threw it at him, the said Mr. Cope, and therewith struck him upon the Head, and immediately thereupon, without any Intermission, drew his Sword, and thrust him into the Left Part of his Breast, over the Arm of one Robert Martin, notwithstanding the Endeavour used by the said Martin to hinder Mawgridge from killing Mr. Cope, and gave Mr. Cope the Wound in the Indictment mentioned, whereof he instantly died. But the Jury do farther say, That immediately, in a little Space of Time, between Mawgridge's drawing his Sword and the giving the mortal Wound by him, Mr. Cope did arise from his Chair where he sat, and took another Bottle that then stood upon the Table, and threw it at Mawgridge, which did hit and break his Head; That Mr. Cope had no Sword in his Hand drawn all the while; and that after Mawgridge had thrown the Bottle, Mr. Cope spake not. And whether this be Murder or Manslaughter, the Jury pray the Advice of the Court.

A Day being appointed for the Resolution of the Court, and the Marshal required to bring the Prisoner to the Bar, returned he was escaped; which being recorded, the Chief-Justice gave the Opinion of the Judges in this Manner:

This Record being removed into this Court, the Case hath been argued before all the Judges; and all of us, except my Lord Chief-Justice Trevor, are of Opinion that Mawgridge is guilty of Murder.

This hath been a Case of great Expectation.

This Distinction between Murder and Manslaughter only, is occasioned by the Statute of 23 H. VIII. and other Statutes that took away the Benefit of Clergy from Murder committed by Malice premeditated, which Statutes have been the Occasion of many nice Speculations.

The Word Murder is known to be a Term or a Description of Homicide committed in the worst Manner, which is no where used but in this Island, and is a Word framed by our Saxon Ancestors in the Reign of Canutus upon a particular Occasion, which appears by an uncontested Authority, Lamb. 141. In the Laws of Edward the Confessor: Murdrum quidem inventa fuerunt in diebus Canuti Regis, qui post acquisitionem Angliam & pacificationem, regatu Baronum Angliam remisit in Daciam exercitum suum. Thereupon a Law was made, That if any Englishman should kill any of the Danes that he had left behind, if he were apprehended, he should be bound to undergo the Ordeal Trial to clear himself; and if the Murderer were not found within eight Days, and after that a Month was given, then if he could not be found, the Ville should pay forty-six Marks, which if not able to pay, it should be levied upon the Hundred. Bracton 120. agrees with this Account.

Though this Law ceased upon the Expulsion of the Danes, yet William the Conqueror revived it for the Security of his Normans, as appears by his Laws, after he had confirmed King Edward the Confessor's Laws. And Henry I. Anno primo Regni, afterwards by his Law (as appears in the Addition to Lambert) establishes, "That if a Man be found slain, he should be taken to be a Frenchman, if it was not proved that he was an Englishman, and the Country was bound to enquire whether the Person slain was an Englishman or a Frenchman." These Inquisitions were taken before the Coroner, and returned to the Justices in Eyre, and if the Jury found him an Englishman, then the Country was to be discharged, which Law was called Englishire, and the Justices in Eyre were also bound to enquire thereof, until the Statute of 14 E. III. which, as it is mentioned in Stamford, was abolished.

Hereby a Mistake upon the Statute of Marlebridge is rectified, which is cap. 26. Murdrum de cetero non adjudicatur coram iusticiariis, ubi per infortunium adjectum est, sed licum habeat murdrum de interfectis per se oniam tantum, & non aliter. This was not made upon a Supposition that he that killed the Person slain by Misfortune should be hanged, but only to explain, or rather to take off the Rigor of the Conqueror's Law, that the Country should not be compelled to find out the Manslayer; or if he were found out, he should not undergo the Penalty of that Law. For as the Law stood, or was interpreted before that Statute, if a Man was found to be slain, it was always intended, 1. That he was a Frenchman. 2. That he was killed by an Englishman. 3. That Killing was Murder. 4. If any one was apprehended to be the Murderer, he was to be tried by Fire and Water, though he killed him by Misfortune; which was extended beyond Reason and Justice in favour of the Normans: But if an Englishman was killed by Misfortune, he that killed him was not in Danger of Death, because it was not Felony. For, saith Bracton (who wrote the latter End of H. III.) fol. 136. "He that killed a Man by Misfortune, was to be discharged." 5. If the Malefactor was not taken, then the Country was to be amerced. But by the Statute of Marlebridge, if it was known that the Person slain was a Frenchman, and was killed by Misfortune, then the Country should not be amerced if the Manslayer was not taken; or if he were taken, he should not be put to his Ordeal Trial. This seems to be the true Meaning of that Statute.

But, secondly, it will appear to a Demonstration, That before that Statute, he that killed an Englishman per infortunium was never in any Danger of Death; for this Statute of Marlebridge was made 52 H. III. The Statute of Magna Charta was consummate 9 H. III. and that supposes, "That every one imprisoned for the Death of a Man, and not thereof indicted, might of Right pursue the Writ de odio & atia; and if it was found that the Person imprisoned killed him se defendendo, or per infortunium, and not per feloniam, then he was to be bailed." Which shews that he was not in danger of Death; for if he had, he would not have been let to Bail, 2 Inst. 42.

Hereby I have given a true Account of the Sense of the Word Murder; what it was when (first in the Time of Canutus) a Dane, and since (in William the Conqueror) when a Frenchman was killed; for, as it was then supposed in the Time of Canutus, the Englishmen hated the Danes upon the account of their Nation that had subdued them, and would upon all Occasions seek their Destruction, as they did of a considerable Number of them in the Time of Ethelred, the Saxon King that preceded Canutus next save one; so the Conqueror had the same Reason to suspect the Safety of his Normans.

Afterwards, as appears by the Confessor's Laws, Lamb. 141 the secret or insidious killing of any other as well as a Foreigner was declared to be Murder. Bracton 120, 134, 135. Murder is thus defined, Est occisio hominum extraneorum & notorum occisio manu hominum nequiter perpetrata. With which agrees the other old Books of Britton and Fleta: Only in case of a Foreigner it was penal to the Country; not of a Native.

Next, it may be necessary to shew what was to be understood by Homicide or Manslaughter. Bracton 128. mentions the worst Part of it, which is a voluntary Homicide, defined in this Manner: Si quis ex certa scientia & in offultu premeditato, ira, vel odio, vel causa lucri, nequiter & in feloniam, ac contra pacem Domini Regis aliquem interfecerit: If one knowingly, and by a premeditated Assault, by Anger or Hatred, or for Lucre-Sake, should kill another, this was accounted Manslaughter; If it be done clanculo, saith Bracton, it is Murder: That was all the Difference there was between the one and the other.

It appears, that since that of Bracton the Notion of Murder is much altered, and comprehends all Homicides, whether privately or publicly committed, if done by Malice premeditated. With this agrees Stam. Pl. Cor. 18. b. "At this Day (saith he) a Man may define Murder in another Manner than it is defined by Bracton, Britton and Fleta: If any one of Malice premeditated doth kill another, be he Englishman or Foreigner, if secretly or publicly, that is Murder: This was the Definition long before the making of the Statutes of 4 & 23 H. VIII. and the other Statutes that took away Clergy." To define Murder, there must be malitia premeditata, as also murdravit: So that if an Indictment be that the Party murdravit, and not ex malitia premeditata, it is but Manslaughter, Yel. 204. 2 Cro. 283. 1 Bul. 141. Bradly & Banks. So if it be ex malitia premeditata, omitting murdravit, it is but Manslaughter, Dyer 261. Pl. 26—304. Pl. 56. Vide Stat. 10 E. III. cap. 2. The Parliament complained that Murderers, &c. were encouraged to offend, because Pardons of Manslaughters were granted so easily; the Act therefore prohibits the granting thereof. 13 R. II. recites the same Mischief, and great Damage by Treasons, Murders, &c. because Pardons have been easily granted: Therefore the Act doth provide, "That if a Charter for the Death of a Man be alledged before any Justice, in which Charter it is not specified that he of whose Death any such is arraigned was murdered or slain by Await, Assault or Malice premeditated, it shall be enquired, whether he was murdered or slain by Assault, Await, or Malice premeditated; and if it be so found, the Charter of Pardon shall be disallowed." This is a plain Description of Murder, as it was taken to be according to the common Understanding of Men.

Ever since the killing of a Man by Assault of Malice premeditated hath been allowed to be Murder, and to comprehend the other two Instances. But because that Way of killing by Poison did not come under the ancient Definition of Bracton, &c. which is said to be manu hominum perpetrata, or of this Statute of 13 R. II. Therefore by the Statute of 1 E. VI. c. 12. it was enacted, "That wilful poisoning of any Person should be accounted wilful Murder of Malice premeditated."

One Thing more is fit to be observed, That in all Indictments for Murder a Man is not charged positively, that he did murder the Person slain, but that he ex malitia premeditata, in ipsum insultum fecit, ac cum quodam gladio, he gave him a Wound whereof he died: Et sic ex malitia premeditata ipsum murdravit, so the Murder is charged upon him by way of Conclusion, and as a Consequence from the antecedent Matter that is positively alledged. To come close to a State of the present Question, It doth appear that Mawgridge threw the Bottle at Mr. Cope without any Provocation given to him; for the Difference was between him and the Woman that was there in Company, and his Behaviour was so rude and distasteful as did induce Captain Cope to desire him to leave the Room, where he was only a Guest to him, and there by his Permission; this Cope might reasonably do, which could be no Cause to provoke Mawgridge to make the least Assault upon him: Therefore I shall maintain these three Positions:

1. That in this Case there is express Malice by the Nature and Manner of Mawgridge's throwing the Bottle, and drawing his Sword immediately thereupon.

2. That Mr. Cope's throwing a Bottle at Mawgridge, whereby he was hit and hurt before he gave Mr. Cope the mortal Wound, cannot make any Alteration in the Offence by reducing it to be of so low a Degree as Manslaughter.

3. I shall consider what is such a Provocation, as will make the Act of killing to be but a Manslaughter only.

1. Here is express Malice, that appears by the Nature of the Action. Some have been led into a Mistake, by not well considering what the Passion of Malice is; they have construed it to be a Rancour of Mind lodged in the Person killing, for some considerable Time before the Commission of the Fact, which is a Mistake arising from the not well distinguishing between Hatred and Malice. Envy, Hatred, and Malice, are three distinct Passions of the Mind.

1st. Envy properly is a repining, or being grieved at the Happiness and Prosperity of another, Invidius alterius rebus macerescit opimis.

2dly. Hatred, which is odium, is, as Tully saith, Ira inveterata, a Rancour fixed and settled in the Mind of one towards another, which admits of several Degrees. It may arrive to so high a Degree, and may carry a Man so far as to wish the Hurt of him, though not to perpetrate it himself.

3dly. Malice is a Design formed of doing Mischief to another; Cum quis data opera male agit, he that designs and useth the Means to do ill, is malicious, 2 Inst. 42. Odium signifies Hatred, atque Malice, because it is eager, sharp, and cruel. He that doth a cruel Act voluntarily, doth it of Malice prepenfed, 3 Inst. 62. By the Statute of 5 Hen. IV. If any one out of Malice prepenfed shall cut out the Tongue, or put out the Eyes of another, he shall incur the Pain of Felony. If one doth such a Mischief on a sudden, that is Malice prepenfed; for, saith my Lord Coke, "If it be voluntarily, the Law will imply Malice." Therefore when a Man shall, without any Provocation, stab another with a Dagger, or knock out his Brains with a Bottle, this is express Malice, for he designedly and purposely did him the Mischief. This is such an Act that is malicious in the Nature of the Act itself, if found by a Jury, though it be sudden, and the Words ex malitia præcogitata are not in the Verdict, 1 Cro. 131. Halloway's Case, who was Woodward of Ostlerly-Park, in Middlesex; a Boy came there to cut [steal] Wood, whom by Chance he espied, and the Boy being upon a Tree, he immediately calls to him to descend, which the Boy obeying, Halloway tied him to an Horse's Tail with a Cord that the Boy had, then gave him two Blows, the Horse ran away and brake the Boy's Shoulder, whereof he died. This was ruled to be Murder by all the Justices and Barons, except Justice Hutton, who only doubted thereof; and that was a stronger Case than this; for there was some Kind of Provocation in the Boy, who was stealing the Wood in the Park, of which Halloway had the Care; and it cannot be reasonably thought, that he designed more than the Chastisement of the Boy, and the Horse running away in that Manner was a Surprise to Halloway; yet in regard the Boy did not resist him, his tying him to the Horse's Tail was an Act of Cruelty, the Event whereof proving so fatal; it was adjudged to be Malice prepenfed, though of a sudden, and in the Heat of Passion. This Case is reported in Jones, 168. Pal. 585. And there held, that the Court could determine it to be Malice prepenfed upon the special Matter found, Crompton 23. Two playing at Tables fall out in their Game, one upon a sudden kills the other with a Dagger: This was held to be Murder by Bromley at Chester Assizes, 27 Eliz. So in this Case, if the Bottle had killed Mr. Cope before he had returned the Bottle upon Mawgridge, that would have been Murder without all Manner of Doubt.

In the second Place, I come now to consider whether Mr. Cope's returning a Bottle upon Mawgridge before he gave him the mortal Wound with the Sword, shall have any Manner of Influence upon the Case: I hold not. First, Because Mawgridge by his throwing the Bottle had manifested a malicious Design. Secondly, His Sword was drawn immediately to supply the Mischief which the Bottle might fall short of. Thirdly, The throwing the Bottle by Captain Cope was justifiable and lawful; and though he had wounded Mawgridge, he might have justified it in an Action of Assault and Battery, and therefore cannot be any Provocation to Mawgridge to stab him with his Sword. That the throwing the Bottle is a Demonstration of Malice is not to be controverted; for if upon that violent Act he had killed Mr. Cope, it had been Murder. Now it hath been held, That if A. of his Malice prepenfed assaults B. to kill him, and B. draws his Sword and attacks A. and pursues him, then A. for his own Safety gives back, and retreats to a Wall, B. still pursuing him with his drawn Sword, A. in his Defence kills B. This is Murder in A. For A. having Malice against B. and in pursuance thereof endeavouring to kill him, is answerable for all the Consequences, of which he was the original Cause. It is not reasonable for any Man that is dangerously assaulted, and when he perceives his Life in Danger from his Adversary, but to have Liberty for the Security of his own Life, to pursue him that maliciously assaulted him; for "he that hath manifested that he hath Malice against another, is not fit to be trusted with a dangerous Weapon in his Hand *," Dalt. 292. Hale 42. And so resolved by all the Judges, 18 Car. II. when they met in Serjeants-Inn, in Preparation for my Lord Morley's Trial, Dalt. 272. If A. of Malice prepenfed, discharge a Pistol at B. and then runs away, B. pursues him, and A. turns back, and in his own Defence kills B. It is Murder. This I held to be good Law; for A. had a malicious Intent against B. and his Retreat after he had discharged his Pistol at B. was not because he repented, but for his own Safety.

In a set Duel, there are mutual Passies made between the Combatants, yet if there be original Malice between the Parties, it is not the Interchange of Blows will make an Alteration, or be any Mitigation of the Offence of Killing. Therefore I hold, if Mawgridge had thrown the Bottle at Mr. Cope, and Mr. Cope had returned another upon him, and hit him, and thereupon Mawgridge had drawn his Sword and killed Mr. Cope, it would have been Murder. Some will say, that there is a Difference between the Cases; for that the Assault by the Pistol, and the fighting a Duel was express Malice, but this is only Malice implied. Surely there is no Difference, for Malice implied is prepenfed, as much as if there had been a Proof of Malice, or Hatred for some considerable time before the Act; for the Stroke given, or an Attempt made by Malice implied, is as dangerous as a Stroke given upon Malice expressed, therefore may be as lawfully resisted. This very Point was also considered by the Twelve Judges at Serjeants-Inn, and by them resolved to be Murder upon the Occasion of my Lord Morley's Case. When a Man attacks another with a dangerous Weapon without any Provocation; that is express Malice from the Nature of the Act, which is cruel. The Definition of Malice implied is where it is not express in the Nature of the Act; as where a Man kills an Officer that had Authority to arrest his Person: The Person who kills him in Defence of himself from the Arrest, is guilty of Murder, because the Malice is implied, for properly and naturally it was not Malice, for his Design was only to defend himself from the Arrest.

3. I come now to the third Matter proposed, which is, to consider what is in Law such a Provocation to a Man to commit an Act of Violence upon another, whereby he shall deprive him of his Life, so as to extenuate the Fact, and make it to be a Manslaughter only. First, Negatively, what is not. Secondly, Positively, what is. First, No Words of Reproach or Infamy are sufficient to provoke another to such a Degree of Anger as to strike, or assault the provoking Party with a Sword, or to throw a Bottle at him, or strike him with any other Weapon that may kill him; but if the Person provoking be thereby killed, it is Murder.

In the Assembly of the Judges, 18 Car. II. this was a Point positively resolved.

Therefore I am of Opinion, That if two are in Company together, and one shall give the other contumelious Language (as suppose A. and B.). A. that was so provoked draws his Sword, and makes a Pass at B. B. (then having no Weapon drawn) but misses him. Thereupon B. draws his Sword, and passes at A. And there being an Interchange of Passes between them, A. kills B. I hold this to be Murder in A. for A.'s Pass at B. was malicious, and what B. afterwards did was lawful. But if A. who had been so provoked, draws his Sword, and then before he passes, B.'s Sword is drawn; or A. bids him draw, and B. thereupon drawing, there happen to be mutual Passes: If A. kills B. this will be but Manslaughter, because it was sudden; and A.'s Design was not so absolutely to destroy B. but to combat with him, whereby he run the Hazard of his own Life at the same Time. But if Time was appointed to fight (suppose the next Day), and accordingly they do fight, it is Murder in him that kills the other. But if they go into the Field immediately and fight, then but Manslaughter. Suppose upon provoking Language given by B. to A. A. gives B. a Box on the Ear, or a little Blow with a Stick, which happens to be so unlucky that it kills B. who might have some Impostume in his Head, or other Ailment which proves the Cause of B.'s Death, this Blow, though not justifiable by Law, but is a Wrong, yet it may be but Manslaughter, because it doth not appear that he designed such a Mischief.

2. Secondly, As no Words are a Provocation, so no affronting Gestures are sufficient, though never so reproachful; which Point was adjudged, 3 Cro. 779. Watts and Braim, in an Appeal of Murder.

There having been a Quarrel between A. and B. and B. was hurt in the Fray; and about two Days after B. came and made a wry Mouth at A. who thereupon struck him upon the Calf of the Leg, of which he instantly died. It was Murder in A. for the affronting him in that Manner was not any Provocation to B. to use that Violence to A.

There hath been another Case, which I fear hath been the Occasion of some Mistake in the Decision of Questions of this Kind, Jones 432. D. Williams's Case, he being a Welshman, upon St. David's Day having a Leek in his Hat, a certain Person pointed to a Jack of Lent that hung up hard by, and said to him, Look upon your Countryman; at which D. Williams was much enraged, and took a Hammer that lay upon a Stall hard by, and flung at him, which missed him, but hit another and killed him: He was indicted upon the Statute of Stabbing. Resolved, He was not within that Statute, but guilty of Manslaughter at Common Law. I concur with that Judgment, that it is not within the Statute of Stabbing, for it is not such a Weapon, or Act that is within that Statute, neither could he be found guilty of Murder, but only of Manslaughter, for the Indictment was for no more. But if the Indictment had been for Murder, I do think that the Welshman ought to have been convicted thereof, for the Provocation did not amount to that Degree, as to excite him designedly to destroy the Person that gave it him.

3. Thirdly, If one Man be trespassing upon another, breaking his Hedges, or the like, and the Owner, or his Servant, shall upon Sight thereof take up an Hedge-stake, and knock him on the Head; that will be Murder, because it was a violent Act, beyond the Proportion of the Provocation, which is sufficiently justified by Halloway's Case, who did not seem to intend so much the Destruction of the young Man that stole the Wood, as that he should endeavour to break his Skull or knock out his Brains, yet using that violent and dangerous Action of tying him to the Horse's Tail, rendered him guilty of Murder.

If a Man shall see another stealing his Wood, he cannot justify beating him, unless it be to hinder from stealing any more; (that is) that notwithstanding he be forbid to take any, doth proceed to take more, and will not part with that which he had taken. But if he desists, and the Owner or Woodward pursues him to beat him so as to kill him, it is Murder.

If a Man goes violently to take another Man's Goods, he may beat him off to rescue his Goods, 9 E. IV. 281. b. 19 Hen. VI. 31. But if a Man hath done a Trespass, and is not continuing in it; and he that hath received the Injury shall thereupon beat him to a Degree of Killing, it is Murder, for it is apparent Malice; for in that Case he ought not to strike him, but is a Trespasser for so doing.

4. Fourthly, If a Parent or a Master be provoked to a Degree of Passion by some Mis carriage of the Child or Servant, and the Parent or Master shall proceed to correct the Child or Servant with a moderate Weapon, and shall by Chance give him an unlucky Stroke, so as to kill him; that is but a Misadventure. But if the Parent or Master shall use an improper Instrument in the Correction; then if he kills the Child or the Servant, it is Murder: And so was it resolved by all the Judges of the King's Bench, with the Concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice Bridgman, in a special Verdict in one Gray's Case, found at the Old Bailey, 10th October 18 Car. II. and removed into this Court, Kelyng, p. 64 Gray being a Smith, B. was his Servant; he commanded B. his Servant to mend certain Stamps belonging to his Trade; afterwards he and his Servant being at

* Judge Foster, in his Reports, p. 274—5. says, in Mawgridge's Case, "He, upon Words of Anger between him and Mr. Cope, threw a Bottle with great Violence at the Head of Mr. Cope, and immediately drew his Sword, Mr. Cope returned the Bottle with equal Violence; it was, saith Lord Holt, lawful and justifiable in Mr. Cope so to do: For, as he argueth a little afterwards, He that hath shown that he hath Malice against another, is not fit to be trusted with a dangerous Weapon in his Hand."—Upon which the Judge observes, "It was upon this Principle I presume (and possibly, too, upon the Rule laid down touching the Arrest of a Person who had given a dangerous Wound), that the Legislature in that Case of the Marquis De Guiscard, who stabbed Mr. Harley sitting in Council, (9 Ann. cap. 16.) discharged the Party who was supposed to have given him the mortal Wound, from all Manner of Prosecution on that Account; and declared the Killing to be a lawful and necessary action."

Work at the Anvil, Gray asked his Servant whether he had mended the Stamps, as he had directed him. But B the Servant having neglected his Duty acknowledged it to his Master; upon which the Master was angry, and told him if he would not serve him, he should serve at Bridewell; to which the Servant replied, That he had as good serve in Bridewell as serve the said Gray; whereupon the said Gray took the Iron-Bar upon which he and his Servant was working, and struck his Servant with it upon the Skull, and thereby brake his Skull, of which the Servant died. This was held to be Murder; yet here was a Provocation on a sudden, as sudden a Resentment, and as speedy putting it in Execution; for though he might correct his Servant both for his Neglect and Unmannerliness, yet exceeding Measure therein, it is malicious. Every one must perceive that this last is a stronger Case than this at Bar.

1. First, Gray was working honestly and fairly at his Trade, and justly calling to his Servant for an Account of his Business: This Miscreant was in the actual Violation of all the Rules of Hospitality.

2. Secondly, Gray's Action was right, as to the striking his Servant by way of Correction; but the Error was in the Degree, being too violent, and with an improper Weapon. This of Mawgridge was with a Resolution to do Mischief.

3. Thirdly, He had not the least Provocation from Mr. Cope, until after he had made the first and dangerous Assault, and then pursued it with the drawing his Sword to second it, before Mr. Cope returned the other Bottle. But Gray had a Provocation by the Disappointment his Servant gave him in neglecting his Business, and returning a saucy Answer.

The like in obstinate and perverse Children, they are a great Grief to Parents, and when found in ill Actions, are a great Provocation. But if upon such Provocation the Parent shall exceed the Degree of Moderation, and thereby in chastising kill the Child, it will be Murder. As if a Cudgel in the Correction that is used be of a large Size, or if a Child be thrown down and stamped upon: So said the Lord Bridgeman and Justice Twifden, and that they ruled it so in their several Circuits.

5. If a Man upon a sudden Disappointment by another shall resort violently to that other Man's House to expostulate with him, and with his Sword shall endeavour to force his Entrance, to compel that other to perform his Promise, or otherwise to comply with his Desire; and the Owner shall set himself in Opposition to him, and he shall pass at him, and kill the Owner of the House, it is Murder, 2 Roll. Rep. 460. Clement against Sir Charles Blunt, in an Appeal of Murder. The Case was, that Clement had promised a Dog to Sir Charles Blunt; and being requested accordingly to deliver him, refused, and beat the Dog home to his House: At which Sir Charles Blunt fetched his Sword, and came to Clement's House for the Dog. Clement stood at the Door, and resisted his Entry. Blunt thereupon kills Clement. The Jury were merciful, and found this Fact in Sir Charles Blunt to be but Manslaughter. Dodderidge was clearly of Opinion it was Murder. But the Lord Chief-Justice was a little tender in his Direction to the Jury. But Rolls makes this Remark, that it was not insisted upon by the Appellant's Counsel, that Clement was in the Defence of his House, and that Blunt attacked Clement to force in: It was without all Question Murder, though of a sudden Heat, for there was no Assault made by Clement upon him nor on any of his Friends, but all the Violence and Force was on Sir Charles Blunt's Side.

Having in these Particulars shewn what is not a Provocation sufficient to alleviate the Act of Killing, so as to reduce it to be but a bare Homicide, I will now, secondly, give some particular Rules, such as are supported by Authority and general Consent, and shew what are always allowed to be sufficient Provocations.

1. First, If one Man upon angry Words shall make an Assault upon another, either by pulling him by the Nose, or fillying upon the Forehead, and he that is so assaulted shall draw his Sword, and immediately run the other through, that is but Manslaughter; for the Peace is broken by the Person killed, and with an Indignity to him that received the Assault. Besides, he that was so affronted might reasonably apprehend, that he that treated him in that Manner might have some further Design upon him.

There is a Case in Stiles, 467. Buckner's Case. Buckner was indebted, and B and C came to his Chamber upon the Account of his Creditor to demand the Money, B took a Sword that hung up, and was in the Scabbard, and stood at the Door with it in his Hand undrawn, to keep the Debtor in until they could send for a Bailiff to arrest him; thereupon the Debtor took out a Dagger which he had in his Pocket and stabbed B. This was a Special Verdict, and adjudged only Manslaughter, for the Debtor was insulted, and imprisoned injuriously without any Process of Law, and though within the Words of the Statute of Stabbing, yet not within the Reason of it.

2. Secondly, If a Man's Friend be assaulted by another, or engaged in a Quarrel that comes to Blows, and he, in the Vindication of his Friend, shall on a sudden take up a mischievous Instrument and kill his Friend's Adversary, that is but Manslaughter; so was the Case, 12 Rep. 87. If two be fighting together, and a Friend of the one takes up a Bowl on a sudden, and with it breaks the Skull of his Friend's Adversary, of which he died, that is no more than Manslaughter. So it is, if two be fighting a Duel, though upon Malice prepened; and one comes and takes Part with him, that he thinks may have the Disadvantage in the Combat, or it may be that he is most affected to, not knowing of the Malice, that is but Manslaughter, Pl. Com. 101. John Vaughan and Salisbury.

3. Thirdly, If a Man perceives another by Force to be injuriously treated, pressed, and restrained of his Liberty, though the Person abused doth not complain, or call for Aid or Assistance; and others out of Compassion shall come to his Rescue, and kill any of those that shall so restrain him, that is Manslaughter, 18 Car. II. adjudged in this Court upon a Special Verdict found at the Old-Bailey, in the Case of one Hugett, 18 Car. II. Kelyng, p. 59. A and others in the time of the Dutch War without any Warrant impressed B to serve the King at Sea; B quietly submitted and went off with the Press-Masters; Hugett and the others pursued them and required a Sight of their Warrant; but they shewed a Piece of Paper, that was not a sufficient Warrant: Thereupon Hugett with the others drew their Swords, and the Press-Masters theirs, and so there was a Combat, and those who endeavoured to rescue the pressed Man killed one of the pretended Press-Masters. This was but Manslaughter; for when the Liberty of one Subject is invaded, it affects all the rest: It is a Provocation to all People, as being of ill Example and pernicious Consequence. All the Judges of the King's-Bench, viz. Kelyng, Twifden, Wyndham and Morston were of Opinion, that it was Murder, because he meddled in a Matter in which he was not concerned: But the other Eight Judges of the other Courts conceived it only Manslaughter, to which the Judges of the King's-Bench did conform, and gave Judgment accordingly.

4. Fourthly, When a Man is taken in Adultery with another Man's Wife, if the Husband shall stab the Adulterer, or knock out his Brains, This is bare Manslaughter; for Jealousy is the Rage of a Man, and Adultery is the highest Invasion of Property, 1 Vent. 158. Raymond 213. Manning's Case.

If a Thief comes to rob another, it is lawful to kill him. And if a Man comes to rob a Man's Posterity and his Family, yet to kill him is Manslaughter; so is the Law, though it may seem hard, that the Killing in the one Case should not be as justifiable as the other, Leu. xx. Ver. 10. If one committeth Adultery with his Neighbour's Wife, even he the Adulterer and the Adulteress shall be put to Death. So that a Man cannot receive a higher Provocation. But this Case bears no Proportion with those Cases that have been adjudged to be only Manslaughter, and therefore the Court being so advised doth determine that Mawgridge is guilty of Murder. More might be said upon this Occasion; yet this may at present suffice to set the Matter now in question in its true Light, to shew how necessary it is to apply the Law to exterminate such noxious Creatures.

Upon this Conviction the Court did direct that Process should be issued against Mawgridge, and so to proceed to Outlawry if he cannot be retaken in the mean time.

The Case was, Mr. Cope (a younger Branch of the Copes of Bransel, in Hampshire, Barts.) having got a Lieutenant's Commission in the Guards, invited some Officers and other Gentlemen to dine with him at the Dolphin Tavern in Tower-Street, June 17, 1706, in order to wet his Commission; one of the Gentlemen took Mawgridge along with him, telling him he would be as welcome to Mr. Cope as any of the Company; upon that he went, and after Dinner was over, and paid for by Mr. Cope, they all staid a while longer, and had more Wine brought in, and paid Half a-Crown each for their Club; then they broke up, and most of them went away; but Mr. Mawgridge and the rest being invited by Mr. Cope to the Guard-Room in the Tower, went with him, and called for Wine. Two Bottles were accordingly brought; and as they were drinking, a Coach came to the Guard-Room Door with a Woman in it (of no very modest Behaviour); and asked for Capt. Cope; whereupon he and Mawgridge went to the Coach-Door, and brought her into the Guard-Room; where having been a-while, she cried, Who shall pay for my Coach? Upon this Mr. Mawgridge said, I will, and so discharged the Coach; then he offered to salute her, but she rejected him, and gave him ill Words; to which he made Returns of the like Kind; on which Lieut. Cope took the Woman's Part; and then Mawgridge demanded Satisfaction of Mr. Cope, in order to provoke him to fight, &c. &c. and killed Mr. Cope. Upon this Mawgridge was tried at the Old-Bailey in July 1706, for the Murder, and a Special Verdict found, wherein all the Particulars are related, as before-mentioned:—But before the arguing the Special Verdict, he made his Escape out of the Marshalsea, where he was confined; and that Night went to his Father, Major Mawgridge, who with his Wife (Mawgridge's Mother-in-Law) washed and rubbed him all over with green Walnut Shucks and Walnut Liquor to disguise him, and then all three set out in the Night, and walked above 30 Miles into Essex, where the Father gave One Hundred Guineas to a Master of a Vessel, near Colchester, to carry him safe to Holland, which he did; there he was concealed above a Year and half; for though he was a very handsome Man, he was so disfigured scarce any one knew him; he spoke French and Spanish generally and mighty well; but at last being at a Tavern at Ghent in Flanders, and a little too merry, he spoke English so fluently, and by some Expressions he dropt, became suspected, seized (a large Reward having been offered for apprehending him), and on Examination found to be the Man who killed Mr. Cope, was brought over to England in March 1707-8, and being brought to the King's-Bench Bar, received Sentence of Death, and was executed at Tyburn, on Wednesday, April 28, 1708, with William Gregg, for High-Treason (whose Case will be inserted in the Appendix). The Ordinary says, Mawgridge went in a Coach with him (and Gregg in a Sledge) to Tyburn; "That he submitted willingly to his Sentence, owning the Justice of it, tho' he declared he had no premeditated Malice against the Gentleman he so unfortunately killed. He said, he heartily repented of it, and prayed that God would wash away the Stain, and deliver him from the Guilt of that Blood which he had so shed. He owned that he had been a very great Sinner, but was sorry that he had any ways offended God and Man, and begged Pardon of both. That he hoped God would shew him Mercy in another World, because he was always grieving for his Sins, and particularly for this, ever since he had made his Escape; and tho' he had no Apprehension of being brought to Condemnation here for it, it was still continually before him, and the Remembrance of it was painful to him. He made strong Resolutions to live otherwise, and was always praying to God to pardon him, and to keep him for the future. He acknowledged the Justice of God had overtaken him, and would not suffer him to live long unpunished for this heinous Crime: He declared his being in charity with all the World, even with those who had brought him to this his Punishment, and prayed for the Conversion of all wicked Persons, desiring they would take Warning by him. He told me, he was about 40 Years of Age, born at Canterbury of good Parents, and brought up in the Church of England; that both his Father and Ancestors had had the Honour to serve the Crown for above 200 Years as Drum-Major; and that he himself had received a very good Education, and brought up genteelly, tho' he was for a considerable time Kettle-Drummer to the First Troop of Guards, and was a going with a Commission into the Army when this melancholy Accident happened."—Major Mawgridge, on his Son's Execution, which had so great an Effect on him, could not be prevailed on either to eat or drink for three Nights and three Days, and raved about like a Madman; he afterwards behaved at times like one distracted, drawing his Sword, and threatening to murder his Wife, obliging her to kneel down for him to stab her, &c. and then relenting. In short, he was never after easy or in his right Senses; moving about from place to place, though he lived to near fourscore Years of Age.

Mr. Attorney-General, Sir Philip York (afterwards Earl of Hardwick). My Lord, we desire that those that were summoned on the Jury, who happened not to be sworn, should stay, lest when Mr. Kinnnersley is arraigned there should be a Defect of Jurymen.

It was ordered accordingly by the Court.

Clerk of Arraigns. Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales stands indicted, by the Name of William Hales, late of London, Goldsmith, for that he being a Person of evil Fame and Conversation, and endeavouring Samuel Edwards, Esq. and divers others willingly to defraud, on the 1st of June, in the Parish of , had in his Custody a certain Note, bearing date May 17, 1728, by which Note it was supposed, that Mr. Robert Hales * did promise to pay unto Samuel Edwards, Esq. the full Sum of Eight hundred Pounds; and that, on the same Note, with an Intent to defraud, in the Parish aforesaid, he did fraudulently and deceitfully, on the 13th of June, forge and counterfeit a certain Indorsement, to the great Damage of the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. to the Breach of his Majesty's Peace, and the ill Example of his Majesty's Subjects in like Case offending.

Mr. Strange. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, the Prisoner at the Bar, William Hales, standeth indicted for forging, counterfeiting, and publishing an Indorsement of Samuel Edwards, Esq. on a Promissory Note. The Indictment sets forth, that the Prisoner did endeavour to deceive and defraud Samuel Edwards, Esq. and others his Majesty's Subjects, having in his Possession a certain Promissory Note, under the Hand of Robert Hales, bearing Date May 17, 1728, by which Note, this Robert Hales is supposed to promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order, a certain Sum of Eight hundred Pounds, having this Note in his Custody, did forge and counterfeit, and caused to be forged counterfeited, a certain Indorsement on the same Note, viz.

Pray pay to for Samuel Edwards.

and having in his Custody the said Note for Eight hundred Pounds, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. on which there was so forged an Indorsement in the Name of the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. did publish it to be a true Indorsement, knowing the same to be so forged and counterfeited. This is laid to be to the great Damage of the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. the Breach of his Majesty's Peace, and the ill Example of his Majesty's Subjects in like Case offending. To this the said Defendant hath pleaded, Not Guilty.

Mr. Attorney-General. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am

Counsel on the same Side, for my Lord the King. The Charge against the Defendant, William Hales, is for forging an Indorsement on a Promissory Note to Samuel Edwards, Esq. for the Sum of Eight hundred Pounds. The Note was made in the Name of Robert Hales, for Eight hundred Pounds, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order. And, Gentlemen, it will appear, that the Prisoner hath been guilty both of forging this Indorsement, and of publishing of it, knowing it to be so forged. Gentlemen, this Samuel Edwards, Esq. hath a considerable Employment in the Exchequer, and is besides a Member of the House of Commons, and by that hath the Privilege of sending his Post-Letters free. It was his Misfortune to live in the Neighbourhood of Mr. Hales, in Duke-street, in Westminster. The Opportunity for committing of this Fraud seems to have been in this manner: Mr. Hales used frequently to apply to Mr. Edwards, sometimes by himself, sometimes by a Servant, for Frank-Covers of Letters to send News into the Country. The Gentleman's Good-nature induced him to accommodate him according to his Desire with them, supposing that they were only designed to send News to his Friends in the Country. He having possessed himself of several Papers thus subscribed, it will appear, that most probably he made use of one of these Franks to commit this Forgery. The Forgery is an Indorsement on a Note of Robert Hales. The Note is this:

May 17, 1728.

I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order, Eight hundred Pounds, three Months after Date, Value Received.

ROBERT HALES.

The Indorsement is thus:

Pray pay the Value of this to , for Value received. SAMUEL EDWARDS.

This Indorsement being thus wrote over the Name Samuel Edwards, Gentlemen, it appears by the Face of this Indorsement, that it is cut off from another Writing. There is the Tail of a Letter, which manifestly appears. The Word the is wrote with an Abbreviation y. That will appear to be a Word altered from something else. It is difficult to tell whether to read it for y, or, which looks like the Truth of the Case, for ye. It will appear to be very probable, that the Manner of forging was this: Having possessed himself of these Franks, he cut off a Piece of one of these Franks proper for a Promissory Note to be wrote on it, which would have on the Back of it the Name of Samuel Edwards. When he had done this, he did not think proper to write the Note himself, but got another Gentleman to write a Promissory Note on the Back of this Paper, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order. When this was done, the Name Samuel Edwards served for an Indorsement on the Note. And the Alteration seems to have been made in the following manner: There being the Word Free wrote over the Name, there is the Letter e crowded in between the f and the r. As to the ee's after the r, the Use made of them is this: Out of the one of them is drawn the stroke for the Letter y, the latter e stands on one Side, or rather above the y, and makes y. Having done this, it appears, that here is a Promissory Note, in the Name of Robert Hales, to Samuel Edwards, Esq. and here is an Indorsement of Mr. Samuel Edwards, which, by Virtue of an Act of Parliament, which makes these Notes current, and the Indorser liable, Mr. Edwards is made liable to the Payment of this Note. The Use made of this Note is this, to raise Money upon it, and stake the Credit of Mr. Edwards as a Security for this Money. Gentlemen, having done this, he applies to Mr. Harle, to borrow of him a certain Sum of Four hundred and fifty Pounds. He knew very well, that his Credit would not serve for that Purpose, he being a known Bankrupt; but desired that Mr. Harle would lend him Four hundred and fifty Pounds, upon the Credit of this Note. Mr. Harle knew that Mr. Edwards was a Gentleman of great Credit: It was a Promissory Note of Eight hundred Pounds, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. and indorsed by Samuel Edwards: Mr. Harle made therefore no doubt of advancing the Money desired upon it. The Manner of advancing this Money was by Mr. Harle's making a Draught upon his Goldsmiths, Mess. Caswall and Mount, where Mr. Hales received this Money. Gentlemen, there will be Evidence to charge this upon Mr. Hales. Gentlemen, the Occasion of discovering this Forgery was this, Mr. Hales having been taken up in September last, on another Discovery of forging a Note of Mr. Gibson's, for which he was convicted last Sessions †, that caused a pretty deal of Noise.

And,

William Hales was indicted for a Misdemeanour, in forging and counterfeiting a certain Writing, or Note of Hand, in these Words:

August 27, 1728.
I promise to pay to George Watfon, Esq. or Ord.r, the Sum of Six thousand four hundred Pounds, upon Demand, the like Value received, For myself and Partners, THOMAS GIBSON.

* This Robert Hales, Esq. Jan. 27, 1728-9, was tried at the King's-Bench Bar, Westminster, by a Special Jury of the County of Middlesex, of which Sir George Walters, Knt. was Foreman, on an Indictment for a Misdemeanour, for that the said Robert Hales, Esq. would have defrauded Samuel Edwards, Esq. of Eight hundred Pounds, by means of a Note, drawn by the said Robert Hales, Esq. for Eight hundred Pounds, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order. The Paper, on which the said Note was drawn, having the Name of the said Samuel Edwards on the Back thereof, only as a Frank of a Letter to be sent by the Post; he, the said Robert Hales, having no Dealings with the said Samuel Edwards. The Trial lasted seven Hours, when the Jury brought him in Guilty. But in June following, he pleaded his Majesty's most gracious Pardon in the Court of King's-Bench, for the said Offence.

Mich. Term, Geo. II.

Dominus Rex vers. Robertum Hales.

" Mr. Attorney moved for a Trial at Bar on an Information filed by him for Forgery. But it not being carried on at the Expence of the Crown, but of a private Prosecutor, the Court held, that he must make out the usual Requisites to bring it to the Bar: So the Motion was denied. And, at another Day, Mr. Attorney moved, on an Authority from the King, to prosecute, and it was granted as of Right to the King in his own Cause. And in Hil. sequen. it was tried, and the Defendant convicted. And in Trin. sequen. being called to Judgment, he produced a Pardon, which was allowed; and being only for a Misdemeanour, he was not put to go to the Bar, or plead it upon his Knees." Strange, Vol. II. p. 816.

And

And, Gentlemen, such as had Notes of Mr. Hales for their Security were alarmed; Mr. Harle heard of this among others, and the Thing thus coming to be inquired into, it appeared plain Mr. Edwards had no dealing with them, but it was a Forgery and an Imposition both upon Mr. Edwards and Mr. Harle. We will call the Witnesses, and then we apprehend, that the Thing will speak for itself, and will appear a plain Forgery.

Mr. Serjeant Whitaker. My Lord, there are a pretty many Indictments, and Mr. Attorney hath opened the Cause: Therefore we shall immediately call the Witnesses.

Thomas Maddocks called and sworn.

Lord-Chief-Baron. And where doth Mr. Hales live?

Th. Mad. Within a few Doors, almost over-against Mr. Edwards.

Lord-Chief-Baron. How long since was it?

Th. Mad. I believe that it might be three or four Years ago.

Mr. Attorney General. There were (I apprehend you say) several that were franked?—Th. Mad. Yes, Sir, there were frequently.

Th. Mad. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Lacy. They asked you, whether there were any Dealings between your Master and Mr. Hales, besides this of Letters. I would enquire of you, whether your Master acquaints you with his Dealings with any other Persons?—Th. Mad. No, Sir.

Anne Clarke called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Had you a Note of Directions for Letters to be franked by Mr. Edwards?—Anne Clarke. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Who brought it?—Anne Clarke. Mr. Hales's Servant.

Mr. Serj. Whit. What was his Name?

Anne Clarke. Robert, I think they called him.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know whose Writing it was?

Anne Clarke. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. We shall, my Lord, call another Witness to prove that it was Mr. Hales's.

Mr. Serj. Whit. When was it?—Anne Clarke. I cannot say.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Was it Summer or Winter?—Anne Clarke. Summer.

Mr. Serj. Whit. In what Month was it?

Anne Clarke. I believe that it was in July last.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did you deliver them to Mr. Edwards?

Anne Clarke. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. What did you say to him, or he to you?

Anne Clarke. I told him, that Mr. Hales's Servant had left that Paper of Directions for the Franks that he had desired; and said that his Master understood that he would not frank them without a Superscription, and therewith an Intent to defraud Thomas Gibson, Esq. and other his Majesty's Subjects; and for publishing the said false and counterfeit Note, as a true Note, he knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, Nov. 7.

The Counsel for the King having opened the Indictment, and the Evidence against the Prisoner, proceeded to call and examine the Witnesses.

Philip Booth, Servant to Mr. Gibson. I have known the Prisoner for some Time. He came to me about a Year and a half ago, and desired me to get my Master (who is a Member of Parliament) to frank two Letters for him; for he said, that the Gentleman, who used to frank his Letters, was gone out of Town. He then gave me two large Sheets of Paper, folded up in a large Size, for Letters, and desired that they might be directed, To Robert Booth, Esq. at Bristol. These were accordingly done by Mr. Gibson; and under the Directions he wrote,

Free,
THO. GIBSON.

Counsel. Are you acquainted with Mr. Gibson's Hand?

Ph. Booth. Yes, very well.

Counsel. Look on that Note.

Ph. Booth. This is a Note for 6400l. signed Tho. Gibson.

Counsel. Do you take it to be all of Mr. Gibson's Writing?

Ph. Booth. I take the Name to be his Writing, but I believe the Body of the Note was writ by another Person; and, that it is Part of one of the Letters that Mr. Gibson franked for the Prisoner, the Note being written in the Space between the Direction, which is cut off, and Mr. Gibson's Name.

Counsel. Why do you think so?

Ph. Booth. For several Reasons.—I am well satisfied, that this Word For, was originally Free; and that the two e's have been taken out; and it is plain, that the o is crowded in between the F and the r; and that the Words, myself and Partners, are added a little below; for over the m, there appears the Bottoms of the two e's; and the o, and these following Words, are writ with Ink of a different Colour from the F, the r, and Mr. Gibson's Name. Indeed the Words, Myself and Partners, are a faint Imagination of Mr. Gibson's Hand: But I am so well acquainted with his Writing, that I could easily distinguish the true from the counterfeit, though I had nothing to judge by but the Form of the Letters. But what is more, this Note is not drawn after Mr. Gibson's Manner: I never knew him write, For myself and Partners, but always, For Self and Co. Nor did I ever remember to have seen a Note of his with such Words in it, as the like Value received. Besides, the Note appears to have been folded like Part of a Letter, and I can never believe, that Mr. Gibson would draw a Note of such Consequence upon such a Scrap of Paper.

Robert Booth of Bristol, Esq. I never received any Letter, either franked or otherwise, from the Prisoner; and there is no Person in Bristol, but myself, who goes by the Name and Title of Robert Booth, Esq.

Thomas Ramsey. I have been acquainted with the Prisoner above a Year, but more intimately from last June, to the 7th of last September, on which Day I was at his House, in Duke-Street, Westminster. I had then got on a light Coat, a red Waistcoat and Breeches, and a broad open Silver-laced Hat. He bid me change my Dress, and put on a Suit of plain Cloaths that I had by me. I did so, but not having a plain Hat, he bid me put on one of his. When I had thus dressed myself, I went with him into the City; but, by the Way, to make me look the more like a Man of Business, he furnished me with a Letter-Cafe, and, in Middle-Row in Holborn, he bought me a dark Wig, and made me put my light one in my Pocket. When all this was done, we went to John's Coffee-House, in Sheer-Lane, where we had not been long before a Porter came in. The Prisoner asked him, if he did not want Mr. Ramsey? meaning me. The Porter said, Yes, and delivered a Letter to the Prisoner, who immediately gave it to me, and bade me open it, which I did, and found a Note in it for 6400l. signed, Thomas Gibson.

Coun. Is that the Note?

Ramsey. Yes, I know it very well.

Coun. What followed?

Ramsey. In the Body of the Letter there was writ, To the Lady Harriot Elliot, 4300l. and, To Sir John Hind Cotton, 2100l. And, under this last, the Prisoner bade me write, To James Moreton, Esq. or Bearer, 70l. which I did, and the Prisoner gave me three Bank Notes, one for 40l. and two of 25l. each. These Bank Notes, the Letter and the counterfeit Note for 6400l. the Prisoner put into my Letter-Cafe, and bade me go to Mr. Snow, the Banker's, and desire them to change those Notes for Notes of their own, for such Sums, and payable to such Persons as were mentioned in the Letter. The Prisoner shewed me the Shop, and stood within Sight of it. I went in, and first produced Bank Notes, and desired Mr. Pollock to change them according to my Directions. He did it very readily. Then I pulled out the 6400l. and prayed him to change that too, but he refused; for he said it was not all of Mr. Gibson's Hand-Writing, and therefore he would not meddle with it.

I returned to the Prisoner, and told him what had been done: And then he went again to John's Coffee-House in Sheer-Lane, where he ordered me to write on a Piece of Paper, To Sir Richard Grosvenor, 4300l. and To Sir John Hind Cotton, 2100l. And, when I had done so, he went out with me again, and shewed me Mr. Hoare's Shop, and bid me, if I could, to change that Note of 6400l. for Hoare and Company's Notes, payable to Sir Richard Grosvenor, and Sir John Hind Cotton, for the Sums I had set down. He likewise gave me another Note of about 70l. to change there, and ordered me, if any Body should ask my Name, to say, that my Name was Fowler. So I went into Mr. Hoare's Shop, and got all the Notes changed, and then, going to the Prisoner, who waited for me at a Fruit-Stall hard by; we took Coach, and drove to the Royal-Exchange, and thence we went to Janeway's Coffee-House, where the Prisoner bade me write, 3100l. and 1200l. payable to Samuel Palmer, therefore he had sent that Paper of Directions. He said then that he did not care to frank them, because Mr. Hales had both a Brother and a Nephew that were Members of Parliament, and therefore had no need to apply to him for Franks.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, we shall now prove the Paper of Directions to be Mr. Hales's Hand-Writing.

Mr. Booth called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Sir, Are you acquainted with Mr. William Hales's Hand-Writing?—Mr. Booth. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Whose Writing do you take that Paper of Directions to be?—Mr. Booth. I verily believe it to be Mr. William Hales's.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, there is something very worthy of Observation as to these directions and Covers. The Covers are very large. The Directions are extremely short, e. g. for John Pratt, Esq. Bristol. The whole Direction is but one Line, which would consequently leave a great deal of Room. Another is to Mr. Levett of Huntingdon. And there are two to each of these. The other two to Steven Mitford, Esq. at Exeter. The Man gave an Account of six Covers sent to be franked; there are two to each of these, which very well agree.

Mr. Serj. Whit. You say, Sir, that this is the Hand-Writing of Mr. William Hales?—Mr. Booth. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. I would ask, whether it is common for a Person that hath a promissory Note to write his Name thereon?

Mr. Booth. I know not, Sir, that it is common.

Note of Directions read.

Two to John Pratt, Esq. Bristol.

Two to Mr. Levett, Huntingdon.

Two to Stephen Mitford, Esq. Exeter.

Mr. Harle, called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Let the Gentlemen of the Jury see the Directions and Covers.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Gentlemen, you will observe the Size of the Covers, and the Shortness of the Directions just fitted for the Purpose.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Mr. Harle, please, Sir, to take that Note in your Hand, and give us an Account who you received it from?

Mr. Harle. From Mr. Hales.

Mr. Serj. Whit. When was it?

Mr. Harle. To the best of my Remembrance it was June 13th last.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Will you give us an Account on what Account it was, and what Mr. Hales said to you when he brought that Note?

Mr. Harle. Mr. Hales on the 13th of June last came to me, and brought me that Note from a Gentleman.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Where was you?

Mr. Harle. To the best of my Remembrance, at Baker's Coffee-house in Exchange Alley. He desired to borrow of me four hundred and fifty Pounds upon the Credit of that Note: I accordingly made him a Draught on Mess. Caswall and Mount, with whom I left my Cash for that Sum; for a Security for which he left that Note, and he promised that he would pay it in a few Days.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did he take any particular Notice of the Indorsement?

Mr. Harle. Not much, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Was it then indorsed?

Mr. Harle. Yes, Sir, I am sure it was; for I was desired to lend the Money on a Note so indorsed.

Mr. Serj. Whit. The Note then, upon this Occasion, was left in your Hands after that it was so indorsed, Was it not?—Mr. Harle. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Upon what Occasion did it happen to be suspected or discovered? Did you pay it yourself, or your Goldsmith?

Mr. Harle. Mess. Caswall and Mount, on whom I made a Draught.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Have you that Draught?—Mr. Harle. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. It hath been delivered up, hath it?

Mr. Harle. Yes, Sir, and cancelled.

Mr. Serj. Whit. On what Occasion?—Mr. Harle. When I settle my Accounts with my Goldsmiths, I take up my Notes.

Mr. Strange. You was going to give us an Account how you came to suspect this Note?

Mr. Harle. I think it was on Sept. 9, 1728, I was in Exchange Alley all the Morning, my Business calling me thither. At Two I went home Palmer, Esq. or Bearer, and then sent me to Mr. Woodward's, there to change Hoare and Company's Note for 4300 l. payable to Sir Richard Grosvenor, for Woodward's Notes for 3100 l. and 1200 l. to Samuel Palmer, Esq. at the same time the Prisoner ordered me, if any Body enquired who I was, to say, that my Name was Thomas Fowler; and, if they asked any Questions about Samuel Palmer, Esq. I might say, that he lived in Mansell-Street, in Goodman's Fields. I accordingly went to Mr. Woodward's; but his Door being shut, I stepped back to the Prisoner, who thereupon sent me to Mr. Bracy's, and there I got Mr. Bracy's Notes to Samuel Palmer, Esq. in lieu of Hoare's Note to Sir Richard Grosvenor.

This was on Saturday Night, and, it being now too late to do any more such Business, we went Home to the Prisoner's House, where I lodged. He bade me be ready in the same Dress on Monday Morning, which I accordingly was. We went again to Janeway's Coffee-House, from whence the Prisoner sent me to Alderman Hankey's, where I changed the Notes again. From Mr. Hankey's I went to Mr. Halfey, and turned these Notes into South-Sea and India Bonds, and the Bonds were afterwards converted into Bank Notes. The Prisoner employed another Agent to get off some of these Bank Notes, and he had better Luck than I met with: For, unknown to me, Mr. Gibson's Cashier had discovered the Forgery, and traced out the Places where we had been; so that I, going to the Bank with two Notes, each for 200 l. I was stopped. The Prisoner then waiting for me in the Old-Jury, he was presently taken into Custody.

Mr. Maddox. I had Instructions to stop any Person who brought Notes of such a Number to the Bank; and Romfey coming soon after with such Notes, I stopped him. He sent a Letter, directed to Mr. Hales, at Robin's Coffee-House; we went thither, and found the Prisoner, and brought him to the Bank. He confessed there, and likewise before Mr. Alderman Bellamy, that the Note for 6400 l. came from him, but he said he had it of one Samuel Palmer. The Money and Notes that were found upon the Prisoner and Romfey, made up the whole Sum of 6400 l.

as usual. It seems there was a Message left with my Servant by Mr. William Hales, that he had paid to my Goldsmith four hundred and fifty Pounds, Part of the Money which he owed me; for he owed me other Money on Security. He went to them and paid them this Money for which he took a Memorandum that he had paid them so much Money upon Account. Going then to Bethnal Green, when I came home Mr. Caswall told me what had happened. There is (said he) a sad Thing hath happened; Mr. William Hales, with whom you have Transactions, is taken up for Forgery. He hath paid to us To-day four hundred and fifty Pounds upon your Account, which is attached in our Hands. It seems there was found in his Pocket-book a Memorandum which gave an Account of his paying that Sum to them.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Was this the first Occasion of your Suspicion?

Mr. Harle. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What did you do upon that?

Mr. Harle. I had asked a Gentleman, now in Court, some Days before, knowing him well acquainted with Mr. Edwards, and the Affairs of the Exchequer, whether he knew Mr. Edwards's Hand-writing, and whether he knew that to be Mr. Edwards's Hand-writing? He said, he believed that it was. I indeed myself believed that it was. After that Mr. Hales was taken up (I think that it was the Wednesday or Thursday after), I went up to the Exchequer to that Gentleman to get him to go with me to Mr. Edwards. He went up, but Mr. Edwards was not there. We then went into the Hall, where we met with Mr. Edwards, who seemed to be very much surprized. As to the Note (said he) I know nothing of it. As to the Hand-writing, he could not positively say whether it was his own or not; if (said he) it is mine Hand, it is made an ill Use of. We went immediately to the Coffee-house to inquire after Mr. Robert Hales, thence to the Cock-pit, and thence to his House; but met not with him. I then left Mr. Wright and Mr. Edwards. I told them that my Business required me to go into the City. They resolved to meet Mr. Robert Hales, and inquire of him whether it was his Note or not.

Lord Chief Baron. Read the Note distinctly.

Note Read.

Indorsement.] Pray pay to the Order of for the Value received.

Samuel Edwards.

Draught read. 51.] Mess. Caswall and Mount.

June 13, 1728. Pay to Mr. William Hales or Bearer, on Demand, four hundred and fifty Pounds.

Robert Harle.

Lord Chief Baron. Sir, you say that you are acquainted with the Hand-writing of Mr. Edwards, Do you not?—Mr. Harle. No Sir.

Mr. Attorney General. My Lord, we beg that the Gentlemen of the Jury will look upon the Indorsement. But before it be put into their Hands, I would make an Observation thereon. It appeareth by the End of the Paper that it is cut off from something else. It is not straight as it would be naturally, but seems cut off obliquely: And there is the Tail probably of a Letter of the Direction of the Cover whence we presume it cut off. Then the Words, 'Pray pay to the Order of,' at a Distance from the other Words, 'for the Value received.' There is this Material also, that the Words 'for the Value received' are not usual Words in an Indorsement; when the Words 'Value received' are mentioned, still more unusual to put in the Word the. But the Word free being there, there must be some Way contrived to use those Letters: An o is therefore crouded in between the f and the r: And then the y seems to be a much blacker Ink than the rest: And then as to the two es's, the one of them the y is drawn from, and the other of them stands for the other Part of the Contraction.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Look on it, Gentlemen, and you will find it as mentioned.

Mr. Att. Gen. Observe, Gentlemen, over it there is a Stroke or Hook.

Mr. John Spicer called and sworn.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Spicer, What Employment are you in under Mr. Edwards?—Mr. Spicer. A Clerk, Sir, in the Exchequer.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long in that Capacity?

Mr. Spicer. About ten Years in that Capacity: But in all I have served him for four-and-twenty Years.

Mr. Pollock, Mr. Richard Hoare, Mr. Turner, Mr. Hankey, Mr. Cole, Servant to Mr. Halfey, and Mr. George Lee, confirmed the Particulars of Romfey's changing the Notes.

Robert Hall. I am the Prisoner's Taylor, and by his Directions I took Notes and Money for him at Mr. Bracy's on Monday Morning, and from thence I went to the Bank, and received Money for the Bank Notes I had taken at Mr. Bracy's.—The Prisoner ordered me, if any Body should ask my Name, to say it was John Roberts, and that I lived in the Hay-Market, —or in any other Place that I could remember.

Counsel for the Prisoner. We will not pretend to prove, that the Note in dispute is not counterfeit; but we shall endeavour to shew, that he received that Note of Samuel Palmer, Esq. with whom he had very considerable Dealings. And, as Mr. Hales has been a Bankrupt for these twenty Years past, and has not been able to obtain his Certificate, he has been obliged to transact his Affairs under other People's Names, or perhaps to make use of fictitious Names, in order to secure his Effects.—Here, Mr. Granper, do you know one Samuel Palmer?

Mr. Granper. I did know such a Man: He was employed by the East-India Company. They sent him abroad, and I remember he came back again, but I don't know where he is now.

Counsel. Had not Mr. Hales considerable Dealings with him?

Granper. Dealings? I never knew they had any Dealings with one another.

The Jury found the Prisoner guilty.

He was a second Time indicted for a Misdemeanor, in fraudulently, and by false Tokens, procuring the Notes of Benjamin Hoare and Henry Hoare, to the great Damage of the said Benjamin and Henry.

The Evidence was to the same Effect, as in the last Trial, and the Jury found him guilty.

But Judgment against him was respited till the next Sessions, there being other Indictments against him.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you known in all that Time any Money-dealings between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Robert, or Mr. William Hales?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. If there had been any, do you think that you should have known it?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir, I believe that I should; for, as to Affairs of that Nature, I believe that I know as much as any except himself.

Mr. Att. Gen. Look upon that Note. Do you take any Part of that Note to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. Spicer. The Name is his; and the f I believe is his. As to the other Letters they are so altered that I cannot say. Value received is not his.

Mr. Att. Gen. Are you acquainted with his Writing?

Mr. Spicer. Very well, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you seen his frank Letters?—Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is his Method of franking?

Mr. Spicer. Free Samuel Edwards.

Mr. Att. Gen. Doth he write the Word free?—Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Sort of f doth he make?

Mr. Spicer. A Sort of double f just such as is here.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you take the Letter c to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. Spicer. It is an altered Letter. It was something else turned into an c.

Mr. Att. Gen. The r what is that, doth it not seem to have been another Letter?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, it seems altered from another Letter; but bunglingly done.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. We will, my Lord, call one of Mr. Caswall's Apprentices to prove that this Draught hath been complied with.

(Mr. George Branthwait called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Do you look upon that Draught. Do you remember whether it was ever brought to you, and by whom?

Mr. Branthwait. I believe it was brought by Mr. Hales.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. To you?

Mr. Branthwait. Yes, Sir, and it was marked by me.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What had he for it?

Mr. Branthwait. He had of me two Notes. One was for 250*l.* the other for 220*l.* which was 470*l.* and he brought besides this Draught two Notes of Wanley's for 20*l.* which made the Balance.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Whom were they payable to?

Mr. Branthwait. One to one Calthrops, and the other to himself.

Lord Chief Baron. You say there were two Notes you gave him. Whom was the 250*l.* Note payable to?

Mr. Branthwait. To Mr. William Hales.

Lord Chief Baron. And who was the 220*l.* Note made payable to?

Mr. Branthwait. To one Charlton Thrup. He gave me this Draught of Mr. Harle's for 250*l.* and Notes of twenty Pounds.

Lord Chief Baron. Whom did you say the 220*l.* Note was made payable to?—Mr. Branthwait. To one Charlton Thrup.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we have done with our Evidence.

Lord Chief Baron. Well, What do you say to this?

Mr. Serj. Darnell. I have nothing material in mine Instructions; therefore, I shall not trouble your Lordship.

Mr. Loay. I take leave to observe, that it doth appear that no Prejudice is done by this Note. The 450*l.* borrowed on it hath been repaid.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Hales owed Mr. Harle Money upon other Accounts, and he had it upon Account: And besides, it is attached in the Goldsmith's Hands, and it was on the very same Day that he was taken.

Lord Chief Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury, This is an Indictment against William Hales, Goldsmith, for a very great Misdemeanour. It is for forging an Indorsement on a promissory Note for eight hundred Pounds; for the charging of the Person indorsing with the Payment of this Sum; and the publishing of this Indorsement as a true one, knowing it to be so forged. It is a very great Offence, a Misdemeanour of the highest Nature; not only as it affects particular Persons, and charges the Person whose Name is made use of with the Payment, but as it is destructive to all Commerce: You are therefore to consider what Account the Defendant can give of it. The Indictment sets forth that the Defendant had in his Custody a certain Note or a Writing, purporting to be a promissory Note, with the Name of Robert Hales; by which Note it was supposed, that Robert Hales promised to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or his Order, the Sum of eight hundred Pounds, within three Months after Date. And upon this, the Charge by the Indictment is, that the Defendant, with an Intention to charge Mr. Edwards with the Payment of the Money contained in this indorsed Note, and to defraud and deceive him and others, on the 13th Day of June did falsely and deceitfully forge and counterfeit a certain Indorsement on this Note in these English Words following:

'Pray pay to the Order of _____ for the Value received,' over the Name of Samuel Edwards, as if subscribed to that Indorsement; and, that knowing the same to be a forged and counterfeit Indorsement, he published the same in order to deceive several Persons, the King's Subjects, as a real Indorsement, as well as to defraud the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. Now in order to prove this, the Counsel gave some Account of the Circumstances of the Defendant, the Character of Mr. Edwards, the Acquaintance between them as Neighbours. And to shew you the Circumstances of the Fact, they have called several Witnesses: First, they called a Servant of Mr. Edwards's, who mentioned that he had lived some considerable Time in Mr. Edwards's Service; during which Time the Defendant, Mr. Hales, hath frequently, for several Years, sent to Mr. Edwards to have Franks delivered him in the Name of Mr. Edwards, who hath for some Years been a Member of Parliament, in order to send these free of the Postage. It appears that this hath been done for several Years; and the usual Way was, when Mr. Edwards had received the Direction of the Name of the Person, he himself wrote the whole Supercription, and then subscribed to frank it Free Samuel Edwards. He tells you, that in the Beginning of July last, several Covers were brought to him for Franks, made up as you may perceive pretty large. The Covers were brought over to Mr. Edwards's House by a Servant of Mr. Hales's. The Message was, that Mr. Hales desired some Franks upon these Covers, particularly desiring them to be franked without any Supercription. He saith, that these were left in this Manner, and were all delivered to a Servant of Mr. Edwards with this Desire, that he would only write thereupon Samuel Edwards free; that the rest might be left to be filled up by Mr. Hales as he thought fit. He tells you, that when his Master came home, his Master having, as he observes, always wrote himself the whole Supercription, his Master refused to do this; and therefore these Covers remained without franking: Mr. Edwards would not accommodate the Defendant, Mr. Hales, in that manner with his Hand, and leave the rest blank for another Person to fill up as he thought fit. This was very prudently done; Mr. Edwards, who is a Gentleman in Business, might well apprehend that an Opportunity might be hereby given to serve Purposes that it might not be in his Power to controul. This, Gentlemen, is made use of as Proof of an Attempt by the Defendant, to get such Sort of Franks into his Power to make use of to such a Purpose as this. The next Witness that they called is Anne Clarke, who saith that she is likewise a Servant to Mr. Edwards, and she produceth a Note written by Mr. Hales; and saith, that this was brought to the House of Mr. Edwards, with a Desire to have some Franks directed to each of those Persons, two to each of these three several Persons: She saith, that it was some Time last Summer, she thinks about July. She saith, that when her Master, Mr. Edwards, came home, she shewed it to him; and Mr. Edwards declined giving or accommodating Mr. Hales with Franks to these Persons. The Reason that he gave was this: Mr. Hales (said he) hath both a Brother and a Nephew that are Members of the House of Commons; and therefore he need not send to me for Franks, when he may have them from his own Relations; he therefore declined it at that Time. These were the Directions: Two to Mr. Levett of Huntingdon, two to John Pratt, Esq. at Bristol, two to Stephen Miford, Esq. at Bristol. Gentlemen, to corroborate this Evidence that this Note came from the Defendant, Mr. Hales, Mr. Booth is called. He is asked, Whether he is well acquainted with the Hand-writing of the Defendant Mr. Hales? He saith that he is, and that he verily believes that this Note is his Hand-writing. It hath been observed by Mr. Attorney, that there seems to have been some Design, the Form wherein it is wrote being very proper to give an Opportunity for an Alteration; that each of these Directions is very short, and would take up at most but one Line on the Supercription or Outside of the Cover; that there would have been a considerable Space left, so that when Free, Samuel Edwards, was wrote, there would have been a sufficient Space of Paper to write a Note or any thing over it. This is the Observation that hath been made upon this Note of Directions. After this they produce Mr. Robert Harle, who is Secretary to the Million Bank, to witness to the particular Fact. He saith, that this Note was on the 13th of June last brought and delivered to him by the Defendant Mr. William Hales. He saith, that he was then at Baker's Coffee-house in Exchange Alley; that the Defendant, Mr. Hales, came to him, and produced this very Note of eight hundred Pounds payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. within three Months, subscribed Robert Hales, and indorsed in the Name of Samuel Edwards, and desired him to advance him four hundred and fifty Pounds upon the Credit of that Note; that seeing a promissory Note made payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. and indorsed by the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. this appeared to him sufficient Security to lend four hundred and fifty Pounds upon; that he did thereupon comply with the Request of the Defendant, Mr. William Hales, to advance him that Sum; that he drew a Draught for it on Caswall and Mount, who were his Goldsmiths for this Sum, which Draught he took up afterwards, and allowed in his settling of his Accounts with his Goldsmiths; that at that Time when the Defendant brought this Note to him, this very Note was delivered to him, with this very Indorsement that is now upon it,

VOL. IX.

Pray pay to the Order of

for Value received
Samuel Edwards.

He saith, that he is sure that it was thus indorsed when it was left with him, he being desired to lend the Money on a Note so indorsed; that it hath been in his Custody ever since, so that he is sure there hath been no Alteration made thereon since that it was delivered unto him. You may remember that he was particularly asked, Are you sure that it was indorsed when it was delivered you? He saith that he is sure; and indeed the Thing bespeaks itself. 'When a Note is made payable to a particular Person, if any other Person brings it, every one expects that there should be an Indorsement to intitle any Person that is not the very Person to whom it was made payable. I am therefore sure (saith he) that it was so indorsed: And as Mr. Edwards was a Person of very great Dealings and considerable Substance, and so likely to have such a Note made payable to him, I therefore gave Credit to this Note as a sufficient Security to reimburse me the four hundred and fifty Pounds which I advanced thereupon.' This Fact he tells you was thus transacted at that Time; and he is sure that he received it from the Defendant thus indorsed, and that the Defendant hath had the Benefit of the Draught which he gave him on the Credit thereof. Mr. Harle hath allowed this in settling his Accounts with his Goldsmith. Upon this the Note hath been read to shew you the Purport thereof, and the Indorsement thereon. The Note is this,

May 13, 1728.

I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order, the Sum of Eight Hundred Pounds, within three Months after Date, for Value received.

Robert Hales.

Then upon the Back of the Note there is this Indorsement,

Pray pay to the Order of _____ received,

for Value received
Samuel Edwards.

Mr. Harle goeth on in the Account which he gives you, and saith that this Note was left in his Hands in June; and that on Sept. 9 after, he was in Exchange-Alley all the Morning till about two; that there was a Message left for him at Baker's Coffee-house, but he received it not there; that he went Home,

L

Home, and heard that there was a Message left for him by the Defendant, Mr. Hales, at Baker's Coffee-house; that he went out in the Afternoon, and had not a particular Account of the Message till he came Home. The Message was from Mr. Hales, that he had that Morning paid to his Goldsmiths Casual and Mount Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds on his Account: Mr. Harle tells you that there was more Money due to him on Security. So much Money was then paid in Discharge of so much, Part of Money advanced by him to Mr. Hales, and it was the exact Sum which had been advanced on the 13th of June on the Credit of this Note. He tells you, that in the Evening Mr. Casual came to him, and told him there was a melancholy Account, that a sad Accident had happened: For Mr. William Hales, the Person that had paid them this Money on his Account, was taken up for Forgery, and this Money was attached in their Hands for to prevent his issuing it out. Mr. Harle tells you, that this was the first Discovery that he had of the particular Fact, that gave him Occasion to make the more particular Inquiry: He had indeed two or three Days before spoke to a Gentleman of the Exchequer, one Mr. Wright, had shewed him the Indorsement; and having some Suspicion, asked him whether he was acquainted with Mr. Edwards's Hand, and whether he thought that that was his Hand-writing? Mr. Wright thought it was a little odd, was something diffident, but believed that it was Mr. Edwards's Hand, as Mr. Harle himself also thought that it was. He saith, that after that the Defendant was apprehended, he went to Mr. Wright to desire him to go with him, that they might have from Mr. Edwards more particular Satisfaction. They went and met with Mr. Edwards, in Westminster-Hall, shewed him the Note, asked him whether he knew of it, and whether it was his Indorsement? Mr. Edwards was very much startled, and said, that he never gave any such Note, and knew nothing of it. Mr. Harle asked him whether the Name was his Hand-writing? He said that if it was, an ill Use was made of it. Mr. Edwards took a Copy of it, and kept it by him. The Note hath been read to you, and appears to be a promissory Note in the Name of Mr. Robert Hales, for Eight Hundred Pounds, payable in three Months, to Samuel Edwards, Esq. The Indorsement is Pray pay to the Order of for the Value received,

Samuel Edwards.

Gentlemen, upon the producing and reading of this Note, Mr. Attorney hath made several Observations on the Manner of writing it. You have had the Inspection of it, and something very particular appears to every one's View. It is by the Counsel for the Prosecutor supposed, that this Note must be formed from Part of a Frank Cover signed free Samuel Edwards, free being turned into for ye Value received; that there is the Remainder of another Letter. And you may observe whether there is a Selvedge, or any Thing of that Nature, that sheweth it to have been the Outside of a Sheet of Paper. All the Edges indeed seem to be smooth and clean as a Paper that is cut. The Indorsement begins, 'Pray pay to the Order of' for then comes ye, and then a large Distance between that and 'Value received.' So that it seems pretty extraordinary that if any one was honestly writing, and had a Paper not written on before, that they should write in this Manner that the Word ye should be tacked to the Word for, and put at such a Distance from 'Value received.' Received follows Value immediately in a more plain Writing: Besides, it is unusual to make use of the Word ye before 'Value received;' but they say it is more generally 'Value received.' You have an Instance in the Note itself; the Conclusion of the Note is 'Value received:' and I believe the Observation is just; that it is not so usual to say 'For ye Value received.' But the Observation of the Counsel was this, that there was a Necessity of this in order to accommodate the Letters to the Forgery; as the Words now stand they exactly suited. And, Gentlemen, the f is of a paler Ink than the or, and these Letters thicker, and seem of a deeper Ink. If there were two ee's before, the Alteration and making the other Letters must occasion the Thickness of these Letters, and their seeming of a blacker Ink. Other Letters being to be superinduced, they must of Necessity be thicker and deeper than the first Letters. Here is a very strange Sort of an r, and the o seems very odd. At the End of the r is something made use of to assist to make the upper Part of the y, which doth not stand cleverly. And you will find that Part which is the Head of the y much thicker than the other Part that makes up the y. And then on the Side or one Shoulder of the y there is a Sort of e put. You may see how improperly it stands. It is not an e directly over the y, which is the Way sometimes of writing the short; but it comes to the Bottom of the Head of the y. So that, Gentlemen, these are the Observations that have been made by the Counsel. You have seen this Note, and may observe upon it, whether you think these Observations plain, proper and just? Upon this Occasion, another Servant of Mr. Edwards is called, one Mr. Spicer. He saith, that he hath been a Clerk in the Exchequer above ten Years, but in the whole in Mr. Edwards's Service upwards of twenty Years; that he is well acquainted with his public Dealings and private Transactions in Money-Matters: and that he never knew or heard that he had any Money-Dealings with the Defendant, which he believes he should, if there had been any, being his Clerk, and acquainted with his Money-Dealings. And he saith, that as to the Name Samuel Edwards, he believes it to be Mr. Edwards's proper Hand-Writing, being very well acquainted with his Hand. And he saith, that as to the Indorsement, he believes that the f is his, but not the other Letters; that he is satisfied that 'Value received' is not Mr. Edwards's Writing. And he saith, that the o and r he doth not take to be Mr. Edwards's Hand-Writing, but an Alteration from something that Mr. Edwards had wrote before; that the usual Way of Mr. Edwards franking is free with a f as here free; and that the o appears to be made out of an altered Letter. So that this is a proper Observation, that there is an Alteration, as they believe upon their Oaths. He saith, that it is bunglingly done; that he apprehends it done as hath been mentioned. Well, another Witness is called, Mr. George Brantwaite, a Servant to Mess. Casual and Mount. He saith, that this Draught was brought to their Office by the Defendant himself, because he hath put his Mark upon it, as is proper for Persons of such Dealings; that that Mark of his at the Bottom reminds him that the Defendant brought it. Upon the bringing of this Draught, he had two Notes from this Witness on account of his Master; one was for Two Hundred and Fifty Pounds, the other for Two Hundred and Twenty: That came to Four Hundred and Seventy Pounds: Therefore the Deficiency of this Draught was to be supplied with another to make up that Sum complete. Therefore, he saith, that he brought Notes of Wanley's for Twenty Pounds, which made up the Balance. The Note for Two Hundred and Fifty Pounds, he saith, was made payable to the Defendant himself; and that for Two Hundred and Twenty Pounds to one Charlton Thrup; and that at this Time the Draught and Wanley's Notes were delivered to him for these Notes on Account of Mess. Casual and Mount. This is the Account given by them. The Defendant himself and his Counsel are here. Nothing material is said by them in Defence, only Mr. Lacy mentioned that there is no Damage done by this Note, the Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds borrowed on it being repaid. To this it was replied by Mr. Attorney, that the Money was paid upon Account, there being other Monies due to Mr. Harle on Security; and besides it is attached in Mr. Harle's Goldsmiths Hands, to prevent its being issued out. Gentlemen, you will observe, that if this was a real Indorsement, it would be an Assurance of paying the whole Debt. Whosoever indorseth a Note, whereof no Part is paid, is liable to the whole. Therefore the Question is not, Whether or not this Money was paid? but whether here is not an Engagement to pay the Note, which the Re-payment of the Money borrowed thereon is no Fence against? Therefore if the Money had been repaid, that had been no acquitting of the Crime. That will no more discharge a Person, than if a Felon should say that he is acquitted because the Goods are restored. The Behaviour afterwards is not a sufficient Acquittal of a Crime. And consider when that was. It was not before, but upon the Monday, the very Day that he was apprehended. Then the Message was left, and the Money paid. You are to consider, therefore, whether this did not arise from an Apprehension and Fear of a Discovery, in order to clear Things as well as he could? Gentlemen, as there is sufficient Evidence to fix this upon the Defendant, so hath he not proved how he came by this Note. He hath not called one Witness to shew that he had any Money-Dealings with Mr. Edwards, or that he received it of any other Person; but it is left on the Evidence given by the Prosecutor. Therefore, there can be no Doubt in the Matter. If a Person is silent to the Charge, and cannot give you any Satisfaction as to it, it stands as fully fixed upon him as if any had seen him write the Indorsement. Therefore, Gentlemen, you are to consider, whether any Thing appears to afford the least Presumption that this was a true Indorsement made by Mr. Edwards, for Value received by him? It is, Gentlemen, an Offence of a very heinous Nature, and, if not suppressed, must tend to hinder all Commerce by Bills and Paper-Credit. If this be suffered to increase, none can take such a Note, unless he goeth to the Person himself. It will render it insecure to carry on Commerce by Notes or Bills. As to an Indorsement of this Nature, though it was not mentioned, it is proper for me to take notice, that tho' the Name be not named, it may be made to any Person. The Person, in whose Possession it is, can go and receive the Money. So that the Indorsement is complete Authority to empower the Person in whose Possession the Note is, to receive the Money, and likewise to charge the Person that so indorseth it with the Re-imbursement of the Money. Therefore, Gentlemen, the Crime and Offence seems complete. Upon this Evidence, it doth not seem to me that there can be any doubt with you, whether he be guilty of this Fact or not.

V. WILLIAM HALES was indicted for a Misdemeanour, in obtaining the Sum of Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds, from Mr. William Harle, by false Tokens *.

Jury sworn over again.

Clerk. O Y E Z, Oyez, if any one can inform, &c.

Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales stands indicted by the Name of William Hales, &c. for falsely and deceitfully obtaining the Sum of Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds of Mr. William Harle by a false Token, to wit, a Promissory Note in the Name of Mr. Robert Hales, whereby the said Robert Hales is supposed to engage to pay within three Months after Date, the Sum of Eight Hundred Pounds to Samuel Edwards, Esq. with a counterfeit Indorsement on this Note to the great Damage, &c. To this Indictment he hath pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Strange. This likewise is an Indictment against the Defendant Mr. William Hales, and is for falsely and deceitfully obtaining a Sum of Money of Mr. William Harle by a false Token. And it sets forth, that the Defendant having in his Possession a Promissory Note of Mr. Robert Hales's for Eight Hundred Pounds, payable in three Months after Date to Samuel Edwards, Esq. with a forged Indorsement thereon in the Name of the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. did falsely and deceitfully obtain of one Mr. William Harle, the Sum of Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds on the said Note. This is laid to be the great Damage, &c.

Mr. Hungerford. May it please your Lordship, the Fact charged is the very same as in the former Cause already heard, only upon a different Law, 33 Hen. VIII. There was, it seems, so long ago an abominable Practice of obtaining Money by false Tokens. The Act of Parliament hath prohibited that Practice, and made it penal. There is but one Witness that we shall trouble your Lordship with.

Mr. Harle called and sworn.

Mr. Hungerford. Mr. Harle, pray give an Account to my Lord, and the Jury, when you first saw that Note, and what Money you paid upon it.

Mr. Harle. On the 13th of June, Mr. Hales applied to me, to lend him Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds upon this Note. I accordingly made a Draught on my Goldsmiths, which I suppose was paid the same Day, having taken up the Draught on settling mine Accounts.

Lord Chief Baron Pengelly. Mr. Lacy, do you expect that they should go on further in their Evidence?

Mr. Lacy. No, my Lord.

* These Trials were taken in Short-Hand by Order of Mr. Edwards.

Lord Chief Baron Piggally. This Indictment is against William Hales, Goldsmith. It is for obtaining upon this Note a Draught equivalent to Money, and which afterwards produced Money, by this false Token. If the Note was forged, it was a false Note. He brought this Note as a good Note, to induce Mr. Hales to accommodate him with Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds thereupon. That is the Description of the Act of Parliament, that if any one by a false Token doth obtain or get any Thing or any Goods of another's, corporal Punishment shall be inflicted. If this appear to be a forged Indorsement; this being a false Token, he must be guilty. So that the Evidence is the same as to both these Indictments.

The Officer sworn to keep the Jury.

Clerk. Gentlemen, answer to your Names.

Jury called over.
Clerk. Are you all agreed in your Verdict?

Jury. Agreed.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. How say you, Is William Hales guilty of the Misdemeanour wherewith he is charged, in forging and publishing an Indorsement on a Promissory Note, or not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. How say you, Is William Hales guilty of the Misdemeanour wherewith he stands charged in obtaining Money by a false Token, or not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

VI. WILLIAM HALES and THOMAS KINNERSLEY, Clerk, were indicted for Forging and Counterfeiting a Note of Hand, bearing Date Aug. 16, 1727, for Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order, signed Thomas Kinnerfley, and indorsed Samuel Edwards.

Jury called over again, and sworn.

Crier. OYEZ, Oyez. If any one can inform my Lord the King's Justice, the King's Serjeants, Attorney, &c. in this Cause between our Sovereign Lord the King and William Hales and Thomas Kinnerfley, let them come forth, &c.

Here the Indictment was read.

Mr. Strange. Gentlemen of the Jury. This is an Indictment against the two Prisoners at the Bar, William Hales of London, late Goldsmith, and Thomas Kinnerfley, Clerk. The Indictment sets forth that these two Defendants, being Persons of ill Fame and Reputation, and devising and intending to defraud Samuel Edwards, Esq. and divers other his Majesty's Subjects, in March last had in their Custody a certain Note or a Writing purporting to be a Promissory Note signed by Thomas Kinnerfley, and dated Aug. 16, 1727. In this Note Thomas Kinnerfley is supposed to promise to pay Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds to Samuel Edwards, Esq. within three Months after Date, for Value received; that on this Note which they had in their Custody, they forged an Indorsement in these Words, 'Pray pay to the Order of for Value received, Samuel Edwards;' That thus having in their Custody this Note with this forged Indorsement thereupon, and knowing this to be a forged Indorsement, they did afterwards publish it to be a true one. These Offences are laid to be to the great Damage of the said Samuel Edwards, Esq. the Breach of his Majesty's Peace, and the ill Example of other his Majesty's Subjects in like Case offending. To this Indictment they have pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Attorney General. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel on the same Side for my Lord the King. Gentlemen, the Charge against the Defendant is for forging an Indorsement on a Promissory Note for Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds. Likewise they are charged with publishing the said counterfeit Indorsement for a true one, knowing the same to be forged and counterfeit. Gentlemen, this is not the first of several Facts of this Nature that have come to be considered with regard to the Defendant Mr. Hales: But the first that hath come to be examined in this Place charged upon the other Defendant, Mr. Kinnerfley, a Clergyman: And it is a very melancholy Thing that when a Scene of Forgery of this Nature is going on, which as you have been told is of a very pernicious Nature to Trade and Commerce, we should see one charged therewith that hath a Right to appear in that Habit, and thinks fit to appear here in it. But it will appear that there is just Ground to charge not only the Defendant Hales, but the Defendant Kinnerfley. Gentlemen, as to the Fact, it will seem that it took rise in the same manner as the former Fact; that by that Correspondence that Mr. William Hales thought fit to let himself into with Mr. Edwards, by applying for Frank Covers to send News into the Country, he took occasion to make Use of such a Paper; and that there being an Intimacy between him and Mr. Kinnerfley, Mr. Hales having by this Means possessed himself of a Frank Cover with the Name of Samuel Edwards free thereon, that upon a Piece of that Paper cut off from the rest, a Promissory Note is written. I take it that the Note will appear to be the Hand-writing of Mr. Kinnerfley, dated in a different Hand, Aug. 16, 1727. The Words are these:

I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or his Order, three Months after Date, the Sum of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, for the Value received.
THOMAS KINNERSLEY.

On the Back of the Paper these Circumstances will appear: First, The Edge of the Paper on that Side of it where the Indorsement is wrote appears cut off; and as in the former Case, so here there are the Tails of two or three Letters still remaining plainly to be seen. And it will appear that there is an Irregularity and Unevenness in the cutting; the Edge in one Place smoother being turned in, and an Hook or Dent made in the Paper. Under this, pretty near the Top of the Paper, is written 'Pray pay to the Order of,' then there is a wide Blank as in the former Instance; then follow the Words, 'For the Value received, Samuel Edwards.' It appears that the Words for the are written in a stronger and blacker Ink than the former; the f of the former Sort, probably Mr. Edwards's. The Word the is not written in a Contraction as before, but at length. Here, instead of changing Letters, erasing or turning, are Letters written over in a blacker Ink: The other Letters, as the two e's, appear in a paler Ink; so that it will appear to a Demonstration that this was a Frank turned to this Use. Other Observations will likewise appear as to the Manner of penning it: This Note being written, and the Indorsement upon it, it will appear what Use was made of it; and it will appear by strong Circumstances, if not by the Confession of the Defendant Kinnerfley, that the Name of Samuel Edwards was there when he wrote the Note: If so it will appear clear against Kinnerfley. It will thus appear a Circumstance to charge the Defendant; as first, it appears that there never was any Dealing between Kinnerfley and Mr. Samuel Edwards: I know not that it will appear that they were so much as known to each other; and yet here is a Note wrote by Mr. Kinnerfley, whereby he engageth to pay Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, within three Months after Date, to him or his Order. It is very extraordinary that any Gentleman should write a Promissory Note, especially should write such a Note to pay such a Sum to another, to one with whom he had no Dealings. It is incumbent therefore on Kinnerfley to shew any such Dealings, and upon what fair Occasion it can be made appear to be given. Gentlemen, as this will appear to you to be the Nature of the Note and the Manner of indorsing it, and that there were no Dealings between them, and consequently no Reason for putting it in Mr. Edwards's Name, but that his Name was there, and to make him the Indorser; so the Use made of it was to carry it to Mr. Bird, an Officer to the Hudson's Bay Company. Mr. Hales delivered it to him as a true Note and Indorsement; and desired that Mr. Bird would accommodate him with Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds upon it. I think that Mr. Hales gave his own Note for that Sum: But as the principal Security this Note of Mr. Edwards's was left with Mr. Bird. It was on the 20th of March 1727 that this Note was left and thus deposited with Mr. Bird. And, Gentlemen, in April following there was the Sum of Four Hundred and Fifty Pounds, as Part of the Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds paid by Mr. Hales. Gentlemen, the Residue not being paid in such a Time as it was expected, Mr. Bird directed one Mr. Tomkins to write to Kinnerfley to demand the Money, and to threaten to sue for it. After this Mr. Kinnerfley came to him at Fenchurch-Street, the Hudson's Bay House. Mr. Bird told him that there was such a Note which was left with him for a Security for Money borrowed; that there was so much thereof that remained due, and desired the Money. It will appear that at that Place and Time when the Note was shewed to Mr. Kinnerfley, he owned that he had wrote this Note, and said that he was an undone Man, and that Mr. Bird must not expect the Money from him, but apply to Mr. Edwards who indorsed the Note. Gentlemen, after this Declaration had been made by Mr. Kinnerfley, in September there was a Discovery made of Mr. Gibson's Note, upon which Mr. Hales was committed, September 9 last: That gave occasion to every one that had received of Mr. Hales's Notes for their Security to look about them, which produced a particular Inquiry about this Note. Mr. Edwards was informed that such a Note was in the Hands of Mr. Bird; upon his applying to Mr. Bird, it appeared in the manner that I have opened unto you: When that appeared, and that the Note was wrote by Mr. Kinnerfley on a Paper signed by Mr. Edwards, Mr. Kinnerfley was taken up. I think that there was some Difficulty at first for the Constable to apprehend him; but at length he was apprehended, and carried before Sir Richard Hopkins. It will appear that he was then in great Confusion, and appeared to have some Sort of Inclination to make the only Reparation that Guilt of such a Crime could admit of, viz. making a full Discovery. He said, that he would confess every thing, and owned that both the Body of the Note and the Subscription to it was his Hand-writing. He confessed likewise, if my Brief be right, that he knew that Mr. Edwards's Name was on the Back of it; that Mr. Edwards was a Stranger to him, and that he had no Dealings with him. It happened at that Time that there was one Mitford present, something of an Attorney or Solicitor, and a Relation of Mr. Kinnerfley's. He found that Mr. Kinnerfley was on a dangerous Point when he declared, that he knew that Mr. Edwards's Name was there when he wrote the Note. He stopt him short, bade him confess nothing, asked him what he meant? He took his Advice, and, I think, denied his own Hand-writing. Upon that Occasion a Discovery was prevented: He was then committed, and that is the Occasion of the present Prosecution. We shall call the Witnesses. As to Mr. Hales, the Evidence that we shall lay before you in his usual Practice of applying to Mr. Edwards for Franks, the Manner of making this Note and Indorsement, the Use he made of it, his publishing and depositing of it as a true Indorsement, when it appears on the Face of it to be a forged one. It will appear plainly against him that he was concerned in the Forgery, and in the Publication of it. As to the other of the Defendants, Mr. Kinnerfley, the Circumstances that I have mentioned will make it appear to be his, and be as strong Evidence against him as against the other.

Mr. Serj. Whit. I will not take up any of your Lordship's Time, there being more Indictments; but shall immediately call our Witnesses.

Thomas Maddox and Anne Clark were called and sworn.

N. B. Their Examination was in Substance the same as in the former Trial, p. 69, 70. therefore need not be inserted over again.

Mr. John Spicer called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Look upon that Note. Are you acquainted with Mr. Edwards's Hand-writing?—Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. How long have you been acquainted with it?

Mr. Spicer. Twenty-four Years, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. How long have you been a Clerk to him?

Mr. Spicer. Between ten and eleven Years, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. How much is his Hand?

Mr. Spicer. Samuel Edwards and the f.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Very well. As to the other Letters, What are they?

Mr. Spicer. Some of them seem to be written over other Letters, which I suppose were Part of the Word free. The r seems visible between the o and r.

Mr. Strange. What was his Method of writing the Word free?

Mr.

Mr. Spicer. With a double f, just as it is here, ffree.

Mr. Strange. Did you ever know him use the Word Frank?

Mr. Spicer. Never, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. You say that you have been concerned as Clerk between ten and eleven Years. Was you concerned before for him?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. In what Business?

Mr. Spicer. As to his private Affairs in Town, Cash in Town, and many of his Rents.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. During the Time that you was acquainted with his private Transactions, did you ever understand that there were any Transactions in Money Affairs between him and Mr. Hales?

Mr. Spicer. No, never any whatever. I never so much as heard his Name in the Family.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you ever know that Mr. Edwards used to make a Practice of indorsing any other Person's Notes, or of giving promissory Notes?—Mr. Spicer. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. I believe you will all be convinced that it is his Hand-writing.

Mr. Kinnerley. I admit, Sir, the whole Body of the Note to be mine own Hand-writing.

Mr. Strange. Look upon it before you do that. We desire nothing but what is fair.

Mr. Kinnerley. Yes, Sir, I admit both the Figures on the Top, and the whole Note to be mine.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Gentlemen, you will observe that there were but three Months mentioned in the Note. The Note is drawn Aug. 16. and was not brought till March 20 after, so that the whole Time was long expired before the Note was left with Mr. Bird for the Money which he lent upon it.

Mr. Strange. I verily believe, my Lord, the Indorsement and Note to be both the same Hand.

(Mrs. William Wright called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Sir, was you at any Time with Mr. Kinnerley and Mr. Edwards, and was there any Discourse passed between them about this Note?

Mr. Wright. When Mr. Kinnerley was examined before Sir Richard Hopkins, he there owned it to be his own Hand-writing, both the Note and Indorsement.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. But give us an Account whether he was going to make a Confession, and what was said upon it?

Mr. Wright. As soon as he said that the Note was all his Hand-writing—

Lord Chief-Baron Pengelly. And what did he say besides?

Mr. Wright. What he said, my Lord, as to the Indorsement was afterwards. As soon as he said that the Note was all his Hand-writing, Mr. Edwards asked him, Why he drew the Note payable to him, when there never had been any Dealings or Negotiations between them?

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What said Mr. Kinnerley to that?

Mr. Wright. He said that there never had been any Dealings between them, either before or since the making of the Note payable to him; that he did not know Mr. Edwards, nor, except that Time before Sir Richard Hopkins, had not seen him.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Pray, Sir, give us an Account how he was prevented going on.

Mr. Wright. He opened himself in this Manner: That he was indebted to Mr. Hales in that Sum, and more, and that Mr. Hales desired him to give a Note of his Hand; that he asked Mr. Hales to whom it should be made payable? I replied, It is very unusual to ask that. It is sure natural for a Man to make it payable to a Person that he oweth the Money to. I said, Sir, you seemed before to declare yourself an unhappy Person, an undone Man. I asked him the Reason; and upon that Mr. Mitford, who was with him, said, You shall not go on to declare any thing further, you may do yourself an Injury.

Mr. Strange. Did he say at that Time, that he saw any thing on the Back of that Note?

Mr. Wright. As soon as he had declared the Note to be his Hand-writing to Mr. Edwards, and Mr. Bird had showed the Note to Mr. Kinnerley, he was asked, Whether he knew of that Indorsement of Mr. Edwards's Hand before he saw the Note? He said, he did know of the Indorsement thereof, but know not how it came there.

Mr. Strange. How did Mr. Edwards ask the Question?

Mr. Wright. He asked Mr. Bird, Did Mr. Kinnerley own the Indorsement before you showed him the Note?

Mr. Strange. Sir, you do not apprehend the Question asked you. What was the Question that Mr. Edwards asked Mr. Kinnerley?

Mr. Wright. Whether he knew of the Indorsement before that Mr. Bird showed him the Note?

Mr. Strange. What did he say?—Mr. Wright. He answered that he did.

Lord Chief Baron. Was that all that he said?

Mr. Wright. He said that he had had several Dealings with Mr. Hales, which was the Cause of his drawing that Note in that Manner.

Lord Chief Baron. But what did he say concerning the Indorsement?

Mr. Wright. Mr. Bird said, That before he showed Mr. Kinnerley the Note, Mr. Kinnerley said that there was such a Note of his Hand, with such an Indorsement.

Lord Chief Baron. But what was the Answer that Mr. Kinnerley gave Mr. Edwards?

Mr. Wright. That he knew of the Indorsement, but knew not how it came there.

Mr. Strange. Did he, Mr. Kinnerley, mention the Indorsement himself? Did he say, whether he saw the Name before his writing the Note?

Mr. Wright. Not at that Time, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Did he at any other in your Hearing?

Mr. Wright. No, Sir.

Mr. Strange. When Mr. Mitford stopt him, was there any Discourse afterwards whose Hand-writing the Note might be; was there any Dispute?

Mr. Wright. Sir, the Company broke up then, when Mr. Mitford had given him that Caution.

(Sir Richard Hopkins sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Sir Richard—

Mr. Lacy. I would beg first to ask Sir Richard, whether this Examination was reduced into Writing?

Sir Richard Hopkins. I always take a Memorandum in my Book of what is said upon an Examination. There was none other Examination in Writing, but my Memorandum of what I thought sufficient to occasion the Commitment that I made.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. When was it?

Sir Richard Hopkins. It was some time about September. I remember that he was charged before me about two Notes. One was a Note of Twelve Hundred and Sixty, the other was a Note of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, which of these you desire me to speak to, I know not.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. That of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds.

Sir Richard Hopkins. There was such a Note drawn by Thomas Kinnerley, payable within three Months after Date to Samuel Edwards, Esq. and indorsed by Samuel Edwards. I looked upon it; and, turning over the Indorsement, it seemed to me to be an altered and forged Thing. Upon this I examined Mr. Bird, whom they offered as an Evidence. Mr. Bird told me, that he had lent Money upon that Note of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, and that he had received some Money in Part of Payment of what he had lent: That hearing that Mr. Hales was taken up, he made Application to Mr. Kinnerley for what Money remained due to him; that when he made such Application to Mr. Kinnerley for this Money, Mr. Kinnerley, before he saw the Note, told him, that he had a Note of his for his Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, payable in three Months after Date to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or Order, and indorsed by Samuel Edwards. This I laid my Finger upon before him, thinking it sufficient to commit him, and repeated the Words to Mr. Bird, Are these the Words that you say? If they are, repeat them; which he did. I asked Mr. Kinnerley, whether he had any Dealings with Mr. Edwards? He said, that he had not. I asked then, How he came to make a Note for twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds payable to him, a Person with whom he had no Dealings. He said, That he did it at the Request of Mr. Hales, to whom he was indebted in that Sum of Money. He said, That as to the Indorsement he knew not how it came there. He seemed ready to make an ample Confession; but there was a Person there, who was (I think) one Way or other related to the Law, who stopt him directly, and had oft interrupted. I said to him, Sir, this is not becoming here: I expect to examine any Person without your interrupting. I will afterwards ask any Question that—

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Sir, when Mr. Kinnerley had owned the Note, was there afterwards a Denial?

Sir Richard Hopkins. Afterwards, Sir, there was a Denial. It might be as to the other Note; and not that which you are now asking me about. (Mr. Richard Davis, the Constable, called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Richard Davis, I think that you was the Constable sent to apprehend Mr. Kinnerley. Will you give us an Account how often you went to apprehend him, whether he was to be met withal, and what past when he was apprehended?

Mr. Richard Davis. My Lord, on September 12, there was a Warrant issued out to take up the Rev. Mr. Kinnerley, and was given to me to execute. Accordingly I went in the Afternoon, and took a Porter with me. We went to the Magpy Tavern without Aldgate. I sent the Porter thence to Mr. Kinnerley's House in Mansel-Street, to tell him, that there was a Gentleman there to speak with him; because, he living in Mansel-Street in Middlesex, I could not there execute my Warrant. When the Porter came back, he told me, that the Daughter came to the Door, and said, that the Reverend Mr. Kinnerley was not in Town. After I had paid for what I had called for, I went from thence to the Clerk of the Parish, and asked him, whether the Rev. Mr. Kinnerley was in Town? He answered, No; and said, that he went out of Town on Tuesday, I think it was, and that he did not know when he would be in Town. He asked me what I wanted with him? I told him that a Couple wanted to be married, and wanted a Licence. Won't (said he) the Curate do? No (said I), the young Gentlewoman will not be married by any but the Doctor, and at his Church: So the Person having no Apprehension, sent me to London-House in Aldersgate-Street, to enquire for Mr. May, who would tell me when the Doctor would be in Town. He told me, that he would be in Town next Thursday Night. Accordingly I went the next Friday Morning, took a Porter with me, went directly to the Doctor's House. When I came there I rung hard at the Gate. Out came the Daughter. I asked to speak with the Doctor; she said that he was not at Home, and enquired what I would have with him. I told her the same about my wanting a Licence that I had told the Clerk before. I will (said she) go and call my Mamma. Accordingly Madam Kinnerley came out: I told her that I wanted a Licence, was informed that the Doctor generally kept Licences by him, or at least could help me to one. She desired me to walk into the Parlour, said that the Doctor had been out of Town, was very much fatigued, which was the Reason that he was denied. Out came the Doctor, Sir, (said he) where is the Gentlewoman? Sir, (said I) she is hard by, at the Magpy Tavern by Aldgate. Who (said he) is she, and who are her Friends? I told him that her Name was Bird. Where (said he) lives she? I said in Fleet-Street. I do not (said he) remember that Name. You do, Sir, (said I) know her Father very well. What Age (said he) is she? I told him her Age. Have her Friends given Consent (said he), without that I would not do it for an hundred Pounds: The Penalty is fifty Pounds; I told him that it had been done to my Knowledge. Aye (said he) it may be at the Fleet. I desired him to go to the Tavern, where her Brother was with her, and he would be satisfied. My Intent was to decoy him into the Liberties of the City. He said, No, he would not go with me: So I had no Opportunity then. But having seen him once, and so knowing him, I afterwards watched for him, and saw him come out, and go through the Minorities. I watched him till he came to Aldgate; I then paid my Respects to him. I think (said he) that you are the Person that came to me about a Marriage. Yes, Sir, (said I) but I have now another Affair to speak to you of. I have a Warrant against you for Forgery of a Note of twelve hundred and sixty Pounds. He said, God forbid. He asked to see my Warrant. He said, had the Gentleman sent to him, he would readily have come. I asked him why he denied himself? He said, that he apprehended an Arrest. I desired him to go with me to the White Hart Tavern in Bishopsgate-Street. He there owned the Note.

Mr.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Was it within or without the Bars?

Mr. Davis. It was within.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you go with him to Sir Richard Hopkins?

Mr. Davis. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. My Lord, there is another Thing that we shall prove; for all is Circumstance. We shall shew that Mr. Kinnersey and Mr. Hales have been often together for four or five Months in a private Manner. As soon as the one hath come in, the other hath gone with him into a private Room, and they have stayed some Time together; and this was about the Time that these Transactions have been. When these Matters are laid together, you will judge that Mr. Kinnersey hath not been so kind to Mr. Edwards as to give him Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds; but that there was a plain formed Design to raise this Money upon his Credit. Join this together with his owning, that he knew that Mr. Edwards's Hand was on the Back of the Note before he drew the Note, and that he knew of the Indorsement, though he said he knew not how it came there. Considering these Things, none will doubt but that there was a Contrivance between them. We shall call several Witnesses.

Mr. Lacy. We submit it to my Lord, whether it be proper. It is foreign to this Indictment; and we should have nothing offered but what we may be supposed to come prepared to defend. We cannot be supposed to come prepared to defend this, by shewing how he came there, and upon what Account.

Lord Chief Baron. It is an Indictment against both the Defendants. The Note was indeed subscribed by the Defendant Kinnersey: But then it was delivered out by the other Defendant Hales. Now, they say, that they will shew by several Witnesses that they were very conversant together about that Time, and they are acquainted with the private Manner of their conversing together. You hear what is the Use they make of it. I see not that we can refuse their giving this Account. What Use is to be made of it must be left to the Jury.

Mr. Mather. Are these Things to be proved by Circumstances?

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Can Forgery be proved any otherwise?

Mr. Bab called and sworn.

Mr. Strange. Pray, where do you live?

Mr. Bab. At Peel's Coffee-house, in Fleet-street.

Mr. Strange. Do you keep that House?

Mr. Bab. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Have you ever observed that Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersey ever frequented that House, and in what Manner?

Mr. Bab. Last Summer, the greatest Part of the Summer, sometimes twice or thrice in a Week, till near the Time that the Gentleman was taken up, Mr. Hales would sometimes come thither, and sometimes be there an Hour or two. Sometimes he would ask whether a Minister had been there to ask for him? We hardly knew the Name of either of them, but knew whom he meant. Mr. Hales would often be in our Room, and see sometimes Mr. Kinnersey coming, out of the Window. Mr. Hales would hardly take any Notice of him; but as soon as he came in Mr. Hales would go into a private Room, and the other afterwards go to him. And sometimes as soon as one came in at one Door, the other went out at the other, and he followed him.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. How often was this?

Mr. Bab. Twice or thrice in a Week.

Mr. Strange. Do you remember on what Occasion, and how they left off coming to your House?

Mr. Bab. Mr. Kinnersey was not at the House for two or three Weeks or a Month before Mr. Hales was taken up. Mr. Hales was there a few Days before.

Mr. Strange. Do you remember that Mr. Kinnersey passed by?

Mr. Bab. Once he did. He went down Fleet-street: Mr. Hales rose up, went out, and went after him.

Mr. Strange. How long was this before Mr. Hales was apprehended?

Mr. Bab. It was three Weeks or a Month, I believe, before he was apprehended.

Mr. Strange. I ask, Whether at any Time they sat down in the publick Room?

Mr. Bab. Very seldom: They generally went into the private Part.

Mr. Strange. Was that distinct from the rest of the House?

Mr. Bab. Yes, Sir, quite separate.

Mr. John Brooks called and sworn.

Mr. Strange. Where do you live?

Mr. Brooks. I keep a Coffee-house in Downing-street, in Westminster.

Mr. Strange. What Name doth your Coffee-house go by?

Mr. Brooks. My own Name.

Mr. Strange. Do you know that you have ever observed that Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersey ever frequented your House, and in what Manner?

Mr. Brooks. Mr. Kinnersey hath sometimes come to the Coffee-house; sent for a Porter; gave him a Note to Mr. Hales, who hath come, and they have gone to a private Part of the Room.

Mr. Strange. Was there any other with them?

Mr. Brooks. No, Sir, never.

Mr. Strange. Was it often that they met thus?

Mr. Brooks. About four or five Times in a Month.

Mr. Strange. How long have they stayed?

Mr. Brooks. Several Hours. When I have asked the Servant why a Candle was not carried them, he hath said, that they refused it.

Mr. Strange. How long was it before Mr. Hales was taken up?

Mr. Brooks. About a Month.

Mr. Strange. Was there any Observation made upon his being taken up?

Mr. Brooks. I observed it the more, having often seen them together.

Thomas Janeway called and sworn.

Mr. Kinnersey. I admit, my Lord, that we have been together at several Coffee-houses.

Lord Chief Baron. Well, now the Man is sworn, we will go on with him.

Mr. Strange. Do you know Mr. Kinnersey and Mr. Hales?

Mr. Janeway. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Do you keep a Coffee-house?—Mr. Janeway. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Where?—Mr. Janeway. In Cornhill, Sir.

Vol. IX.

Mr. Strange. Do you remember that they have frequented your House together, and in what Manner?

Mr. Janeway. I believe they may have been there together several Times.

Mr. Strange. What Company had they with them?

Mr. Janeway. I take no Notice what Company is there. I observed them not.

Mr. Strange. How often have you observed them retire up Stairs together?

Mr. Janeway. I take no Notice of such Things. They might for an hundred Times, for aught I know.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. My Lord, we shall rest the Evidence here: We submit it to your Lordship and the Jury, when such a Note is drawn by such a Man upon such a Paper, by which he promiseth to pay such a Sum to a Person with whom he had no Dealings, to what End can it be. Can it be with any other Intention than to charge an innocent Man with it? I think it is a plain Case. It is certain that Mr. Hales carried this Note, and borrowed a Sum of Money upon it; and Mr. Kinnersey made Preparation for it by making a Note for so much Money payable to Mr. Edwards. Doth a Man so easily give Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds to a Stranger with whom he hath had no Dealings? To what Purpose could it then be thus drawn? Why, to be indorsed. And this Mr. Kinnersey did, and he owned that the Name was there, and he knew that Mr. Edwards was a rich Man. Well, if Mr. Edwards was a rich Man, and the other not worth a Groat, as he owned himself to be an undone Man, to what Purpose then can it be? Well, I think it clearly appears that this was a Contrivance between them two. If you think not this plain, I think that it is impossible to convict any Man on a stronger Evidence.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. My Lord, I am Counsel for the Prisoner at the Bar, Mr. Hales. And I think it doth appear that there was a Transaction between Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersey; and that this Money was due from Mr. Kinnersey to him. And we apprehend, notwithstanding what hath been offered, that the Confession of Mr. Kinnersey, is a proper Justification of Mr. Hales. It is not, my Lord, Mr. Kinnersey's being a Defendant that shall deprive Mr. Hales of the Benefit of this Confession. It appearing that he was indebted to Mr. Hales, this Note was given in Satisfaction: We apprehend that it was given upon this Account to Mr. Hales. In Confirmation of what Mr. Hales saith, we can produce a Person to shew that there was an Account between them, and Mr. Kinnersey acknowledged such a Balance, in Satisfaction of which this Note was given. And we think that it could not be drawn as a Note of Mr. Kinnersey's payable to Mr. Hales, not only because the Account would be as good against Mr. Kinnersey as such a Note of his Hand, but also because of Mr. Hales's own Circumstances. Mr. Hales applied to a Gentleman that recommended him to Mr. Bird to borrow Money upon this Note. And, Gentlemen, it was this Note thus drawn that recommended him. Mr. Hales had the Misfortune to be concerned with Sir Stephen Evance; he could not therefore appear himself; and, therefore, by the Assistance of this Note, borrowed the Money. When Difficulties came upon it, he went and paid Part of the Money, and I believe would have taken care to have paid the whole: It doth not appear that this hath affected Mr. Edwards. His name indeed hath been exposed as a Man would not be willing that it should; Money hath been raised upon the Credit of his Name; but he hath not been affected thereby. This therefore lieth on the unhappy Circumstances of Mr. Hales. We will call one Witness, and then this Confession of Mr. Kinnersey we hope will avail.

Mr. Lacy. My Lord, I apprehend that there is a Circumstance that lessens the Weight of, if it not wholly sets aside what they go upon. What they have gone on was, that Mr. Edwards's Franks were used to this ill Purpose. Maddox, a Servant of Mr. Edwards, is produced, who tells us of a Parcel of Franks that were delivered in July last. Mr. Bird gave an Account that this Note was brought to him in March: So that it was brought him before these Franks were delivered. And though it may be apprehended that there were other Franks, we think that there ought to be a Proof of some Franks that were delivered before.

Mr. Strange. There have been, Mr. Lacy, (as hath been deposed) for several Years. Those that were brought in July last, are those that never were franked, but were only Covers left for that Purpose.

Mr. Robert Burkit called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Do you know, Sir, of any Account stated between Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersey?

Mr. Robert Burkit. No, Sir, none at all.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. No! What doth the Man mean?

Mr. Strange. What, none in Newgate, nor no where else? Do you know of none?—Mr. Robert Burkit. No, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Do you know of any Money that was at any Time due from Mr. Hales to Mr. Kinnersey?

Mr. Robert Burkit. No, Sir, none at all.

Lord Chief Baron. Have you any other Witness?

Mr. Serj. Darnell. My Lords, there are two Witnesses to this Account stated.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel for Mr. Kinnersey. I apprehend that he is innocent. I readily agree with Mr. Attorney, that the Affair of Notes, established by Act of Parliament, is of great Moment, and their Security necessary to Commerce; and that the Forgery of such Notes and Indorsements thereupon is very pernicious to the Publick: I therefore apprehend that there ought to be strong Evidence for the convicting of such a Crime. I humbly submit it, that before a Man be convicted of so infamous an Affair, there ought to be strong Evidence; and the rather because he is a Clergyman of the Church of England, and his Capacity of Service depends upon his Credit: And it doth appear that he hath behaved himself with all possible Caution. You see that the Contrivance that the Officer sent to apprehend him made use of, was a Pretence of a Marriage. You see, Gentlemen, and I am glad to see it, and wish that all others used the same Caution, that upon his Inquiry what Age the young Woman was of, understanding that she was not of Age, and her Parents not being there, notwithstanding that he was told that her Brother was there with her, yet he absolutely refused and said, that he would not be concerned for an hundred Pounds without the Parents Consent: That is such a Point in his Favour, that I think that it is a stronger Circumstance for him, than the other Circumstances are against him. As to the Offence that is charged upon him, it is, I suppose, that he should give out a Note made in his Name payable to Mr. Edwards, and indorse such a Note in Mr. Edwards's Name, in order to charge Mr. Edwards with the Payment of the Money. They lay a great Stress upon this, and say, that Mr. Kinnersley was wholly unacquainted with Mr. Edwards. One of the Witnesses saith, that Mr. Kinnersley himself owned that he had never seen Mr. Edwards before in his Life. How therefore (say they) is it likely, that there should be any fair Reason for a Man to make such a Note payable to one that he had no Dealing nor Acquaintance with, nor had so much as ever seen before in his Life? I submit it to you, whether in the Course of Business it is a material Thing whom a Note is made payable to. If a Man owe a Sum of Money, and give a Note for it, it is natural to enquire to whom it should be made payable. It was the more natural in this Case, as Mr. Hales, having the Misfortune to have a Commission of Bankruptcy standing out against him, could not negotiate Notes in his own Name, but must act in some Friend or Neighbour's Name. And it is no great Wonder that Mr. Kinnersley, whose Character directed his Studies another Way, and who was not acquainted much with these Affairs, should be imposed upon to give such a Note; and the less so for this plain Reason: Sir Stephen Evance and Mr. Hales formerly lived in Mr. Kinnersley's Parish; received him with a great deal of Civility: It can be no Wonder therefore that he afterwards continued an Acquaintance with him. Notwithstanding his Misfortunes, it is plain that Mr. Hales was still acquainted with several very worthy Gentlemen: Mr. Gibson and Mr. Edwards both furnished him with Franks; Sir Biby Lake recommended him to Mr. Bird, to borrow of him a considerable Sum of Money. If such Gentlemen as these thus corresponded with him after his Misfortunes, no Wonder that Mr. Kinnersley, who had been the Minister of the Parish where Mr. Hales had lived, should keep up an Acquaintance with him; and so no Wonder that he should be so imposed on. In fact, we shall shew you that he was indebted for such a Sum to Mr. Hales. It is impossible to give a particular Account of the whole Affair; Mr. Hales being also a Defendant, and therefore no Evidence: But that he was indebted in some such Sums is plain. Gentlemen, it is very innocent if a Man give a Note where there is no Consideration. It is no Injury to the Publick. The Person that gives the Note may injure himself, but not the Publick. There is no Act of Parliament against the giving of such Notes. Well, if the giving of the Note be not culpable, consider how the Fact of the Indorsement comes about. And if you consider how that comes about, no doubt but that he must be cleared of the Fact. How must this be done to affect Mr. Kinnersley? It must be on the Back of the Note when he wrote the Note, and he must know it to be there. Now, with great Submission, have they given any Proof, or Colour of Proof, that it was then there, or, that if it was, he knew it to be there? They have given you the Proof of Mr. Bird and the Constable, who was present when he was examined. According to the first of these, it is plain that he knew not. He said that he knew that the Name was there, but knew not how it came there. This, I think, instead of a Confession, is an avoiding of it, by saying, that he knew nothing at all how it came there: But consider the Nature of the Thing, how it is supposed to be done from a Frank of Mr. Edwards's. Mr. Edwards had never franked a Letter for him, but many for Mr. Hales. Is it not most natural to suppose then that Hales was concerned? How doth it follow, that this being done from a Frank, the Name must be there before the Note was wrote? A Man that is capable of drawing such a Note for such an End, might he not give it to be franked? Is it not easy to conceive, that if I give such a Note on a Quarter of a Sheet of Paper doubled up to a Person to be franked, that he shall do this so as to make the Name stand for an Indorsement? I would make this further Observation, it hath been counted doubtful, whether the making use of a Man's Name to a different Purpose from what he designed it for, shall be counted a Forgery. I think that the Doubt ariseth upon a Distinction of my Lord Couper, on the Statute of 8 Eliz. between forging and making a False Deed. I do not pretend to say but that the Opinion of the King's-Bench was right. It was in the Affair of Ward and Bridge.

Lord Chief Baron. No, Bridge and Dutton: There was an Alteration. The Question was, Whether it could be accounted a Forgery within the Act of Parliament? The Words of the Description in the Act of Parliament are, "If any one forge or erase, &c." whether he could be charged with forging of that Note? I was one of the Counsel. It appeared their Opinion, that he forged it as much as if he had wrote the whole Note.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, I agree it to be as your Lordship puts it. I only mention it as a Doubt not settled by the printed Books. My Lord, a Man may alter a Deed, e.g. a Person oweth me Money on Bond; if I alter the Bond to mine own Damage, that is no Forgery; but when he doth it to the Injury of the Person to whom the Money is owing, then it is Forgery: The Forgery therefore lieth in the Design of defrauding another. Now, whose Good is it that this Note was drawn for? It appears that my Client had no Benefit at all by it. The Money was all received by Mr. Hales, and the whole Transaction about paying the Money was by Mr. Hales: He was therefore to receive the Benefit, most likely therefore that the Forgery was his. And as to this Promissory Note, what was the Effect of it? No one will pretend to say, but that if Mr. Edwards was to bring an Action he might recover his Money of Mr. Kinnersley: He hath, therefore, only wrote a Note, which, without Controversy, hath subjected him to the Payment of such a Sum of Money. Mr. Hales hath received the Money, and gained by this Note. We submit it therefore to your Lordship.

Mr. Mather. My Lord, with relation to the Transactions between Mr. Kinnersley and Mr. Hales, we shall call Evidence to shew the Reasons of those private Meetings that were between them.

(Mr. Peter Marth called and sworn.)

Mr. Mather. Sir, do you know the Defendants, Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersley?

Mr. Peter Marth. I have, Sir, known Mr. Hales many Years.

Mr. Mather. But have you known Mr. Kinnersley?

Mr. Peter Marth. Not so many Years.

Lord Chief Baron. What is your Business or Employment?

Mr. Peter Marth. I am an Attorney, my Lord.

Mr. Mather. Do you know of any Transactions between Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersley?

Mr. Peter Marth. About ten or eleven Years ago, Mr. Hales brought me a Bond of fifty Pounds, payable by Mr. Kinnersley to me. Mr. Kinnersley owed him the Money, and had given him a Bond payable to me. He desired me to get it.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. This is not Evidence. What signifieth it what the Defendant told him?

Mr. Mather. What was done upon that? What came of the Bond?

Mr. Peter Marth. I delivered it to Mr. Hales again.

Mr. Mather. Did Mr. Hales owe you any Money?

Mr. Peter Marth. No, Sir, none at all.

(Mr. Cropley called and sworn.)

Mr. Lacy. Mr. Cropley, What do you know of any Money-matters between Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersley?

Mr. Cropley. I received about sixty Pounds at Janeway's Coffee-house, a Debt which was due to me from Mr. Kinnersley: They were there together; Mr. Kinnersley was the Debtor, Mr. Hales had given me a Note for it. Mr. Kinnersley had prevailed on me to lend him an hundred and odd Pounds upon but a slight Acquaintance: He brought another Gentleman to be Security with him for the paying it me; so I forbore him for six Months. I then enquired of him after it: When he had led me a Dance from Coffee-house to Coffee-house for some Months, I was forced at last to sue for it. He desired me to sue the other Party, and forbore him: I recovered Half from the one, then I came upon him for the other. When I came to serve him with a Notice of a Writ of Enquiry, he met me with Mr. Hales at some Tavern in Holborn, about June or July last was a Twelvemonth. Then Mr. Hales said to me, I am to receive about six or seven hundred Pounds within about three Months Time; and then I shall be ready to pay that Money: Upon that I sapt my Procedure upon the Writ of Enquiry; and, as Mr. Hales requested me, I took Mr. Hales's and Mr. Kinnersley's Note for the Payment of it within three Months. When that Time was expired, or within about four Months, I got it. What was his Part to pay I received at Janeway's Coffee-house: They were together; which paid me I cannot say. The Money was in half and quarter broad Pieces; I refused to take it in those Pieces, being to transact it in the Alley. Upon that he took me to a Banker's about Temple-Bar, and there changed it.

Lord Chief Baron. When was this?

Mr. Cropley. It was in February. Mr. Kinnersley gave me a little Note at the same Time for the Damages that I had sustained in seeking it; about fifty Shillings, or thereabouts.

Mr. Strange. Hath there been any Application made, Sir, to you to appear as a Witness?

Mr. Cropley. Yes, Sir, Mrs. Kinnersley sent to desire me; and Mr. Kinnersley also sent me a Letter, and besides that sent me a Subpoena.

Mr. Strange. Can you produce that Letter?

Mr. Cropley. I have it not here, Sir.

Mr. Strange. You cannot say which paid you the Money, Sir?

Mr. Cropley. No, Sir, but they were both together.

Mr. Kinnersley. Sir, one Word I beg. Did not Mr. Hales give you a Note for it?

Mr. Cropley. Yes, Sir, you and Mr. Hales joined in it.

Mr. Peter Beart was called, but did not appear.

(Mr. John Wells called and sworn.)

Mr. Lacy. What do you know, Sir, of any Money due from Mr. Kinnersley to Mr. Hales?

Mr. John Wells. No, Sir, I know not of any.

Mr. Lacy. Or of any Money lent, particularly an hundred Pound? Was Mr. Kinnersley indebted to you?

Mr. John Wells. Yes, Sir, an hundred Pound.

Mr. Lacy. Who lent him the Money to pay you?

Mr. John Wells. Mr. Hales, as Mr. Kinnersley told me.

Mr. Lacy. Who paid you the Money?

Mr. John Wells. Mr. Kinnersley.

Mr. Lacy. Was Mr. Hales present?

Mr. John Wells. I do not know, Sir. It was paid to my Attorney.

(Mr. John Simpson (Banker) called and sworn.)

Mr. Lacy. Sir, what do you know of Money due from Mr. Kinnersley to Mr. Hales?

Mr. Simpson. I know not Mr. Hales, Sir. I never saw him out of Court.

Mr. Lacy. Was Mr. Kinnersley indebted to you?

Mr. Simpson. Some Months ago he borrowed of me thirty Pounds on some Lottery Tickets.

Mr. Lacy. Who paid it you off?

Mr. Simpson. I was not at the Shop when the Money was paid.

Mr. Lacy. But do you not know how it was discharged, whether by Money or Notes, and by whom?

Mr. Simpson. No, Sir, I cannot say. It doth not appear by our Books.

Mr. Lacy. Do you know or not that Mr. Hales paid it, or gave a Note for it?—Mr. Simpson. I do not know, Sir.

Mr. Lacy. Doth any Note by your Books appear given for it, or by whom paid?

Mr. Simpson. No, Sir; if it had been paid by any other Hand than Mr. Kinnersley's, I believe that it would have appeared by our Books.

(Mr. Fowler (Banker) called and sworn.)

Mr. Kinnersley. Sir, I beg you to say whether you remember that I gave you a Note from some Friend of Mr. Hales's?

Mr. Fowler. You never mentioned his Name. I lent you Money upon Lottery Tickets; but know nothing of that you mention.

Mr. Kinnersley. Did not Mr. Hales come to your Shop, take up the Note, and pay it?

Mr. Fowler. No, Sir, not that I know of. I never saw him there.

(Mr. John Hall called and sworn.)

Mr. Lacy. Did you ever, Sir, give a Note upon Mr. Hales's Account and for his Money?

Mr. Hall. Not that I know of.

Mr. Lacy. Did you at his Desire pay any Money?

Mr. Hall. No, Sir.

Mr. Lacy. Do you know any Person that did?—Mr. Hall. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Do you know Mr. William Hales? Will you give us an Account of his paying you a Bill in broad Pieces, and whether he asked asked you to write his Name Wells. He can tell very well I know what this means. Did you give any Note, or set your Name?

Mr. Hall. I set my Name.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know your Name again?---Mr. Hall. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Is that your Name?---Mr. Hall. Yes, Sir, it is.

Mr. Serj. Whit. When did they get it of you?

Mr. Hall. On August 17 last.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. I see not how my Brother makes this Evidence against Mr. Hales. He is not brought for him but for Mr. Kinnerley; and they would cross-examine him as to Mr. Hales.

Mr. Serj. Whit. I agree with you that we could not have called him: But my Brother Eyre called him to shew that there was a promissory Note, he denies it. Well, I submit it.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, we have gone through the Evidence opened: But I would mention this as to the Examination before Sir Richard Hopkins. It is suggested that Mr. Kinnerley would have confessed, but that he was interrupted by Mr. Mitford. It is plain that he had spoke to all that was material both as to the Note and the Indorsement: I think that it is therefore wrong, for them to say that he would have confessed more, but that he was interrupted. But we will call a Gentleman to shew in what a candid Manner he behaved, and that he was not interrupted in the Manner that hath been suggested.

(Rev. Mr. John Hayes called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Was you present, Sir, at Sir Richard Hopkins's, when Mr. Kinnerley was examined?---Mr. Hayes. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. What did you observe about his being stopped, or did he fully speak his Mind?

Mr. Hayes. I remember, Sir, that Mr. Mitford desired him to be cautious, and not too free in making his Reply.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. I only ask you, whether he had not then spoke both as to the Note and the Indorsement?

Mr. Hayes. He said that the Note was his. He said that as to the Indorsement, he had heard that it was indorsed by Mr. Edwards, but knew not how it came.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Do you apprehend that his being cautioned was to be careful in his Answer, or that referred to the Answers that he had already made?

Mr. Hayes. I apprehended that the Caution was to be careful in his Answers.

(Mr. Grants called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Was you present at the Examination of Mr. Kinnerley before Sir Richard Hopkins?

Mr. Grants. Yes, Sir, Mr. Kinnerley sent for me when he was first taken up. I suppose it was because I married a Relation of his; for I knew nothing of any Transactions between him and Mr. Hales.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. I ask you, whether he fully spoke his Mind about the Note and the Indorsement, or whether he was interrupted therein?

Mr. Grants. Sir Richard asked him, whether he knew the Note and the Indorsement? There then passed a Sort of a Squabble between him and Mr. Mitford.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Did you observe that any Gentleman interrupted Mr. Kinnerley, or cautioned him as to his Answers?

Mr. Grants. There was an Interruption: But what it was I could not particularly hear.

Lord Chief-Baron. Have you done?---Mr. Serj. Eyre. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, I observe that the Defence that they have made is for one to throw it upon another. Mr. Kinnerley thinks that Mr. Hales is as deep as he can be, and therefore may bear the Load: But then, my Lord, Mr. Hales wants to retort it upon Mr. Kinnerley; but the Drift of both is, that Mr. Kinnerley may get out as he can. You will observe the Defence: There is a Pretence of mutual Dealings, and that this Note was given in Discharge of the Balance of the Account. I submit whether there hath been any Evidence of any Dealings to any such Sum: If not, to what Purpose was it given? If it was to raise Money, was it for a fraudulent Purpose, or not? If it was, they are both equally guilty. But the Pretence now is this, Mr. Hales was a Bankrupt; and it was therefore proper for them to have a third Person, in whose Name to transact. Now how could that be proper, if it was a Person over whom they had no Power? Would any one be willing to take Notes in the Name of a Stranger? Is a Stranger to be trusted with such a Sum? No. If not, how then? Here is one Man to write such a Note for another in Mr. Edwards's Name, to what Purpose? Why, in order to charge Mr. Edwards with the Money: Else, what signifieth the Indorsement. The Question then is, Was Mr. Edwards's Hand there? And did Mr. Kinnerley know it? They that would have it that Mr. Kinnerley was very innocent, say, that he knew nothing at all that Mr. Edwards's Hand was there. Well, when he comes to be called upon and importuned for the Money by Mr. Bird, what doth he say? Why, Mr. Edwards is a rich Man; I am an undone Man: You must therefore resort unto him. This was said not only upon the Sight of the Note, but before it was shewed to him. He then told Mr. Bird that he knew that he had such a Note of his so indorsed. Gentlemen, Things of this Nature are only to be detected by Circumstances. They will not call Persons to be Witnesses to these Transactions. If this was a fair Dealing, it was proper to have called some one honest Man to give an Account that he was present thereat, and privy to this Transaction: But instead of that, which is the wickedest I cannot tell; but it is plain that here is a Contrivance to charge an innocent Person; and such little Things as Evidences of Transactions of a Note of fifty or thirty Pounds, or the like, are not to go against it. Circumstances will not make a plainer Proof than here is of Forgery. A Note drawn on such a little Paper, in so slovenly a Manner, detects itself. Here is a plain Forgery. The Question is, who is guilty of it; and whether there is not sufficient Proof that the Defendants are the Persons guilty of it?

Mr. Strange. My Lord, I beg it may be considered, whether it is not criminal to give such a Note. At several Times he declared before he saw the Note, that the Name of Mr. Edwards was on the Back of it. If the Jury are of my Mind, as to one Fact, it is a Demonstration that the Name was upon it when the Note was given. If the Jury will look upon the Note, it will appear that something was written upon the Note, and nothing more probable than free. Can any imagine, that Mr. Edwards, whose name is there, would ever write a Frank upon a Note? If therefore, the Jury is of my Opinion in this Observation, that there was at first free Samuel Edwards, it is impossible to imagine but that it was wrote there before the Note was drawn. My Lord, that the Jury will take on their View. My Lord, there have been several Things said as to whose Benefit this should be for, that it is plain that Mr. Kinnerley received no Benefit by it, that therefore it could not probably be his Forgery. My Lord, it is plain by the Account that we have given you of their Correspondence, that there was something carrying on between them, which must be of a very private Nature. Doth it not appear for whose Benefit it was? I am (said he) an undone Man; you cannot expect it of me, but must apply to Mr. Edwards who indorsed it: And therefore, though he made himself liable, that signified not, as he was at the same Time liable to many more Actions. It appears that they were obliged to give the Note in the Name of another Person who was responsible, having no Credit of their own. As to that Objection, for whose Benefit, we apprehend it of no Consequence; they might probably share it between them. There was another Thing endeavoured to be proved, viz. such a Debt due from Mr. Kinnerley to Mr. Hales. Since they thought it necessary to attempt a Proof of that Kind, if they have failed in that Proof, I apprehend that their Opinion was that they stood in Need of a Proof of that Kind, which hath failed them. What have they gained? Notwithstanding a Note given of twelve hundred and sixty Pounds (a very great Sum to be due from a Clergyman in his Circumstances), they have pretended to prove nothing but one Bond of fifty Pound, which hath not been proved, but only Mr. Hales came to Mr. Marsh and told him this, which I apprehend to be no Evidence: Had they brought the Bond, it would have appeared whether true or not: This is no Proof that Mr. Kinnerley was indebted to Mr. Hales. What Mr. Cropley saith, amounteth to no more than about fifty-nine or sixty Pounds. I must submit it, whether they have given a reasonable Account of this Affair. My Lord, it is an Happiness that there are such general Circumstances as tend to detect them.

Mr. Kinnerley. My Lord, I desire to speak.

Lord Chief-Baron. You were called on before. You should advise with your Counsel whether it be proper: I would only acquaint you that it is not regular. If you would be heard, or call any Witness, if you have any Thing material for your Defence, it shall be heard: But if you produce any Thing new, the Counsel for the King must have Liberty to answer; or if you bring any Witness, they must have Liberty to cross-examine, or to bring any other Evidence on their Side.

Mr. Kinnerley. My Lord, I shall call no other Evidence. I shall leave it to your Justice; and this Gentleman I believe will acquiesce. Mr. Hales lent me fifty Pounds; he took it in that Gentleman's Name that was called for a Witness: Next, Mr. Took had one hundred and fifty Pound Note: Another Gentleman (Mr. Burton) hath Notes of one hundred Pound, which Mr. Hales gave him to discharge a Debt.

Lord Chief-Baron. Mr. Kinnerley. You intimated that you should bring nothing new.

Mr. Kinnerley. My Lord, at a Publick Coffee-House he desired me to lay down twenty-five Pounds, and the Policies are now in Court which were actually insured for so much Money. And as to this Note, I call God to Witness, that this Note I gave him upon no other Account but on settling the Account in Exchange for other Notes which amounted to that Sum. He directed me how to do it; took the Paper out of his Book, and held it double, whence I now apprehend that Mr. Edwards's Name was then on the Back. I never was privy to his altering any Letters: I gave him that Note for want of Money, for a Debt which is still due, and call upon him to declare what is true.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, whatever Mr. Kinnerley hath avowed is without Witness.

Lord Chief-Baron. When Persons are prosecuted capitally, the Law alloweth him not Counsel as to Fact: Therefore, what a Person alleges himself must be taken Notice of. Upon a Charge of Misdemeanour you make your Defence by Counsel, and they state the Case. It doth not avail in Proof what a Person saith himself, and what they say avails not, except supported by Proof. What you say will have no Weight as proved, except proved.

Mr. Kinnerley. My Lord, are Policies no Proof? Here is a Certificate from the proper Officer. Sir, I insist upon it that you do me Justice in this Matter. I will be content to suffer Death if this be not so.

Lord Chief-Baron. You are not to be now regarded.

Lord Chief-Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment against Thomas Kinnerley, Clerk, and William Hales, late of London, Goldsmith, for forging and publishing an Indorsement on a promissory Note, for the Payment of Twelve Hundred and Fifty Pounds to Samuel Edwards, Esq. And the Indictment sets forth, That the Defendants, having in their Custody a promissory Note subscribed by Thomas Kinnerley, and bearing Date August 16, 1727, whereby Kinnerley promised to pay Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds to Samuel Edwards, Esq. within three Months; that the Defendants, having this Note in their Custody with an Intention to deceive and defraud the same Samuel Edwards, Esq. and being Persons of evil Fame and Reputation, did falsely and fraudulently forge and counterfeit on this Note for Twelve Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable within three Months after Date to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or his Order, an Indorsement to this Effect,

Pray pay to the Order of

for the Value received,
SAMUEL EDWARDS.

thereby intending to charge Mr. Edwards as the Indorser of that Note with the Payment of the Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds contained in the Body of the said Note; that after they had forged and counterfeited this Indorsement upon this Note, and knowing it to be a Counterfeit, they did publish the said Note so indorsed. Gentlemen, the Counsel on the Behalf of the Prosecution have acquainted you that they look upon this as a Contrivance of both Defendants to carry on this Forgery upon what they suppose at first merely a Frank; that the Name of Mr. Edwards upon the Cover of a Letter with the Word free; that the Word free hath been at the Time of the Indorsement altered and made for the, and the Word Value received added to that, and made the Indorsement to this Note. For the corroborating of this they have called called several Witnesses. First, Thomas Maddox was called a Servant to Mr. Edwards. He tells you that Mr. Edwards lives in Duke-street, Westminster, and that the Defendant Hales lived near over-against him; that the Defendant Hales frequently sent Covers over, upon which he had several Franks directed to several Persons; that this hath been the Custom for several Years; that Mr. Edwards used to send them over indorsed with his Name Samuel Edwards, Esq. He saith, that his usual Way was to indorse the whole Supercription; but that last Summer, some Time about July, there were six Covers sent over by the Defendant to Mr. Edwards's House by the Defendant Hales, desiring that they might be franked with only Samuel Edwards Esq. without writing the whole Supercription; that Mr. Edwards declined that, saying that he never did it: He therefore refused him, and those Covers were not indorsed, but were produced here. He hath been asked, Whether he knew of any Correspondence besides this of franking Letters between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Hales; and whether he knew of any between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kinnerley? He answered, That he doth not know of any whatsoever. Another Servant, one Anne Clarke, comes and produceth a Paper of Names that was brought over from the Defendant Hales to Mr. Samuel Edwards's House, in order for him to frank Letters to those Persons, and write the whole Supercription as at other Times. She produced the Paper in Court, which she said that she received from Mr. Hales's Servant. And Mr. Booth being examined thereto declares it to be the proper Hand of the Defendant Hales, with whose Writing he hath been well acquainted, especially since his Bankruptcy, he being a Clerk in that Commission. In this Paper is wrote,

Two to John Pratt, Esq; Bristol.

Two to Mr. Levett, Huntington.

Two to Stephen Mitford, Esq; Exeter.

They make use of this Evidence to shew that there was a Sort of an Attempt to get Covers with these Names franked, hoping or supposing that there might be a Space left sufficient to write a Note of this Nature. Mr. Booth who was called to prove the Hand-writing of Mr. Hales, was cross-examined by the Counsel for the Defendant, whether he knew of any Traffick of Mr. Hales since his Bankruptcy. He saith, That he doth not know of any, but that he was well acquainted with his Hand-writing, being employed in the Affair of the Commission of Bankruptcy. Mr. Thomas Bird was next called and examined as to the Circumstances of the Publication of this Note. He tells you that this Note, dated Aug. 16, 1727, for the forged Indorsement whereof both the Defendants are prosecuted, was brought to him, in order to take up Money upon this Note, and further Security, which Mr. Hales gave in March last; that it was brought in the Manner that it now is, and no Alteration made either in the Body of the Note or in the Indorsement, but it stands and remains in the same Manner as when he first received it; that when Mr. Hales came to him, he proposed to borrow of him seven hundred and fifty Pounds upon the Credit of this Note for his Security, and likewise upon his own Note for the Payment of this Money; that he had been requested by a Friend of his in the Morning before to accommodate Mr. Hales with this Money upon the Credit of a Note which the Person had in his Hand, and which was the same Note; and that on the Afternoon of the same Day [March 20], while he was at the Hudson's-Bay House, in Fenchurch-Street, Mr. Hales came to him with the Note, and he then lent him the Money for fourteen Days; that he then desired Mr. Hales to write some Paper to testify the Receipt of the Money, and be a further Security to him; and that the said Mr. Hales thereupon wrote a promissory Note dated the same Day, wherein he promised the Repayment of this Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds in fourteen Days, which Note was subscribed by the Defendant Hales himself; that the Sum of Money was made up in several Bank Notes; that he delivered these to the said Defendant Hales, and took this Note and Mr. Hales's own Note, as a Security for the said Money; that April 3 following Mr. Hales brought four hundred Pounds, which he indorsed upon his own Note; and that the rest of the Money remains due. He tells you, that when he heard that the Defendant Hales was apprehended in September last, he sent to one Tomkins, an Attorney, delivered this Note to him to go to Mr. Kinnerley, to get this Money for him. The Account that he received was, that Mr. Kinnerley was out of Town, so that he could not meet with him. At length Mr. Tomkins intimated that Mr. Kinnerley cared not to see him, but would come the next Day to Mr. Bird himself upon this Affair. Accordingly on or about the 16th of September, the Defendant, Kinnerley, came to Mr. Bird at his Compting-house: Mr. Bird, not knowing who he was, seeing a Clergyman come in his Gown, and looking a little at him, he said his Name was Kinnerley. He hereupon said that he had a Note of his Hand left with him for a Security; to which he replied, I know, Sir, that you have, and it is for Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, payable in three Months to Mr. Edwards or his Order; that he said that the Note was of his own Hand-writing; but immediately added, How it came to be indorsed by Mr. Edwards I know not. This, Gentlemen, you must take particular Notice of, because this was the first Mention of Mr. Edwards's Indorsement: At that Time Mr. Bird had not mentioned that, nor shewed him the Note; when Mr. Kinnerley having owned the Note to be his Hand-writing, immediately added, but how it came to be indorsed by Mr. Edwards I know not; naming thus the particular Person who was the Indorser of this Note. He saith, that Mr. Kinnerley was in a great Consternation at that Time, and said that he was an undone Man, among other Expressions. And he said likewise, that Mr. Edwards was a Gentleman of Substance; and this he declared, tho' Mr. Bird had not shewn him the Note at that Time: I am (said he) an undone Man; Mr. Edwards is a Man of Substance. This he said before that the Note was shewn to him, or any Declaration was made by Mr. Bird relating to Mr. Edwards's being the Indorser of this Note. He said further that he was not in a Capacity to pay this Money; and that they must apply to Mr. Edwards, who was a substantial Man, for it. Gentlemen, this was made use of as a Sort of Defence at this Time to avoid this Thing, to put it off from himself by this Argument, why Bird should not come upon Kinnerley himself, who was incapable of paying him, but take his Remedy against Mr. Edwards, who was a substantial Man. He was cross-examined: The Counsel for the Defendant asked who was the Person that recommended Mr. Hales to him as the Borrower of this Money?

It was answered, That it was Sir Bibb Lake. He was asked on whose Credit he lent the Money, Mr. Hales's or Mr. Edwards's? It was answered both, as it must be in such a Case. Gentlemen, upon this the Note was read; for it being received directly from the Hands of the Defendant Hales, that was sufficient Cause to read the Note, and lay it before you. Accordingly it appears to bear Date Aug. 16, 1727, and is a promissory Note, running thus:

I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq; or his Order, within three Months after Date, the Sum of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, for Value received, £. 1260.

Thomas Kinnerley.

Then comes the Indorsement: And there, there is wrote on the Top, 'Pray pay to the Order of,' then there is a large Blank, then comes 'for Value received', and then there is the Subscription 'Samuel Edwards.' Gentlemen, upon this it is proper to take notice of the Observations made by the Counsel for the Prosecution on the Manner of the writing of this Indorsement. They observe that this must be a Subscription by Mr. Edwards of his Name for a Frank for the passing of a Letter free: It appears very probable from the Manner of his writing a Frank. Free and not Frank is the Word that he makes use of: And upon what appears by what remains in this Note, they say, that by the Top it appears that it must be cut off from some other Note, and that there is an Indenture where they suppose that some other Letters were; that there is the Appearance of something not a Blot, but the Appearance of the Remainder of a Letter or Figure on this Place, and some Appearance of a little Dash from it. But they say that for the is substituted for the Word free; that it appears by the Thickness of the Letters, by the Ink, and by the Manner wherein the Letters are put there, and by the Form of the ff which Mr. Edwards makes in the Word free; and that there is still the Appearance of the Remainder of one or both the e's. Upon this, Gentlemen, you will consider whether the o and the r have not the Appearance of some other Letters under them, and between the f and the r. It is plain upon Sight whether the other Letters seem wrote of the same Strength and Thickness with the f and r. The ff seems paler and thinner, and of a different Ink from the other Letters. And then, Gentlemen, the Word the is here written at Length. You will consider whether this seems not to have been from a Necessity to put some other Word to fill the whole Compass of the Word free. Now the seems not wrote at the same Time, and with the same Ink with Value received. If this had been wrote all at the same Time, it is pretty extraordinary that it should not have been wrote even. The f is wrote in a straight Line even with Value received, but the o sinks a little, and the r comes under. You will consider, Gentlemen, whether there was sufficient Room, and whether this was the Cause of putting it so. These Considerations are made use of to make it probable that it was wrote at different Times: If so, it is most probable that it was at first free, and that the other Words were substituted afterwards. So that these are the Observations as to the Manner of writing it, which you are to consider whether they are true, and there be a Foundation for them or not. Mr. Spicer then was called, who hath been a Clerk to Mr. Edwards in the Exchequer between ten and eleven Years, but hath been in his Service about twenty-four Years. The Note was shewn to him, and he tells you, that as to the Name, he takes it to be the proper Hand-writing of Mr. Samuel Edwards, his Master: The f he also counts to be his. Upon his Observation and Oath, which is Evidence to be left to you, the Word for is wrote over other Letters, and he believes, upon his Oath, that the first Word was free. He saith, that Mr. Edwards, when he maketh a Frank, makes use of a ff as in the Manner that it here stands. If it was made for Value received at first, it is pretty extraordinary that a ff should be written, and not a single f as usual. Why (saith he) it is my Master's usual Way of Writing free. And then he saith that he always wrote free and not frank; which is material, as the Word frank might not so well correspond with this Alteration. He saith that the r seems visible, and to stand between the o and r. You will see whether there be the Remainder of any such Letter or no; since he saith that he doth think that the r is visible. He tells you, that as he is Clerk to Mr. Edwards, so he is acquainted with his private Affairs, relating to his Estate and the like, and that he doth not know of any Money Transactions between his Master and either of the Defendants; that he is so well acquainted with his Affairs, and the Nature of his Employment under Mr. Edwards such, that he believes that if any such Dealings had been, it would have come to his Cognizance. He tells you, likewise, that Mr. Edwards is not a Person that useth to deal this Way: It was very proper to ask him this, because it is common for many Persons to indorse Notes in this Manner. He saith that it is not his usual Custom: It cometh not into his public Business; and, as to his private Transactions, he never knew him to do it. They were then going to call a Witness to prove the Body of the Note to be Mr. Kinnerley's Hand-writing. Upon this, Mr. Kinnerley took upon him to admit that it was all his own Hand-writing. So then it is to be taken for confessed, that the Body of the Note was his writing. It is written in this Manner,

August 16, 1727.

I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq; or his Order, three Months after Date, the Sum of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, for Value received, £. 1260.

Thomas Kinnerley.

Well, Gentlemen, after this, the Counsel for the Prosecution say, that Mr. Kinnerley hath in effect confessed as much as amounts to what they stand in need of to convict him of this Forgery. First, They call Mr. Wright, who was present at the Examination of Mr. Kinnerley before Sir Richard Hopkins. Mr. Wright tells you, that at that Time the Defendant Kinnerley owned that the Note was all his own Hand-writing; that Mr. Edwards thereupon asked him why he drew the Note payable to him, when there never had been any Dealings between them. Mr. Wright saith, That the Defendant Kinnerley owned at that Time that there never had been any Dealings between them, and likewise that he did not know Mr. Edwards, nor had, to the best of his Knowledge ever, seen him till then before Sir Richard. But he said, that the Reason of his doing it was this: That he was indebted to the other Defendant Hales in a Sum of such an Amount and more; and that Hales desired him, the Defendant Kinnerley, to write him a promissory Note for that Sum; that he asked Mr. Hales whom he should make the Note payable to, and Mr. Hales said to Samuel Edwards, Esq; and that that accordingly he wrote the Note in that Manner that it now appears in to you upon the Request of Mr. Hales. Mr. Wright tells you, that at that Time he had heard what had past relating to the Discourse with Bird; and he told him, Why you have expressed yourself as if you was a ruined and undone Man; why did you say that, if Mr. Hales requested your writing, him a Note for such a Sum as Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds? Upon this, one Mitford said to Mr. Kinnerley, 'You shall not go on to declare yourself any further, you may do yourself an Injury.' This is made use of as a Circumstance by the King's Counsel, that Mr. Kinnerley was going to explain himself further if he had not been prevented by his Friend or Solicitor, who knew the Consequence of a Confession of this Nature. Mr. Wright tells you, that at this Time when Mr. Bird was examined, and said that he had not at that Time shewed the Note to Kinnerley, when he said, that how it came to be indorsed by Mr. Edwards he could not tell. Mr. Edwards hereupon asked him whether he knew of this Indorsement before Mr. Bird shewed him the Note? That he answered that he did, but that how it came there he could not tell. So that that is the Substance of his Confession in that Respect, that he did know of it, though he said he knew not how it came there. Sir Richard Hopkins likewise was called to give an Account of what passed before him: He saith, that he took Minutes of what passed; that it was in the latter end of September that he was brought before him charged with Forgery of two Notes, this of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, and another of Sixteen Hundred Pounds; that as to this Note, it seemed to him an altered Note, which was the Occasion of his more strict Examination of the Matter. He saith, that he examined Mr. Bird, who advanced this Money, who said that before he had shewn this Note to Mr. Kinnerley, when he had only told him that he had a Note of his Hand left with him for a Security, he answered, I know that you have: It is for Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, payable in three Months to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or his Order, and is indorsed by Samuel Edwards. Sir Richard hereupon asked Mr. Edwards if he had had any Dealings with Mr. Kinnerley? Who said that he had not. Kinnerley also said the same, but said that he drew this Note payable to Mr. Edwards at the Request of the other Defendant Hales, to whom he was indebted in that Sum, and more; but that he did not know Mr. Edwards, nor to the best of his Knowledge had ever seen him before that Time. He saith, that upon his observing that it was very strange that he should make such a Note payable to a Person with whom he owned that he had no Dealings, and who was an utter Stranger to him, Kinnerley was going further to open his Mind, but one Mitford stood and prevented him from going on. Richard Davis, who is the Constable that apprehended him, was next called to give an Account of what passed when the Warrant was issued out, and given him to be executed. He tells you, that because Mr. Kinnerley lived out of the City, he went to a publick House within the Jurisdiction of the City, and sent a Porter to desire to speak with him; but received Answer that he was not in Town. He inquired when he would be in Town, and went himself, and made a Pretence of a Couple wanting to be married. At first came out the Daughter, and then the Mother, whom he acquainted with his Business: At first they seemed to say that he was not at Home, or did not readily say where he was; but after that he had given an Account of his Business, he was carried into the Parlour, and then Mr. Kinnerley came to him. He told him the Business of the Marriage: The Defendant thereupon asked him several Questions; and, among the rest, how old the Lady to be married was? This is necessary to be mentioned, because they have insisted upon it as a Proof of his Honesty, that he asked whether she was of Age or not? And being told that she was not, then asked whether there was Consent of Relations or not? If (said he) there be not, I will not be concerned in a Thing of this Nature for an hundred Pound. He was told that the Brother was with her at the Magpye Tavern, and asked to go thither for Satisfaction, but would not go. Upon this the Constable saith, that he went away, and made it his Business to watch and see when Mr. Kinnerley came out. In an Hour or two he came out, he dogged him up the Minories, then when he was come within Aldgate, he told him that he had a Warrant against him for Forgery of a Note of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds. He then desired him to go into a House with him, where he asked to see the Warrant: Upon seeing it, he said, that if the Gentleman had sent for him he should readily have come to him. Being asked why he denied himself? He answered, that he was afraid of being arrested for Debt, and that was the Reason of his denying himself when the Constable came to inquire for him. He then owned that the Note was his own Hand-writing; but said that he knew not how the Indorsement came there. This agrees with what was said by the Counsel, and proved by the Witnesses, concerning what was said by him upon his Examination before Sir Richard Hopkins, and to Mr. Bird at his Counting-house when he came to him. This is the Evidence, as to the Fact. The Counsel for the Prosecution go on and say, that there hath been a private Correspondence carried on between these two Defendants, which they insist on as a Circumstance to make it likely that they joined herein. They called to this, first, Mr. Thomas Bab, who saith, that both the Defendants used to meet frequently at his House; that Mr. Hales frequently came there early in the Morning, would sometimes walk about a considerable Time, would ask sometimes if the Minister had been there without naming him, but they knew whom he meant, having frequently seen them together; that some Time before Kinnerley came in, Hales sitting by the Window, saw him go by and went to him; sometimes Kinnerley came in and went through the Coffee-room into a back Room, and Hales would follow after him, and they would stay there together; Kinnerley sometimes would go out at one Door, and Hales immediately go out at the other; that this continued for about a Month or three Weeks before Mr. Hales's Apprehension; that one Time particularly, Mr. Kinnerley passed by and went down Fleet-street, and Mr. Hales seeing him, rose up and went out after him: This, he saith, was about a Month before the Defendant Hales was taken up. He saith, that they seldom sat down in the publick Room, but went into a private Room. John Brooks was next called, who saith, that he keeps a Coffee-house in Downing-street, in Westminster. He said, that Mr. Kinnerley used to come sometimes to his Coffee-house, send for a Porter, and give him a Note for Mr. Hales, who hath come to him, and they have gone into a private Part of the Room, and there they have staid for three or four Hours together; that it being in the Evening he hath thought them in the dark, and asked the Servant why a Candle was not carried them? Who hath answered, that he had carried them one but they refused it, not caring to be interrupted; that they met thus about three or four Times in a Month, a little while before Mr. Hales was apprehended. Mr. Janeway also was called, who saith, that he hath seen the two Defendants several Times retire up Stairs together at his Coffee-house. This, Gentlemen, is relied upon, and given in Evidence, to shew that there was a Correspondence between them about some Affairs not so proper to be managed in Publick. This is the Substance of the Evidence on the Side of the Prosecution: And the Counsel for the King tell you, that as to Things of this Nature, they must be done in a very private Way in order to prevent a Discovery; it cannot be expected that they would call Persons to see such a Thing done; that the only Evidence, therefore, that can be given is Circumstance. Well, Gentlemen, the Defendants come upon their Defence: They appear by different Counsel, and make a separate Defence. The Counsel on the Behalf of the Defendant Hales insist that there was a Debt due from Kinnerley to Hales, for which this Note was given; that this doth appear from the several Declarations made by Mr. Kinnerley from time to time. They rely upon this as Evidence of such a Debt for Money advanced to him, and that this Note was given by the Defendant Kinnerley for such a Debt. They tell you, that Mr. Hales being a Bankrupt, and therefore it not being proper to have such a Note in his own Name, because it would be liable to be claimed by the Assignees in the Commission of Bankruptcy against him, that therefore it was proper to make use of the Name of another Person; that Mr. Edwards was never affected or injured hereby; that Part of the Money hath been paid, and if they had had a little Patience, as Four Hundred Pounds was paid, so the rest would have been paid: And though they admit that the making of such a Note in the Name of another to advance Credit without his Leave was criminal, yet it did not, they say, really affect or injure him. And then to shew that there was a Reason or Foundation for the giving of this Note, they said that they would call Witnesses that there was an Account stated, upon which this Money appeared to be due. They called Robert Burkit to it: But he saith that he knoweth of no such Account, it is all Imagination; that his Name was made use of without his Knowledge; that he knew nothing of any Money ever due between them: So that it is plain, that that Witness is lost in the Examination as to any Benefit to them. They said that they had another Witness who happened not to be here: This is the Substance of the Defence of the Defendant Hales. Kinnerley then comes on his Defence. His Counsel insist that he is not evidenced to be concerned and knowing of this Forgery; that as this is a Crime of a very heinous Nature, and deserves the greatest Punishment, so it is necessary that the clearest Proof should be given you before you convict him. They say that his Character likewise requires stronger Evidence than others; that his Credit is more concerned than others, because the very Exercise of his Function depends upon his Credit, without which he will be of no Use in the Parish where he doth or may minister. And they say, that it appears by the Evidence on the Side of the Prosecution, that he is very careful in the Discharge of his Function, which they insist on from his Refusal to be concerned in a Marriage without a Licence and Consent of Friends, it being contrary to Acts of Parliament and to the Canons of the Church, and that they suppose him as cautious in other Things. They say, that the Thing itself is usual, and that it is an innocent and harmless Thing; that no Person is hurt by another's engaging to pay him a Sum of Money by such a Note; that the Person, indeed, who gives such a Note is liable to an Action for the Money, but that there is no Injury done to the Person to whom it is made payable; that therefore as to Mr. Kinnerley's subscribing a Note for so much Money payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. especially when it was done upon the Request of the Defendant Hales, upon account of a Debt which was due from him to Hales, and for the Convenience of Hales, it was an innocent Thing; that Kinnerley was to pay Hales so much Money, and Hales himself desired a Note for it in this Name. They say that Kinnerley might be induced to do this from the Credit and Character of Hales, and from their former Acquaintance; that he was the Minister in his Parish when the Partnership was between him and Sir Stephen Evance; that notwithstanding his Misfortunes since that first Acquaintance, it is plain that he hath been corresponded with by Persons of Credit, therefore there can be no Reflection on that Head on Mr. Kinnerley. And they say, that as there was nothing culpable in giving of the Note, so nothing amiss hath happened thereupon; that if Mr. Hales hath done any thing amiss, it does not affect Mr. Kinnerley. Though they raise Mr. Hales's Credit at first, yet afterward they link it, and seem to throw the Blame upon him. They plead also, that there is no Evidence that the Indorsement was upon the Note when it was subscribed by Mr. Kinnerley. If it was afterwards (say they) indorsed with or without Authority from Mr. Edwards, it will not affect Kinnerley, except there be express Proof that he did it. They say also, that there is no Proof of any Franks delivered to Kinnerley but only to Hales; that he had not therefore the Opportunity that Hales might have; that therefore he is not involved in that Circumstance of the Inducement hereto, that Proof or Evidence given is nothing against him. And then (say they) to what Purpose should the Note be contrived to be indorsed with the Privy of Kinnerley, when he hath no manner of Benefit thereby, Hales having received the Money? They ask the Question qui bono, and thence infer that Kinnerley could not do this. And they insist upon it in point of Law, that the writing of this Note can be no Fraud in him, he having done what renders him liable to an Action: And to shew that the Money was due from Kinnerley to Hales, they have called several Witnesses to shew that there was a Foundation for this Note. Mr. Peter Marsh was called. He saith, that about ten or eleven Years ago he brought a Bond of Fifty Pounds to him made by Mr. Kinnerley payable to him. Mr. Hales told him, that Mr. Kinnerley owed him this Money, and had given him this Note made payable to him, which he desired him therefore to get for him. He knew nothing of the Matter, was surprised that his Name was made use of, and so returned the Bond again. This is insisted upon, Gentlemen, to shew that there were Transactions between Kinnerley and Hales. Now whether this proves a Debt due from the one to the other, or proves an extraordinary Method of taking Bonds in the Names of Persons without their Consent, you are to consider; especially when you must know that if this Bond had been put in suit by Peter Marsh, he would have been liable to recover the Money. Well, then William Cropley is next called. He saith, that he received at Janeway's Coffee-house about Sixty Pounds, a Debt that was due from Kinnerley to him. He received it of the Defendant Hales, and Kinnerley was there with him at that Time. He saith, that Kinnerley was the original Debtor for the Money, and that Hales gave him his Note for it. He saith, that Kinnerley had borrowed of him an Hundred and odd Pounds; that he brought another Gentleman to be Security with him for it; that at the End of six Months he could not get his Money; that he enquired of Kinnerley for it, who led him a Dance from Place to Place after him for a considerable Time; that at last he was forced to sue for the Money; and recovered half from the other Gentleman; that he then prosecuted Kinnerley for the rest; that then Kinnerley met him with Mr. Hales at some Tavern, and then Hales told him that he was to receive about six or seven hundred Pound within about three Months Time, and then he would pay him. He saith, that upon that Offer of Hales he took a Note of Hales, and a new one of Kinnerley for the Money; and that in February last he got the Money as before-mentioned, and received it at Janeway's Coffee-house. And he saith, that some little Matter (about fifty Shillings or thereabouts) was due for the Charges, for which he gave him his Note. Hales gave his Note for the Payment of a Debt of Kinnerley's, a Debt of Fifty Pounds, and he gave this Reason for it, that he was to receive within six Months about Six or Seven Hundred Pounds for him, and therefore he could venture being Security for Kinnerley. This is a Transaction of quite another Nature. It is so far from proving a Debt from Kinnerley to Hales, that it rather proves Hales indebted and becoming Security for the other. Well, then John Wells is called. He saith, that he knoweth not of any Money due from Kinnerley to Hales, but that Kinnerley owed him an Hundred Pound; that afterwards this Money was paid to his Attorney, by whom or how he could not tell. Mr. Simpson, who is a Partner with Mr. Fowler, is then asked concerning Thirty Pounds borrowed upon some Lottery Tickets of Mr. Fowler, and is asked concerning this Money, how, where, and by whom it was discharged? He saith, that he was not at the Shop, and knoweth not by whom and how it was discharged. Mr. Kinnerley, upon this, applies himself to one of the Gentlemen of the Jury, and interrogates him how this Money was paid. Mr. Fowler was here-upon sworn to give Evidence. Upon his Oath, he saith, that he never knew of any Transaction in the Name of Hales; that he never saw him at his Shop. That as to Kinnerley there was a Transaction of Money borrowed on Lottery Tickets, but he knoweth nothing of Hales's being concerned. Another Person is examined whether he ever gave a Note on Mr. Hales's Account, or at his Request paid any Money? He saith, that he never did, nor knoweth that any other did. They tell you also, that the Witnesses for the Prosecution have in a great measure proved the Denial of Mr. Kinnerley of his knowing of the Indorsement: But they call themselves for further Proof, Evidence of it. They call Mr. John Hayes, who saith that he was present at the Examination of Mr. Kinnerley before Sir Richard Hopkins; that at that Time the Defendant Kinnerley owned his writing the Body of the Note, but at the same time said, that how the Indorsement came there he could not tell. He tells you that the Caution that was given to the Defendant Kinnerley, was after this Declaration made by him; that then there was an Admonition that he should be cautious in the Answers that he gave. One Andrew Grants likewise was present at that Examination. He saith, that that was all that passed at that Time, and that he was not stopped by Mr. Mitford, but only a reasonable Caution given him that he should not be too much in an Hurry, or the like. This is the Substance of the Defence made by the Counsel for both the Defendants. It is the Right of the Counsel for the King to reply. They say, that there hath been no Evidence of Transactions between Kinnerley and Hales to the Amount of any such Sum as the Note is for; that if the Note was given with a Design to defraud, both must be equally guilty; and that it is a very extraordinary Thing that this Note should be written by Mr. Kinnerley as a Promissory Note for such a Sum payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. when it doth not appear, on the Defendant's Part, that there was any Correspondence between Edwards and Kinnerley, and on their Side it hath been proved that there was no such Correspondence; that it was very extraordinary if this Note was given for a Debt due, that it should be taken in the Name of one with whom they had no Money-dealings whatsoever, and over whom they could not be supposed to have any Power; that this therefore seems to be only to give a Credit to the Note; that it could not be of any Use whatsoever without having the Name of some Person of Circumstance and Condition to it who would be obliged to pay the Note; that this Note must have been thrown upon Mr. Edwards, appears (they say) from the Declaration of Kinnerley, that he was an undone Man. If then it was of any Use to borrow Money upon or in any other Way, it must be from the Substance of Mr. Edwards, and not from the Poverty and Deficiency of Kinnerley. They insist upon that Circumstance, and the Declaration of Kinnerley, that he knew of that Indorsement, though how it came there, he said that he knew not. And further they say, that as the Name was Mr. Edwards's own Hand-writing, if that the Word free was wrote upon the Paper, it must be before the writing of the Body of the Note. It cannot be imagined that the Words were not there before. It cannot be supposed that Mr. Edwards would set his Name to the Word free, or to any other Word on the Back of a Note promising the Payment of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, within six Months, to him or his Order. They insist, therefore, that this Name and the Word free were upon the Paper before the Note was wrote, and that this is a strong and reasonable Evidence that Kinnerley must be privy to the Name Edwards, and the Indorsement at that Time. After that, Mr. Kinnerley desired to be heard, and he was indulged: But as to that you have been informed, that in Indictments for Misdemeanours, whatever the Defendant saith for himself, it will have no further Validity than as the Counsel insist, and Evidence is brought for him. The Circumstance, therefore, is very different from what is allowed when Persons are prosecuted in capital Cases. However, you have heard how he hath declared in the most solemn Manner his Innocence. You are to consider whether that is of any Validity, unless there was Evidence of such a Debt due from the Defendant Kinnerley to Hales the other Defendant, whether you will take it upon his Word. This being the Evidence on both Sides, the first Question is, whether the Indorsement is forged, because, till you determine that it is a forged Indorsement, there can be no Prosecution for the Publication of it. If it be a true Indorsement, no Person can be guilty of the Publication, much less can Mr. Kinnerley, who did not deliver the Note: That therefore lieth upon the Defence of Mr. Hales, which is not made but by the Defence of Kinnerley. You are to consider then the Opportunity that the Defendant might take hold of from the receiving of Franks for several Years from Mr. Edwards; and you will consider whether there is any clear Proof, or so much as the Colour of it, that Mr. Edwards was privy to an Indorsement of this Nature, or there was any Occasion for such an Indorsement. If no such Money was indeed due, to what Purpose should the Note be indorsed? Upon the best Observations that I can make, I see not any Evidence to raise a reasonable Presumption from, that this was a fair and justifiable Indorsement. If it was not an Imposition on Mr. Edwards, because it makes him liable as an Indorser for the Sum mentioned in the Note, if you should find that, yet you are to consider whether it is fair to make use of another's Name in a Note; for Mr. Kinnerley, who by his own Confession is a poor, undone Man, and whose Living is under a Sequestration, to make a Note indorsed by another Person who can never be reimbursed by this Person who subscribed the Note, it is a very extraordinary Way; though they say that it is an innocent Way of raising Money, for a Person in Custody, or liable to it, to make use of the Name of a substantial Person in such a Note, whose Credit must be at Stake for the Money. And then as to the Nature of the Note: If it was only a Promissory Note for so much Money payable to Samuel Edwards, Esq. it was not of such Consequence, for then he was not liable: But he is liable to the Payment only upon the Indorsement of such a Note. Why then, Gentlemen, you are to consider, whether this Note, when Mr. Kinnerley had wrote it, could be of any Use in the World unless it was indorsed afterwards. Why then this Note is either a Preparation to obtain Mr. Edwards's voluntary Indorsement for a Security, or an Imposition upon him. Hath any Evidence been produced to shew a Probability that Mr. Edwards would give him that Liberty to transfer his own Insufficiency and Poverty upon him, and make him liable to Mr. Edwards, which can have no Effect but by an Indorsement; doth not Mr. Kinnerley put it into the Power of Hales to negotiate this Note? Therefore I must inform you, if two Persons contrive together to draw such a Note, and make use of it, both Persons concerned in the Transaction, in my Opinion, will be guilty. Forgery is an intire Fact. Though one Person doth one Part, and another the other, both are equally guilty. Gentlemen, it is material, as hath been observed, to consider when this Indorsement was made; and if it was a forged Indorsement, you will consider when it will appear to have been indorsed. You have been truly told that this can be only known by Circumstances: Therefore you are to consider, whether the Name of Samuel Edwards can be supposed to be set there after the Note was wrote. Well then, what is the proper and natural Way of understanding this Transaction? If there be the Name of a Person on any Paper, where there is Room for making an Alteration, what is natural? Why, to transact on the other Side what is necessary to supply and make that complete, without which the Name would be to no Purpose. Therefore, that is a material Consideration; if it is impossible that the Name could be wrote after the making of the Note, whether that be not a reasonable Presumption that he saw this Indorsement when he wrote this Note. Suppose the Words only free Samuel Edwards, it was not proper to write this Note on the Back of it. If this Indorsement was made without his Privy, how came he to know of it when he came to Mr. Bird? And upon Mr. Bird's telling him that he had a Note of his left with him, immediately answer'd, 'I know that you have; it is for so much, payable in three Months to Mr. Edwards, but how it came indorsed by him I know not;' when Mr. Bird swears that he had not then acquainted him with the Indorsement, nor shewed him the Note at that Time. No Evidence hath been produced to shew how he came to know that it was indorsed. He declared, indeed, that he knew not how it came to be indorsed: But you are to consider, whether that Part wherein he declares his Knowledge is to be regarded, or what he declares he knows not of. A Declaration of this Nature will be taken most strongly against him. Consider, therefore, whether this latter Part of his Declaration be sufficient to discharge him. If he knew that it was indorsed, you should have some Evidence upon what Account it was. As to the rest, as to the Character, his Coat, or the like, you are to try him upon the same Law with Hales. I know not why the Habit he wears should exempt him from the common Rules of Proof. As to the particular Circumstance of his Usefulness depending on his Credit, that is left to you. But the same Law is made for one that is for another: You are therefore to consider of it. If this be a fair Indorsement you must acquit both. If you are satisfied that it is not, but the Indorsement is a forged Indorsement, whether either, and which of the Defendants seems to be guilty. You are to consider the Nature and Circumstances of the Transaction, and whether there appears any thing to distinguish the one from the other, and accordingly give your Verdict against the one or the other. If you desire it, the Note will be given to you.

Jury. My Lord, If your Lordship please, we will take the Note up with us. Mr. Kinnerley. I desire to be heard —

L. C. Baron. Not in case of a Misdemeanour. I know not any Instance in which it hath been allowed.

Mr. Kinn. I beg leave, my Lord. I take the Lord to witness —

L. C. Baron. All I can say is, if you have a mind to aver or affirm any thing, the Court would rather be irregular than abridge you of any thing.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. My Lord, it never was allowed; after your Lordship has summed up the Evidence, and the Jury going out; it is strange Mr. Kinnerley will behave so.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is it, my Lord, to be allowed?

L. C. Baron. The Gentlemen have insisted upon it. You cannot be heard. Mr.

Mr. Kinnersley. By the living God, I know nothing of it!
 Clerk of Assize. [Calling over the Jury] Are you all agreed in your Verdict?—Jury. All.
 Clerk. Who shall speak for you?—Jury. Our Foreman.
 Clerk. How say you, Is William Hales Guilty of the Misdemeanour wherewith he stands charged, in forging an Indorsement on a Promissory

Note for Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. and publishing the same knowing it to be forged; or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.
 Clerk. How say you, Is Thomas Kinnersley Guilty of the said Misdemeanour wherewith he stands charged, or Not Guilty?
Foreman. Guilty.

VII. The Trial of WILLIAM HALES, for a Misdemeanour, in obtaining from Thomas Bird the Sum of Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds by false Tokens, &c.

The Jury called over again.
 Clerk. OYEZ, OYEZ. If any one can inform, &c. &c.
 Indictment.] William Hales stands indicted by the Name of William Hales, &c. for falsely and deceitfully obtaining the Sum of Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds of Thomas Bird by a false Token, viz. a Promissory Note, in these Words following:

Aug. 16, 1727.
 I promise to pay to Samuel Edwards, Esq. or his Order, within three Months after Date, the Sum of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, for Value received,
 THOMAS KINNERSLEY.
 On which Note there is the following Indorsement,
 Pay pay to the Order of for Value received,
 SAMUEL EDWARDS.

to the great Damage of Samuel Edwards, Esq. &c. To this Indictment he hath pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Strange. May it please your Lordship, this is an Indictment against the Prisoner William Hales only. It sets forth that he, having in his Possession a certain Writing purporting to be a Promissory Note made in the Name of Thomas Kinnersley, wherein the said Thomas Kinnersley is supposed to promise to pay the Sum of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds to Samuel Edwards, Esq. within three Months, with a forged Indorsement of Mr. Edwards on that Note, did, in Marib last, falsely and deceitfully obtain of Mr. Thomas Bird, the Sum of Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds by that false Token. This is laid to be contrary to the Statute in that Case made, to the Damage of Samuel Edwards, Esq. &c. to the Breach of his Majesty's Peace, and to the ill Example of his Majesty's Subjects in like Case offending.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, this is an Indictment against Mr. William Hales, for obtaining a Sum of Money by the false Token of this Note. For this we will only call Mr. Bird.

Mr. Bird called and sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Bird, look upon the Note, and give an Account who brought it to you, and what Money you paid upon it?

Mr. Bird. Mr. William Hales brought it to me on March 20th, last.

Mr. At. Gen. What did he say?

Mr. Bird. He said, that at the Request of a Gentleman, I was to lend him Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds upon that Note.

Mr. At. Gen. Did he produce the Note?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir, I had it then of him.

Mr. At. Gen. Was it then indorsed as it is now?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir, in the Manner as now.

Mr. At. Gen. How much Money did you deliver him upon it?

Mr. Bird. Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds.

Lord Chief-Baron Pengelly. Did you deliver it, when he delivered you this Note?—Mr. Bird. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. At. Gen. Should you have let him have this Money if he had not produced this Note?—Mr. Bird. No, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. What was it paid in?—Mr. Bird. In one or more Bank Notes.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. I submit this, my Lord: They have laid this Indictment but singly for obtaining Money, whereas in the former they layed doubly for obtaining Money, or other valuable Things: It lieth therefore upon them to prove that this Mr. Hales did receive in Money. Though I know that generally Bank Notes are received as so much Money, yet I know not that according to Law they are reckoned Money. They should therefore have laid it for Money or other valuable Things, it being two Bank Notes, and not Money: And in this manner, I suppose, in case of a Tender of Money, it is not, as I apprehend, thought that a Tender of Bank Notes is a sufficient Plea: The Consequence then is, that the giving of Seven Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and the giving of such Notes is not tantamount. They ought to indict him as the Fact really was.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know, Mr. Bird, of the receiving of this Money? Did he complain of his not receiving of this Money?—Mr. Bird. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did he pay back any of the Money?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir, Four Hundred Pounds.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Was it upon the Account of those Bank Notes?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir.

Lord Chief-Baron. Then when he paid you back that Money, did he complain that he had not received it?—Mr. Bird. No, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Pray, Sir, did he say that he had received it?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir.

Lord Chief-Baron. Mr. Serjeant Eyre, I suppose you do not insist upon it as necessary that he should receive so much Money of Mr. Bird. If he received the Produce of those Notes it was sufficient.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, I apprehend that though he did receive the Money from the Bank for those Notes, he received not the Money from the Hands of Mr. Bird. He received, indeed, what I should have taken for Money. Especially as the Act of Parliament hath added, or any valuable Thing, as Jewels or the like. I think it should have been so laid. I observe the Words used are, by Colour or Means of a false Token. I would ask, Suppose Mr. Bird had ordered him to receive it of his Cashier, or sent the Note to his Goldsmith, whose Payment would it have been? Suppose he had sent him to the Bank to receive that Money before he delivered up the Note, certainly he had obtained the Money by Colour or Means of that Note.

My Lord, I admit that if it had been paid by his Servant or by his Cashier upon a Note drawn upon him for it, I take it that it might have been laid either Way.

Mr. Serj. Whit. The Bank in that Respect are but Cashiers for the Gentlemen that have their Notes.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. The other Indictment laid it doubly.

Judge Reynolds. Though they might do that by Way of Caution, yet it might have been laid the other Way as this is.

Lord Chief-Baron. Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to consider whether the Indorsement on this Note was a forged Indorsement: For if it was not forged, the Defendant cannot be said to obtain the Money by a false Token. And further you are to consider, as he obtained this of Mr. Bird by this false Token, whether it ever came to his Hands or not. You are to consider upon the Evidence that he never complained that he had not received the Money for those Bills, but, on the contrary, paid back Four Hundred Pounds, Part of the Money, whether he would have paid it if he had not received the Money. Therefore, if you apprehend that Indorsement of the Note was not a forged Indorsement, or that the Money was not paid, you are to acquit him. But if you judge that the Indorsement upon the Note was forged, and the Money paid, whether it was paid by Mr. Bird in Money, or in Bills upon which he afterwards received Money, I think that that makes no Difference.

Jury called over.

Clerk. Are you all agreed in your Verdict?—Jury. Agreed.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?—Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. How say you, Is William Hales Guilty of the Misdemeanour whereof he stands indicted in obtaining a Sum of Money by this false Token, or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

VIII. WILLIAM HALES and THOMAS KINNERSLEY, Clerk, were indicted for a Misdemeanour, for fraudulently Forging a Promissory Note, &c. in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and publishing the said Note, knowing the same to be forged.

Jury called and sworn over again.

Clerk. OYEZ! Oyez! If any Man can inform, &c.

Indictment.] Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales and Thomas Kinnersley stand indicted by the Name, &c. for fraudulently forging a Note or a Writing, purporting to be a Promissory Note, on the second of March, in the first Year of his Majesty's Reign, in the Words following:

I promise to pay to Mr. Thomas Kinnersley, or his Order, within six Months after Date, the Sum of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, for the Value received, and knowingly and wittingly publishing of this as a true Writing, knowing it to be so forged and counterfeited.

Mr. Strange. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment against the two Prisoners William Hales and Thomas Kinnersley. This Indictment sets forth, that they being Persons of ill Fame, and intending to deceive Mr. Edwards, &c. on the second of March, in the first Year of his Majesty's Reign, did forge a Writing purporting to be a Promissory Note, &c. The Indictment further sets forth, that the Defendants did likewise produce and publish this Promissory Note of Mr. Edwards's for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds; that knowing this to be a forged Note, they did publish the said Note for a true one. It is laid in other Words, that they forged a Note of Samuel Edwards's, whereby he is supposed to promise to pay to Thomas Kinnersley, within six Months, the Sum of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, &c. To all these Facts they both have pleaded Not guilty.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel for the King. Gentlemen, this is an Indictment against both the Defendants, for forging a Promissory Note in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable to Thomas Kinnersley, or Order, within six Months after Date, and also for publishing the same. And, Gentlemen, though it is laid several Ways in the Indictment, the Note is one and the same. There are not several Notes. Gentlemen, it will appear to you that this Forgery of this Note was by the same Opportunity taken by Mr. Hales, in conjunction with Mr. Kinnersley, that the former was. It hath been observed already, that in Cases of this Kind Facts are to be proved only by Circumstances. Plain and positive Proof is not to be expected: But such Circumstances speak the Truth often more plainly than the other Way of Proof doth. As to Mr. Hales, Mr. Edwards being too obliging to him, he made use of it to much the same Purpose as in the former Case. But it was not now to indorse, but to make a Promissory Note for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable by Mr. Edwards to Mr. Kinnersley, within six Months after Date, and dated March 30, 1728. And, Gentlemen, this Note is signed on the Back with the Hand-writing of Thomas Kinnersley. The Manner

Manner of this Forgery will appear to have been like the other: But it will appear on the very Face of it manifestly a Forgery. Gentlemen, the Note is wrote on a very small Piece of Paper, which appears plainly to have been cut off from another Paper. And, Gentlemen, the Words, for the Value received, are not wrote upon the Line with the other Words, but a little below the Line. The Words for the appear done in the same Manner as in the former Note that before came under your Consideration. Here is a ff such as before, and as Mr. Edwards always useth, then an r which appears to be of the same Hand, then an e crowded in between them which seems not of the original Writing. One of the ee's is made to serve for the first Stroke of the y, and a long Stroke between the two ee's, then the other e makes up the Word ye. Then Value received is wrote in another manner of Hand. This seems to be the Nature of the Forgery; and none can doubt it a Forgery that inspects it. This appears to be done from a Frank Cover obtained from Mr. Edwards. And this is something remarkable: It is something odd that for the Value received should be wrote on another Line. It is plain that the Words are set thus odd because of the Word wrote before, and that the ff beginning another Line may make the better Appearance. This Note is made payable to Mr. Kinnersley. He was an absolute Stranger to Mr. Edwards as it appeared in the former Cafe. There was no Dealing between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kinnersley, nor no Colour of any such Dealing, by which a Debt of such a Sum as this should become due from Mr. Edwards to Kinnersley. But, Gentlemen, this Note thus made for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable within Six Months from Mr. Edwards to Kinnersley, without any Dealings between them to give a Foundation for it, in the manner I have shewed you, which is sufficient to make it appear to any a Forgery, is indorsed by Mr. Kinnersley. That will appear a clear Evidence of the Forgery being by Mr. Kinnersley. No Man in his Senses would do this. If a forged Note for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, was made in the Name of any Person, and appeared in all these Circumstances of a plain Forgery, no Man in his Senses, and designing to act a fair Part, would make an Indorsement thereto. No other Purpose, therefore, seems aimed at in the indorsing but to set the Note a-going. If such a Note was offered to a fair and honest Man to indorse would he not startle at it? Would he ever have indorsed it? Therefore, this Indorsement is a strong Evidence against him. The Use made of this Note, thus forged and indorsed, was this: It being in the Hands of Mr. Hales, Mr. Hales wanting a Sum of Money applied to one Mr. Thrup, desiring him to lend him his Note of Four Hundred Pounds. Upon his doing this with Difficulty, Mr. Hales deposited this Note as a Security for his Money, and hereupon this Note continued in the Hands of Mr. Thrup. Gentlemen, upon the Discovery that was made of another Forgery, whereupon Mr. Hales was apprehended, there was a Suspicion: Hereupon Mr. Edwards, being informed that this Note was in the Hands of Mr. Thrup, inquired of him about it. The Thing upon this appeared, and Mr. Kinnersley thereupon was apprehended and carried before Sir Richard Hopkins. At first he seemed willing to make a Discovery; afterwards he went back, and denied (I think) what he seemed before to have owned: That will be proved to you. I think that this will appear plainly to have been a Forgery, and to have been done by Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersley.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, we will go on in the same Method as before, by calling two or three Witnesses.

Thomas Maddox and Anne Clarke were called, sworn, and deposed as before. As also Mr. Booth. Vide p. 78.

Mr. Charlton Thrup called and sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Look, Sir, on that Note, and tell us when you first saw it before.

Mr. Thrup. On May the 22d.

Mr. At. Gen. Who brought it to you?

Mr. Thrup. Mr. Hales.

Mr. At. Gen. What did he say to you?

Mr. Thrup. He brought it to me, and desired me that I would give him on it three Notes of five hundred Pounds. I refused him at first, alledging that it was not for my Credit. At length I put into his Hand a promissory Note for four hundred Pounds payable within six Months.

Mr. At. Gen. Look on that Note, and see whether it now is in the same Case that it then was. Was the Indorsement then upon it?

Mr. Thrup. I cannot say: For I took no Notice of the Indorsement till I delivered it to Mr. Booth at the Request of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. At. Gen. In whose Custody was it till you delivered it to Mr. Booth?

Mr. Thrup. In mine, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you make any Alteration in it?

Mr. Thrup. No, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. And when you gave it to Mr. Booth you minded the Indorsement. Did you not?

Mr. Thrup. Yes, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. How came you not to mind it before? What Security was Mr. Edwards's Note if it had not been indorsed?

Mr. Thrup. I had such an Opinion of Mr. Hales that I suspected nothing, and therefore gave him the Note; I did not think he would have been guilty of so vile an Action.

Mr. At. Gen. When was it that you delivered this Note to Mr. Booth?

Mr. Thrup. It was in September last.

Mr. At. Gen. How much had you lent upon it?

Mr. Thrup. Four Hundred Pounds, Sir.

Mr. Lacy. What is become of that Note?

Mr. Thrup. I know not, Sir. I am not yet possessed of it: But I believe it to be in the Hands of Mr. Maddox of the Bank.

Mr. John Spicer sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know Mr. Edwards's Hand-writing?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. Look on that Note, and tell us what of it you take to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. Spicer. The Name is his and the ff. And I think the plainest ff that I have seen is remaining.

Mr. At. Gen. Is the e Mr. Edwards's?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir; it hath been something else.

Mr. At. Gen. Was it Part of the original Word?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir, to the best of my Judgment it is altered. It is so crowded between the Letters, that it seems as if it was Part of them.

Mr. At. Gen. Look on the r. Whose is that?

Mr. Spicer. I believe it to be Mr. Edwards's.

Mr. At. Gen. And you observe two ee's. Do you not?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir. One of the ee's is brought to make Part of the y, which with the other e makes the y.

Mr. At. Gen. How doth Mr. Edwards write his Franks?

Mr. Spicer. Free with a double f, as it is here free Samuel Edwards.

Mr. At. Gen. In what manner are you concerned for Mr. Edwards?

Mr. Spicer. I am a Clerk in his Office.

Mr. At. Gen. How many Years in his Service?

Mr. Spicer. I have been his Clerk between ten and eleven Years: But I have been in all in his Service about twenty-four Years.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know that he had any Money Transactions with either Mr. Hales or Mr. Kinnersley?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir, none at all.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you ever know him give such Notes?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir. I never knew him give any Notes for Time, nor ever give any Note but when he wrote himself the whole Note.

Mr. John Williams called and sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Williams, look upon the Hand at the Bottom of that Paper. Whose do you take that to be?

Mr. Williams. It is very like Mr. Kinnersley's.

Mr. At. Gen. Have you ever seen him write?

Mr. Williams. Yes, Sir, I have his Writing here.

Mr. At. Gen. What are you?

Mr. Williams. I am his Church-warden.

Mr. At. Gen. Have you seen him write? Look upon that Paper, and tell us whether you believe it his Hand-writing or not?

Mr. Williams. The Letters have a certain Cut very like his Hand-writing.

Judge Reynolds. Upon your Oath, Do you or do you not believe it to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. Williams. I think that it is very like his Hand, my Lord.

Judge Reynolds. Is it so like that you believe it to be his Hand?

Mr. Williams. Yes, my Lord, I believe it to be his.

Judge Reynolds. You are not called to swear, whether you saw him write it, or can say positively whether it is his Hand-writing; but whether from his Manner of Writing that you have seen, you believe, or do not, that it is his Hand-writing?

Mr. Williams. Yes, to the best of my Belief it is his.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Pray, Sir, how often have you seen him write?

Mr. Williams. Three or four Times.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. How long since?

Mr. Williams. Last Year.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Do you remember his Hand for the Compass of a Year, so as to take it upon you, upon your Oath, to say that you judge it his Hand?

Mr. Williams. Doth it depend upon my Judgment?

Judge Reynolds. Yes, it doth. Look on it.

Mr. Williams. It is more like his Hand than any other's that I ever saw.

Judge Reynolds. But is it so like that you really believe it to be his Hand?

Mr. Williams. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. John Lincoln called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Sir, please to look on that Paper. Have you ever seen Mr. Kinnersley write his Name?

Mr. Lincoln. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Frequently, or only once?

Mr. Lincoln. Several Times, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. You say that you have seen him write several Times. Upon your Oath, according to the best of your Judgment, do you take that to be his Hand or not?

Mr. Lincoln. There is a great deal to be said on that Subject.

Judge Reynolds. Yes. But little needs to be said about it. Is it so like that you believe it to be his Hand?

Mr. Lincoln. Yes, my Lord it is.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Then, my Lord, having proved that this is his Hand-writing, we desire that it may be read against both the Defendants.

Note read.] I Promise to pay to Mr. Thomas Kinnersley, or his Order, within six Months after Date, the Sum of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, for ye Value received.

March 30, 1728.

Samuel Edwards.

Indorsement. Thomas Kinnersley.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. The Gentlemen of the Jury should see it now.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, we desire that the Jury may see it now. And, Gentlemen, you will observe, if you cast your Eye upon the Note, that there is this one Observation that may be added to the others that were made, that the Note is all written with a Secretary e, but the e in for ye, which plainly seems to answer to Mr. Edwards's Hand, and shew that that is an old e.

Mr. Thomas Bird sworn.

Mr. At. Gen. Sir, whose Hand is that?

Mr. Bird. Mr. Kinnersley, Sir, owned that to be his Hand-writing?

Mr. At. Gen. Was it shewed by you to Mr. Kinnersley at that Time when he owned it?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Kinnersley. And did I own it, Sir?

Mr. At. Gen. Why you owned it in Court. This is the old Note.

Mr. Kinnersley. I beg your Pardon, Sir; I did not understand that.

Mr. At. Gen. Give that Note to the Jury to compare it with the other Note that is now before them.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Mr. Lincoln, those Receipts which you produced, did Mr. Kinnersley actually write them?

Mr. Lincoln. I saw him write them all.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Shew them to the Jury.

Judge Reynolds. Gentlemen of the Jury, in that Book you will find some Receipts wrote by Mr. Kinnersley, which Mr. Lincoln swears that they are his Hand; that he saw him write them all.

Mr. At. Gen. The next Witness that we will call is Thomas Bab.

Bab

Bab not appearing nor Thomas Brooks, who was next called, Sir Richard Hopkins was sworn.

Mr. Att. Gen. Sir Richard, we must trouble you to give an Account upon what Account Mr. Kinnersley was brought before you, and what he said? Sir Richard Hopkins. He was brought before me about two Notes, one of Twelve hundred and sixty Pounds, and this Note.

Mr. Att. Gen. When he was before you, was there any particular Mention made of this Note of sixteen hundred and fifty Pounds?

Sir Richard Hopkins. It was given to me to examine Mr. Kinnersley about it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Sir Richard, can you recollect whether that is the Note?

Sir Richard Hopkins. I made no Mark upon it: But I verily believe that this was the Note.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it shewed to Mr. Kinnersley?

Sir Richard Hopkins. This Note was put into my Hand to examine Mr. Kinnersley upon. I looked upon it, and it seemed to me to be a Forgery. Before I could say any thing to Mr. Kinnersley about it, I saw one Mitford there. Before Mr. Kinnersley could answer what I had not fully asked him, 'Hold, Sir (said he), say nothing; this is not your Hand.' I thought this very odd Treatment of a Justice of Peace. I said then to Mr. Kinnersley, Is this your Hand or not? He said, No; I had the other Note in my Hand, I desired him therefore to recollect himself; for I thought that they seemed clearly to be the same Hand.

Mr. Strange. I think he owned the one to be his Hand-writing, and the other not. I ask, Whether that which he did own, was owned before that Mr. Mitford interrupted him, or after?

Sir Richard Hopkins. It was before. Upon that Mr. Mitford interrupted him.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Upon the Question, when Inquiry was made whether he had had any Dealings with Mr. Edwards, what did he say?

Sir Richard Hopkins. Both Mr. Edwards and I asked him, whether he ever had had any Dealings with Mr. Edwards? To which he replied No, he never had had any, nor ever to the best of his Knowledge had seen him before. I then asked him how he came to draw that Note payable to Mr. Edwards, when there never had been any Dealings between him and Mr. Edwards? He answered, That he did it at the Request of Mr. Hales, to whom he was indebted in that Sum, and more.

Judge Reynolds. The first Question I suppose was general, whether there had been any Dealings between them? Afterwards, when the Notes were shewn him, he owned the one, and denied the other. Was it not so?

Sir Richard Hopkins. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Att. Gen. The next Witness that we shall call is Thomas Bab, to shew that there was a private Correspondence and several Meetings between Kinnersley and Hales.

Thomas Babb was called and sworn, and deposed as before.

Mr. Kinnersley. Sir, did we ever call for Pen, Ink and Paper?

Mr. Bab. No, Sir, never.

Mr. Brooks called and sworn, deposed as before.

Mr. Kinnersley. There could not be much done at Night without a Candle. Mr. Brooks. No, Sir; but you had been there a considerable Time before.

Mr. Wright called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Was you present, Sir, at the Examination of Mr. Kinnersley before Sir Richard Hopkins?---Mr. Wright. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. When Mr. Edwards asked him, whether there had been any Dealings between them, what did he reply?

Mr. Wright. He replied, that there never had been any Dealings between them, and that he never had seen him till that Time.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Did you observe any Interruption?

Mr. Wright. Mr. Kinnersley was saying, I will tell you all if you will give me leave. Mr. Mitford laid his Hand upon him and said, Hold your Tongue, be careful what you say.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. I ask whether he had there related any thing as to the Note now in question before the Interruption?

Mr. Wright. He had declared that that Note was not his.

Mr. Kinnersley I beg leave to speak, my Lord. Both Sir Richard Hopkins and that Gentleman have made a Mistake. Mr. Edwards asked me, How oft have you visited Mr. Hales in Newgate? Upon this it was that he said, Hold your Peace.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What was the Question that was asked Mr. Kinnersley, when you say that Mr Mitford interposed?

Mr. Wright. I cannot say what was the Question that was asked immediately before.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. But you say, that it was after that he had denied this Note?---Mr. Wright. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Kinnersley. I would only ask, Sir, whether Sir Richard Hopkins desired me to hold my Tongue as well as Mr. Mitford?

Judge Reynolds. Did he bid Mr. Kinnersley make no Discovery?

Mr. Wright. No, my Lord.

Mr. Kinnersley. No, my Lord: But he bade me take the Gentleman's Advice. I appeal to Sir Richard.

Sir Richard Hopkins. The Gentleman hath appealed to me. I take it that the Question is, Whether I advised him to take the Gentleman's Advice? It would be very strange that I should reprove Mr. Mitford for Misbehaviour, and yet should at the same Time advise you to take his Advice.

Mr. Wright. Sir Richard asked Mr. Bird, whether Mr. Kinnersley owned that he knew of the Notes being indorsed that was in his Hands? He said that he did. Then he was asked when and how he knew this? This was before Mr. Mitford interposed.

Judge Reynolds. You have appealed to Sir Richard Hopkins, that he advised you to take the Gentleman's Advice. Sir Richard denies this.

Mr. Kinnersley. But he cannot deny that he said, Take your Friend's Advice.

Mr. John March called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Was you present, Sir, at the Examination of Mr. Kinnersley before Sir Richard Hopkins?---Mr. March. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Pray, will you give us an Account of all that past there at that Time.

Mr. March. My Lord, I was attending upon Mr. Richard Hopkins as his Clerk, when Mr. Kinnersley was brought before him with relation to these Notes. When the first Note was produced, he was asked, whether that Note was his Hand-writing or not? To which he answered, That it was. When that was gone through, the second Note was produced, being a promissory Note made in the Name of Mr. Edwards payable to Mr. Kinnersley. When that Note in the Name of Mr. Edwards was produced; we perceived on the Back of it the Name of Mr. Kinnersley wrote. Mr. Kinnersley having denied this Note, Sir Richard, upon comparing the Name on the Back of this Note, with the other Note which he had owned to be his own Hand-writing, said to him, 'I would have you, Sir, consider very well whether you did not write that too; for it is very like that which you have owned.' Upon that Mr. Mitford interposed.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. What was it that Mr. Mitford did say?

Mr. March. Mr. Mitford upon that said, 'Mr. Kinnersley, I would not have you answer that Question; or to that Purpose.'

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Sir Richard Hopkins advise him to take his Friend's Advice?---Mr. March. No, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did he reprove Mr. Mitford for interposing?

Mr. March. Yes, Sir. He desired him to be quiet, and told him that he would ask whatever Questions were desired, but desired that he would not interrupt.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was his denying of the Note before or after the Interruption?

Mr. March. He had first interrupted during the Examination on the first Note, and he afterwards interposed during that on the second Note.

Mr. Att. Gen. Well. But I ask you as to the second Interruption, whether it was before or after his denying his Hand?

Mr. March. It was after.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. You was saying, Sir, that Sir Richard bade him recollect himself, and consider well whether this was not his Hand too, for that it was very like that Note which he had owned to be his own Hand-writing: Had not Mr. Kinnersley before that said, that he did not sign that Note?

Mr. March. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. We rest it here, my Lord, and leave the Consideration hereof to the Jury.

Mr. Mather. I would ask, whether Mr. Mitford's Advice was not that he should not speak too fast?

Mr. March. No, Sir; it was that he should not answer to that Question.

Mr. Kinnersley. They contradict one another; and Mr. Bird will swear any thing.

Judge Reynolds. You may prove that to be his Character if you can: But without that you ought not to aver it.

Mr. Bird. It is well known, my Lord, what my Character is. I have Persons of good Credit that have known me these twenty-six Years: I have never falsified my Word.

Mr. Lacy. My Lord, I have nothing material in my Instructions; and therefore I shall not trouble your Lordship.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, I am Counsel for Mr. Kinnersley. I admit that they have proved that there was an Intimacy between them. It is detrimental to my Client that there was such an Acquaintance when the one was Pariahonier formerly to the other, and that this Acquaintance was kept up to the last: But it doth not follow that they are to be considered as one: If Mr. Hales be never so guilty, it doth not appear that Mr. Kinnersley is guilty. As to this Indictment, the Charge is forging a Note in the Name of Mr. Edwards, and indorsing the same. It is admitted that Mr. Kinnersley had no Acquaintance with Mr. Edwards: But on the other hand it is pretty plain, by the Evidence that hath been given, that there was an Acquaintance between Mr. Edwards and Mr. Hales. They were near Neighbours: Mr. Edwards hath indulged him with Franks for several Years. Mr. Hales is a Man under Misfortunes for many Years, hath had a Commission of Bankruptcy awarded against him: It is very natural for such Persons to deal rather in another Person's Name than in his own; if therefore there be an Intimacy between Mr. Hales and Mr. Edwards, Mr. Hales should apply to Mr. Edwards, and he upon his Request should give him such a Note, I do not wonder that any Gentleman of Character should indorse such a Note signed by a Person of such Figure. It doth not seem very unnatural, that after their long Acquaintance a Note payable to Mr. Kinnersley, in Trust for Mr. Hales, should be indorsed by Mr. Kinnersley: This may be supposed the Case, if actually he did indorse the Note. I do not see why he may not be supposed as easily imposed upon as the other Gentleman, viz. Mr. Thrup. It is not so plain a Fallacy as that Mr. Thrup, who is a Gentleman in Business, could discern it? Why must we suppose then that Mr. Kinnersley must discern it? If then Mr. Hales is guilty of the Forgery, it doth not follow that Mr. Kinnersley must be so. As to the other Point, it is no Wonder that there should be the Name of Mr. Kinnersley on the Back of the Note: Any that would forge a Note will not scruple to forge an Indorsement. It is as like as possible, that the Man that would forge a Note in Mr. Edwards's Name for such a Sum, may be as easily supposed to forge an Indorsement on this Note. How have they proved that it was indorsed by Mr. Kinnersley? Two or three Gentlemen have been produced as Witnesses, that have seen his Hand several Times, and from the Similitude of the Letters they believe it to be his Hand: But there is such Evidence to be every Day given of one Man's writing like another, that a Similitude of Hands is not to be wondered at. It is not to be wondered at that he that would be guilty of forging the whole Note would indorse it: Whether there is any Difference in the Hand between the Writings that have been produced and this Note and Indorsement, must be left to the Jury.

Judge Reynolds. Have you any Witnesses?

Mr. Kinnersley. I beg a Word, my Lord.

Judge Reynolds. Not till we have heard the whole that the Counsel say.

Mr. Mather. I take Notice, my Lord, that there hath been a Variance among the Witnesses as to what past at his Examination before Sir Richard Hopkins. The only Caution that was given him was, that he should not be too rash in his Answers, as your Lordship hath (I believe) thought him very rash in his Conduct here. We shall only call Witness as to this.

Rev. Mr. John Hayes called and sworn

Mr. Mather. Mr. Hayes, please to give my Lord and the Jury an Account what passed as to this Note of Sixteen hundred and fifty Pounds?

Mr. Hayes. When this Note was produced before Sir Richard Hopkins, and shewed to Mr. Kinnersley, upon shewing him the Name on the Back of the Note, he absolutely denied it to be his Hand.

Mr. Mather. Did you hear Mr. Mitford interrupt?
 Mr. Hayes. I remember that there was a Dispute between Sir Richard Hopkins and Mr. Mitford. There were Minutes taken of Mr. Bird's Examination: Upon the reading of these Minutes, Mr. Mitford apprehended them not to be rightly taken according to the Evidence that was given. Upon this Mr. Bird was re-examined, and then there was another Question proposed concerning Mr. Kinnersley's going to Newgate to visit Mr. Hales. Then Mr. Mitford again interposed.
 Mr. Mather. Was that the Reason of the Interruption?
 Mr. Hayes. Yes, Sir, I believe it was.
 Mr. Mather. Was there some other Part in which he had also interposed?—Mr. Hayes. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Ward called and sworn.

Mr. Mather. Sir, was you present at the Examination of Mr. Kinnersley before Sir Richard Hopkins?
 Mr. Ward. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Mather. Give us an Account of the Interruption by Mr. Mitford.
 Mr. Ward. Mr. Kinnersley was examined as to the Note of twelve hundred and sixty Pounds: Mr. Kinnersley being examined as to that, there happened some Words to pass between him and Mr. Bird: After some Hesitation and Dispute, he having acknowledged that Note, it was put down in the Minutes. After that he was examined as to this Note of sixteen hundred and fifty Pounds: Upon his denying that it was his Hand, Mr. Kinnersley was asked some Question by Sir Richard Hopkins concerning somewhat that he had formerly said; whereupon he desired to be examined in the Court of Aldermen. Mr. Mitford hereupon desired him not to desire this.

Mr. Mather. My Lord, the Reason that we bring this Witness is to shew, that he had confessed all that he could at that Time, and there was Reason therefore for Mr. Mitford to interpose for the preventing Mr. Kinnersley's making a Discovery.

Mr. Kinnersley. My Lord, when this Note was shewed me before Sir Richard Hopkins, it was the first Time that I ever saw it: I therefore denied it to be my Hand; but by looking upon it more closely, I own that it is like my Hand. Though none can oblige me to say any Thing, I would be content to be examined; and therefore have, though not regarded, solemnly averred that I was not privy to his getting of that Note or Money. As to the other Note, I owed him at that Time the twelve hundred and sixty Pounds; I gave him that Note for it, and would not with that Solemnity say that it is not mine. He hath got it some other Way indorsed: But as to this Note it is not my Hand. Had Mr. Hales brought Mr. Edwards's Note to me, and desired me to indorse it; though I own that I think that it hath the Marks of Forgery, yet if Mr. Thrup and others were imposed upon, why might not I? Why should I suspect him more than others? I own that I had a great Confidence in him. Supposing this, will you condemn me for an unjust Thing? I take God to witness, that I never set my Hand to that Note, nor never took any Money. I beg Pardon, I will say one Word more: The Gentleman hath taken notice rightly that I have spoken rashly; it is an Oppression, and the Wise Man saith, that Oppression will make a wise Man mad, which is worse than rash.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, he hath intimated that this is an unjust and oppressive Prosecution: I submit it. Proper Evidence hath been given, and he hath replied to it by his Counsel. The Counsel suppose, that if the whole Note was Mr. Hales's Hand-writing, it was very likely that he would not scruple the Indorsement. Mr. Kinnersley himself seems to admit, that for aught he knows he might have indorsed such a Note; but the Turn that he gives it is this: If such a Note was wrote in the Name of Mr. Edwards payable to him, he might indorse it, being brought by a creditable and honest Person. If a Note was made payable to him by a Gentleman of such Figure and Character, and so brought to him, he thinks that he might indorse it, and would so have done: But it is impossible that it could be fairly done; there must be something fraudulent in it. The Evidence on the Side of the King shews, that there must have been a Conspiracy between these two Persons to defraud several Persons: As the other Note was, without any Colour for it, made payable to Mr. Edwards, his Name being indorsed upon it, he being a Person of Ability to credit the Note: So this second, on the other hand, without any Foundation also, because no Colour of Dealings between them, is made in the Name of Mr. Edwards, payable to Mr. Kinnersley, and Mr. Kinnersley's Name indorsed. Why should Mr. Kinnersley's Name be put to it, but only to give a Currency to this Note? When a Note is made payable to any Person, it cannot be negotiated by any other without his Hand being put to it: His Hand therefore was not so much to give a Credit to the Note, he being a Man of no Substance, as to give a Currency to the Note, it being in his Name. When that appears to you, it is (I think) sufficient to convince your Judgments that Mr. Kinnersley is a Partner in this Forgery, otherwise would not have indorsed this Note in these Circumstances.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. My Lord, it is very extraordinary for a Person to pretend such a Note belonging to him, that never had had any Dealings with Mr. Edwards. What Proof hath he given that he did not indorse it? What Colour is there to say that this is a rash Prosecution?

Mr. Kinnersley. My Lord, I beg a Word. I say not that it is rash, as to the whole Prosecution; but I never was privy to any Wickedness in this Note, nor in any other: If I had, I would never have appeared here in my Gown. My Character ought not to exempt me if I am guilty; I ought to abstain from all Appearance of Evil: When I have forfeited that Character, I desire to live no longer among Mankind. I asked Mr. Hales on what Account I was sent for, and whether there were any Note of mine? He said, Yes; there was a Note of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds payable by Mr. Edwards. Is it (said I) a true Note? Is it wrote by Mr. Edwards? He shook his Head and said, just as true as the other. I asked him whether it was indorsed? To which he replied, Yes. Had I known, my Lord, that the Note was indorsed, I need not have asked Mr. Hales. He is ready to do me Justice, though he must thereby take it upon himself. Your Lordship knows that I have no such Character in Suffolk.

Judge Reynolds. We shall not need, Mr. Kinnersley, to go to Suffolk for your Character.

Judge Reynolds. Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales, late of London, Goldsmith, and Thomas Kinnersley, Clerk, stand indicted for forging a Note under the Hand of Mr. Samuel Edwards, for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable within three Months to Thomas Kinnersley, or Order, after the Date thereof, for Value received: And another Part of the Indictment chargeth them with publishing the same. To this Indictment they have pleaded Not Guilty: The Question you are now to determine. Gentlemen, the Foundation of this which hath been insisted on by the Counsel on the Side of the Prosecution is, that these Gentlemen, or rather the one of them, Mr. Hales, having an Acquaintance with Mr. Edwards, and being indulged by him the Liberty of applying to him for Franks, they have made a wrong Use of this, and by converting some of the Letters of the Word free into for, and by adding some other Words, they have now formed it into a negociable Note for the Sum of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, payable within six Months to Mr. Kinnersley, or his Order: And then Mr. Kinnersley, to give a Circulation to the Note, and make it negociable, hath, in Combination with Mr. Hales, indorsed his Name: Mr. Edwards is responsible to any body to whom this Note is transferred over. Gentlemen, to make out this to be the Case, they have first endeavoured to shew that Mr. Hales, for some Time, on several Pretences, procured a Number of Supercriptions to be written for Franks by Mr. Edwards, who is a Member of Parliament, and particularly some Supercriptions in such Circumstances as were most accommodated to serve a Design of this Nature. And to this End they have produced Thomas Maddox, a Servant of Mr. Edwards's. He saith, that Mr. Hales, living near Mr. Edwards in Duke-street, in Westminster, hath several Times applied to him for Frank Covers to send News into the Country; that Mr. Edwards hath given him several for that Purpose, but generally wrote the whole Supercription himself, pursuant to the Directions that were given him; that in July last there came a Parcel of Franks, six of them, whereof five have been produced, to be franked, but without any Direction to whom to superscribe them. Mr. Edwards was desired to frank them without any Supercription: Mr. Edwards refused to frank them, unless directed to whom to superscribe them: Thus these Covers, upon that, were not done at that Time. But then to shew you what past afterwards upon Occasion of these Blanks sent to be franked, Anne Clarke, a Servant also to Mr. Edwards was called. She saith, that some time after this, Mr. Hales's Servant came again over to Mr. Edwards's House, and told her that Mr. Edwards having refused to frank his Master's Covers without Supercriptions, he had brought from his Master a Paper of Directions what Supercriptions he desired Mr. Edwards to put to them. That Paper of Directions hath been produced, and hath been sworn by Mr. Booth to be Mr. Hales's own Hand-writing. They were very short Directions:

Two to Mr. Levitt, of Huntington.

Two to John Pratt, Esq. at Bristol.

Two to Stephen Mitford, Esq. Exeter.

And they would infer, that as these Supercriptions were very short, and so would not take up much Room, a vacant Space would have been left sufficient to write any thing of this Nature. That is the Reason of their producing an Account of this Transaction, which doth not immediately affect this Cause, but only as they are inclinable to believe that some such Frank may have been made use of to such an End as these seem to have been designed for. And then, Gentlemen, to shew you the Use which they made hereof, the Note upon which this Indictment is immediately founded. The Note is in these Words,

I promise to pay to Mr. Thomas Kinnersley, or his Order, within six Months after Date, the Sum of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, for the Value received,

March 30, 1728.

Samuel Edwards.

And on the Back it is indorsed with the Name Thomas Kinnersley. Gentlemen, they have insisted upon it that the Note itself carries the evident Marks of Forgery upon it. They say that this is so plainly derived from the frank Cover of a Letter, that the Word free is not wholly covered, but that still some of it appears; that the Stile is unusual for the Value received. The in a large Hand, and then afterwards Value received, the ee's of a Round Hand, whereas all the other ee's are of a quite different Figure, in a Secretary Hand. Other Observations they have also made, which you that have viewed the Note can easily judge of. They then apply themselves to bring Evidence as to Mr. Hales, the one of the Defendants: And for that Purpose they have produced Mr. Charlton Thrup. He saith, that on May 22d last this Defendant, Mr. Hales, brought this Note to him, desiring him to lend him three Five Hundred Pound Notes upon it; that he, not caring to have his Credit engaged to such a Degree, refused to do it; but upon his Importunity, did at last consent to give him a promissory Note of Four Hundred Pounds upon the Security of this Note, which Mr. Hales thereupon then deposited in his Hands; that it was a Note for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, signed by Mr. Edwards, payable to Kinnersley, and indorsed. He saith, indeed, that he did not then observe the Indorsement. Seeing this Note signed with Mr. Edwards's Hand, and knowing him to be a Man of great Sufficiency, he was not so attentive to the other. He saith, that he kept this Note in his Hand till after that Mr. Hales was taken up, and then he delivered it by the Direction of Mr. Edwards to Mr. Booth; that before it

* In Trinity Term 5 Geo. there was an Information against this Mr. Kinnersley and one Moore, as being evil-disposed Persons, in order to extort Money from my Lord Sunderland, did conspire together to charge my Lord with endeavouring to commit Sodomy with the said Moore; and that in Execution of this Conspiracy, they did, in the Presence and Hearing of several Persons, falsely and maliciously accuse my Lord, that he conatus fuit rem veneream habere with the Defendant Moore, and so to commit Sodomy. Kinnersley only appeared, and pleads to Issue, and is found Guilty; and several Exceptions were taken in Arrest of Judgment, see Strange's Reports, Vol. I. p. 195. but the Court over-ruled them all. Whereupon Judgment was given for the King, and afterwards the Court proceeded to Sentence, and told the Defendant Kinnersley, nothing but his being a Clergyman protected him from a Corporal Punishment; they fined him 500*l.* a Year's Imprisonment, and to find Sureties for his good Behaviour for seven Years. In Easter Term, 5 Geo. Moore was convicted and sentenced to stand in the Pillory, suffer a Year's Imprisonment, and to find Sureties for seven Years. And this Term, Kinnersley, on Affidavits of his being indisposed, moved the Court that he might be admitted to the Benefit of the Rules. Sed per Curiam, we never do it for one in Execution, which differs from the Case of a Person committed for High Treason, who have been bailed on account of Illness. Ibid. 196.

went out of his Hands, he observed the Indorsement. He swears also, that it received no Alteration in the intermediate Space between its coming into his Hands and its going out: It must be therefore indorsed before. He saith, that as to his own Note, he knoweth not what is come of it, but believes that it is in the Hands of Mr. Madden, at the Bank. To shew that this is a forged Note they have called Mr. Spicer, who hath been above twenty Years concerned for Mr. Edwards; about ten or twelve as his Clerk. He saith that the Name is Mr. Edwards's, and that the ff is also his; that it is his Master's constant Custom, when he franks a Letter, to write the Word ffree, and not frank over his Name, in the Manner wherein this originally stood, and that always with a ff. He saith, that he likewise thinks that the r is his Master's Hand-writing, but that the s is since crowded in between those Letters. He thinks, that there are plain Footsteps, which shew that the first of the two ss's, which joined to form the Word ffree, hath been made use of to form the first Part of the Head of the y, and the other Stroke being drawn between that and the other s it forms the Word y, but then it doth not stand as usual over the y. And then he observes that he the rather believes this to be his Master's s, for that he always writes such an Hand, and all the rest here are in quite another Hand. And he saith, that he believes, that being acquainted with his Master's Affairs, he should have known of it, if that there had been any such Transaction of his Master's, and that this Note too is of a quite different Form from any that his Master ever delivered, and in a Manner wherein his Master doth not usually transact his Affairs: For that, as he is a Man of great Credit, he never knew him give a Note for Time; and in the next Place he is so very cautious, that he never knew him give a Note but that he wrote the whole Body of it with his own Hand, whereas the Body of this Note is not his own Hand, and therefore contrary to the Method that he usually observes. Thus far the Evidence is produced, in order to charge Mr. Hales, the one of the Defendants: But then in order to prove Mr. Kinnersley a Partner in this Transaction, they have afterwards observed upon the Indorsement, that this Note being made payable to Mr. Kinnersley, it could be of no Use till indorsed by him to give it a Currency. They have shewed the Hand upon the Back, and in order to prove his Name wrote there to be his Hand, as in Cases of this Nature nothing but an Observation of the Similitude of Hands can be expected, they have called on those that have seen his Hand, to give their Opinion thereof. The first Man expresseth himself with a great deal of Caution, seeming to apprehend at first that he was called to swear positively that it was his Hand: He saith, that he hath seen him write several Times, particularly at least three or four Times the last Year; that this is so like that he verily believes this to be his Hand, and cannot alter his Judgment as to it. To the same Purpose they have also produced another Person, one Mr. John Lincoln: He saith, that he hath seen him write several Times, and put his Name to Receipts in a Book; and that he cannot believe but that this is his Hand-writing. Some of you having desired to see and compare with this Note the other Note which was formerly proved, it hath been again proved; and as the Person aforementioned produced several Receipts which he saw him write, you have had them also to look upon: Which how far it will help you in forming a Judgment you are to judge. Further, they say, that Mr. Kinnersley was a Stranger to, and had no Transactions with Mr. Edwards. They have called several Persons that were present at the Examination of Mr. Kinnersley before Sir Richard Hopkins, as well as Sir Richard himself, who all say that Mr. Kinnersley himself owned this, and was going to say something further, had he not been interrupted by Mr. Mitford. Sir Richard Hopkins hath been produced. He saith, that in the latter End of September last, Mr. Kinnersley was brought before him, charged with two Notes, viz. one of Twelve Hundred and Sixty Pounds, and this Note of Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds; that they entered into the Examination of the first Note, which he owned very frankly to be his Note, written with his own Hand; that they then entered upon the other Note, which he verily believes to be the same that hath been here produced; that Mr. Kinnersley having denied this Indorsement to be his Hand, he desired him to recollect whether this Indorsement was not his Hand too, for that he observed a very great Likeness of the Hand between that and the Note which he had owned to be his Hand-writing, and delivered the Note to the Defendant Kinnersley to look upon; that upon this Mr. Mitford came up to him, and said, 'Answer nothing: This not your Hand-writing.' He saith, that upon this Mr. Kinnersley said the same Thing, that this was not his Hand-writing. He saith, that he asked him, whether he had had any Dealings with Mr. Edwards? That he replied that he had not, and that till this Time he was an utter Stranger to his Person. He saith, that Mr. Mitford and he had some high Words upon this Occasion; he reproving him for interposing when he apprehended that a further Discovery might have been made. They next endeavour to shew, that there was a Correspondence carried on in a private Manner between the two Defendants. In order to shew this, they have produced several Persons at whose Houses they have met: One of them is Thomas Bab; he saith that he keeps Peel's Coffee-house, in Fleet-street; that the latter End of last Summer Mr. Hales very frequently came thither, and would sometimes be there for an Hour or two; that he often asked whether the Minister had been there to ask for him, not asking for Mr. Kinnersley by Name, they knowing whom he meant, having often seen them there together; that when Mr. Kinnersley came in, they used to retire into a private Room, and stay there together for some Time; that one Time Mr. Hales observed Mr. Kinnersley going down Fleet-street, went out and went after him; that sometimes they went away together, sometimes asunder; sometimes one went out at the one Door into Fleet-street, and the other at the other into the Passage to Fetter-lane. He saith, that this their Resort to his House was till about a Month before that Mr. Hales was taken up, and was then discontinued. Mr. Kinnersley asking him, whether they ever called for Pen, Ink and Paper? To this he replied, No. Of the same Nature is the Evidence of Thomas Brooks; he saith, that he keeps a Coffee-house at Downing-street, in Westminster; that Mr. Kinnersley used to come to his House, send for a Porter, and give him a Note to Mr. Hales, who thereupon hath come thither to him, and they have gone together by themselves to the further End of the Room; that this they did several Times, and stayed together sometimes several Hours. He saith, that once particularly they staid there till it was so dark that he asked his Servant why he had not carried the Gentlemen a Candle; who said that he had carried them one; but they refused it. Gentlemen, they have then again had Resort to the Examination before Sir Richard Hopkins: They have, as to this, called Mr. Wright. He saith, that he was present at that Examination; and that Mr. Kinnersley, being pressed to answer several Questions put to him, was in some Emotion, and said; I will tell you all, give me leave; seeming desirous to take Time to digest his Thoughts: That then one Mr. Mitford came up to him; and bade him hold his Tongue, or he would do himself some Mischief, or Words to that Effect. He being examined as to some Particulars that Mr. Kinnersley affirmed to have passed between Sir Richard Hopkins and Mr. Mitford, and that Sir Richard advised him to take his Friend's Advice, he denieth this, as doth also Sir Richard Hopkins himself, to whom Mr. Kinnersley hereupon appealed. He saith, that he thinks that this Interruption was after that having owned the other Note to be his Hand-writing, he had denied this Indorsement to be his, whereas Sir Richard thought it before, and designed to prevent his answering him on that Head. They have also produced Mr. March, who is Sir Richard Hopkins's Clerk; he gives you much the same Account. He saith, that Mr. Kinnersley having owned the other Note, and denied this Indorsement to be his Hand, Sir Richard observing the Likeness of the Hand, advised him to recollect himself, and consider well whether that Indorsement was not his Hand too as well as the other Note, for that the Hands were very like; that Mr. Mitford upon that interposed, and said, 'I would have you cautious, and not answer that Question.' He denies that Sir Richard advised Mr. Kinnersley to take his Friend's Advice; but on the contrary saith, that Sir Richard was a little warm, and reprehended him for his interposing, as being an Interruption of Justice. This is the Evidence that hath been laid before you as to this Note, both to prove the Forgery of this Note, and to shew the Use that was made of it both by Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnersley, who is charged with the indorsing this Note in order to make it current. They are called upon to make their Defence: Mr. Hales stands mute, and saith nothing. The Facts bear very hard upon him, he being supposed to procure these Franks: It behoved him therefore to give some Account how he came by this Note. So as to that I apprehend that there is no Difficulty, Mr. Hales making no Defence. But the Question is, How far Mr. Kinnersley is proved to be concerned? His Counsel have endeavoured to soften the Evidence, of make it not applicable to Mr. Kinnersley. They own that there was a Familiarity between him and Mr. Hales: But then they say, that there was also a Familiarity between Mr. Hales and Mr. Edwards: They say therefore, that Familiarity with Mr. Hales is not a criminal Thing. In itself it is not: But the Question is, Whether a criminal Use hath been made of it? They suppose it to be a forged Indorsement; but say, that the same Person that forged the Note might also forge the Indorsement: And they say, that supposing it to be Mr. Kinnersley's Hand-writing, it may be well supposed that he was easily imposed upon. And they would also have it believed, that this is an usual Thing for one Person to indorse another's Notes among common Acquaintance. But how were they common Acquaintance, when Mr. Kinnersley hath acknowledged that he had never seen Mr. Edwards in his Life till after this? They say, that it may be the easier supposed that Mr. Kinnersley did thus give Credit to this as a true Note, and not take it to be a Forgery, since Mr. Thrup, who is a Man in Business, was imposed upon by it, and lent Four Hundred Pound upon it. They have called also some Evidence, not directly to controvert the Fact, but to contradict some Things given in Evidence, relating to the Examination taken before Sir Richard Hopkins. To this Purpose they have called Mr. John Hayes. He saith, that whether this Indorsement was his Writing was not the Question proposed to Mr. Kinnersley; when Mr. Mitford interposed, he having before denied that; but that there was another Question, that was then proposed to him to answer; Whether and how often he had been to visit Mr. Hales in Newgate? And he saith, that as to that it was that Mr. Mitford interposed, and advised him not to answer to that Question. They have called also Mr. Ward, who was present at the same Time, and gives you much the same Account. He apprehends that there was a Dispute about the Minutes that were taken of what had passed, and that Mr. Kinnersley was in a Passion, and desired to be examined in the Court of Aldermen; and that then Mr. Mitford interposed, and advised him not to desire this; that the Interruption was upon that extravagant Offer of his, and that upon that possibly Sir Richard might advise him to take his Friend's Advice, that is, to be clear and not so rash in answering the Questions put to him. Mr. Kinnersley himself hath laid before you what he thought proper. The Witnesses that were called (you have doubtless observed) as to that Examination, both of them say, that he had denied it before the Interposure. Mr. Kinnersley speaks himself and seems to say, that he doth not know but that it may be his Hand, though how it came to be obtained he cannot well tell. Indeed it is an extraordinary Thing how his Name should be obtained on the Back of a Note signed by Mr. Edwards. Gentlemen, if any other Particulars, material for their Defence, have slipped me, you have heard them, and they ought to have their Weight. The Question is, Whether and how far he is a Party in this Transaction? If he be a Party, though he doth but the one Part, he is equally guilty: Every Man that takes Part of these Things is equally guilty of the whole, and stands undefended. The Note then must be taken for a forged Note, and probably in the Manner that they have shewn. The Thing in Question is, How far Mr. Kinnersley is concerned? The Name Kinnersley, you see, is upon it: If his Name had not been upon it, the Note had been of no Avail; for there having been no Transactions between them, he could not have demanded the Money. But the main Business was to indorse it, that other Persons that knew not but there might have been such Transactions between them, might credit it, and lend Money upon it. Whether the Proof that is given you that this is his Hand, coupled with his own Apprehension that it is very like his Hand, will satisfy you of it, you must judge. If you judge that it is his Hand, the next Question before you will be, How far it could be put to a Note of Mr. Edwards's? It is plain that there could be no Foundation for it: If then you think it satisfactorily proved that his Hand was put on the Back of this Paper by him, knowing it to be a Note of such Value, and there be no Reason given you for it, you must look on him him as a Party; but if you suppose it put to the Back of the Note without his Privy, in that View of the Thing you must acquit him.

(Jury called over.)

Clerk. Are you all agreed in your Verdict?—Jury. Agreed.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?—Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. How say you. Is William Hales guilty of the Misdemeanour wherewith he stands charged, in forging a Note for Sixteen Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and indorsing the same, and in publishing the same as a true Note and Indorsement, knowing it to be so forged and counterfeited, or not guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. How say you, Is Thomas Kinnerley, Sec.

Foreman. Guilty.

Mr. Strange. My Lord, we desire that Mr. Kinnerley, may be now committed.

Judge Reynolds. Whence was he brought hither?

Mr. Strange. From the Compter.

Judge Reynolds. Well, now that he is convicted, he must be committed.

Mr. Kinnerley. Whither, my Lord?—Judge Reynolds. To Newgate.

Mr. Kinnerley. But, my Lord, there are two Writs against me which fix me to the Compter.

Judge Reynolds. They will follow you doubtless to Newgate.

Mr. Kinnerley. But, my Lord, the Order of the Lord Chief-Justice was, that I should be committed to the Compter till discharged.

Judge Reynolds. Your being ordered to Newgate, is a Discharge from the Compter.

Mr. Kinnerley. I bless God that I go back innocent of the Charge against me.

Judge Reynolds. If you do in your own Apprehension, it is not so in the Apprehension of the Jury.

Mr. Kinnerley. My Lord, I thought I had cleared that Matter. If Mr. Hales had brought me that Note to sign, I believe that I should have signed it: But I should not have done it, if I had known that Mr. Edwards's Name was fraudulently obtained to it. May I never see the Face of Almighty God, if I was ever privy to any of Mr. Hales's Forgeries! If your Lordship please to direct me to Newgate, I desire it may be immediately, for I am ill, having been here so long.

Judge Reynolds. It will be presently, for the Court is going to adjourn.

IX. The Trial of WILLIAM HALES, for fraudulently forging and counterfeiting a Writing, purporting to be a Promissory Note of Samuel Edwards, Esq. to Samuel Lee, for Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds.

The Jury called over and sworn.

Clerk. OYEZ. OYEZ. If any one can inform, &c.

Indictment.] Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales stands indicted by the Name of William Hales, of London, late Goldsmith; for that on the first of August, in the second Year of his Majesty's Reign, he did fraudulently forge and counterfeit a Writing, purporting to be a promissory Note, in these Words following,

March 30, 1728.

Six Months after Date, I promise to pay to Samuel Lee, or his Order, the Sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds, for ye Value received, and that he did knowingly and wittingly publish the same as a true Note, knowing the same to be so forged and counterfeited.

Samuel Edwards.

Mr. Strange. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment against Mr. William Hales, for forging a Note in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. and publishing the same. It sets forth, that on the first of August, in the second Year of his Majesty's Reign, he forged a Note in these Words following, &c.

And it further sets forth, that the Defendant published the said forged Note as a true Note of Mr. Edwards's, knowing the same to be forged and counterfeited.

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. May it please your Lordship, I am Counsel in this Cause for the King. Gentlemen, this Matter is of the same Nature with some former Indictments: I shall therefore take up but little of your Time. It appears, Gentlemen, to us, that this is the Effect of some Frank Covers, that Mr. Hales hath fraudulently obtained of Mr. Edwards. I need not now acquaint you, that Mr. Edwards did for some Time indulge Mr. Hales with Frank Covers, which Mr. Hales pretended that they were designed for sending News into the Country. This Note, Gentlemen, is even a grosser Forgery than the others can be supposed to be. Here is a Sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds, which Mr. Edwards is supposed to promise to pay within six Months after Date to Samuel Lee. This Lee we have inquired into the Character of. He is one that is worth nothing: He is a sea-faring Man, and his Wife was Nurse to Mr. Hales's Children: This Man is not very likely to have a promissory Note for Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds. Gentlemen, when you come to look upon this Note, you will see on it the plainest Marks of Forgery that can be. When you come to look upon it, you will plainly see that free Samuel Edwards still remains visible. There is the double f which Mr. Edwards generally useth, which we shall prove by Witness. And then between the ff and the r there is an o struck in, which you will plainly see is not the same Writing with the ff, nor the same with Samuel Edwards. And then to make out the ye you will see the two ee's are contrived to make a y with a Stroke at the Bottom of the e, but that still the two ee's seem visible, and to be wrote by the same Party that wrote the ff. I will appeal herein to your own Eye-sight. Then there is a Dot at the End of the y, and then Value received. You will see a considerable Depth beneath, and that it must be cut off from something else. How it was, it concerns Mr. Hales to shew. As to the Method wherein this came to be discovered, it is sufficient to tell you, that this had been occasioned by the Discovery of a Note forged in the Name of Mr. Gibson, an Apprehension and Commitment of Mr. Hales; that this gave occasion for several Persons to inquire into the Validity of those Notes which they had received from Mr. Hales. As upon Inquiry several other Notes that have been before you were discovered, so at length it came to be discovered, that Mr. Hales had delivered to Sir Biby Lake this promissory Note, made in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. payable within six Months after Date to Samuel Lee, for Four Thousand Seven hundred Pounds. It was upon this Occasion that it came to be delivered to Sir Biby Lake: Mr. Hales had been harrassed with several Judgments against him: To keep off the evil Day as long as possible, it was necessary to procure some substantial Person to be Bail for him; Sir Biby Lake was applied to, being a very substantial Gentleman. It being on a Writ of Error, and for a considerable Sum, that he was desired to be Bail for Mr. Hales, he made a Scruple, and refused it at first: At length to induce him to it, Mr. Hales said to him, Sir, you shall be at no manner of Risk; I have a promissory Note for Four Thousand and Seven Hundred Pounds, which is made by Mr. Edwards, who is a substantial Man, payable within six Months: This will be an ample Security, if an Execution should come upon you for the affirming of this Judgment. Upon this Sir Biby Lake was induced to be his Security; thus he came to have this Note delivered to him. Gentlemen, when we shew you, as we must, it being a fresh Case, how he had Franks from Mr. Edwards, the Method wherein he hath made this Use thereof, and then that this Note was thus delivered to Sir Biby Lake; and you have considered the several Circumstances of the Case, it will appear both that this is a forged Note, and by whom it was forged; that Mr. Hales was the Person on whom it must be charged.

Mr. Strange. Gentlemen, I would observe to you, which you will plainly see, that here is Mr. Edwards's double ff, and then an o crouded in between that and the r; and that there not being sufficient Room, therefore the Word Pound is crouded in, in a narrow Manner, and then follows the ff, so that it is not possible to suppose that if any Gentleman had wrote it before the ff was wrote, he would have crouded the Word Pound into so narrow a Room. But there was then a Necessity for it.

Thomas Maddox, Anne Clarke, and Mr. Booth were called, sworn, and deposed as before; and the Note of Directions was again read.

(Mr. Spicer sworn.)

Mr. Strange. Please to look on that Note, and tell us how much thereof you take to be Mr. Edwards's?

Mr. Spicer. The Name is his, the ff and the r is also his. The o seems not to be of the same Ink, and is afterwards crouded in. The y is not his.

Mr. Strange. What is Mr. Edwards's Way of franking?

Mr. Spicer. Free Samuel Edwards. Free he usually writes with a ff.

Mr. Strange. Did you ever know him in franking, make use of the Word Frank?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir.

Mr. Strange. How long have you been acquainted with him?

Mr. Spicer. About twenty-four Years, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Did you ever know him any ways concerned with Samuel Lee?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Do you know him?—Mr. Spicer. No, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Do you think, that being acquainted with Mr. Edwards's Concerns, you should have known if there had been any Money Concerns between them?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir, I believe that I should.

Mr. Strange. What further Reasons have you to believe this not to be his Note?

Mr. Spicer. I can never believe this to be his Note, for he never gives any promissory Note for Time, nor any Note at all, without writing the whole Note with his own Hand.

(Sir Biby Lake called and sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Whitaker. Sir, pray please to give us an Account, when you saw that Note first, upon what Occasion it was brought to you, and by whom it was delivered to you?

Sir Biby Lake. About this Time Twelvemonth Mr. William Hales sent Mr. Kinnerley to me at my House in Crosby Square, who told me that Mr. Hales was arrested upon account of a Bond given by him, and Mr. Robert Hales, to Dr. Mupleton of Canterbury; that the Doctor having arrested Mr. William Hales, he desired that I would be Bail for him. I desired Mr. Kinnerley to meet me in the Evening: We then went to the Judges Chambers, and gave Bail to the Action. I thought, that there being no Difficulty in the Gentleman's Appearance, there would be no Damage in doing that for a Friend. Afterwards Mr. Hales came himself to me, and desired me that I would be Bail again for him. I told him that it was somewhat extraordinary; but that however I would meet him at Mr. Turner's at Staples Inn, to consider what to do. He came to me there about Four or Five, and brought a Gentleman with him, who he told me was his Attorney. At first, he told me not: But afterwards, we understood that it was to a Writ of Error that I was desired to be put in Bail. I was then told by Mr. Turner, that if I was Bail to that, I must pay the Money if they did not. Upon this, I told Mr. Hales that I cared not to be Bail in such a Matter as this, unless he would give me good Security. He told me that he was going to Peel's Coffee-house, desired that I would consider of it, and come to him again. I staid to consult Mr. Turner, and told him that I would not be Bail except Mr. Hales would give me good Security. I then went to Peel's Coffee-house, and there found Mr. Hales and Mr. Kinnerley together. I took Mr. Hales to another Part of the Room, and told him, that I would not endanger myself and my Family so far as to engage for such a Sum, it being about Fifteen Hundred Pounds, unless he would give me good Security. Upon this he put his Hand in his Pocket, took out his Pocket-Book, and took out of it this Note. He looked upon it, and said, that it was a promissory Note for Four Thousand and odd Pounds, and was payable within two or three Months after. He put it into my Hand: I looked upon it, and thought it was very good Security to me for such a Sum. He desired that I would keep it in my own Hand till the Money that I was Security for was paid; but said, that he would pay the Money long before I could be called upon; I thought I had sufficient Satisfaction, Satisfaction, and went thereupon before the Lord Chief-Justice Raymond, and gave Bail to the Writ of Error.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Sir, I would desire you to look on the Note, and on the Back of it, and tell us whether it hath had any Alteration?

Sir Biby Lake. None, Sir, that I know of. But I must give you a particular Account of one Thing. It was not all the Time in the same Custody. Before I came there, my Servant went and waited for me with my Horse in Halborn, I being going out of Town. Going therefore to Mr. Turner's, I desired him to lay it by for me in his Drawer, where he hath other Papers of mine. Accordingly he did lay it up; and from that Time it was (I suppose) in Mr. Turner's Custody, till after the Time that Mr. Hales was taken up. When that happened, Mr. Harle of the Million Bank sent me Word thereof. Upon that, when I came in, I went to Mr. Harle, and told him that I had such a Note of Mr. Edwards's in my Hand; and (said I) hearing that you have a Suspicion that the Note that is in your Hands is a bad Note, I have some Reason to desire you to go to Mr. Edwards, and acquaint him, that I have such a Note in Mr. Turner's Custody, who is now in Derbyshire. All that I could then do, was to desire Mr. Turner's Clerk to send to him for the Key, that we might take out the Note and shew it. The Clerk did so; and after some Time had the Key sent him, took out the Note, and I desired him to carry it to Mr. Edwards. It was the same Day that the Note became due.

Mr. Turner called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Mr. Turner, pray please to look upon that Note, and give us an Account when you first saw it?

Mr. Turner. I believe it was one Day in the Beginning of July last, about five or six o'Clock in the Afternoon: I cannot be particular as to the Day, but I believe that it was the same Day that Sir Biby Lake gave Bail to the Writ of Error. He then brought me the Note to lay by for him. I verily believe this to be the same Note.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Hath it had any Alteration since?

Mr. Turner. No, Sir. He desired me to put it for him in a Drawer, where I had other of his Papers: Accordingly I did: I went out of Town in August. Afterwards my Clerk sent me Word, that Sir Biby Lake desired that I would send up the Key of the Drawers, in order to his Notes being taken out. Upon that I sent up the Key to my Clerk, directed him in which Drawer the Note was, desired that he would take it out, and carry it to Sir Biby Lake.

Mr. More called and sworn.

Mr. Strange. Do you remember, Sir, to have received a Key from Mr. Turner?—Mr. More. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Strange. Did you thereupon find this Note in the Drawer?

Mr. More. Yes, Sir; in the Drawer of the Desk.

Mr. Strange. Did you make any Alterations in it?

Mr. More. No, Sir; I took it out, and carried it to Mr. Edwards.

Mr. Strange. Mr. Spicer, you are acquainted with Mr. Edwards's Way of Dealing. When he gives a Promissory Note, doth he write the whole Note?

Mr. Spicer. Yes, Sir; I never knew him give any but that he wrote the whole Note.

Mr. Strange. Doth he use to give Notes for Time?

Mr. Spicer. No, Sir, never.

Mr. Strange. My Lord, we now desire that the Note may be read.

Note read. March 30, 1728.
Six Months after Date, I promise to pay to Samuel Lee, or his Order, the Sum of Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds, for the Value received,
Samuel Edwards.

Indorsed Samuel Lee.

Mr. Strange. You will observe, Gentlemen, the Word free is legible still, and observe how the Word Pounds is crouded in.

Mr. Bird called and sworn.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Sir, do you know Mr. Samuel Lee?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. What is he?—Mr. Bird. A sea-faring Man.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Do you know his Wife?—Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Did she nurse a Child for Mr. Hales?

Mr. Bird. Yes, Sir; two for several Years.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Is he a Man of Worth?

Mr. Bird. No, Sir; he is not worth five Pounds in the World.

Mr. Serj. Raby. What say you to this, Mr. Hales? You see that they have given an Account of the Method that you took to procure Frank Covers. This Note they say, that you published as a true Note, how should it come to pass, that such a poor Person as this Lee is should indorse over such a Note to you?

Mr. Hales. Mr. Lee gave it me, there being Monies due to me.

Mr. Serj. Raby. If you can prove any Transaction between you and that Lee, to induce the Jury to believe that it was given you upon that Consideration, it will be proper now to do it.—Mr. Hales. He is gone abroad.

Mr. Serj. Raby. Is there any Person that can be Witnels of any such Transaction?—Mr. Hales. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Raby. Gentlemen of the Jury, William Hales of London, late Goldsmith, stands indicted for forging a Note for Four Thousand and Seven Hundred Pounds, payable within six Months after Date to Samuel Lee, or Order, in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. and for publishing the same as a true Note. You see, Gentlemen, that there have been several Witnelles produced to shew how he got Possession of Frank Covers, on Pretence of sending News into the Country; and that he sent a Paper of Directions for some, which Directions were very short, and so convenient for the writing in the intermediate Space over the Name, such a Note as this. And they have sworn that these Directions are his Hand, which were sent over by his Servant to Mr. Edwards for Franks. Now to shew you that this Note was published by this Man as a true Note, and that he is guilty hereof, Sir Biby Lake hath appeared. He tells you, that there were two several Applications to him to be Bail for Mr. Hales; that he complied readily with the one, but the other he made more Scruple of, because it was more dangerous; it being to a Writ of Error, and for about Fifteen Hundred Pounds. He was therefore more cautious, and would not do it without Security. He tells you, that upon this, this Note was offered and deposited in his Hands by the Prisoner. This, if you are satisfied of it, fixed the Note upon the Prisoner. It appears hereby, that it was in the Hands of the Prisoner. He cannot shew you how he came by it: That then is a strong Proof to fix the Charge in this Indictment upon him. Where a forged Note is found in a Person's Possession, and it appears that he offered it as a true one, and cannot give an Account how he came by it, that fixeth the Charge of forging it upon him. This Note was published in the City of London, and therefore the Forgery in the Indictment is fixed there: For it is impossible to know certainly where a Note is forged, since no one calls Evidence to see him forge a Note. Thus it appears to have been in his Custody, and it cannot otherwise be proved. Other Witnelles have been produced, to shew that the Note hath not been altered since it was delivered by him. Mr. Turner tells you, that he received it from Sir Biby Lake the Day that he received it from Mr. Hales, and laid it by for him in his Drawer; so that from the Time that it was published, it continueth in the same State that it then was. Other Circumstances have been laid before you, as the Manner of Mr. Edwards's making out any Notes. He doth not give out any Promissory Note made for Time, nor doth he ever give out any whatsoever but such as are all of his own Hand-writing. Another Circumstance that hath been laid before you, relates to the Person to whom this Note is made payable. It looks like a Contrivance to have it all in his own Management, in the Hands of his Servant, and within his own reach; that this Note should be made payable to a poor Man, whose Wife was Nurse to Mr. Hales's Children, and the Witnel believes him not to be worth five Pounds in the World. How should he be intituled to this Bill for such a Sum, which he might have indorsed to any other Person? No one sure would trust such a Note with such a Person. He could not be possessed of it in his own Right, and no other Person would intrust a Man, not worth five Pounds, with a Note of this Value. This Circumstance they offer to your Consideration: And they take Notice of some Letters which shew that there was originally free, which is now turned into for the before Value received. It appears that it was free Samuel Edwards: And it is almost legible notwithstanding the Alteration that hath been made. He hath said nothing in his Defence to shew how he came by that Note. He saith that Lee gave it him. Is it likely that a Man not worth five Pounds in the World should give out such a Note as this? Though there is no direct Evidence of his forging it, that makes no Alteration: If he directed it to be done, it is the same Thing as if he did it himself; nor doth it appear that any but himself is concerned therein. He having published it, is guilty not only of the Publication, but of the forging of it: If you believe it to be a forged Note, he is guilty of the Forgery. His publishing of the Note is a sufficient Evidence of it. If a Man had received such a Note, he would readily say, I received it of such a Person on such an Occasion: But there hath been no Evidence of this Nature given. If you ask a Man, how he came by this or that Thing, he saith another gave it him: That may be said in every criminal Case; it is often said, but never regarded except proved. You are then to consider all these Circumstances, and to judge thereupon whether it is a forged Note; whether it is likely that Lee should have a Note of this Value, and that there should be any Reason for his delivering such a Note? There have been no Pretence of any Transactions between this Lee and Mr. Edwards, nor any Colour of Proof on what Consideration the Gentleman should write such a Note payable to such a Man, and give it him. Gentlemen, here is as full and plain Proof as can be expected, if the Evidence swear true; so I leave it to you.

Clerk. Are you all agreed in your Verdict?—Jury. Agreed.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?—Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. How say you, Is William Hales Guilty of the Misdemeanour whereof he stands indicted in forging a Note in the Name of Samuel Edwards, Esq. for Four Thousand Seven Hundred Pounds, and publishing the same, or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, the Note being found to be forged, we desire that Sir Biby Lake may deliver it to Mr. Edwards.

Sir William Thompson. That is but common Justice.

Mr. Strange. My Lord, there is another Indictment: But we will not trouble your Lordship with that; therefore the Jury may be discharged.

Mr. Serj. Whit. My Lord, we think it proper to take notice, that upon the three Indictments wherof he hath been found guilty on the Statute of King Henry VIII. for obtaining Money by false Tokens, there can be no Fine in the Case: We must therefore crave corporal Punishment.

Sir William Thompson. The Question is, What corporal Punishment? To be sure he will be pilloried.

Mr. Serj. Whit. The Pillory, my Lord, is nothing. The Gentleman hath endeavoured to get many Thousand Pounds of several Gentlemen: Now he is only to look through a wooden Casement, and this is to make Recompence. We humbly hope, that according to the Words of the Act of Parliament, some Punishment will be ordered, not only ignominious but corporal Punishment, as the Words are very extensive.

Sir William Thompson. The Court to be sure will order Imprisonment, as well as the Pillory, and Security afterward.

Mr. Serj. Whit. But should not the Punishment left to the Discretion of the Court be extended to something further?

Sir William Thompson. I am not for extending it to Torture. I know not any Precedent; nor would I begin any Thing of that Nature. The King himself is limited by our Law.

Mr. Serj. Whit. The Penalty seems left to the Discretion of this Court.

Sir William Thompson. I would not extend it. I do not know but that the Parliament may think of something else afterwards.

Mr. Serj. Whit. Well, Sir, I have laid it before you. I submit it.

The Judgment of the Court.

That William Hales and Thomas Kinnersley should stand twice in the Pillory; once in Fleet-Street, at the End of Fetter-Lane, and once at the Royal-Exchange, in Cornhill.

That Hales should pay a Fine of fifty Marks, suffer five Years Imprisonment, and give Security for his good Behaviour for seven Years afterwards. And

That

That Kinnersley should pay a Fine of Two Hundred Pounds (an Hundred on each Indictment), suffer two Years Imprisonment, and give Security for his good Behaviour for three Years longer.

Mr. Hales begged that two Years of his Imprisonment might be remitted on account of his Age; but it was not granted.

February 11 following, Hales and Kinnersley stood in the Pillory at the Royal-Exchange in Cornhill.

February 15. They both stood again in the Pillory at Fetter-Lane End, in Fleet-Street. Kinnersley stood both Times in his Canonical Habit, thinking to draw Compassion and Respect from the Populace, but it had the contrary Effect.

Feb. 18th following, died in the Press-Yard in Newgate the said William Hales; and April 7, 1729, died in the same Place, of a Fever, Thomas Kinnersley, Clerk.

Forgery is now made Felony, without Benefit of Clergy; as is likewise the publishing any forged Deed, Will, Bond, Note, Indorsement, &c. knowing them to be forged, by the Stat. 2. Geo. II. and 7 Geo. II. which see for the several particular Cases there mentioned.

X. Proceedings against JOHN HUGGINS, Esq. Warden of the Fleet, THOMAS BAMBRIDGE, Esq. Warden of the Fleet, RICHARD CORBET, one of the Tipstaffs of the Fleet, and WILLIAM ACTON, Keeper of the Marshalsea Prison.

A Report from the Committee of the House of Commons appointed to enquire into the State of the Gaols of this Kingdom, so far as relates to the cruel Usage of the Prisoners; which occasioned the following Trials.

Jovis, 20 Die Martii, 1728.

MR. Oglethorpe, from the Committee appointed to inquire into the State of the Gaols of this Kingdom, made a Report of some Progress which the Committee had made in their Inquiry into the State of the Fleet Prison, with the Resolutions of the Committee thereupon; and he read the Report in his Place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the Table, viz.

The Committee find, That the Fleet Prison is an ancient Prison, and formerly used for the Reception of the Prisoners committed by the Council-Table, then called the Court of the Star-Chamber, which exercised unlimited Authority, and inflicted heavier Punishments than by any Law were warranted.

And as that assumed Authority was found to be an intolerable Burden to the Subject, and the Means to introduce an Arbitrary Power and Government, all Jurisdiction, Power, and Authority belonging unto, or exercised in the same Court, or by any the Judges, Officers, or Ministers thereof, were clearly and absolutely dissolved, taken away, and determined, by an Act made in the sixteenth Year of the Reign of King Charles the First.

And thereby the Committee apprehend all Pretences of the Warden of the Fleet to take Fees from Archbishops, Bishops, Temporal Peers, Barons, and others of lower Degree, or to put them in Irons, or exact Fees for not doing so, were determined, and abolished.

That after the said Act took Place, the Fleet Prison became a Prison for Debtors, and for Contempts of the Courts of Chancery, Exchequer, and Common-Pleas only, and fell under the same Regulations as other Gaols of this Kingdom.

That by an Act of the 22d and 23d of King Charles the Second, the future Government of all Prisons was vested in the Lords Chief-Justices, the Chief-Baron, or any two of them, for the Time being; and the Justices of the Peace in London, Middlesex, and Surry; and the Judges for the several Circuits; and the Justices of the Peace, for the Time being, in their several Precincts: And pursuant thereunto, several Orders and Regulations have been made, which the present Warden of the Fleet hath not regarded or complied with, but hath exercised an unwarrantable and arbitrary Power, not only in extorting exorbitant Fees, but in oppressing Prisoners for Debt, by loading them with Irons, worse than if the Star-Chamber was still subsisting, and contrary to the great Charter, the Foundation of the Liberty of the Subject, and in Defiance and Contempt thereof, as well as of other good Laws of this Kingdom.

It appears by a Patent of the third Year of Queen Elizabeth, recited in Letters Patents bearing Date the nineteenth Year of King Charles the Second, That the Fleet Prison was an ancient Prison, called Prisona de le Fleet, alias, The Queen's Gaol of the Fleet; and that certain Constitutions were then established by Agreement between Richard Tyrrell, Warden, and the Prisoners of the Fleet, and a Table of Fees annexed, in which the Fees to be paid by an Archbishop, Duke, Marquis, Earl, or other Lord Spiritual or Temporal, are particularly mentioned, and the Fine ascertained which they are to pay for the Liberty of the House and Irons; and that these Constitutions and Orders were confirmed by the said Letters Patent of King Charles the Second: Which Letters Patent grant the Office of Warden of the Fleet, and of the Keeper of the Old Palace at Westminster, the Shops in Westminster-Hall, certain Tenements adjoining to the Fleet, and other Rents and Profits belonging to the Warden, to Sir Jeremy Whicheot and his Heirs for ever. And the said Sir Jeremy rebuilt the said Prison at his own Expence, as a Consideration for the Grant thereof. But the said Prison, and the Custody of the Prisoners, being a Freehold, and falling by Descent or Purchase into the Hands of Persons incapable of executing the Office of Warden, was the Occasion of great Abuses, and frequent Complaints to Parliament, till at length the Patent was set aside.

And a Patent for Life was granted to Baldwyn Leighton, Esq. in Consideration of his great Pains and Expences in suing the former Patentees to a Forfeiture; and he soon dying, John Huggins, Esq. by giving 5000*l.* to the late Lord Clarendon, did, by his Interest, obtain a Grant of the said Office for his own and his Son's Life.

That it appeared to the Committee, That in the Year 1725, one Mr. Arne, an Upholder, was carried into a Stable which stood where the strong Room on the Master's Side now is, and was there confined (being a Place of cold Restraint) till he died, and that he was in good State of Health before he was confined to that Room.

That the said John Huggins growing in Years, and willing to retire from Business, and his Son not caring to take upon him so troublesome an Office, he hath for several Years been engaged in continual Negotiations about the Disposal of the said Office, and in August last concluded a final Treaty with Thomas Bambridge and Deugal Cutburt, Esqrs. and for 5000*l.* to be paid unto him, obliged himself to surrender the said Patent for his and his Son's Life, and procure a new Patent for the said Bambridge and Cutburt, which the said Huggins did accordingly obtain, and Cutburt paid in Money, or gave good Security to pay 2500*l.* for one Moiety of the said Office of Warden; and Bambridge gave Land and other Security, which the said Huggins was then content with, for 2500*l.* being for the other Moiety of the said Office.

That Mr. Huggins being examined touching an Instrument signed by him in November 1724, appointing Richard Corbett, one of the five Tipstaffs of or belonging to the Fleet Prison, acknowledged that he had no Power by Virtue of any Patent from the Crown to constitute such Tipstaff but that when he came to his Office he found that such an Officer had been so constituted, and he took that for a Precedent to do the same.

That since the said Thomas Bambridge has acted as Warden, the Books belonging to the Office of the Warden have been very negligently kept, and the Discharges not duly entered, to the great Prejudice of many of his Majesty's Subjects; and he hath not regularly taken Charge of the Prisoners committed to his Care by his Patent; and hath not, as he himself confesseth, ever had any authentick List of the Prisoners in the Rules delivered him, so he cannot have executed the Trust of keeping his Prisoners in safe Custody, when he did not know who or where they were.

The Committee find that the said Thomas Bambridge, who for some Years acted as Deputy-Warden of the Fleet, and is now actually Warden of that Prison, hath himself been aiding and assisting in an Escape: That he caused a private Door to be made through the Walls of the Prison out of the Yard where the Dogs are, the Key of which Door was kept by himself, and he with his own Hands opened the Door and let out Byce, the Smuggler, charged at the King's Suit with upwards of 30,000*l.* and was afterwards seen at Islington, and hath been several Times let out of the Prison by Bambridge.

The Committee find that the said Bambridge hath by himself and his Agents often refused to admit Prisoners into the Prison, though committed by due Course of Law; and in order to extort Money from them, hath often, contrary to an Act of the Twenty-second and Twenty-third of King Charles II. without their free and voluntary Consent, caused them to be carried away from the Prison Gate unto a publick Victualling or Drinking-House, commonly called a Spunging-House, belonging to him the said Bambridge as Warden, and rented of him by Corbett his Tipstaff, and hath there kept them at exorbitant Charges, and forced them to call for more Liquor than they were inclined to, and to spend more than they were able to afford, to the defrauding of their Creditors, and the distressing of their Families, whose Substance they are compelled there to consume; and for the more effectual making them stretch their poor Remains of Credit, and to squeeze out of them the Charity of their Friends, each Prisoner is better or worse treated according to his Expences, some being allowed a handsome Room and Bed to themselves, some stowed in Garrets, three in one Bed, and some put in Irons.

That these Houses were further used by the said Bambridge, as a Terror for extorting Money from the Prisoners, who on Security given have the Liberty of the Rules; of which Mr. Robert Castell was an unhappy Instance, a Man born to a competent Estate, but being unfortunately plunged in Debt, was thrown into Prison; he was first sent (according to Custom) to Corbett's, from whence he by Presents to Bambridge redeemed himself, and, giving Security, obtained the Liberty of the Rules; notwithstanding which he had frequently Presents, as they are called, exacted from him by Bambridge, and was menaced, on Refusal, to be sent back to Corbett's again.

The said Bambridge having thus unlawfully extorted large Sums of Money from him in a very short Time, Castell grew weary of being made such a wretched Property, and resolving not to injure farther his Family or his Creditors for the sake of so small a Liberty, he refused to submit to further Exactions; upon which the said Bambridge ordered him to be recommitted to Corbett's, where the Small-Pox then raged, though Castell acquainted him with his not having had that Distemper, and that he dreaded it so much, that the putting him into a House where it was would occasion his Death, which, if it happened before he could settle his Affairs, would be a great Prejudice to his Creditors, and would expose his Family to Destruction; and therefore he earnestly desired that he might either be sent to another House, or even into the Gaol itself, as a Favour. The melancholy Case of this Poor Gentleman moved the very Agents of the said Bambridge to Compassion, so that they also used their utmost Endeavours to dissuade him from sending this unhappy Prisoner to that infected House: But Bambridge forced him thither, where he (as he feared he should) caught the Small-Pox, and in a few Days died thereof, justly charging the said Bambridge with his Death; and unhappily leaving all his Affairs in the greatest Confusion, and a numerous Family of small Children in the utmost Distress.

It appeared to the Committee, That the Letting-out of the Fleet Tenements to Victuallers for the Reception of Prisoners hath been but of late practised, and that the first of them Lett for this Purpose was to Mary Whitwood, who still continues Tenant of the same, and that her Rent has from 32*l.* per Ann. been increased to 60*l.* and a certain Number of Prisoners stipulated to be made a prey of, to enable her to pay so great a Rent; and that she, to procure the Benefit of having such a Number of Prisoners sent to her her House, hath, over and above the increased Rent, been obliged to make a Present to the said Bambridge of Forty Guineas, as also of a Toy, (as it is called) being the Model of a Chinese Ship, made of Amber, set in Silver, for which Four-score Broad-Pieces had been offered her.

This is the first Method of extorting Money from the unhappy Prisoners; and when they can no longer bear the Misery and Expence of a Spunging-House, before they can obtain the Privilege of being admitted into the Prison, they are obliged to comply with such exorbitant Fees as the said Bambridge thinks fit to demand, which, if they do not, they are sure, under various Pretences, of being turned down to the Common-Side, if not put in Irons and Dungeons; and this has been done to those who were willing and offered to pay the Fees established by the Regulation made by the Judges of the Common-Pleas in Trin. Term 1727, which ought to have been hung up in some publick Place in the Prison, to which the Prisoners might have free Access, but was secreted by the said James Barnes, pursuant to Orders of the said Bambridge; which Table of Fees seems to be unreasonable, because it obliges Men who are committed for not being able to pay their Debts, to pay such Sums of Money as their Circumstances render them altogether unable to comply with.

And notwithstanding the Payment of such large Fees, in order to extort further Sums from the unfortunate Prisoners, the said Bambridge unjustly pretends he has a Right, as Warden, to exercise an unlimited Power of changing Prisoners from Room to Room; of turning them into the Common-Side, though they have paid the Master's Side Fee; and inflicting Arbitrary Punishments by locking them down in unwholsome Dungeons, and loading them with torturing Irons; some Instances of which follow; viz.

Jacob Mendez Solas, a Portuguese, was, as far as it appeared to the Committee, one of the first Prisoners for Debt that ever was loaded with Irons in the Fleet; The said Bambridge one Day called him into the Gate-House of the Prison, called the Lodge, where he caused him to be seized, fettered, and carried to Corbett's, the Spunging-House, and there kept for upwards of a Week, and when brought back into the Prison, Bambridge caused him to be turned into the Dungeon, called the Strong Room of the Master's Side.

This Place is a Vault like those in which the Dead are Inter'd, and wherein the Bodies of Persons dying in the said Prison are usually deposited, till the Coroner's Inquest hath passed upon them; it has no Chimney nor Fire-place, nor any Light but what comes over the Door, or through a Hole of about Eight Inches square. It is neither paved nor boarded; and the rough Bricks appear both on the Sides and Top, being neither wainscotted nor plastered: What adds to the Dampness and Stench of the Place is, its being built over the Common-Sewer, and adjoining to the Sink and Dung-hill where all the Nastiness of the Prison is cast. In this miserable Place the poor Wretch was kept by the said Bambridge, manacled and shackled for near Two Months. At length, on receiving Five Guineas from Mr. Kemp, a Friend of Solas's, Bambridge released the Prisoner from his cruel Confinement. But though his Chains were taken off, his Terror still remained, and the unhappy Man was prevailed upon by that Terror, not only to labour gratis for the said Bambridge, but to swear also at Random all that he hath required of him: And the Committee themselves saw an Instance of the deep Impression his Sufferings had made upon him; for on his furnishing from something said, that Bambridge was to return again, as Warden of the Fleet, he fainted, and the Blood started out of his Mouth and Nose.

Captain John Mackphedris, who was bred a Merchant, is another melancholy Instance of the cruel Use the said Bambridge hath made of his assumed Authority. Mackphedris was a considerable Trader, and in a very flourishing Condition until the Year 1720, when being bound for large Sums to the Crown, for a Person afterwards ruined by the Misfortunes of that Year, he was undone. In June 1727 he was a Prisoner in the Fleet, and altho' he had before paid his Commitment-Fee, the like Fee was extorted from him a second Time; and he having furnished a Room, Bambridge demanded an extravagant Price for it, which he refused to pay; and urged, that it was unlawful for the Warden to demand extravagant Rents, and offered to pay what was legally due: Notwithstanding which, the said Bambridge, assisted by the said James Barnes and other Accomplices, broke open his Room, and took away several Things of great Value, amongst others, the King's Extent in Aid of the Prisoner (which was to have been returned in a few Days, in order to procure the Debt to the Crown, and the Prisoner's Enlargement), which Bambridge still detains. Not content with this, Bambridge locked the Prisoner out of his Room, and forced him to lie in the open Yard, called the Bare. He sat quietly under his Wrongs, and getting some poor Materials, built a little Hut to protect himself, as well as he could, from the Injuries of the Weather. The said Bambridge seeing his Unconcernedness, said, Damn him! he is easy. I will put him into the Strong Room before To-morrow; and ordered Barnes to pull down his little Hut, which was done accordingly. The poor Prisoner being in an ill State of Health, and the Night rainy, was put to great Distress. Some time after this he was (about Eleven o'Clock at Night) assaulted by Bambridge, with several other Persons his Accomplices, in a violent Manner; and Bambridge, though the Prisoner was unarmed, attacked him with his Sword, but by good Fortune was prevented from killing him; and several other Prisoners coming out upon the Noise, they carried Mackphedris for Safety into another Gentleman's Room; soon after which Bambridge coming with one Savage, and several others, broke open the Door, and Bambridge strove with his Sword to kill the Prisoner: But he again got away, and hid himself in another Room. Next Morning the said Bambridge entered the Prison with a Detachment of Soldiers, and ordered the Prisoner to be dragged to the Lodge, and ironed with great Irons; on which he desiring to know for what Cause, and by what Authority he was to be so cruelly used? Bambridge replied, It was by his own Authority, and Damn him he would do it, and lose his Life. The Prisoner desired he might be carried before a Magistrate, that he might know his Crime before he was punished; but Bambridge refused, and put Irons upon his Legs which were too little, so that in forcing them on, his Legs were like to have been broken; and the Torture was impossible to be endured. Upon which the Prisoner complaining of the grievous Pain and Straintness of the Irons, Bambridge answered, That he did it on Purpose to torture him: On which the Prisoner replying,

That by the Law of England no Man ought to be tortured; Bambridge declared, That he would do it first, and answer for it afterwards; and caused him to be dragged away to the Dungeon, where he lay without a Bed, loaded with Irons so close rivetted that they kept him in continual Torture, and mortified his Legs. After long Application his Irons were changed, and a Surgeon directed to dress his Legs, but his Lameness is not, nor ever can be cured. He was kept in this miserable Condition for three Weeks, by which his Sight is greatly prejudiced, and in danger of being lost.

The Prisoner, upon this Usage, petitioned the Judges, and after several Meetings, and a full Hearing, the Judges reprimanded Mr. Huggins and Bambridge, and declared, That a Gaoler could not answer the Ironing of a Man before he was found guilty of a Crime; but it being out of Term, they could not give the Prisoner any Relief or Satisfaction.

Notwithstanding this Opinion of the Judges, the said Bambridge continued to keep the Prisoner in Irons till he had paid him Six Guineas; and to prevent the Prisoner's recovering Damages for the cruel Treatment of him, Bambridge indicted him and his principal Witnesses at the Old Bailey, before they knew any Thing of the Matter; and to support that Indictment, he had recourse to Subornation, and turned two of his Servants out of Places which they had bought, because they would not swear falsely that the Prisoner had struck the said Bambridge, which Words he had inserted in Affidavits ready prepared for Signing, and which they knew to be false. As soon as they were apprized of it, they applied to the Lord-Mayor, who ordered the Grand-Jury down to the Fleet, where they found that Bambridge was the Aggressor. But the Bill against the Prisoners being already found, the second Inquiry was too late.

The Prisoners being no longer able to bear the Charges of Prosecution, which had already cost 100*l.* and being softened by Promises, and terrified by Threats, submitted to plead Guilty, on a solemn Assurance and Agreement made with Bambridge before Witnesses, of having but One Shilling Fine laid upon them; but so soon as they had pleaded Guilty, Bambridge took Advantage of it, and has continued harrassing them and their Securities ever since.

The Desire of Gain urged the said Bambridge to the preceding Instances of Cruelty; but a more diabolical Passion, that of Malice, animated him to oppress Captain David Sinclair in the following Manner.

At the latter End of June or Beginning of July last, the said Bambridge declared to the said James Barnes, one of the Agents of his Cruelties, That he would have Sinclair's Blood; and he took the Opportunity of the first Festival Day, which was on the first of August following, when he thought Captain Sinclair might, by celebrating the Memory of the late King, be warmed with Liquor so far as to give him some Excuse for the Cruelties which he intended to inflict upon him. But in some measure he was disappointed; for Captain Sinclair was perfectly sober, when the said Bambridge rushed into his Room with a dark Lanthorn in his Hand, assisted by his Accomplices James Barnes and William Pindar, and supported by his usual Guard, armed with Muskets and Bayonets, and without any Provocation given, run his Lanthorn into Captain Sinclair's Face, seized him by the Collar, and told him he must come along with him: Captain Sinclair, though surprized, asked for what, and by what Authority he so treated him? Upon which Barnes and the rest seized Captain Sinclair, who still desiring to know by what Authority they so abused him? Bambridge grossly insulted him, and struck him with his Cane on the Head and Shoulders, whilst he was held fast by Pindar and Barnes. Such base and scandalous Usage of this Gentleman, who had in the late Wars always signalized himself with the greatest Courage, Gallantry, and Honour in the Service of his Country upon many the most brave and desperate Occasions, must be most shocking and intolerable; yet Captain Sinclair bore it with Patience, refusing only to go out of his Room unless he was forced; whereupon the said Bambridge threatened to run his Cane down his Throat, and ordered his Guard to stab him with their Bayonets, or drag him down to the said Dungeon, called the Strong Room; the latter of which they did, and Bambridge kept him confined in that damp and loathsome Place, till he had lost the Use of his Limbs and Memory, neither of which has he perfectly recovered to this Day. Many aggravating Cruelties were used to make his Confinement more terrible; and when Bambridge found he was in danger of immediate Death, he removed him, for fear of his dying in Durefs, and caused him to be carried in a dying Condition from that Dungeon to a Room where there was no Bed or Furniture; and so unmercifully prevented his Friends having any Access to him, that he was four Days without the least Sustainance.

It appeared to the Committee by the Evidence of a Surgeon and others, who were Prisoners in the House, that when Captain Sinclair was forced into that loathsome Dungeon he was in perfect Health.

Captain Sinclair applied for Remedy at Law against the said Cruelties of Bambridge, and had procured a Habeas Corpus for his Witnesses to be brought before the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, when the said Bambridge, by Colour of his assumed Authority as Warden, took the said Writs of Habeas Corpus from the Officer whose Duty it was to make a Return of them, and commanded him to keep out of the Way, whilst he himself went to the Old Bailey, and immediately indicted Captain Sinclair and such of his Witnesses as he knew he could not deter by Threats, or prevail with by Promises to go from the Truth.

Captain Sinclair had Temper enough to bear patiently almost insupportable Injuries, and to reserve himself for a proper Occasion, when Justice should be done him by the Laws of the Realm.

But the said Bambridge has forced others by Wrongs and Injuries beyond human Bearing, to endeavour the avenging Injuries and Oppressions which they could no longer endure.

And it appeared to the Committee, that the said Bambridge, in order to avoid the Punishment due to these Crimes, hath committed greater, and hath not only deny'd Admittance to the Solicitors, who might procure Justice to the injured Prisoners, and in open Defiance to the Law, disobey'd the King's Writs, but hath also seduced some by indulging them in Riot, and terrified others with fear of Durefs, to swear to and subscribe such false Affidavits as he thought fit to prepare for them, on several Occasions; in all which Wrongs and Oppressions John Everett also acted as one of the said Bambridge's wicked Accomplices.

That

That the said Bambridge being asked by the Committee, By what Authority he pretended to put Prisoners into Dungeons and Irons? Answered, That he did it by his own Authority as Warden, to preserve the Quiet and Safety of the Custody of the Prison.

But it appeared to the Committee by the Examinations of many Witnesses, that before the Time when Gybbon and the said Bambridge acted as Deputy-Wardens under Mr. Huggins, the Quiet and Safety of the Custody were very well preserved without the Use of Irons or Dungeons.

That the two Dungeons, called The Strong Room on the Master Side, and The Strong Room on the Common Side, were both built within these few Years; and that the old Method of punishing drunken and disorderly Persons was putting them in the Stocks; and the Punishment of those who had escaped, or attempted to escape, was putting them upon a Tub at the Gate of the Prison; by way of publick Shame, or securing them without Irons, in their proper Rooms for some Days.

And that the said Dungeons were built in Defiance of, and contrary to the Declaration of the Lord King, when Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; who, upon an Application made to him on Behalf of the Prisoners of the Fleet, when Mr. Huggins and Gybbon urged that there was Danger of Prisoners escaping, DECLARED, that they might raise their Walls higher, but that there should be no Prison within a Prison.

That upon the strictest Inquiry, the Committee could not find that any Prisoners in the Fleet for Debt had been put in Irons before the said Mr. Huggins had the Office of Warden.

That it is not the only Design of the said Thomas Bambridge to extort Money from his Prisoners, if they survive his inhuman Treatment, but he seems to have a farther View, in case it causes Death, of possessing himself of their Effects. One remarkable Proof of which the Committee think proper here to insert, viz.

Mr. John Holder, a Spanish Merchant, was a Prisoner in the Fleet, and had a Room which he fitted up with his own Furniture, and had with him all his Books, Accounts and Writings, and other Effects, to the Value of about 30,000*l.* which he declared by Affidavit, upon the following Occasion:

The said Thomas Bambridge, by Force, turned the said Mr. Holder over to the Common Side, and took Possession of his Room, in which all his Effects were.

Mr. Holder remonstrated strongly against this Usage, and Bambridge refusing to restore him to his Room, or Possession of his Effects, he made a proper Affidavit in order to apply to the Judges for Relief, and declared that he feared his Effects might be imbezelled whilst he was thus unjustly forced from them, and that he feared Bambridge's cruel Treatment of him would be the Cause of his Death: The Miseries of the Common Side, which he dreaded, had such an Effect upon him (being a Man of an advanced Age, and accustomed to live in Ease and Plenty), that it threw him into such a Fit of Sickness as made his Life despaired of, and in his Illness he often declared, That the Villain Bambridge would be the Occasion of his Death. Which proved true; for Bambridge finding Mr. Holder like to die in the Durels which he had put him into, (for his own Sake, to avoid the Punishment inflicted by Law upon Gaolers who so inhumanly destroy their Prisoners) permitted him to be carried back to his Room, where in a few Days he died of the said Sickness, contracted by the said forcible Removal of him to the Common Side by Bambridge, as aforesaid.

Mr. Holder by his last Will appointed Major Wilson and Mr. John Pigott Trustees for his Son, a Youth of about thirteen Years of Age, who had accompanied him in the Time of his Confinement.

This young Gentleman, after his Father's Death, locked up his Effects in several Trunks and Boxes, and delivered the Keys thereof to Mr. Pigott as his Trustee, who locked up the Room and took the Key with him; but the said Thomas Bambridge caused the said Room to be broke open by Thomas King, another of his Accomplices, and caused the said Effects to be seized, after that he, Bambridge, had forced Mr. Pigott out of the Prison, (though a Prisoner in Execution) and locked down Major Wilson (the other Trustee) in the Dungeon, to prevent their taking any Inventory in Behalf of the Heir at Law, then an Orphan.

These evil Practices of letting out Prisoners, extorting exorbitant Fees, suffering Escapes, and exercising all Sorts of Inhumanity for Gain, may in a great measure be imputed to the Venality of the Warden's Office; for the Warden who buys the Privilege of punishing others, does consequently sell his Forbearance at high Rates, and repair his own Charge and Loss at the wretched Expence of the Ease and Quiet of the miserable Objects in his Custody.

Upon the whole Matter the Committee came to the following Resolutions, viz.

Resolved, That it appears to this Committee, That Thomas Bambridge, the Acting Warden of the Prison of the Fleet, hath wilfully permitted several Debtors to the Crown in great Sums of Money, as well as Debtors to divers of his Majesty's Subjects, to escape; hath been guilty of the most notorious Breaches of his Trust, great Extortions, and the highest Crimes and Misdemeanours in the Execution of his said Office; and hath arbitrarily and unlawfully loaded with Irons, put into Dungeons, and destroyed Prisoners for Debt under his Charge, treating them in the most barbarous and cruel Manner, in high Violation and Contempt of the Laws of this Kingdom.

Die Martis, 20 Die Maij, 1729.

John Huggins, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)

Clerk. Thou standest indicted by the Name of John Huggins, Esq. Warden of the Fleet, &c. [The Indictment being inserted with the Special Verdict at the End of this Trial, is omitted here].

* These Trials of Huggins, Bambridge and Aston, were all taken in Short-Hand by Mr. Luke Kenn, (Clerk to the Committee appointed to inquire into the Gaols of the Fleet, Marshalsea, &c.) who in his Life-time asked Two Hundred Pounds for the Copy of them.

How sayest thou, John Huggins, art thou Guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Clerk. Thou the Prisoner at the Bar, these Men that thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our Sovereign Lord the King and thee, upon the Trial of thy Life and Death; therefore, if thou wilt challenge them, or any of them, thy Time to speak is as they come to the Book to be sworn, before they are sworn.

Then the Jury sworn were as follow, viz.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, the Distance is too great to be heard: I desire I may come to the Inner Bar; for, my Lord, when any Inconvenience happens, it is the constant Rule to admit the Prisoner to come there: It was done in the Case of Sanders and Clifton.

Mr. Just. Page. Whenever the Court conceives an Inconvenience, it has been allowed; but I cannot allow it till then.

Clark. You Gentlemen of the Jury look upon the Prisoner; he stands indicted by the Name of, &c.

(Prout the Indictment mutatis mutandis.)

Mr. Huggins. I must desire, my Lord, to have the Indictment read in Latin. (Which was accordingly done.)

Mr. Holland. (Member of Parliament for Chippenham). My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King; and this is an Indictment against John Huggins, for aiding and abetting James Barnes in the Murder of Edward Arne; that John Huggins was Warden, and one James Barnes was then his Agent, who did in November, in the 11th Year of his late Majesty, make an Assault upon Edward Arne, and took Arne involuntarily, and confined him in the Strong Room (without the Comfort of Fire, Close-stool, or other Utensil), built near the Place where Executions are thrown out, a Place very unwholesome, and most dangerous to the Health; that Arne fell sick in the said Room, and languished till the 7th of December, and then died; that Huggins, through his cruel Disposition, being an Oppressor of the Prisoners, did, &c.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, James Barnes, who stands indicted for the Murder of Edward Arne, is fled from Justice; and John Huggins, the Prisoner at the Bar, also stands indicted for aiding and abetting in the said Fact. He was then Warden of the Fleet, and had the Custody and Care of the Prisoners then committed to his Charge; therefore it will be necessary to let you know what Bounds the Law sets to Gaolers, and to Prisoners. The Law sets Fences to them both: The Gaoler is to be protected in his Duty, supported and maintained in it; and it is justifiable, if, in Defence of himself, he destroys a Man, and commits an Act of Felony: On the other hand, if by any unnecessary Tyranny, or Restraint, any of the Prisoners come by an untimely Death, it is Murder in the Gaoler; and this last is principally necessary for your Attention.

Edward Arne, on the 12th of May, 1725, was committed upon Mesne Process; he was a quiet, peaceable, and inoffensive Man, and continued so till September in that Year; the Gentleman at the Bar, not content with the same Security that his Predecessors had, took it in his head to make a Strong Room, which was built about three Months before the Death of Edward Arne; it was like a Vault, built over the Common Sewer, near a Laystall, where the filthy Matter was lodged, nothing but Bricks and Mortar, not tiled or pointed; and in this Condition, about September, one Barnes, Servant of the Defendant, came to the said Arne, as he was sitting in the Cellar, rushed upon him, and took him away to the Dungeon, a Place where Nobody had been put in before; in this said Place of Restraint he was confined, though he was in a quiet Condition: There was no Fire, nor Fire-place, no Light but through a Hole over the Door, and a little Hole by the Side, big enough to put a Quart Pot in at; there was not the Want only of Fire, or Fire-place, but there was no Chamber-pot, no Convenience for the Ease of Nature, so that it must fall, and he converse with it: The Place was so moist, that Drops of Wet run down the Wall. The Man immediately lost his Voice, his Throat was swelled, and his Cloaths rotted with the Dampness of the Place, and the poor Man having a Feather-bed crept into it, and the Feathers stuck close to him, and in this Condition he lay; but one Day, the Door being open, he got out, and run into the Common Hall; he looked, Gentlemen, more like a feather'd Fowl, than an Human Creature. This was represented to Mr. Huggins, who generally lived in the Country, and did not come to the Gaol so often as he ought; but at one Time, when he was at the Prison, he saw the Man, and the poor Man just saw him, his Eye fell, the Door was closed, and he died: The Warden, Gentlemen, had the Door shut, and ordered him to be locked up, and he continued so locked up from September till the 20th of October; and it is wonderful to think (if he had not been a Man of a very strong Frame) how he could have continued there so long. It moved the Compassion of his Fellow-Prisoners, who applied to have him released out of that Place, but that not being done, a little Care was taken to attend him. Gentlemen, at the Time when Mr. Gybbon was Deputy, some of the Prisoners asked him, Why he did not take care of Arne, for the Man cannot speak? And Answer was made by Barnes, let him die and be damned; and this was in the Presence of the Warden. Gentlemen, I must observe to you, that for Security of the Lives of Prisoners, the Coroner's Inquest ought to sit upon them, to see if any Marks could be found to give an Information of the Cause of Death, but this was not done: This is the Substance of the Evidence, which cannot be aggravated.

Mr. Att. Gen. (Sir Philip Yorke, afterwards Earl of Hardwick and Lord Chancellor.) My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King, and this Prosecution is the Effect of a useful, compassionate Inquiry concerning the Gaols, so it was found necessary to bring the Cause before you, that Gaolers may be punished, who have Opportunity, and have endeavoured to oppress the unfortunate Persons under their Charge and Power. It is necessary there should be Gaols and Prisoners, and that Persons should be under Confinement; but not for Gaolers to have it in their Power to commit Oppressions and Cruelties, to the Loss of the Lives of his Majesty's Subjects; if the Evidence be true, which shall be offered to you, this will appear to be an Instance of the utmost Oppression, and the utmost Cruelty. Mr. Huggins was Warden of the Fleet Prison, and had the Care and Custody of the Prisoners, and ought personally, or by his Deputy, to take care of them, and so is answerable for them: Mr. Edward Arne came a Prisoner in May 1725, and continued there till he died. At his first coming in, he lodged with one Robert Shaw; but some Difference happening between them, he was turned out of that Room, and lay in the Common Hall. This unhappy Man was said to be disordered in his Senses, which his Oppression might reasonably occasion; he was an inoffensive, quiet Man: But about this Time, there was a new Scheme of having a Prison within a Prison, and was the Occasion of their committing Oppressions upon the Prisoners. This Strong Room was then erected in the manner of a Vault, commonly called a Dungeon; there was no Window, no Chimney; it was built with bare Brick and Mortar: Upon what Occasion it was built, the Prisoner will give you an Account, if he had any Authority for building it. Gaolers are to take care of Prisoners, but not to build Dungeons to put them in; the Walls were not dry, but very damp and unwholesome, as usually such Places must be. While Arne was standing in the Cellar inoffensively, Barnes, who was intrusted with the Care of the Prisoners, seized him and put him in this Place, and he was there put without any manner of Provision to sustain Life; there was a little Hole where you might put a little Drink through, sometimes he had an Opportunity of having some, and sometimes none. Under this Restraint this Person was kept, without any Convenience to ease Nature; the Description is such that must move every body to Compassion. His Bed was dragged in with him, and he ripped it open and crept into it to keep himself warm, and the Feathers stuck to him by reason of his being besmeared with his own Ordure, which he had not Opportunity of doing out of the Place. During the whole Time whilst Arne was confined, Mr. Huggins, who was then Warden, came twice, though he ought to have come often, and his Duty required him so to do: Mr. Huggins looked upon him there, and saw him lie in that Condition, in the Place built by his own Order; but the Prisoner, so far from giving him any Relief, or removing him out of that Confinement, ordered the Door to be locked up in his Presence, he being Warden, and by his Authority. This affecting Condition the poor Man was in, and in the Circumstance he was in, he ought to have relieved him. Several Applications were made to Gybbon, and other the Servants of the Warden, to desire this unhappy Man to be released: Letters were sent to shew his miserable Condition, that he was not likely to live, and to desire that he might be put under a proper Custody; but nothing was done. At that Time even the Prisoner saw him languish; his Speech was lost, and then he languished, and continued in the Dungeon till the Time of his Death; this will appear clearly by the Evidence, that he died in Durefs, and that the Distemper there contracted was the Occasion of his Death. The next Consideration is, who, and what was the Occasion of his Death: It is the Duty of a Gaoler to have a Coroner's Inquest to inquire into the Death of a Prisoner, for his own Justification, who, by having the Custody of, and the Power over his Prisoners, may destroy them; therefore, if there was no particular Reason, why should it not have been done? Tho' he cannot pretend to shew a particular Order why he did not. When I consider, that nothing could be done but by his Authority, nothing done but by his Direction, that was his particular Order.

If he, who was the principal Gaoler, who had the Authority to confine him, and to discharge him from an improper Confinement, who saw him there, did not release him, but instead of that suffered him to be locked up, he is guilty of his Death. In point of Law, if a Prisoner dies in Durefs of the Gaoler by hard Confinement, in a cruel Manner, unnecessary to the Gaoler's safe Custody, it is Death by Law; if the Gaoler is not answerable for the Act, what needs the dead Persons to be inquired after by a Jury? Justice ought to be done, let it fall on whom it will; and I do not doubt, but the Jury, for the Sake of their Oaths, will find him Guilty.

Mr. Sol. Gen. (Hon. Mr. Talbot, afterwards a Peer and Lord Chancellor.) We will call our Evidence to prove the Facts.

Call Richard Longborn. (Who was sworn, as were all the rest that appeared.) He produced a Copy of Mr. Huggins's Patent, bearing Date the 22d July, the 12th Queen Ann, which he proved to be a true Copy, and such Part of it was read as proved him to be Warden.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I desire the Habendum may be read, by which I have a Power to appoint a Deputy or Deputies for and during my natural Life.

Mr. Just. Page. I don't know what Use you will make of it; but you may call for it in your Defence.

Call Robert Bigrave.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know the Prisoner?—Mr. Bigrave. Very well.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long have you known him?

Mr. Bigrave. I knew him when I was Clerk of the Papers, in April 1725.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did he act?—Mr. Bigrave. He was Warden, but did not act, Mr. Gybbon was Deputy to Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who constituted you Clerk of the Papers?

Mr. Bigrave. Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were the Securities taken in the Name of Mr. Huggins?

Mr. Bigrave. The Security Bonds were taken, and Returns made in the Name of Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I desire to come to the Inner-Bar, for I can't hear.

Mr. Just. Page. You shall have all reasonable Indulgence, and if you can't hear you must be allowed to come. (Which he accordingly did.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Bigrave, did Mr. Huggins continue Warden during the whole Year 1725?

Mr. Bigrave. He did continue Warden during the whole Year 1725, and Returns were made in his Name.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know James Barnes?

Mr. Bigrave. Yes, He was Servant to Mr. Gybbon, and was employ'd as Watchman and Runner, to take care that the Prisoners did not escape.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did he act in this Capacity, whilst Mr. Huggins was principal Warden?

Mr. Bigrave. He did.

 Mr. Bigrave. I remember Edward Arne, and I did hear he was confined there.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Who was the Place built by?
 Mr. Bigrave. It was built by Mr. Gybbon, because I saw Mr. Gybbon give Directions about it.

 Mr. Att. Gen. So he chose to be Deputy to Mr. Gybbon?
 Mr. Justice Page. My Lord, I desire the Witness may be asked if the Room was boarded or floored.
 Mr. Bigrave. I did not observe it till Mackbeadris's Time.
 Mr. Att. Gen. How were the Sides of it?
 Mr. Bigrave. Brick and Mortar.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Was you not in the Room till after Arne died?
 Mr. Bigrave. No.
 Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I shall follow the Gentleman step by step, and desire Mr. Bigrave may be asked, if the Bonds were not made up by Mr. Gybbon's Direction, and he took the Advantage of them?
 Mr. Bigrave. He always did, and I filled up several by his Order.
 Mr. Huggins. Did he receive all the Advantage and Benefit of the Office to his own Use?
 Mr. Bigrave. I took it so.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Can you take upon you to say that Mr. Huggins had no Part?
 Mr. Bigrave. I can't say.
 Mr. Huggins. Was not Gybbon appointed my Deputy?
 Mr. Bigrave. I found Mr. Gybbon Deputy, when I came there, but can't say, whether he was appointed by Writing or not.
 Mr. Huggins. Did he pay no Salary?
 Mr. Bigrave. I heard he paid 400 l. per. Ann. and I always apprehended Mr. Gybbon had the whole Account.
 Mr. Huggins. I desire he may be asked, whether the Bonds were not filled up by Mr. Gybbon?
 Mr. Bigrave. Always.
 Mr. Huggins. Returns of Writs were made in my Name; I desire he may be asked, whether he did not receive Direction from Mr. Gybbon to make Returns?
 Mr. Bigrave. I did receive Directions from him, for in 1727, I had some difficulty in making a Return of a Languidus, and then made Returns in Writing, and I received two Rule Fees, and 1s. out of each was due to the Warden, which I allowed and paid to Mr. Gybbon, and had a Receipt under his Hand for it.
 Mr. Huggins. Were Warrants in my Name for Prisoners escaping?
 Mr. Bigrave. The Warrants were generally left in the Publick Office, and signed and sealed in Blank, and that they were filled up by Mr. Gybbon, and signed and sealed by Mr. Huggins.
 Mr. Huggins. In whose Name were the Warrants returned?
 Mr. Bigrave. The Warrants were returned in the Name of Mr. Huggins, but by the Direction of Mr. Gybbon.
 Mr. Huggins. Was Barnes my Servant or Mr. Gybbon's?
 Mr. Bigrave. He was allowed to be Servant to Mr. Gybbon.
 Mr. Justice Page. I will ask a Question or two.
 Mr. Huggins. I must beg Leave, my Lord, to ask one Question more, and then will make some Observations upon the Evidence.
 Mr. Justice Page. It is not proper to break in upon the Evidence to make any Observations now.

Mr. Huggins. This is the grand Point.
 Mr. Justice Page. Whether it is or no, that will come anon. If you insist upon making your Remarks now you shall; but I think it will be to your Prejudice, for by that you will be precluded from making your Remarks upon the Cloze of the Evidence.
 Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I will then submit.
 Mr. Justice Page. If you will ask Mr. Bigrave any more Questions, you may proceed.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you hear of any Ill-usage from me to this Man (meaning Mr. Arne)?
 Mr. Bigrave. I remember Mr. Arne was there, though I knew no such Man, and heard he was in the Strong Room.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you hear of any Alteration that was made in the Strong Room while Mr. Arne was there?
 Mr. Bigrave. I never heard of any Alteration during that Time.
 Mr. Huggins. Did not Gybbon keep two distinct Offices in one and the same House?
 Mr. Bigrave. In the Year 1725 he did.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Pray distinguish nicely as to Barnes, Huggins, and Gybbon, whether Barnes was not employed as Watchman while Huggins was Principal, and Gybbon Deputy-Warden?
 Mr. Bigrave. He was.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Who put you into your Office?
 Mr. Bigrave. Mr. Huggins put me into the Place, and I made an Agreement, and was to have One Shilling paid me out of each Day-Rule.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Who made the Agreement?
 Mr. Bigrave. I made the Agreement with Mr. Huggins, and paid 700l. to Mr. Huggins and Fifty Guineas.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Who put Mr. Barnes in?—Mr. Bigrave. Mr. Gybbon.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How do you know?—Mr. Bigrave. I heard so, Call Richard Bishop.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What are you?
 Mr. Bishop. I was Tipstaff to Mr. Huggins, presently after Huggins came to his Office, and paid him 200l. for it.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Who was Deputy then?
 Mr. Bishop. There was no Deputy-Warden, only Mr. Dickson, Clerk of the Papers.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. When did Gybbon come there?
 Mr. Bishop. In the Year 1724.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What time did Arne become a Prisoner?
 Mr. Bishop. In 1724 or 1725, I brought him down from the Judges Chambers, and put him at the Vine as usual.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Why did you not bring him into the Prison?
 Mr. Bishop. Because he thought to give Security.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Was not that a Spunging-house?
 Mr. Bishop. Yes.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. How long did he continue there?
 Mr. Bishop. About two Months.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Where did he lie, when he went into the Gaol?
 Mr. Bishop. When he went into the Gaol, I did not trouble myself about it.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember the building the Strong Room?
 Mr. Bishop. I do remember its being built in 1725.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What Sort of a Place is it?
 Mr. Bishop. I have seen the Outside, but never saw the Inside; I believe it is built over the Common-Sewer, and but a little Way from the Dunghill; the Ashes and Dirt of the House is flung down there.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see Mr. Arne there?
 Mr. Bishop. I saw him once in the Long Room out of his Cloaths, before he was brought into the Strong Room, and I complained to Mr. Gybbon, and said he ought to be sent to Bethlem, but he put him in the Strong Room.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Can you tell of any Complaints made about Arne's being put there?
 Mr. Bishop. I did apply to Mr. Gybbon, and said it was better to keep him in his own Room, for if a Wife Man was put there it would make him mad; and it would have made me mad if I had been put there myself; and I heard Mr. Gybbon speak to Mr. Hopkins to acquaint Mr. Huggins, that as Mr. Taylor was one of the Governors of Bethlem, and Mr. Huggins's Friend and Acquaintance, he might easily get him in there.
 Mr. Huggins. It was no Part of the Office of Warden of the Fleet; but I might, by a friendly Office, use my Interest with Mr. Taylor, and that would shew me more a humane Man, than one guilty of Cruelty.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see Mr. Huggins in the Gaol, during the Time Mr. Arne was in the Strong Room?
 Mr. Bishop. I saw Mr. Huggins there several Times, but can't say whether then or not when Mr. Arne was in the Strong Room.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Was he any way abusive?
 Mr. Bishop. I never heard that Arne was any way abusive, or needed any such Restraint.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What was James Barnes?
 Mr. Bishop. He was to take up People that the Warden directed him to take up, and acted as Watchman in the Gaol, and was Servant under the Warden.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What time was Arne put in the Strong Room?
 Mr. Bishop. He came into the Prison before the Strong Room was built.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember when it was built?
 Mr. Bishop. It was built in 1725, I believe at the latter Part of the Summer Season.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember the Time while Arne was there?
 Mr. Bishop. I do.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Thing of Consequence done in the Gaol, without the Direction of Mr. Huggins?
 Mr. Bishop. Nothing of Consequence was done without his Direction; but the common Business of the Gaol was done by Mr. Gybbon's Direction.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you ever speak to Mr. Huggins in relation to Arne's Confinement?
 Mr. Bishop. I believe I might speak to Mr. Gybbon, and I believe I might speak to Mr. Huggins, for I frequently did speak to him about Business.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What Condition was Mr. Arne in, when brought to the Fleet?
 Mr. Bishop. I think he was in his Senses, he was inoffensive, and I think there was no Occasion to confine him; I saw him several Times walking about about the Yard, and if he had been confined to his own Room any-body might have looked after him, even if it had been a Child.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Had he any Bed whilst in the Strong Room?

Mr. Bishop. I think he had no Bed there; it was a dark Place, I could not see into it.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did Huggins use to come there after Gybbon was Deputy?

Mr. Bishop. I saw Mr. Huggins there several times after Mr. Gybbon was Deputy-Warden, and Huggins used to give Directions, during the Time Gybbon was his Deputy, and Hopkins used to bring Orders to Mr. Gybbon from Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Sol. Gen. In what condition of Health was Mr. Arne when he was brought in?

Mr. Bishop. He was in a good Condition of Health, and in his Senses; and I believe, being put in the Strong Room in the Fleet, would have killed any-body, and that that forwarded Arne's Death, and he would not have died so soon if he had not been there.

Mr. Huggins. When you spoke to Mr. Gybbon to apply to me to make Interest to the Governor of Bathlem, whether it was Quatenus-Warden, or only as I was supposed to have Acquaintance or Interest?

Mr. Bishop. It was to apply to you as Warden.

Mr. Huggins. Was there not Women Prisoners, and Men's Wives in the Gaol?

Mr. Bishop. Yes. Mr. Huggins. My Lord, It was very unfit for a Man to go naked about where there were Women, and it was fit he should be confined some where. Whose Servant was James Barnes?

Mr. Bishop. Mr. Gybbon's.

Mr. Justice Page. At the Time, when he run about naked, was there no other Room that he could have been put in?

Mr. Bishop. There certainly were other Places where he might have been put.

Mr. Justice Page. How often have you seen him naked?

Mr. Bishop. I saw him naked but once.

Mr. Baron Carter. You said Gybbon gave some Directions; and Huggins gave some Directions; now during the Time that Gybbon acted, did the Prisoner, Mr. Huggins, give any Directions as to the moving of Prisoners?

Mr. Bishop. My Lord, I never meddled with what was done in the Inside of the Prison, so can't inform you.

Call Mr. John Cotton.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Officer are you belonging to the Fleet?

Mr. Cotton. Clerk of the Papers.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray see what Time Arne was committed?

Mr. Cotton. He was committed the 12th of May, 1725, at the Suit of John Martin and others upon Mesne Process.

Mr. Huggins. I desire he may see, when Barnes became a Prisoner?

Mr. Cotton. In Hillary, 1724.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is not Barnes still a Prisoner, and what is become of him?

Mr. Cotton. He was a Prisoner, and had the Liberty of the Gate; and when the Order of the House of Commons came for taking him into Custody, he ran away, and Corbet has endeavoured to find him out, but could not.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was Arne charged in Execution?

Mr. Cotton. No, he was not.

Call Mr. Thomas Farrington.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Edward Arne?

Mr. Farrington. I did, and the first Time, that he came into the Prison, it was between the 20th and 28th of June, 1725. He was some time at the Vins before.

Mr. Att. Gen. What State of Health was he in?

Mr. Farrington. When he came into the Fleet Prison he was in a good State of Health, and free from any Sort of Deliriousness, and I never saw him do any Thing amiss to Man, Woman, or Child.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember his being confined in the Strong Room?

Mr. Farrington. I do remember his being confined in September, and that he died in October.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was the first Time you knew of his Confinement?

Mr. Farrington. The first time I ever heard of his being confined, I heard he was carried into the Strong Room by Barnes, by the Directions of Gybbon, Deputy-Warden to the Prisoner at the Bar, and he had lain before that in Number VII. with Robert Shaw, and upon some Difference, being turned out of that Room, he then lay in the Common-Hall, upon a Bed of his own, which he laid upon Part of a broken Table-Bedstead.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was the first Time you saw Arne in the Strong Room?

Mr. Farrington. I saw him the very Day he was put in.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Sort of a Place is it?

Mr. Farrington. It is a Room arched over like a Vault, and had been new erected about six Weeks, and the Walls were very damp and wet, you might strike off the Drops with your Hand like the Dew on the Top of the Grass in a Morning; there was no Wainscot nor Plastering, there were some Boards at the Bottom, but whether intirely boarded I can't tell. It was a Vault arched over, and when Arne was carried in not tiled; there was a Window over the Door three Quarters of a Yard long, and another on the Side of the Door seven or eight Inches long, and four wide, and no Fire-place, and the Common-Sewer runs under it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who supply'd him with Victuals?

Mr. Farrington. I saw Mr. Louden give him Victuals.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who kept the Key of the Room?

Mr. Farrington. Barnes.

Mr. Att. Gen. From the Time that Mr. Arne came into the Prison, which was between the 20th and 28th of June, till he was put in the Strong Room, What State of Health was he in?

Mr. Farrington. He continued in a good State of Health, till a little before he was put in the Strong Room, and then he grew somewhat disordered; and from the Time he was put in the Strong Room, he altered every Day, grew hoarse, and at last could not speak, and he grew weaker and weaker every Day; about the Beginning of October lost his Voice, he grew then delirious, and ript open his Bed, and crept into the Feathers, and one Day came to the Chapel with Excrement and Feathers sticking about him like a Magpye, being forced to ease Nature in that Place; and after that, I saw the Prisoner at the Bar, and Hopkins, looking into the Strong Room (the Door being open) upon Arne, and Arne was lying in the Bed ript open, and covered much about as high as his Navel.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you hear Arne speak?

Mr. Farrington. He was very hoarse, and could not speak; but lifted up his Eyes, and looked at Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Huggins then see him?

Mr. Farrington. Mr. Huggins must see him, if he was not blind.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you hear them speak?

Mr. Farrington. Mr. Huggins and Hopkins whispered, but I did not hear what they said; but Huggins shook his Head, then Barnes shut the Door, and Huggins and Hopkins were then going away.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long after was it before Arne died?

Mr. Farrington. About fourteen Days.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see Arne between this Time of Huggins being there and his Death?

Mr. Farrington. I saw him the Morning before he died, and at that Time he was so weak, he could not stir any Way, but there lay gaping for Life.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the Occasion of his lying in that languishing Condition?

Mr. Farrington. Arne's Confinement was the Occasion. I was in the Strong Room three Days myself with one Smith, my Legs were so swelled, that the Small was as big as my Thigh, and I never knew a Day's Sickness till that Time, and if I had continued a Week longer it would have killed me, and I was forced to buy Paper to ease Nature in, and sling it out of the Window.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is the Situation of that Room?

Mr. Farrington. Its Situation is at the furthest Part of the Prison Northward, and there is a Sewer under it, into which runs the Water from the Pump to carry off the Excrements of the Prison, which are emptied into it, and the Dunghil was then about six Yards from it.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Distance is there between the Strong Room and the Dunghil now?

Mr. Farrington. About eight Yards, and all the Nuisance of the House is flung there, and there are very bad Smells.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the Occasion of the Death of Arne?

Mr. Farrington. I think it was the Strong Room was the Occasion of it, for it was enough to kill the strongest Body.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Arne die there?

Mr. Farrington. He did, and Mr. Huggins always said he had Authority to put Persons in the Strong Room, or Irons, which I can prove under his Hand (and was going to pull out a Paper, which not being allowed as Evidence, he desisted). I saw Mr. Huggins a second Time walking upon the Bars with Gybbon and Levinz, between the Hours of Eleven and One, a Week or Fortnight after which he was at the Strong Room.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long did Mr. Huggins stand looking upon Mr. Arne in the Strong Room?

Mr. Farrington. About three, four, or five Minutes, and he then stood looking at the Door, as I now stand looking at the Council.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was Arne let out of the Strong Room afterwards?

Mr. Farrington. I never heard that Arne was afterwards out of the Strong Room till he died.

Mr. Huggins. Did not you make some Affidavits by way of Complaint to the Court of Common Pleas?—Mr. Farrington. Yes.

Mr. Huggins. Please, my Lord, to ask, Whether or not Mr. Arne was mentioned in that Complaint that he made?

Mr. Farrington. I never made but three Affidavits, two of which I have in my Hand in Print, but don't remember Mr. Arne's being mentioned in either of them.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, The Affidavits tend chiefly to the sending of Coffins in.

Mr. Justice Page. If you intend to make any Use of those Affidavits, they must be produced and read.

Call Mr. Richard Fulthorpe.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Edward Arne?

Mr. Fulthorpe. I did, I was a Prisoner then myself, he was brought in the latter End of August, and I remember him a Prisoner before he was confined in the Strong Room; I being in the Cellar, one Barnes and two or three other Servants of the Wardens, took him by Violence and carried him there.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you been in his Company, and had Conversation with him?—Mr. Fulthorpe. I had several Times.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was he disorderly?

Mr. Fulthorpe. He might be a little in Liquor, but he did nothing to offend any one, and gave no Disturbance to the Company. He was carried by Barnes into the Strong Room.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Sort of a Place is the Strong Room?

Mr. Fulthorpe. It is a Place like a Dungeon, with a Hole on the Side big enough to put in a full Pot of Beer.

Mr. Att. Gen. How big is the Room?

Mr. Fulthorpe. The Room is about Half the Bigness of the Court where the Counsel sit, and stands near the Dunghill, and the Sewer runs under it. I saw it opened.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was over the Common Sewer?

Mr. Fulthorpe. There was Boards laid loose over.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was between the Common Sewer and the Boards?

Mr. Fulthorpe. Nothing. The Walls were green. It was not tiled in, and scarce been built above a Week, and was as wet as any Thing could be.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who put Arne into the Strong Room?

Mr. Fulthorpe. Barnes and some others, then Prisoners, who acted under the Warden, took him out of the Cellar, put him in there, and locked him up.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see Mr. Huggins during the Time Arne was there confined?

Mr. Fulthorpe. I saw Mr. Huggins twice there. I saw him at the Strong Room; he went along with Gybbon and Hopkins, and Mr. Huggins laid his Hand upon the Door, and looked in, the Door being open.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long was he there?

Mr. Fulthorpe. A Minute or two.

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who was there besides?
Mr. Fulbourn. Several belonging to the Fleet. I believe Barnes was there.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long before the Death of Arne?

Mr. Ful. About a Month.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Contition was Arne in at the Time he was put in there?—Mr. Ful. When he was put in there, he was a little out of the way when fuddled, but when sober as well as any Man; when I came to the Door, there used to be a Smell enough to strike one down.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long was Arne in the Strong Room, before you saw him there?—Mr. Ful. I went the next Morning, and at several other Times.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long was Arne there?—Mr. Ful. About six Weeks.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Condition was he in when Huggins looked upon him?—Mr. Ful. He was very ill when Huggins looked upon him.

Mr. Att. Gen. What do you think was the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Ful. The Confinement and the Dampness of the Room gave him his Death.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had Mr. Huggins spoke to have Arne taken out?

Mr. Ful. He had not, for the Door was shut, Mr. Huggins being then present.

Mr. Att. Gen. How came you to be there?

Mr. Ful. I wanted to speak to Mr. Huggins about Business, for the Payment of the Bill drawn upon Huggins by one Lewis.

Mr. Att. Gen. How came Arne to cut his Bed in Pieces, and creep into the Feathers?

Mr. Ful. It was occasioned by his Confinement; there was no Fire there, and I believe the Confinement was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Huggins. How often did you know him let out?

Mr. Ful. Two or three Times.

Mr. Huggins. How long was you a Prisoner after?

Mr. Ful. I was discharged by the Act of Grace.

Mr. Att. Gen. How came you to be present at the Time Mr. Huggins looked into the Strong Room?

Mr. Ful. I waited for an Opportunity of speaking to him about a Note.

Call Mr. Tudor Smith.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you know Edward Arne?

Mr. Smith. I knew Mr. Arne very well, and that he was in the Fleet Prison. I remember the Time of his coming into the Fleet Prison. I was with him in the Spunging-House, and then he was carried into the Fleet Prison.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Where did he lie?

Mr. Smith. In the Room of one Robert Shaw, and continued there about a Fortnight or three Weeks; but upon some Quarrel was turned out.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When Arne came out of the Room, was not his Bed turned out with him?

Mr. Smith. It was; upon which, he then lay in the Common-Hall for some Time.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see Arne carried to the Strong Room?

Mr. Smith. I was in the Cellar, when he was carried to the Strong Room; Barnes took him away.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What was Barnes?

Mr. Smith. I apprehended him to be Mr. Huggins's Servant.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did you see done by Barnes?

Mr. Smith. I did see Barnes come, and take Arne by the Collar, and he said, He must go along with him. Arne said, Where? Barnes replied, No matter where, you must go along with me; and the next Morning I saw Arne in the Strong Room.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What State of Health was he in, when carried there?

Mr. Smith. He was in an ill State of Health.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Sort of a Room was it?

Mr. Smith. It was newly built, very damp, and a nauseous Place. I knowing him before, was under more than common Concern, and asked Arne how he did? And he said Barnes carried him there. I asked him if he had a Bed? He said he had no Bed; but the next Day a Bed was brought to him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long did he lie there?

Mr. Smith. A Month or six Weeks; I visited him often.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Fire-place, any Candle, or any thing necessary to ease Nature in?

Mr. Smith. There was no Fire-Place, no Candle, nothing necessary to ease Nature in, and he was forced to do all that Nature required there; and many a Time, when I carried Drink, Meat, or Ale to him, I have been forced to hold my Nose.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What place was there to let in the Air?

Mr. Smith. There was a Place over the Door with Iron Bars, three Foot in Length, and another Hole on the Side, about a Foot and Half.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you give any Notice to Mr. Huggins of the Condition this Man was in?

Mr. Smith. Having been a Prisoner some Time, I applied for the Benefit of the Rules, and he received Twelve Pounds for the Liberty of the Rules, and Hopkins and Gybbon insisted upon Ten Guineas more; and I wrote four Letters of the Usage I received, having paid several Sums of Money; which I sent to Mr. Huggins by Robin the Porter, and did in one of them, of the 5th of October, mention Mr. Arne's Confinement.

Mr. Baron Carter. To what Purpose was that Letter?

Mr. Smith. It partly related to my own Business, and I mentioned that the Strong Room was a Place not fit for a Christian to be in, and Mr. Arne lay in a very miserable Condition; and seeing him in such a Condition, I gave him an old Night-Gown, being in a Manner naked for want of Covering, he had ripped open his Bed, and had got into the Feathers.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you take any Notice in the Letter of his lying in the Feathers?

Mr. Smith. I had wrote in the Letter about seeing him in the Feathers, and directed the Letter to Mr. Huggins, at his House in St. Martin's Lane, and sent it by Robin the Porter. I spoke to Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. Justice Page. That was not material.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you ever see Mr. Huggins in the Gaol?

Mr. Smith. I never did, but watched an Opportunity of seeing him.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Condition was Arne in?

Mr. Smith. It was a miserable Scene; and I take it that it was the Cause of his Death; and that he perished by being in such a Condition.

Mr. Hug. I desire he may be asked, my Lord, if ever I had come into the Fleet Prison, he should have seen me?—Mr. Smith. I believe I should.

Mr. Huggins. Did you ever see me there?

Mr. Smith. I saw Mr. Huggins two or three Times, at the Time the Prothonotaries were there.

Mr. Huggins. I desire he may be asked, my Lord, if he received any Answer from me to the Letter?

Mr. Smith. I received no Answer from Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Hug. Did the Letter contain other Business?—Mr. Smith. It did.

Call Robert Saintclair, the Porter.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is that the Man, Robin?—Mr. Smith. It is the Man I sent.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you carry any Letters for Mr. Smith?

Saintclair. I carried several Letters, and brought Answers back again to them; but by reason of the Distance of the Time, cannot remember the Delivery of the Letters, but gave the Answers to Mr. Smith.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember about what Time?

Saint. I cannot say about what Time.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you carry any Letters from Mr. Smith to Mr. Huggins?

Saint. I carried several Letters to Mr. Huggins from Mr. Smith, and always returned an Answer to whom I delivered them.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I desire he may be asked, if he ever delivered a Letter from Mr. Smith to me?

Saint. I cannot say I ever saw Mr. Huggins at his own House.

Call Thomas Paine.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Edward Arne?

Mr. Paine. I did, and remember his being put in the Fleet Prison.

Mr. Att. Gen. What State of Health was he in when he came there?

Mr. Paine. He was in a good State of Health. I was in Company with him and Captain Bateman, who was at Cards, and Arne was at Play, and did not seem to be lunatick; and one James Barnes came into the Room whilst I was in Company drinking with them, and Arne was doing nothing disorderly, and Barnes forced him into the Strong Room, and I was then by.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who was Barnes?

Mr. Paine. Barnes was a Prisoner, and was made a Watchman by Gybbon, who gave him the Liberty of the Gate.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was his Business?

Mr. Paine. He was a Watchman.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whose Servant did you look upon him to be?

Mr. Paine. I looked upon him to be a Servant of Mr. Gibbon's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you ever see Mr. Huggins there?

Mr. Paine. I never saw Mr. Huggins there, but when the Prothonotaries were there.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Sort of a Place was it before it was made so?

Mr. Paine. It was a Stable where the Cocks and Hens roosted.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see it after it was converted into a Strong Room, before Mr. Arne was put into it?

Mr. Paine. I did; and the Walls were green; there was certainly a Dampness.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there any Sewer run under it?

Mr. Paine. I cannot say; but there was an ill Smell came both from the Necessary-House and from the Dunghill.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Condition was Arne in, after he was put in by Barnes?

Mr. Paine. Arne grew outrageous, and tore his Clothes and Bedding.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Condition of Health was Arne in?

Mr. Paine. I never talked to him, but through the Hole in the Wall.

Mr. Att. Gen. How was he before he died?

Mr. Paine. I was discharged before he died.

Mr. Att. Gen. What kind of Alteration was there in his Voice?

Mr. Paine. He was a little hoarser, and I could not see him, but only as I talked to him through the Hole.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it a fit Place to confine a Prisoner in?

Mr. Paine. It was not a fit Place to confine Prisoners in without Danger of their Lives.

Mr. Hug. Was there a Court of Inspectors or Governors of the Fleet?

Mr. Paine. There was such.

Mr. Hug. Did they not ballot once a Month?

Mr. Paine. We once balloted for Steward and Inspector.

Mr. Hug. Did not the Court of Inspectors place Arne in the Strong Room?

Mr. Paine. The Inspectors did not so much as visit the Strong Room.

Mr. Hug. If any Complaint had been made, was not the Power vested in the Court of Inspectors to redress?

Mr. Justice Page. Mr. Huggins, that is not a proper Question.

Mr. Hug. My Lord, I desire he may be asked then how long it was before Mr. Arne died that he left the Prison?

Mr. Paine. I was discharged in September, about the 8th.

Mr. Hug. The 8th of September, my Lord, which was about six Weeks before Mr. Arne died.

Mr. Justice Page. When was the Strong Room built?

Mr. Paine. In Mr. Gybbon's Time.

Mr. Hug. My Lord, if Mr. Gybbon built the Strong Room, there is Reason to believe he paid for it.

Call John Bouch.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you belong to the Fleet?

Mr. Bouch. I did, I was Turnkey there.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was the Strong Room built?

Mr.

* In Justice Vol

Mr. Bouch. It was built in 1725, the latter End of the Summer, by the Direction of Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Att. Gen. During the Time that you belonged there, did not Mr. Huggins come frequently?

Mr. Bouch. He came now and then, not very often.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was Arne put in the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. He was put in about August.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know him before he was carried there?

Mr. Bouch. I knew him very well, and never saw any Ill offered by him.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whose Order was he put in by?

Mr. Bouch. He was put in by the Order of Mr. Gybbon and Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did he die in that Place?

Mr. Bouch. He did.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long was he there?

Mr. Bouch. About a Month or six Weeks.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see Mr. Huggins there during the Time Arne was in the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. I cannot say I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who was it over-look'd the building the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. Mr. Huggins, when he came to the Lodge.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was he there when the Building was a-raising?

Mr. Bouch. I cannot be certain, but I remember there was a Direction of the Court of Common-Pleas for Mr. Huggins to inspect the Gaol, and that he came once a-Week after the Order from the Court of Common-Pleas.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the Condition of the Room?

Mr. Bouch. The Room was newly built and green.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you carry any Letter to Mr. Huggins relating to Mr. Arne?

Mr. Bouch. I did carry a Letter from a Friend of Mr. Arne's, and he was so weak then that he could not speak.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did you carry it from?

Mr. Bouch. From the Fleet Prison.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was it about?

Mr. Bouch. It was about getting Arne his Liberty; a Gentleman gave me the Letter, and desired me to bring an Answer as to Arne's having the Liberty of the Rules; and I went myself, and saw Mr. Huggins, and gave him the Letter; he opened it, and said he would send an Answer by Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was this?

Mr. Bouch. It was in October, about a Week before Arne died.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did Arne die?

Mr. Bouch. He died in the Strong Room, I saw him two Days before he died; he was just as if dead then, and very weak and ill.

Mr. Att. Gen. What kind of a Place was the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. It was a very fickle Place, because of the Common Sewer running under it.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Message did Mr. Huggins send by Mr. Hopkins as to the Letter?

Mr. Bouch. Mr. Huggins sent Word by Daniel Hopkins, that he would inform Mr. Arne's Friend what was to be done.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who was it built the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. One Fry, a Bricklayer, took Directions from Mr. Huggins, at Mr. Huggins's own House, and I was present when Fry was there.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who paid for the Building?

Mr. Bouch. I believe Mr. Huggins, for Fry was a Master Bricklayer, and I saw him there about Business after the Building was finished.

Mr. Att. Gen. How came you to be there?

Mr. Bouch. I went there then to get a Place of Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was you Turnkey?

Mr. Bouch. I was not Turnkey till after Mr. Arne's Death.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Bouch. I saw him in the Strong Room twenty Times, for I was then endeavouring to get to be Turnkey.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who had you the Place from?

Mr. Bouch. From Mr. Huggins; and during the Time I was endeavouring for it, I saw Mr. Arne in the Strong Room.

Call James Tucker.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know the Place that is called the Strong Room in the Fleet Prison?

Mr. Tucker. I do, and was employed by the Bricklayer and Carpenter to make the Iron-work.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who did you make out your Bill to?

Mr. Tucker. I made it out to Mr. Huggins, as Debtor.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who paid you?

Mr. Tucker. I made the Bill out in Mr. Huggins's Name, and was paid by Pindar, and a Receipt was given in full of that Bill.

Call Mrs. Eliz. Le Pointz.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Edward Arne?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember him a Prisoner in the Fleet, and his Confinement in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I do; he had been confined two or three Days before I went to him; the first Time I saw him sitting upon a Bench, and the next Time in his Feather-bed, and he was covered therein, and his Bed lay on the Floor.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Condition of Health was he in?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I never found him any Way distempered, only disordered by the Cold and Dampness of the Place.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was not his Voice altered?

Mrs. Le Pointz. He had a shivering Hoarseness upon him.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long did he continue there?

Mrs. Le Pointz. He continued there seven Weeks, or thereabouts.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Condition was the Place in?

Mrs. Le Pointz. It was building in July, and I remember the finishing of it some Time in August.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was Mr. Arne put in?

Mrs. Le Pointz. He was put in as soon as it was finished.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you believe that was the Occasion of his Death?

Mrs. Le Pointz. It was impossible to be otherwise; for the Building was so very green, that you might pull the Mortar from the Bricks with your Fingers, and it was impossible any body could be continued therein for seven Weeks without being killed by the Dampness of the Place; and I verily believe that Confinement was the Occasion of Arne's Death.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you ever speak to any body about his Release?

Mrs. Le Pointz. Whilst he was in this Place, I met with Mr. Hopkins, and spoke to him to acquaint Mr. Huggins, that it was impossible but that Arne must perish, if continued in that Place; and if he did not speak to Mr. Huggins, I would send to him myself; to which Hopkins replied, he would; and afterwards I met with him, and asked him, whether he had spoke? He told me he had spoke to Mr. Huggins, who said it was no Business of his.

Mr. Justice Page. That cannot be given in Evidence, for 'tis only Hearsay.

Mrs. Le Pointz. (Standing up again) I saw Mr. Huggins upon the Bare, with one Levings, a Quaker, then a Prisoner in the House, and Mr. Gybbon, during the Time Arne was in the Strong Room.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. Which Way did he come upon the Bare?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I cannot tell; there was then but two Ways, one by the Strong Room, and the other through the House.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. Whereabouts is the Strong Room?

Mrs. Le Pointz. The Strong Room was built near the Bare, and joins to the End of the House; and I saw them walking together; and that he could not well come in or out without coming near the Strong Room.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. What did you think was the Occasion of his coming there?

Mrs. Le Pointz. To take a Survey of the Walls, which were then finished, for that I saw him look up at them.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. Did you know Mr. Huggins?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I knew him very well.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. When was this?

Mrs. Le Pointz. I take it to be some Time in October, about fourteen Days before Arne died: It was after the Fire happened in Bell-Savage Yard. Thomas Levings was called, and being a Quaker* refused to take an Oath, and therefore could not be admitted an Evidence.

Mr. Huggins. It is a great while ago since this Matter happened; there is no Notice taken by the Course of the Evidence how this Matter has gone on, and therefore it was very difficult to answer particularly thereto; this I do solemnly affirm, That during the Time Arne was there, I never heard of his Name, that he died, or was in the Strong Room, till that I was in the Fleet to be examined. That I never was seen in the Fleet Prison while Arne was in the Strong Room; and that no one of the King's Witnesses has said, that I used any hard Words about Mr. Arne. There was a Suggestion of my getting Arne into Bethlehem, it was no Part of my Office as Warden of the Fleet, but I might by a friendly Office use my Interest with Mr. Taylor; and that would shew me more a humane Man, than one guilty of Cruelty.

That some of the Prisoners, who were Witnesses, were discharged the Prison the 7th of September, so it was not likely that they should be able to swear as to Arne's Death, who did not die till October.

As to Gybbon being Deputy, the first Evidence to be produced will be the Act for Insolvent Debtors in 1725, to prove that Gybbon carried in a Lift pursuant to that Act; and delivered it as Gaoler, and swore to it; and I must desire, that Mr. Tanner may read the Clause in that Act of Parliament, where Gaolers are directed to make out a Lift of Prisoners.

Mr. Att. Gen. If you would prove Mr. Gybbon Warden, you must prove what Consideration he gave, and what Stile he bore.

Mr. Justice Page. Did the Commissioners in that Act take notice who was Deputy-Warden or not? Let it be Deputy, or how it would, they took no Notice of that. It would be no Evidence for the King.

Mr. Huggins. It will prove that Gybbon acted.

Mr. Justice Page. We shall see that when the Act of Parliament is read, I allow Gybbon did act in Fact.

Mr. Att. Gen. If he had a Mind to prove Mr. Gybbon Deputy, he must prove it by his Deputation.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. It is too early to offer this before the Deputation lies before us; therefore I submit it, if it is not too soon to offer this in Evidence.

Mr. Justice Page. I cannot direct the Prisoner how he should proceed; whether this may be of Advantage to him I cannot find. If he be charged from a particular Fact that did arise by Gybbon, why should not Huggins, by the same Rule of Reason, justify himself by any other Act done by Gybbon?

Vide Act.] Then the Clause in the Act of Insolvency in the Year 1725 was ordered to be read.

Mr. Justice Page. I do not see, upon reading of the Act, it affects any Thing that has been said. I take it that the Officer acts, and makes Returns, and the Law does not say whether it is the Warden or the Deputy-Warden. Mr. Huggins, I dare to say you yourself will own it; and the Use that you would make of it is to shew, that he acted as Warden.

Mr. Huggins. Fulthorpe was discharged the 7th of September. I desire Mr. Tanner may produce the Lift, and that it may be read to shew that.

Mr. Justice Page. If Fulthorpe's Evidence was laid aside, yet there are Witnesses enough to prove, that they saw you there: However, I must take notice of what Fulthorpe said; he said, that Arne was a peaceable Man, and then gave a Description of the Room; and said, that the Floor was covered with a few Boards; and that he saw the Prisoner twice in the Fleet, and that he was there at one Time, and looked in at the Door, and then the Door was shut, and he went away. This Defence seems but trifling.

* In the Case of Bambridge (postea) the Appellant's Counsel called a Quaker, and insisted that this is a Civil Suit, in which he might be a Witness. But the Chief Justice said, it was to this Purpose a Criminal Proceeding, and therefore he could not be a Witness. Strange's Reports, Vol. II. p. 856.

Mr. Huggins. I intended it as to the Credit of the Witness.
Mr. Just. Page. The Man has sworn honestly, and if it was struck out of the Evidence it would not signify; and I must a little assist you, as no Counsel is allowed but in Cases of High-Treason. You was going to shew the Act of the Deputy, without shewing what Authority was given to the Deputy. If you have any Instrument or Agreement by which you constituted Gybbon Deputy, you must produce it.

Mr. Hugg. My Lord, I cannot produce it, because it is in the Hands of the Widow Gybbon, or some other Person; and we are at this Time in Equity.

Mr. Just. Page. Affairs of this Nature have always been done by Indenture—as the Sheriffs of London to their Under-Sheriff—and then you must have a Counterpart.

Mr. Hugg. My Lord, I never made any such Indenture; I desire Mr. Tanner may be asked, who appeared as Warden upon the Insolvent Act?

Mr. Tanner. Mr. Gybbon, my Lord.

Mr. Just. Page. Do you believe he was Deputy or not?

Mr. Tanner. I looked upon Gybbon as a proper Officer.

Mr. Just. Page. Who do you think was Warden?

Mr. Tanner. I cannot say who was Warden.

Mr. Just. Page. I thought you would not have equivocated. You are a good Officer, but I shall never examine you as a Witness.

Call John Jeffreys, Keeper of the Compter. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Hugg. Mr. Jeffreys, pray acquaint the Court what Agreement was made between Mr. Gybbon and me.

Mr. Jeff. There was a Writing made, and I was a Witness to it, but did not know what it was.

Mr. Just. Page. Mr. Huggins, the Questions that you ask, you must first explain to the Court.

Mr. Hugg. I desire Mr. Jeffreys may be asked, if he was present at the Agreement?—Mr. Jeffreys. I was present.

Mr. Hugg. Was there any Writing signed?

Mr. Just. Page. You must take care to produce the Writings if you examine to them.

Mr. Hugg. I have sent a Man for the Receipt of 1000l.

Mr. Just. Page. I cannot comply for the same Title made under your Grant to be given in Evidence for the Grantor: It was a Title from you, and how you will do to prove this by Word of Mouth, I cannot see how it can be done; for when a Treaty comes into Articles and Writing, the Treaty by Word of Mouth is at an End without the Writing is produced.

Mr. Hugg. I was going to explain myself, and was over-ruled.

Mr. Just. Page. When once Articles are come to be a Conveyance, except it is to explain that Conveyance, and except it is to discover some Fraud even in the Conveyance when given, it cannot be spoke to.

Mr. Baron Carter being gone out of Court, now returned, and Mr. Justice Page took notice to him of what had passed in his Absence.

Mr. Huggins's Aim is to shew, that Mr. Gybbon was sole, intire, acting Warden; and that no Act of Gybbon's should affect him; and had the late Act of Insolvency read, and thought to have read the Schedule, but that could not be read. Mr. Huggins asked who brought in that Schedule, and asked Mr. Tanner, whether Mr. Gybbon brought in that Return as Deputy or not; who said that he did not know who was Warden, but that Gybbon was the proper Officer: Now Huggins carrying this Matter further, would have Gybbon appear to be his Deputy, and has now called Jeffreys to prove that Deputation. Jeffreys says, that it was in Writing, and I could not allow Jeffreys to give in Evidence what was in Writing. Huggins said in Answer, that there was no Counterpart, and that Gybbon's Widow had such Appointment. I submit it if it was not his Act and Deed, if Mr. Gybbon allowed of it.

Mr. Hugg. My Lord, it is only a Receipt.

Mr. Jeffreys. My Lord, it was a Receipt for 1000l. and no Agreement.

Mr. Hugg. Mr. Gybbon agreed with me for 500l. per Annum; and liking the Bargain made a Deposit of 1000l. and this was all the Writing between us, and in it declared that he was to pay 500l. per Annum, on Condition of having the Rents of the House and Shops in Westminster-Hall, and required a Deposit of 1000l. and a Parole of three Years may amount to a Lease or Demise.

Mr. Baron Carter. At six Months End Gybbon desired to have it renewed, and came to the subsequent Agreement for 900l. per Annum for three Years. If the Court could see that Agreement, whether it do not amount to a Lease, there may be a Demise in it, but how far the Court will lay their Commands to produce it, we shall not now determine; it would be very hard to have it out of his Power, and not to admit him to give Evidence.

Mr. Att. Gen. The Law requires the best Evidence that is to be given; supposing that that Writing was lost, he might be admitted to give Evidence that it was lost. If it was in the Hands of any Officer of the Crown, and they wanted to be admitted to give Evidence as to the Contents, whether upon giving Evidence, that the Thing was in Being, and in the Hands of a third Person, they should give Evidence Parole as to that.

Mr. Just. Page. Suppose a Man receive Money by false Tokens, but by some Accident it is got into other Hands, and he uses all the Care and Art he can to get it, and proves that he cannot come at it, it would be hard to convict a Man, if he cannot come at the Writing. It is the same in Cases of Life and Death, by Forgery and false Deeds.

Mr. Bar. Carter. I agree your Notion is right in Cases of Civil Actions, for if he can't give such Evidence as the Law gives against it, he has a Remedy at Equity; but in this Case, where a Man stands indicted for Murder, where can he have his Remedy? I am sure we should be guilty of Murder, if we insisted on it; Huggins ought to give an Account, that he can't come at such Agreement.

Mr. Hugg. Mr. Jeffreys says, that he applied to Mrs. Gybbon, and Mrs. Gybbon told him, that it was in the Hands of one Wilson, her Clerk in Court, and he could not tell whose Hands it was in.

Mr. Jeffreys. I have a Copy of that Writing, which has been in my Hands long before any Contest happened to Mr. Huggins, for it was written at the same Time the Receipt was given.

Mr. Justice Page. Is it a true Copy?

Mr. Jeff. I believe it to be a true Copy, and that there has been no Alteration made in it.

The Copy of the Writing read — And it appeared to be witnessed by Mr. Jeffreys, the 26th of June 1723.

Mr. Hugg. Have you had any Conversation with Mrs. Gybbon lately?

Mr. Jeff. Mrs. Gybbon came to me about fourteen Days ago.

Mr. Hugg. Was there any Talk of any such Thing as a Lease or Articles of Agreement?

Mr. Jeff. There was no such Word mentioned as a Lease or Articles of Agreement.

Mr. Hugg. Do you know of any Articles of Agreement?

Mr. Jeff. I don't believe there was any, for I was very conversant with Mr. Gybbon, but never heard him ask after them.

Mr. Hugg. How long did Gybbon continue in that Office?

Mr. Jeff. Three Years.

Mr. Att. Gen. What do you mean by that Office; did he continue to act for those three Years?

Mr. Jeff. He did, and one Year longer, which I apply'd to Mr. Huggins for him to do.

Mr. Just. Page. You was present at the settling of the Account between Mr. Huggins and Mr. Gybbon: at the Bottom of the Account there are some Items that have no Sums to them; pray how did that happen?

Mr. Jeff. My Lord, it was not settled.

Mr. Just. Page. Was any Thing mentioned, who was to be at the Charge of Repairs during the four Years?

Mr. Jeff. Mr. Huggins made a Memorandum at the Bottom of the Paper.

Mr. Hugg. It was settled at the End of four Years.

Mr. Just. Page. The Repairs of the Prison was left a Blank.

Mr. Hugg. I answer to that, my Lord, that it was settled at the End of four Years; Mr. Jeffreys was then present. Your Lordship seems to take it for a Lease of three Years.

Mr. Just. Page. It is neither the one, nor the other, either Lease or Agreement.

Mr. Hugg. My Lord, Jeffreys said there was no other Agreement.

Call George Welland. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Hugg. When did Gybbon enter upon his Office?

Mr. George Welland. Mr. Gybbon entered at Christmas, 1722, and I was concerned for Mr. Gybbon before, and by his Direction acted, and he always paid me my Fees, and I never received any Thing from Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Hugg. Who bore all Expences relating to the Gaol?

Mr. Well. Mr. Gybbon.

Mr. Huggins. How long did he act?

Mr. Well. Mr. Gybbon was in four Years and a Half.

Mr. Hugg. What do you know about Arne?

Mr. Well. I was there then, and Arne was committed about the Middle of May, and at the latter End of September, Hopkins was sent into the Country to Shropshire, and I acted till October, and I was requested by Mr. Gybbon to go to the Company of Upholders relating to Mr. Arne. He was brought in May, and put at the Vine, and made his Escape, and then grew disordered in his Senses. Some of the Prisoners come and brought a Bed of Mr. Howard's, and I saw him stark naked; and being desired, he was put in the Strong Room at the Request of the Prisoners.

Mr. Hugg. What was done upon your Application to the Company of Upholders?—Mr. Well. They took Care of him.

The Witnesses had a Book in his Hand, which he called a Check-Book.

Mr. Hugg. Pray give an Account, whether I gave any Direction relating to the Prisoners?

Mr. Well. I never saw Mr. Huggins there but twice, and that was, when the Prothonotaries were there.

Mr. Hugg. When had you that Book delivered to you?

Mr. Well. Two Days before Mr. Fitch died; the Book was brought into my Hands, which I continued to act in till Mr. Bigrave came in.

Mr. Hugg. By the Writing in that Book, I can prove Hopkins out of Town. When was Hopkins out of Town?

Mr. Just. Page. I will call Fulthorpe to clear up this Matter.

Fulthorpe was called again.

Mr. Just. Page. When was it you saw Mr. Huggins at the Fleet Prison?

Mr. Fulthorpe. It was some time before I was discharged. It was about a Month before Mr. Arne died, and I likewise saw Mr. Farrington at the same Time. Mr. Hopkins was there, and then came in with Huggins.

Mr. Just. Page. How often did you see Mr. Huggins there?

Mr. Fulth. I saw him twice at the Prison, but once at the Strong Room.

Mr. Just. Page. What Time of the Day was it you saw Mr. Huggins there?

Mr. Fulthorpe. It was between Eleven and Twelve, and there were there Mr. Huggins, Mr. Hopkins, and Barnes; and I saw Mr. Huggins walking upon the Bars, when Levings the Quaker was there, and I believe Mr. Gybbon with them.

Thomas Farrington was again called.

Mr. Just. Page. Who was at the Strong Room when you saw Huggins there?

Mr. Farrington. There were Mr. Huggins, Hopkins, and Barnes there.

Mr. Hugg. I beg Leave to observe, that Fulthorpe was discharged on the 7th of September, and whether I may not be allowed to examine Welland again, to know if Mr. Gybbon did not give all Orders, and to prove that the constant Usage was not to have the Coroner sit upon Bodies in Mesne Process.

Mr. Just. Page. You may ask what Questions you think proper, for I will stay here till To-morrow Morning, to give you an Opportunity of going on with your Defence in your own way.

Mr. Hugg. I desire then, my Lord, he may be asked, whether Gybbon did not give all Orders relating to the Prisoners?

Mr. Well. He did.

Mr. Hugg. Whether the Coroner was called in to sit upon any Bodies, but in Execution?

Mr. Well. We never had the Coroner, but upon Execution.

Mr. Hugg. Whose Servant was Barnes?

Mr.

Mr. Welland. Mr. Gibbon's Servant, I saw Gibbon pay him Money.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you ever see me and Barnes together?
 Mr. Wel. I don't believe I ever did.
 Mr. Hug. At whose Request was Arne put in the Strong Room?
 Mr. Wel. At the Request of the Prisoners.
 Mr. Justice Page. Name at whose Request he was put in.
 Mr. Wel. I can't tell.
 Mr. Justice Page. How came you to know it?
 Mr. Wel. I was in the Lodge.
 Mr. Justice Page. Was you then present?—Mr. Wel. I was.
 Mr. Justice Page. Can't you name one of them?
 Mr. Wel. No, none of them are now in Gaol.
 Mr. Justice Page. Was not Farrington then a Prisoner?
 Mr. Wel. He was.
 Mr. Justice Page. How long is it since you was concerned in the Prison?
 Mr. Wel. In Michaelmas 1722, and I know nothing of it before.
 Mr. Justice Page. Was there not a Benefit to the Warden for Day-Rules?—Mr. Wel. Yes.
 Mr. Justice Page. Who was the Money accounted for?
 Mr. Wel. It was accounted for to Bishop. The Clerk of the Papers always received the Money, and I have been there several Times at the Payment of Money.
 Mr. Lee. Was it not usual to give Money for the Liberty of the Rules?
 Mr. Wel. Mr. Gibbon made it a Custom to take Two Guineas for every Hundred Pounds, for the Liberty.
 Mr. Lee. Do you know of any Money paid to Mr. Huggins?
 Mr. Wel. I don't know any was.
 Mr. Lee. Was you there when the Strong Room was built?
 Mr. Wel. I was, and Arne was the first Person that was put in.
 Mr. Lee. I ask you, whether it was all finished?
 Mr. Wel. I believe it was floored.
 Mr. Lee. Was it not an arched Vault?
 Mr. Wel. It was a Kind of a Vault, and there was a Bench in it.
 Mr. Lee. Where was it situated?
 Mr. Wel. It was about three Yards from the Dunghill.
 Mr. Lee. Had Arne a Bed there?
 Mr. Wel. He had a Bed in it.
 Mr. Lee. Was he not in a naked Condition?
 Mr. Wel. He was in a naked Condition, which proceeded from his Madnefs.
 Mr. Lee. Was that a Place fit for a Man in his Condition to be kept in?
 Mr. Wel. It was.
 Mr. Lee. Is there any Place so bad in the Prison?
 Mr. Wel. There was a worse Place where I lay, called Julius Caesar's Ward.
 Mr. Lee. How could it be worse?
 Mr. Wel. Because many People lay in it.
 Mr. Lee. Whether Writs were not directed Deputato, or Locum Tenenti?
 Mr. Wel. They were.
 Mr. Lee. Who were the Writs returned by?
 Mr. Wel. By Mr. Huggins.

Call John Browning. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Huggins. How long have you known the Fleet Prison?
 John Browning. I have been a Prisoner there above twenty Years.
 Mr. Huggins. When any body died in the Fleet, except in Execution, was there any Coroner's Inquest?
 Mr. Browning. Never, but when in Execution. Mr. Dickson, who was Clerk of the Papers before Huggins came, told me so.
 Mr. Huggins. My Lord, the Prison being very full, it being against the Time of an Infolvency, the Prisoners grew very riotous, and Mr. Gibbon could not come in, so that there was no Place but the Strong Room to put Arne in.

Call Mr. Samuel Green.

Mr. Huggins. What was the State of the Prison, and the Condition of it in 1725?
 Mr. Green. I was had in in February 1724, and came out the latter End of June 1725, and I apply'd to Mr. Gibbon in February 1724 for a Room; Mr. Gibbon said he could not help me to one; then I apply'd to the Prisoners, and gave a Guinea and a Half to them for one.
 Mr. Huggins. Was there a Court of Inspectors?
 Mr. Green. Yes, and I was one of them, and every Prisoner that came in paid 5s. in order to apply to the Court of Common Pleas to regulate the Fees.
 Mr. Huggins. You did place People in Rooms. Did you punish any Prisoners?—Mr. Green. I can't say we did.
 Mr. Huggins. Did the Warden dare to come in?
 Mr. Green. He did not.
 Mr. Justice Page. Could the Prisoners set open the Gates?
 Mr. Green. They could not set open the Gates, because there was a Turnkey.
 Mr. Huggins. Did Mr. Gibbon offer to come in?
 Mr. Green. He d.d.

Call Mr. William Howard.

Mr. Huggins. Did you know Edward Arne?
 Mr. Howard. Mr. Arne came in about three Weeks before I went out, and he was in the same Room where I was, and wanting some Goods, Arne offered me much more than I thought they were worth; for which Reason I did not apprehend him to be in his right Understanding.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you desire him to bring some Friend?
 Mr. Howard. I think I might desire him to bring some Friend.
 Mr. Huggins. How much might he offer?
 Mr. Howard. He offered me Nine Guineas, but I took Three, when I sold them to his Friends.

Call Mr. Daniel Woodcock.

Mr. Huggins. What do you know of Edward Arne?
 Mr. Woodcock. He came into the Fleet Prison in 1725, and I was a Prisoner a Year and a Half before that, in July 1723, and continued there till September 1725; and I remember Arne's being there some time before I was discharged.
 Mr. Huggins. Was you there when he was carried into the Strong Room?
 Mr. Woodcock. I was.
 Mr. Huggins. Was you in the Cellar, when he was taken from thence?

Mr. Woodcock. I was upon the Stairs, when he was carried into the Strong Room: He lay up and down in the Goal in the Common-Hall and Cellar, till he was carried into the Strong Room, and he was in it till I came away.

Mr. Huggins. Was you ever in the Strong Room?
 Mr. Woodcock. I was.
 Mr. Huggins. Do you remember the building of it?
 Mr. Woodcock. I do.
 Mr. Huggins. How near to the Laystall and Dunghill is it?
 Mr. Woodcock. Within eight or ten Yards.
 Mr. Huggins. Are there any Lights?
 Mr. Woodcock. There is a Place to put in Drink at, on the Side of the Door.
 Mr. Huggins. What is the Wall made of?
 Mr. Woodcock. Lime and Brick, as other Walls are.
 Mr. Huggins. How long was it finished before Arne was carried in?
 Mr. Woodcock. I can't be certain.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you see Arne let out at any time?
 Mr. Woodcock. I saw him let out, and he run about stark Naked.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you ever see him naked before he was put in there?
 Mr. Woodcock. No.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you ever see me at the Prison?
 Mr. Woodcock. Yes, when the Prothonotaries were there.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you think you should have known, when I came there?
 Mr. Woodcock. It was as well known, as if the King had made a publick Entry.
 Mr. Huggins. Was it not for the Prisoners Security to have Arne put there?—Mr. Woodcock. I think it was.
 Mr. Huggins. Who sold Arne his Goods?
 Mr. Woodcock. Captain Howard sold Arne his Goods.
 Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I must observe that the Court of Inspectors punished Prisoners. Did not the Inspectors punish their own Prisoners?
 Mr. Woodcock. Yes, they put them in the Stocks.
 Mr. Huggins. Could Mr. Gibbon come into the Prison?
 Mr. Woodcock. He could not.
 Mr. Justice Page. Why then did you not all go out of Prison?
 Mr. Huggins. Did not the Court of Inspectors dispose of Rooms?
 Mr. Woodcock. I can't say.
 Mr. Huggins. Did you see Barnes carry Arne to the Strong Room?
 Mr. Woodcock. I saw Arne as he was going to the Strong Room with Barnes; and there was a Complaint made to the Court of Inspectors; but not about this Man, but about others.
 Mr. Huggins. Was he a quiet Man?
 Mr. Woodcock. I saw no other, than his running about like a Madman.
 Mr. Huggins. How many Days was Arne in the Strong Room before you was let out of Prison?
 Mr. Woodcock. I was let out about the 4th or 5th of September, there was an Application made to the Court of Common Pleas, and I made an Affidavit against Barnes.

Call Mr. Samuel Humphrys.

Mr. Huggins. Was not you Steward of the Court of Inspectors?
 Mr. Humphrys. I was Steward for some considerable Time.
 Mr. Huggins. When was the Court first erected, and upon what Occasion?
 Mr. Baron Carter. Mr. Huggins, how can you apply this, I can't apprehend. Mr. Humphrys, what do you know of Arne or the Strong Room?
 Mr. Humphrys. Mr. Arne was a Prisoner there, when I was there first.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Where was he when he came first?
 Mr. Humphrys. A Person of his Name came there, whom I knew, and I went with him to see Mr. Arne, and he lived intemperately. This Gentleman, after he had been there, had supplied him with Money, which he spent in Liquors; and after some time he was much altered in his way, and I saw him one Day walking with his Hat and Wig off in the Rain, and took Notice of it; and after that he proceeded to further Extremities, and took up a Brick-bat, and throwed it upon the Bars.
 Mr. Justice Page. Do you believe he had any Design against any body?
 Mr. Humphrys. I believe he had not.
 Mr. Justice Page. Did he ever hit any body?
 Mr. Humphrys. I do not know that he did, but we had apprehensions, that he might, after being in that Condition; he was an Object of great Compassion.
 Mr. Huggins. What was his Behaviour?
 Mr. Humphrys. His Behaviour was such, that he was not fit for a Bed-fellow.
 Mr. Huggins. Do you know any Thing of his being put into the Strong Room?
 Mr. Humphrys. Before he was put into that Place I was discharged.
 Mr. Huggins. Do you remember that you saw me there?
 Mr. Humphrys. I don't remember I saw you there, except when the Prothonotaries were there.
 Mr. Huggins. Was that Room built when you was there?
 Mr. Humphrys. According to the best of my Memory, that Room was built while I was there.
 Mr. Huggins. Was it not a Stable before?
 Mr. Humphrys. There was a Stable, but I don't apprehend it was built on that Spot.
 Mr. Huggins. Was you present at any Time, when the Prisoners desired to have Arne put into the Strong Room?
 Mr. Humphrys. I do not know it; it was after that I came away.
 Mr. Huggins. Did Gibbon dare to come into the Prison without Leave of the Inspectors?
 Mr. Humphrys. Mr. Gibbon was very unwilling to come in, and I believe the Reason was, he could not come in with any Safety. Mr. Gibbon sent one Day to some Gentlemen of the Master Side to know, if he might venture with Safety to the Fleet Prison, for that he had a mind to see the Repairs; upon which Answer was returned, that he might come in; and Mr. Gibbon came in, and I went about with him.
 Mr. Huggins. I desire he may be asked, whether, if any Man was injured, would they not have complained of it?
 Mr. Humphrys. I was there when Arne came in, and discharged before he was put in the Strong Room.

Call

Call Mr. Thomas Dean.

Mr. Huggins. Did you see me in the Prison during the Time Mr. Arne was there?

Mr. Dean. During the Time I was there, which was till the 12th or 14th of September, you was not there; I was discharged on the 7th, but stay'd a Week after.

Mr. Huggins. Was it the Opinion of the Prisoners that Mr. Arne should be confined?

Mr. Dean. It was.

Mr. Huggins. Who provided him Victuals?

Mr. Dean. One Mr. Loudon found him in Meat and Drink, and he was allowed for it. I have seen Mr. Loudon in the Room.

Mr. Huggins. Who kept the Key of the Strong Room?

Mr. Dean. I don't know who kept the Key.

Mr. Huggins. Did you see Arne there?

Mr. Dean. I have seen Arne in the Strong Room.

Mr. Huggins. When was he carried there?

Mr. Dean. He was committed to the Strong Room in July, or the Beginning of August.

Mr. Huggins. Did you see me with Gybbon?

Mr. Dean. I went round the Bare when Mr. Gybbon was in the Prison, and was upon the Bare with him.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not Gybbon's Servants come in?

Mr. Dean. They did, and Gybbon came to Chapel.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whereabouts is the Chapel?

Mr. Dean. The Chapel is within the Walls of the Prison.

Mr. Att. Gen. If Mr. Gybbon dare to venture to come to Chapel; how came he not to come at other Times?

Mr. Huggins. Please to ask, whether, if between the Hours of Ten and Twelve I had been there, I must not have been seen?

Mr. Dean. Captain Pattison and others went round the Prison with Mr. Gybbon.

Mr. Huggins. The Question is, If I had been there, whether you would not have seen me?

Mr. Dean. I should.

Mr. Huggins. Had not Arne a broken Constitution?

Mr. Baron Carter. Mr. Huggins, I cannot admit you to go into that Evidence; I don't know what Advantage it will be to you, you are going to prejudice yourself; for if he had a broken Constitution, there was less Reason to put him into the Strong Room.

Call Mr. John Loudon.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, be pleased to ask Mr. Loudon, whether he had the Care and Custody of Mr. Arne?

Mr. Justice Page. Answer that Question.

Mr. Loudon. I knew Mr. Arne before he came to Prison, I had some Acquaintance with him; he came into Prison about the latter End of June, and some Gentlemen spoke to me to have Mr. Arne table with me, and he allowed me 5s. per Week; but the Gentlemen grew uneasy at his Dining with them, because that he was something out of Order; and some Time after growing worse, the Gentleman with whom he lay quarrelled with him, and I could not afford to board him any longer, he not being able to pay me; and after he was turned from my Table, some of the Upholders Company came and desired me to dine him as usual; and every Morning I carried him a Breakfast, and a Plate of hot Victuals and Drink, and I had the Key of the Room in two or three Days after he was put in.

Mr. Justice Page. How came you by the Key?

Mr. Loudon. Sometimes it was Half an Hour, sometimes an Hour before I could find the Officer, and I said, if they would not let me have the Key, I would not furnish him with Victuals.

Mr. Justice Page. You had the Liberty of going in, could you let him out?

Mr. Loudon. Though I had the Key, and had the Liberty of going in, I had no Power to let him out. He was never out, from the Time he was put in, but once, and that was when some Servants of the Upholders Company came to see him, and then Barnes locked him up again; and when he was out he was stark naked, and run into the Chapel with the Feathers all about him, and I went to take him to carry him in again, but he was very surdy, and would not let me.

Mr. Huggins. In all the Time you had the Key, and the Custody of him, which was from the third Day after his going into the Room, till three Days of his coming out, did you see me in the Prison?

Mr. Loudon. I did not.

Mr. Huggins. Do you think you should, if I had come?

Mr. Loudon. Yes.

Mr. Huggins. If I had been in the House, should you have seen, or heard of it?—Mr. Loudon. I should.

Mr. Huggins. Did any-body sit up with Mr. Arne?

Mr. Loudon. There was somebody sat up with him a few Nights before he died.

Mr. Huggins. I submit it to you, my Lord, whether I shall produce the People of the Upholders Company that sat up with him.

Mr. Justice Page. That will be of no great Use to you.

Mr. Huggins. Was there a Court of Inspectors, who governed the Prisoners?—Mr. Loudon. Yes, there was.

Mr. Huggins. Do you remember you saw Mr. Gybbon there then?

Mr. Loudon. No.

Mr. Huggins. Did the Prisoners dispose of their Rooms?

Mr. Loudon. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. I don't understand very well what way you propose to make your Defence; if Mr. Gybbon had the sole Power, then the Court of Inspectors could not; first Mr. Huggins is not concerned, because Gybbon was; and then he could not be concerned, because the Court of Inspectors was. Mr. Huggins I take to be Warden, and Gybbon Deputy-Warden.

Mr. Attorney-General. What kind of a Place is the Strong Room?

Mr. Loudon. It is a Brick-wall, and arched over with Bricks, and the Floor is boarded, and at that Time a Bench went across the Room. There is a Hole over the Door, with four or five Iron Bars, and a Hole big enough to put a Quart-pot in by the side; it was a new built Room, about six or eight Weeks before Arne was put in, there was no Chimney, Fire-place, nor any Convenience to ease Nature.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it not the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Loudon. It was possible it might. I believe it might do him Prejudice as to his Health.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it hasten his Death?

Mr. Loudon. I do not know but it might; I believe it did hasten his Death.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who gave you the Key?

Mr. Loudon. The Turnkey; and I restored it to him again.

Mr. Att. Gen. As you came to take charge of it, did you always keep the Key?—Mr. Loudon. Sometimes I had it, and sometimes they had it.

Mr. Justice Page. Do you believe you could have lived there six Weeks, if you had been put in that Room?

Mr. Loudon. I don't believe I could.

Call Morgan Gwyn.

Mr. Huggins. Was you a Prisoner all the while Mr. Arne was there?

Mr. Gwyn. Yes.

Mr. Huggins. Did you see me in the House during that Time?

Mr. Gwyn. I did not hear that you had been in the House all the Time he was a Prisoner there, nor did I see you.

Mr. Huggins. Do you think if I had come, you should have seen me?

Mr. Gwyn. I do think I should.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I have Witnesses to prove that I was in Hampshire from the Beginning of September till the Middle of September; that one Part of the Time that Hopkins and myself are said to be at the Strong Room I was out of Town, and another Part that Hopkins was out of Town.

Call William Huggins.

Mr. Justice Page. You are Son to the Prisoner?

William Huggins. I am, my Lord; I have a House in Hampshire; and I remember by several Circumstances, that my Father came there the 1st of September, and continued till the 14th or 15th.

Mr. Huggins. Was I from your House during that Time?

William Huggins. Neither my Father nor myself were; that being the long Vacation, my Father was absent from his Business, and was out of Town at Sir George Oxenden's.

Call Richard Smith.

Mr. Huggins. I desire he may be asked, my Lord, whether he saw me in Hampshire, in 1725, at my Son's?

Mr. Smith. My Lord, I saw Mr. Huggins in Hampshire about the 14th or 15th of September in that Year; and he was likewise there some Time in August.

Mr. Justice Page. Was Mr. Huggins twice there in that Summer?

Mr. Smith. He was there for a great many Days at one Time.

Mr. Justice Page. Did he go up to London, and come down again?

Mr. Smith. I cannot say whether he did or not.

Mr. Justice Page. Did he come up and down several Times?

Mr. Smith. He was constantly there for some Days.

Mr. Justice Page. What are you?

Mr. Smith. I am Tenant to the Estate which Mr. Huggins purchased.

Call Robert Knight.

Mr. Huggins. Do you know of my being at my Son's House in Hampshire, in 1725?

Mr. Knight. You was there between the 4th and 11th of September, and staid fifteen Days.

Mr. Huggins. When did I return?—Mr. Knight. The 15th.

Mr. Huggins. Was I there in August too?

Mr. Knight. You was there between the 9th and 14th, and stayed seven Days.

Call Charles Bird.

Mr. Huggins. Do you know of my being at my Son's House, in Hampshire, in 1725?

Mr. Bird. You was there in August, 1725, about the 7th, but cannot say how long you stayed there; then you came down on the 1st of September, and returned the 15th of the same Month.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I went from thence into Berkshire.

Call James Green.

Mr. Huggins. Did you see me in Hampshire at my Son's in 1725?

Green. I was a Servant then, and lived in Hampshire at the same Time; and you came there on the first of September, and continued till the Eleventh; and in the same Year you was there in August.

Call John Tucker.

Mr. Huggins. Who are you Servant to?

Tucker. To Sir George Oxenden.

Mr. Huggins. Was I any Time in Berkshire in 1725?

Tucker. You was there in September, 1725; and on the 17th I carried you from Wittenham, in Berkshire, to Henley upon Thames.

Mr. Huggins. Did you carry me any further?—Tucker. No.

Mr. Justice Page. When did Mr. Huggins come there?

Tucker. I did not mind that; I know the Time when I carried him from thence, but cannot tell when he came there.

Sir George Oxenden.

Sir George Oxenden. My Lord, Mr. Huggins said he came from his Son's about the 15th of September, and came to Henley about the 17th. I remember very well that Mr. Huggins was at my House in Berkshire, because Sir Cecil Bishop being there (it was the Day before or after Watlington Fair, which was the 18th), Mr. Huggins offered to purchase a little Farm of him, which Mr. Huggins said he would make a Present of to his Son, which, I thought, was a kind, good-natur'd Act: He went away on the 17th or 18th, and I rather believe it was the 18th, because on that Day I went to Watlington Fair.

Mr. Justice Page. How long did Mr. Huggins stay at your House?

Sir George Oxenden. Mr. Huggins was not there above two Days, and said that he came out of Hampshire.

Call Daniel Hopkins.

Mr. Huggins. I must observe, my Lord, the Witnesses said, that Mr. Hopkins was with me, that he was present at the Strong Room.

Mr. Justice Page. Mr. Hopkins, pray when did you go out of Town?

Mr. Hopkins. I went in the Oxford Coach on Monday, the 27th of September, 1725, and got to Oxford that Night; and on Tuesday took the Worcester Coach to Merton in the Marsh, and went from thence to a Place called Barton, to one Mr. Oakley's, a Relation's.

Mr. Huggins. When did you return?

Mr. Hopkins. I came back on the 14th of October in the same Year.

Mr. Huggins. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked, if ever he saw me in the Prison in the Month of September?

Mr.

Mr. Hopkins. No, nor in October; for you was not come back on the 19th.

Mr. Huggins. Was you at the Door of the Strong Room with me?

Mr. Hopkins. No, I was there by myself.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Do you know Mr. Farrington?—Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Don't you remember that he was there with you?

Mr. Hopkins. I don't remember any Company was there then.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Was Barnes there?—Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Who opened the Door?

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot tell.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Did you see Mr. Arne?

Mr. Hopkins. I saw him there; he was naked; he had something about him white, but I cannot say what.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Had you no Discourse about this Man?

Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did not Mr. Gybbon send you to Mr. Huggins about Arne?—Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. When you was at the Door, Did you not whisper to any one?—Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Whose Servant was Barnes?

Mr. Hopkins. He was Servant to Gybbon.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Who named him a Watchman?

Mr. Hopkins. He was a Watchman when I came there; and I saw Gybbon pay him several Times.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Who was you appointed by?

Mr. Hopkins. I was recommended to Mr. Gybbon by Mr. Huggins.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did you do any Business for the Prisoner?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes, and attended him constantly at his House every Morning; but I never had any Thing for that Trouble.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did you buy your Place?—Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did you take all those Journeys to Mr. Huggins for nothing?

Mr. Hopkins. He had seldom any thing to do for me; I was in the Morning generally with him about seven o'Clock, and left him by nine.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Do you know Mrs. Le Pointz?—Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Had you no Discourse with her about Arne as to his Condition?—Mr. Hopkins. I do not remember I had.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Mr. Hopkins, pray consider with yourself, and answer directly, whether or no Mrs. Le Pointz did not desire you to speak to Mr. Huggins about Arne, and you said you would, and that you came to her after, and told her, that you had spoke to Mr. Huggins, and that he said it was no Business of his? Pray consider, and recollect yourself.

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot recollect it.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How did Arne come into the Strong Room?

Mr. Hopkins. I do not know.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How long was he there?—Mr. Hopkins. Six Weeks.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How long was it in that Time before you heard he was there?—Mr. Hopkins. It could not be long.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How long after the Beginning of the six Weeks was it that you saw him there?

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot tell how long; it could not be long.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Was there any Matter in the Gaol that you did not acquaint Mr. Huggins with?

Mr. Hopkins. I seldom acquainted him with any of the Transactions.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Do you remember you acquainted him with this Man's being in the Strong Room?—Mr. Hopkins. I do not know I did.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did you hear any Complaint of his being in that Place?

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot say that I heard any Complaint of his being there.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. I have in my Hand, Mr. Hopkins, an Examination of your's, and I would have you consider with yourself, and I will ask you one Question or two. Do you think the Keeping the Man in that Place was the Cause of his Death?

Mr. Hopkins. I had been very credibly informed of the Indisposition of Arne before.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Upon the Oath you have taken, was not Arne's being confined in that Place the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot say, upon the Oath that I have taken, that it was, as he was mad and sick before he was put in the Strong Room. I believe the Madness was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long after Mr. Arne was confined was it that you saw him?

Mr. Hopkins. I cannot say how long; I believe it was in the Month of September.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not you see him more than once?

Mr. Hopkins. I do not remember.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you again, Did not you see him more than once?

Mr. Hopkins. I do remember I saw him a second Time lying on the Floor, and the upper Part of his Body was then naked.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was any Prisoner in the Fleet confined in such a Strong Room before?

Mr. Hopkins. None was put in there before, nor in any such.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Kind of Room was it?

Mr. Hopkins. The Roof was arched; it was built even with the Ground, and built not long before Arne was put in there.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you observe the Condition of the Wall?

Mr. Hopkins. The Room was damp.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Officer was you belonging to the Fleet?

Mr. Hopkins. I was Clerk of the Inquiries.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not you go to Mr. Huggins frequently?

Mr. Hopkins. I went to Mr. Huggins three or four Times a Week.

Mr. Att. Gen. What did you go to Mr. Huggins upon?

Mr. Hopkins. I went to him about his own Business.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you never attend him on Mornings about the Business of the Prison?

Mr. Hopkins. I have acquainted him with some Things.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not you acquaint him with Matters of Consequence in the Prison?

Mr. Hopkins. I did, if they were Matters of any Consequence, or extraordinary.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not you acquaint Mr. Huggins with Mr. Arne's being there?

Mr. Hopkins. The Reason is why I did not, that I went out of Town on the 27th of September, and did not return till the 1st of October.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you, Whether you believe in your Conscience you did acquaint Mr. Huggins or not?

Mr. Hopkins. It is very likely I did, if I was desired.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you believe in your Conscience you did, if you was desired?—Mr. Hopkins. Why, I verily believe in my Conscience I did, if I was desired.

Mr. Att. Gen. How do you know Arne was mad?

Mr. Hopkins. I heard that he was.

Mr. Att. Gen. Would not his own Room have been a sufficient Confinement?—Mr. Hopkins. I believe it would.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you receive any Order from Mr. Huggins for the Relief of this Man?—Mr. Hopkins. I do not know that I did.

[Upon which his Examination, which was taken before Edward Hughes, Esq. upon Oath, was read, to shew his Prevarication.]

Mr. Justice Page. I ask you, Whether in the Month of September, there was not a great many People discharged out of Custody, and whether there was not any one Room that became empty?

Mr. Hopkins. I believe there was, for fifty or sixty Persons were then discharged; but I had nothing to do with the Affair of Rent.

Mr. Justice Page. Was there any Room better than the Strong Room empty?—Mr. Hopkins. Any Room was better than the Strong Room.

Mr. Justice Page. How long was Arne continued there after the 7th of September?—Mr. Hopkins. He was continued there till he died.

Mr. Justice Page. Was there any Room in the House so bad as that?

Mr. Hopkins. I do not know of any.

Mr. Justice Page. When so many were discharged, might there not be a Room that Arne might be put in?

Mr. Hopkins. I do not remember any Disposition of Rooms.

Mr. Justice Page. Was there no Places empty where the fifty or sixty lay?—Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Justice Page. Was there not a Room then for one Man to lie in?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any Discourse with Bishop about Arne?

Mr. Hopkins. I do not remember he ever spoke to me about him.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Mr. Gybbon never speak to you in the Presence of Bishop, to speak to Mr. Huggins, that some Care might be taken of Arne?

Mr. Hopkins. He did not.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Mr. Gybbon order you to speak to Mr. Huggins to get him into Bethlehem, and to speak to Mr. Taylor, to get him in?

Mr. Justice Page. I must observe, that Mr. Huggins owned that he only did it (speaking of Arne's being got into Bethlehem) as a Friend, and not Quatenus Warden.

Mr. Lee. Mr. Hopkins. I ask you, Whether you at any Time spoke to Gybbon, or any one else, to give Mr. Huggins Notice of Arne's being in the Strong Room?—Mr. Hopkins. I do not know that I did.

(Call Thomas Smith.)

Mr. Huggins. What Resolution did the Upholder's Company come to, as to the discharging Arne out of the Fleet?

Smith. He was Servant to the Company of Undertakers at Exeter Change.

Mr. Justice Page. Do you know if Arne was to be discharged, or how?

Smith. Martin and others, Members of the said Company, first arrested him, and he was carried to a Bailiff's in Hare-Court, and lay there a considerable Time, and then was carried to the Fleet; and upon an Application to the Company of Upholders, they agreed to discharge him, and get him into Bethlehem.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, he was a very sickly Man before he came there; and I desire the Witness may tell you what Condition he was in.

Smith. In the Month of April, 1725, he was in a weakly Condition.

Mr. Justice Page. Mr. Huggins, I cannot admit you into that Evidence.

Mr. Huggins. I desire to call People to his Character.

(Call Mr. Thomas Arne.)

Mr. Huggins. He was chief Mourner to Arne; I desire he may acquaint you what Relation he was to him.

Mr. Arne. Edward Arne was my Uncle's Son: I know that he was in Prison; he lay some Time at an Officer's House, and from thence was removed to the Fleet.

Mr. Huggins. When did you go to him?

Mr. Arne. A Week or ten Days before he died I saw him there; I enquired for him, and they said he was locked up, and directed me to go to Mr. Loudon, Mr. Jerningham's Man.

Mr. Huggins. Was the Door shut?

Mr. Arne. It was padlocked; he lay down at the Side of the Room near the Door, and I found some Rags about him. He knew me, and took me by the Hand; he was then very ill, and could hardly speak. I asked him, what was become of his Ring, Seal, Gold-headed Cane, and other Things of Value? He spoke very faint; I with much Difficulty understood by a Word now and then, that one Searls, a Mercer, had got some of them; and afterwards upon Enquiry found, that he had his Gold Watch, which he had lent him fourteen Guineas upon.

Mr. Huggins. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mr. Arne. He was not capable of complaining, being so very weak.

Mr. Huggins. What State of Health was he in before he came there?

Mr. Arne. I believe he was in a wasting Condition before he was arrested.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you hear any Complaint as to his being in the strong Room?—Mr. Arne. By him I did not.

Mr. Att. Gen. At the Time when you came to visit him, was the Room in a Condition for a sick or a well Man?

Mr. Arne. I believe it was not fit for a sick or a well Man to be in it.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long do you think you could have lived if you had been confined in that Room?

Mr. Arne. I could not have lived six or seven Days, and could not believe any Man alive could be there six or seven Weeks.

Mr. Att. Gen. How often was you there?

Mr. Arne. I never saw it but once.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you think you could have lived there six Weeks?

Mr. Arne. I think I could not live six Weeks in the Damp without Fire or Candle.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, I desire to call some Gentlemen to my Character.

Mr. Just. Page. That you may do if you think fit.

Sir George Oxenden, Bart.

My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins about nine Years; but have been more particularly acquainted with him these four or five Years last past; I never took him to be an ill-natur'd or barbarous Man, and do not believe, willingly, he would do an inhumane Thing to any one.

Sir John Hinde Cotton, Bart.

Mr. Huggins. Pray give an Account how long you have known me.

Sir John Cotton. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins about four or five Years, and have had Occasion to be a good deal with him. I believe him to be a good-natur'd, humane Man; and believe in my Conscience, he would not have been guilty of the Cruelty laid to his Charge.

Call Robert Viner, Esq.

Mr. Robert Viner. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins ever since I can remember any thing at all, he has been concerned for our Family these forty or fifty Years, and I lived with him two Years together; and I take him to be a good-natur'd and humane Man; and, in my Conscience, believe he would not be guilty of a cruel Thing to any Man.

Call John Hedges, Esq.

Mr. John Hedges. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins about six Years, and always took him for a good-natur'd and humane Man; and have since had an Opportunity of knowing several Instances of his Generosity and Good-nature without Fee or Reward: I have known him six or seven Years as a general Acquaintance, and he was very good natur'd and humane; and some time since I have known some Instances of great Generosity and Good-nature, merely for the Pleasure of doing Good, without Fee or Reward.

Call John Knight, Esq.

Mr. John Knight. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these eight or nine Years past, and frequently had Opportunities of being in Conversation with him, and I always took him to be, as far as any Man living, from doing any thing that was cruel; and always acted agreeable to the Character of a humane Man; and I am very sorry any such Thing should be laid to his Charge.

Call Christopher Tillson, Esq.

Mr. Tillson. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these five-and-thirty Years, not superficially, but in particular Friendship, and have found him in all Instances a Man unblameable; and I never saw any thing tending to Cruelty or ill Usage; and have always found him so for these thirty-five Years.

Call Major Churchill.

Major Churchill. My Lord, I have known him these forty-five Years, and have had frequent Communication with him, and always found him a Friend and a Man of Humanity, despising of Money; there was one Thing, in a most particular Manner, I will acquaint your Lordship of.

Mr. Just. Page. I can't admit you into a particular Character, but you may go on with a general one.

Major. Churchill. I never thought him capable in Thought, Word, or Deed, of doing a cruel Thing.

Call Thomas Gibson, Esq.

Mr. Thomas Gibson. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins for these seven or eight Years past, and found him to act with Good-nature, Integrity, Honour, and Humanity.

The Rev. Doctor Pearce (Rector of St. Martin's in the Fields, now Bishop of Rochester).

Dr. Pearce. My Lord, Mr. Huggins is a Vestry man; and I have had more particular Reason to converse with him frequently on that Account, and I never found any Thing in him, that was any way consistent with what is laid to his Charge, and have constantly found him at Church.

Edward Thompson, Esq.

Mr. Thompson. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these seven Years, and have had frequent Experience of Acts of his Friendship and Good-nature, and never discovered any Thing in his Behaviour, but the utmost Good-nature.

Thomas Woodford, Esq.

Mr. Woodford. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins many Years. I have been with him both sober and mellow, and never have discovered any Thing barbarous or cruel in him; and I verily believe he could not be guilty of any such Act, if he knew it at all.

Joseph Taylor, Esq.

Mr. Taylor. My Lord, I have transacted a great deal of Business with Mr. Huggins, and found him act with Candor. Sometimes I have been concerned against him, and sometimes with him; and, if ever I had suspected any Thing in him tending to Cruelty, I assure you, my Lord, I would have shunned his Company instead of seeking it, as I have done.

Martin Bladen, Esq.

Mr. Bladen. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins many Years, and have lived by him in the Country these eight or nine Years; and the Character that he has had is, that he is a good-natured, humane Man; it has been his whole Business of Life to leave a good Character; and, therefore, I can't believe he would do an ill-natured Act.

John Lade, Esq. afterwards Sir John Lade, Bart.

Mr. Lade. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these forty Years, and have seen a great many kind, compassionate Things of him.

Sir Charles Cox, Knt.

Sir Charles Cox. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these forty Years, and have had frequent Dealings with him, and always observed him to be a Man of Charity and Humanity; and I have courted his Company from the good Opinion I have had of him, and don't believe that he would be guilty of any Inhumanity.

Edward Halsey, Esq.

Mr. Halsey. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins near thirty Years, and have been conversant with him, and the Observation I have made of him is, that I have found him zealous to do good Offices, where he had no Fee or Reward, and never found him covetous or cruel.

Sir James Thornhill, Knt.

Sir James Thornhill. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins for these twenty-five Years, and I was proud of the Honour of his Acquaintance. I have never seen or heard of the least cruel Act that he has done by any one; and if I was to repeat the Instances of good-natured Acts—

Mr. Just. Page. Sir, you can't be admitted to do that.

Thomas Martin, Esq.

Mr. Martin. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins these thirty Years, and that he has done a great many kind and good-natured Things. I never knew him a vain Man, but that he did it through Good-nature.

Colonel Negus.

Col. Negus. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins a great many Years, and always looked upon him to be a good-natured Man; and that it was impossible to think he could do so ill-natured an Act, as laid to his Charge.

Campbell, Esq.

Mr. Campbell. My Lord, I have known Mr. Huggins from fifteen to twenty Years, and always found him behave himself with Integrity in his Profession, as a good-natured Man, and always thought his Genius far superior to do an ill-natured Thing: I always had, and still have a good Opinion of him.

Mr. Huggins. My Lord, it appeared to your Lordship, that Mr. Gybbon was the Acting-Warden, and that Barnes was his Servant, not mine. No Argument can be drawn from the Coroners not sitting, the Custom of the Place is otherwise, but as to any Application to get him into Bedlam, that, my Lord, can't be applied to me Quatenus Warden, for it would be only in me a good-natured Act: If Barnes put him in, he is not my Servant; if so, then the Indictment must fail.

That as to the Witnesses they were Prisoners, and they are natural Haters of their Keepers.

I never went to the Prison, but had a hundred People about me, and I must have been seen by many; there was no Pretence of using any Barbarity to any Man, no Money to be extorted; and when I could no way be benefited by it, no one can think, my Lord, I could be guilty of Murder, when no Benefit or Advantage by it could arrive.

Mr. Loudon, my Lord, who had the Custody of the Man, and had the Key till three Days before his Death, had never seen me there; and if he that had the Key did not know of my being there, who should? I shewed, my Lord, that I was out of Town in September, and Hopkins was out of Town till the 14th of October, so that it was impossible, that us two could be there together. All the other Witnesses, that have been called against me would not have lain from that Day to this in Prison, had they not lost their Honour, or lost their Designs.

I never saw the Man, nor heard there was such a Prisoner, and to murder a Man for nothing, God Almighty knows there never stood a Man at this Bar with more Innocency than myself.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. It is plain on the King's Side, that a Subject has been murdered; and what Mr. Huggins has endeavoured to show is, that he never acted, but had a Deputy, and that Deputy was accountable, if any body, for he had no Acquaintance of this Thing; your Lordship, has heard the Witnesses, and I don't doubt but will relate the Evidence fully. The Counsel for the Prisoner objected to Mr. Serjeant Cheshire's replying.

Mr. Just. Page. I am of Opinion, Brother, you can't reply.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. But I may say something to what has not been given already in Evidence.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Huggins endeavours to shew that Gybbon was the Acting-Warden. No, my Lord, neither by a Lease or Deputation Gybbon could not be appointed Warden.

Mr. Just. Page. Mr. Attorney, I cannot admit you to enter into any Reply, but if you have any Evidence, you may call them.

Call Elijah Beavis.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was you a Prisoner in the Fleet, in the Year 1722?

Mr. Beavis. Yes, and I had the Liberty of the Rules, in the Year 1723; and in the Year 1724, I was intitled to be cleared by the Act of Insolvency, but because I could not give the Warden Money enough, was continued till the Year 1725, and I used to see Mr. Hopkins at Pindar's, where Gybbon kept his Office, and it was generally accepted by every body, that Hopkins brought Directions from Huggins to Gybbon every Day.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you heard Hopkins say, that he had Directions from Mr. Huggins to Gybbon, and that he came from Huggins?

Mr. Beavis. I did not hear any particular Directions.

Richard Bishop.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who gave Directions as to the Management of the Gaol?

Mr. Bishop. The particular Things were done by Huggins's Directions, but the common Things without.

Call Joseph Johnson.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know of any Directions brought from Mr. Huggins by Mr. Hopkins, to Mr. Gybbon?

Mr. Johnson. I have heard Mr. Hopkins say, that he came from Mr. Huggins, and that he bid him come every Morning to him; and that one time Mr. Huggins sent word back by Hopkins, that I should be locked up.

Edward Hughes, Esq. (a Member of the House of Commons.)

Mr. Att. Gen. Sir, what have you heard Mr. Huggins declare, as to the Acts he did during the time Gybbon was his Deputy?

Mr. Hughes. My Lord, it appeared to me—

Mr. Baron Carter. Sir, you are not to tell us of what appeared to you, but what you know of your own Knowledge.

Mr. Hughes. My Lord, I can't tell how Knowledge should come to me, until it appeared to me. (After some Pause Mr. Hughes went on.)

My Lord, Mr. Huggins was ordered to attend the Committee, and while Mr. Huggins was there, he was asked, what Escapes had happened during the Time he was Warden? He said, he could not give an Account of them, there had happened so many; but said, that Oliver Read had escaped, and when he was taken, that he Mr. Huggins had ordered Corbett the Tipstaff to put him in Irons, which were sent for from Newgate by his, Huggins's Directions, directions, and owned that he did it by Virtue of his Authority for an Escape; this Confession Huggins made himself, and owned, that he had paid 500*l.* for such Escape that Read had made.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was it Mr. Huggins or Mr. Gybbon ordered him to be put in Irons?

Mr. Hughes. I did not say it was Mr. Gybbon bid him be put in Irons, but it was Mr. Huggins, and that he ordered him to be put in Irons as Warden, and in all Escapes he acted as Principal, for he paid 500*l.* for that Escape.

Mr. Baron Carter. About what time was this?

Mr. Hughes. It was upon the first Escape that Read made; it was in the Year 1726, that Read got off those Irons, and made his second Escape, and was retaken; and then he was put in the Dungeon.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was there any particular Time mentioned?

Mr. Hughes. I have recollected, and it was in the Year 1726; what points out the Time, is Read's Escape.

Mr. Serjeant Darnell. That Paper produced by Jeffreys amounts to a Lease.

Mr. Justice Page. When ever an Agreement is made to make a

Mr. Baron Carter. Lease, that can never be esteemed a Lease.

Proclamation was made to keep Silence.

Mr. Justice Page. Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment against Mr. Huggins, the Prisoner at the Bar, and one Barnes, for the Murder of Edward Arne. The Indictment is indeed particular; the Indictment takes notice, that Huggins was Warden of the Fleet the 1st of October, in the late King's Reign; that he being Warden, had the Government of the Prisoners in the Gaol (that Barnes was an Agent of his, who is fled from Justice). It sets forth, Gentlemen, that Barnes seized upon the said Arne, and carried him to a Place, called the Strong Room; and that Huggins was Aiding, Abetting, and Assisting in carrying him to that Place, and he was continued there the Space of six Weeks; that this is a Place of cold Restraint, and a Room newly built, made of Brick and Mortar, very wet and unfit to live in; that this Barnes did continue him in this Place for six Weeks in a most barbarous and vile Manner, and not allowed him any Necessaries, inasmuch that he had no Chamber-pot, he was without Fire or Fire-place, and only had a little bed. This is the Nature of the Dungeon. It is a Vault arched over, and in the Wall a little Hole big enough to put a Quart-pot in at. It is built over a Common-Sewer adjoining to a Layfall, where all the Dirt and Filth of the Prison lies, which made it not only so noisome, but very unwholesome, that the continuing this Person so long in this Place was the Occasion of his Death. That Mr. Huggins was acquainted with it, but shewed him no Favour; he was not let out, and died in the Middle of October. He died, Gentlemen, by this Durefs of the Prisoner. I will say but little to what the Law is in this Case; a Prisoner for Debt is only taken like a Distress, and kept there till he, or his Friends can pay the Debt for him. Imprisonment is no Punishment, it is not taken as Part of the Debt; for let a Man lie ever so long, his Heirs at Law cannot be exempt from the Debt, but, if they have Effects, are answerable for it. He is kept only in such Manner as he may be forthcoming and safe; this being the Case, he is to be kept in here in a becoming way, as the Warden may be safe, and the Prisoner forthcoming, but in no other Degree that the Prisoner should be punished, by any unreasonable Restraint. If this Arne was kept in no other way than became the Subject of the King, in that reasonable Manner, so that you may take it, there was no Torture, ill Usage, or any Act, but such as was fit and decent for Confinement, no Durefs; then and in that Case, though he died there, it will not be Murder.

But if by the Evidence that has been called, it appears that this Room was an unfit Place to lay this Man in, that it must be the Means of his Destruction, that (being in such Imprisonment as the Gaoler cannot justify) will be Durefs; if they carry that Point, it is Part of the Common Law, the Antient Law, and very rightly observed by the Counsel, that it will be Murder. It would be very hard to take away this Law, though in his own Defence; as he was intrusted with the Life of the King's Subject, he was answerable for him, and the Coroner's Inquest ought to have sat upon his Body; the Law is so much afraid of the Loss of the Life of a Subject, that the King will have an Enquiry to see what is become of the Life of the Prisoner. It was opened by the Counsel for the King, that it was wilfully omitted; on the other Hand, it was urged that this Custom seemed to be asleep, and that it was hard to lay a great Weight, where it had not been so long practised. Gentlemen, there have been great Numbers of Witnesses called, and therefore I cannot give it Word for Word, but will repeat as far as is necessary.

Mr. Longborn was called to prove the first Part of the Indictment, that Huggins was Warden; and he proved the Copy of the Letters Patent granted to Mr. Huggins, who might act by himself or Deputy.

Biggrave gave an Account, that Huggins's Patent bore date on the 25th of July, in the 12th Year of the late Queen; that Mr. Huggins, though Warden, did not act himself, but appointed Gybbon as Deputy; and that Securities were taken by Huggins not by Gybbon, that is to be considered in point of Law, that the Act must be brought against him as Warden, and the making of a Deputy does not discharge him of his Duty; in several Cases he does not continue answerable, for in Civil Cases the Deputy is answerable, therefore the Security is lodged with him. It is a very strong Evidence that the Warden still continues Warden, that he ought to see to the Escape of Prisoners, for that is not only trusted to the Honesty of the Warden, but he is to take the best Care he can of Escapes. He says, that Gybbon did buy his Place, that he did oversee and look after the Affairs of the Fleet, and filled up several Warrants, but always in Huggins's Name; that he did apprehend that Barnes was only a Servant to Gybbon, and that Gybbon, no doubt, had the immediate Trust of the Gaol; and that Barnes was a Runner to Gybbon, and not Huggins's Servant. He agreed what this Place was; that it was arched over; that it was eight Feet wide, eleven Feet long, and nine Feet high; that it was built very little Time before Arne was committed there; he could not describe the whole Situation, but gave an Account that it was very nigh the Dunghill and Filth, had no Chimney nor Chimney-place, and had only two little Holes to let the Air in. He gives an Account of Hopkins; that he looked upon Hopkins to be Gybbon's Servant, besides that he was Clerk to Mr. Huggins at his House in St. Martin's Lane, and generally went backward and forward most Days to Mr. Huggins, and was able to give him an Account of what happened in the Gaol.

Hopkins tells you, he was Clerk of the Inquiries, and that all the Security-Bonds were left with Gybbon, but left in Blank; and when he had inquired into the Securities, the Security-Bonds were filled up by Gybbon; that Gybbon received all the Money, and he heard that Gybbon was to pay Four Hundred Pounds per Annum for it, but that all went on in the Name of Huggins.

Bishop says, that he was Tipstaff under Huggins; that he did pay for his Place, which cost him Two Hundred Pounds; and that about 1724 or 1725 Arne was brought a Prisoner first, and was carried to the Vine, and there continued about a Month, and afterwards was carried into Prison, and lay with one Shaw, and upon a Quarrel was turned out, and the Strong Room was built at the latter End of the Summer; and it must be granted, it was not fit for mortal Man, scarce any Beast, to be in. Gentlemen, this Room is totally unfit for any Man to be put in; and that it was strongly proved, that from the Nature of the Place, and the Circumstances of the Weather, it was the Occasion of his Death; that it was new built, not above three or four Yards from the Dunghill, and that every thing of Nature was done in it; there was no Chair, no Provision, only an old Bed. That he saw him before running about naked in the common Yard, and upon this did tell Gybbon of him, and that it was not fit for the poor Man to be left alone, so it was fitter for him to go to Bethlehem; and very soon after the Man was put into the Strong Room. To go along with Mr. Huggins, I must take Notice of an Observation he made: That it was very unfit for a Man to go naked about where there were Women; and it was fit he should be confined somewhere. He (speaking of Bishop) gives some Account of Barnes, and some Account when the Room was built, just at the latter End of the Year; that he did hear he was in a very wild Condition; that Barnes nor none of them did apprehend Gybbon to have the sole Power; but that Gybbon acted by the Authority of Mr. Huggins; but that he would apply to Mr. Huggins about it, and did ask the Prisoner if it was not proper to get him into Bethlehem; and Huggins observed it was not Part of the Office of Warden of the Fleet, but he might by a friendly Office use his Interest with Mr. Taylor, and that would shew him more a humane Man than one guilty of Cruelty. When any thing special happened, that was still done by Huggins; that tho' Arne was in that Condition, though there was no Occasion or Hazard, and no Cause for putting him into that Room, Huggins not only a Principal, who is answerable for his Deputy, was often in the Fleet, and saw him several Times whilst Gybbon was Deputy, and Arne in that Confinement, and did give Orders about several Things of Moment. Arne he knew was disordered, but never did any ill Thing to put him in Fear and Hazard; the Man never did any Hurt, he might drink, but then there were other Rooms to put him in; no Place could be found to put this Man in so bad as this. When he was turned out from Shaw he had a little Place that he put up in the Common-Hall, and his Goods were carried down there. It was very hard to imagine, if he was not very well, if he was a little disordered, it was very strange that no Place could be found but the Strong Room to put him in. When I came to ask the Question, if there were other Rooms where the Man might be kept with Safety, it was said, that there were Rooms where he might be put in Safety; but it was not thought fit he should go into a Place fit for a Christian to go in, but into this Place.

Mr. Cotton, by the Book, shews, he was admitted Prisoner on Mesne Process in 1725, to shew he did not require to be kept in the same Strictness as on Execution. The Care of the Gaoler is to keep a safe Custody; but not so great on Mesne Process: If a Man in Execution for 1000*l.* was to escape, he must pay the whole Money: No Action of Debt lies on Mesne Process; then the Gaoler is not answerable, the Gaoler could not pay the Debt, the Gaoler is no further answerable than for the Person; so that the Terror was not so great, the Danger was not so close, and that may be the Reason that the Coroner does not sit upon Prisoners in Mesne Process, because the Hazard is not so great; and he says, that about Hillary Term 1724 Barnes came in; and that he was a Watchman and a Runner there.

Farrington apprehends, that Arne came in about the Middle of June, and that he was in good Health when he came in, and that he never knew him do an ill Thing, nor that he would drink; that there was no Danger of his breaking Prison. That he was put into the Strong Room in September, and continued therein till the Middle of October. When he first came into the Prison he lodged with one Robert Shaw, and Shaw threw his Bed out of the Room; he then put his Bed upon a Settle, and he lay there till he was carried to the Strong Room.

He did not see Arne locked in the Strong Room, but did see him taken away, and says, that the Room was not built above six Weeks before the poor Man was carried there. That it was so very wet, green, and so much oufing from the Mortar, that one might with one's Hands strike the Drops off the Wall; and gave the same Account as to the Manner, that it was not tiled in, and he was continued there from the Middle of September, to the Middle of October, and lay in a miserable Condition, not only having his own Excrements sticking about him, but the Feathers of the Bed, having opened it and crept into it for Warmth. I need not take Notice of the Situation of the Place, that has been fully described. There was only two small Holes to let in the Air, there was no Fire, nor Fire-place. He says, that after some time the poor Man grew hoarse. One of the Witnesses says, that he had a shivering Hoarseness, and so continued lingering on till he died: Before he died he came to a bad Hoarseness, and his Senses and Voice were so far gone afterwards, that he could not speak; then Nature failed, he fell away, and Death grew upon him, then he grew delirious, and in this poor Condition he had nothing but a Feather-bed, which a Gentleman had lent him, laying in the Dirt in his own Excrements, and in a nasty Condition, and no way left to preserve Life, but to cut his Bed open, and to lie in the Feathers as long as he could: Being in this miserable Condition, he came into the Church more like a feathered Fowl, than a human Creature, that the Feathers stuck all about him; he burst out and came to the Church; he was demanded back again, and had no Comfort or Relief. Farrington, one of the Evidences says, that he saw Hopkins and Huggins at the Door of the Strong Room, and the Door was open, and Huggins looked upon him, and Hopkins and Huggins whispered, and talked together, but he was not near enough to hear what was said, but Huggins shook his Head; not only Gybbon but Huggins himself locked him up, with Barnes, and this was at the Time when the Door was open, and Barnes kept the Key. It was when the Door was open, and Huggins looked in upon him, the Discourse you will best judge of; his (meaning Huggins) Eyes were there fixed. This is very strong upon the Prisoner; whether Huggins before knew of it, Huggins knew of it then, and then might have saved his Life; he might have taken the proper Care as he ought to have done of him; if Mr. Huggins had done his Part, it would have been no Objection to Huggins, and if he did nothing at that Time, you will judge how far he did pity the Man, whether he did know of it before or no, if he was privy to his being kept in that Durefs, he had sufficient Power, and nothing could bar him of having the superior Power, for, in the Presence of his Deputy, he might act; he that put the Man under Durefs not only was told of it, but saw the Misery of it; it makes him in Law a Principal. That Place was so damp, that he himself was in there but three Days, and was almost killed in that Time. It made his Legs swell, and he had been dead, if he had continued there longer. That Man died there from the Noisomeness of the Place.

Fulthorpe says, that Arne and another Prisoner was drinking with him a Pot of Ale (that Gentleman don't create great Anger in the Fleet.) The Witness says, that he paid Five Shillings per Week for Boarding, and Barnes came up and seized upon Arne and carried him away, but he did not go to follow him; that Arne was very quiet, and he went the next Day to see how it was with him, and there was loose Boards, which he apprehended to lie on the common Sewer, and the Walls were all green and wet, and that it was a miserable Place; that the Man continued six or seven Weeks in this Strong Room.

He says, that he saw Huggins come twice into the Fleet, while Arne was in the Strong Room, but whether it was the Time that Farrington was there can't be certain; but that Huggins, Hopkins, and Barnes were there, and were looking upon him. When he came there a second Time, he can't say that Huggins came to look on Arne, for that he staid there only Half an Hour, to take care of the Prison and Prisoners; that Arne was in Health at, and before the Time he was put in there, and that he went to give him some Drink at the Hole, and the Stench of the Room was so great that it was like to strike him down. He says, that to the best of his Judgment on viewing the Place, that it was impossible for a Man to live there. He did see Arne out two or three Times, but they turned him in again.

Smith says, that Arne for whom he had a great Concern (which Matter is of great Consequence, that requires the utmost Attention), was carried to the Vine, and then carried to the Gaol; that Barnes, who was a Servant to Huggins, as Arne was drinking in the Cellar without being the least troublesome, seized upon Arne, and carried him to the Strong Room; he lay upon the bare Ground, and had nothing to rest him upon; the Description of the Room that he gives, is, that there was no Fire-place, no Candle, nothing to ease Nature in, such a Stink that he was forced to hold his Nose, extremely wet, and in no Condition fit for any one to lie in; he having no Credit with Gybbon, wrote to Huggins several Letters, and in one of them mentioned the said State of Arne, and sent it by Robin the Porter, he sent it by the common Porter, but did not prove that Robin delivered the Letter to Huggins, or brought an Answer, and was of Opinion, this barbarous Treatment was the Death of the poor Man.

Robin was examined as a Witness, he said he did not know what the Letters were; he did what he was paid for, but can't take upon him to swear, whether the Letters were delivered to Mr. Huggins, and what the Contents of the Letters were; there is a Chasm in that Part.

Paine says, that Arne was in a good State of Health, that he might drink, but there was no Ground or Occasion to put him in the Strong Hold, that Barnes was Servant to Gybbon, and that Gybbon acted as Chief-Warden, and that the Prisoner at the Bar did not act. He gave an Account how the Room was built, that it was very damp, that Arne grew hoarse, and lost his Voice; and he believes any Person could not be there without Danger of losing his Life.

Bouch says, that he was Turnkey, and gave an Account, when the Strong Room was built, and apprehended it was built by Huggins; that Huggins did come to the Lodge, but can't say whether he came into the Prison or no; he says, that the poor Man died after in October, and that he carried a Letter to Mr. Huggins, wrote by one of Arne's Friends; that he gave it to Huggins, who opened it, and read it, who said, that he must leave it, and Mr. Huggins would acquaint him with the Nature of the Rules; he further said, that Mr. Huggins did not act singly and solely, and I don't know how indeed he could, I don't know how he could controul a Principal, he might controul a Deputy; he says, he did apply to Mr. Huggins to be Turnkey, and was very often in the Prison, and saw Arne, and gave an Account of his being in that languishing Condition, and that he died there; the Chief of his Evidence is, that Mr. Huggins came often to inquire about the Affairs of the Gaol, and that he was still principal Warden, and if any Thing wrong was done, he ordered it to be rectified.

Tucker was employed to make the Iron Work, but don't say by whom ordered.

Mrs. Le Pointz says, she saw Arne in the Strong Room; and when Mr. Huggins was last there, she saw him on the Bars, and that he could not come in or out, without coming near the Strong Room, and that it was impossible for him to go out upon the Bars, but to go by that Room.

For the Prisoner, he does insist upon several Ways of making his Defence. He says this was in 1725, and therefore its not to be expected, that he can give so good an Account as if it had been a more recent Prosecution; this Thing had slept for three or four Years. It was taken Notice by Mr. Attorney how this came now by a strict Examination, and a very honourable one, and that he mentioned was the Reason it could not escape the Eyes that were so diligent; that is the Answer to that Part of the Defence. Another Part of his Defence is, whether he was made Warden at the Time, that the Letters Patent bore Date? He takes Notice of his coming to an Agreement with Mr. Gybbon, who, he says, had the sole Management, he was willing to put himself into a State of Inaction.—He did agree at first for the Prison only for Half a Year, and then Gybbon, willing to take the whole Rents and Profits, was to pay together Nine Hundred Pounds per Ann. which was agreed on. Another Part of his Defence that he made, was, that he intrusted Mr. Gybbon with the Management of the Office; he had so little Knowledge, that he had never seen nor heard of the Name of Arne, nor never knew that there was such a Prisoner.

Another Matter insisted upon, that there were three Witnesses, that were all mistaken, and that no Credit at all ought to be given to them; and it won't be very material. Some of his Witnesses say, that they never heard of his being there, and others that he was not at London, looking upon it, that he was not concerned at all. To prove this he calls Witnesses, and called Mr. Tanner to read the Insolvent Act, that Deputies were to make Returns of Prisoners. To prove the List of the Prisoners was returned by Mr. Gybbon, he would have produced an Affidavit, but it was not sufficient to be Proof. Mr. Tanner was asked, whether at the Time the List was delivered, Mr. Huggins was not Warden? He did not think fit to answer that Question, and I did not press it very far: But I shall shew you Gybbon was only Deputy. The next Witness that was called was Jeffreys, to shew how far Gybbon was concerned in the Office; he was by when the Agreement was made, and signed by Mr. Huggins, and when it came to be a Question, when that was to be read, whether it was an Agreement or not, he could not tell where it was, it was out of his Power, he could not produce it then. Jeffreys said it was an Acquittance; upon that Huggins endeavoured to get the Paper, and that this was a Copy of it taken, and that it was a true Copy, then that Receipt was proper to be read: When that came to be read, you will consider what it was; it was neither Lease nor Deputation, only an Agreement for a Lease, what Rent was to be paid, and how long he was to have it. It was a Receipt for a Deposit of One Thousand Pounds, wherein there was a proper Covenant and Clauses to be performed. I don't go to argue the Validity of it, if a Man had agreed to hold Land for three Years, that would be a Lease; and if Huggins and Gybbon had agreed certainly for three Years, that would have been a Grant of the Office, and a sufficient Evidence of a Deputation but it is nothing but an Agreement for a Deputation, or a Lease. In Strictness of Law it is nothing; though this may not be in Point of Law, it is sufficient between them for Gybbon to be Deputy in Fact, who came with the good liking of Mr. Huggins and with his Consent; that he was Deputy in Fact still carry with you, and that Huggins was Chief in the Office, and had the Controul thereof. That a Deputy is controulable by the Principal, and when the Principal is there no Man can make a Deputy to execute the Office. This was dated 26 June, 1723, for 1000*l.* and 500*l.* per Annum.

The next was Mr. Welland; there was a good deal said by him about the Coroner's sitting upon dead Bodies, not very much to the Purpose; and then he gave an Account that Gybbon did act during four Years, but what was become of the Repairs, who was to do that, I do not find; as to the Repairs and Taxes, it is not settled to this Day. If upon the Foot merely from the Trust and Confidence one had of the other, if all the Expences were paid by Mr. Huggins, then he built the Strong Room; however, he was liable to the Charge. You will consider, Gentlemen, by what Law this can be built; it was putting a Show of Cruelty in this Office, which they were no way justified to build: Things for Torment, and not for the Service of the Custody, Things of that Kind are not to be done at the Will of the Gaoler, it always ought to be done by Order of their Superiors; if in the City, the Act must be done by the Mayor and Aldermen; if not, by the Common-Council: If in the County, it is not in the Power of the Gaoler, it must be done by the Sessions; there are so many Gentlemen of the Sessions to see what is proper to be done and decent for Christians, that there is no Danger of erecting any Place of Torment. I do not know what Authority either Gybbon or Huggins had to build it; Huggins might have pulled it down, and Gybbon would have been answerable for the Contempt. There is no Agreement appears between Huggins and Gybbon that would clear it up; besides, as to the Repairs we are left in the dark still.

Welland says, that in the Year 1725 Arne was stark naked before he was put in the Strong Room. Huggins urged, that it was not designed for any such Purpose. Welland does not deny, but that there were other Places in the Gaol to put him in: This was in the very Year when the Act passed for Insolvent Debtors, when fifty or sixty were discharged on the 7th of September, before that Time.

Another Part of his Defence is, that the Room was neither his nor Gybbon's to answer for; that there was a Court of the Prisoners, who formed themselves into a Jurisdiction, and made what Order and Rules they pleased, and that they were so troublesome that Gybbon was afraid to go into the Gaol: I do not know what Excuse this is, it would have been very fit for them to have applied to another Place: And though Welland does say, that there was a Request of some of the Prisoners to have him put into the Strong Room, all the Terror this Man put any body in, was flinging a Brick-batt on the Bars, not aiming at any one, and forced them to put this Man under the Restraint of the Strong Room. It was the Request of Nobody, it was Nobody did it; it was very much to have such a Combination, but every body knows that Welland is an Attorney, and has been taken notice of in the Courts. They have not given any Account of any Man's being put in there before. This Man being in a sick Condition, Welland was desired to go to the Upholders at Exeter-Change, they are very compassionate, and do assist People of their Fellowship; and he had some Relief given him. He says, that he never knew Mr. Huggins give any Direction in the Management of any Matters after Mr. Gybbon became Deputy, and gave an Account as to the Coroner's sitting upon dead Bodies; that he took Barnes not to be Huggins's Servant, and Gybbon therefore was answerable for the Act of Barnes. He never so much as saw Mr. Huggins and Barnes together, and that he did not so much as know any Rule-Money paid to Huggins; that Gybbon generally was paid the Fees, for Gybbon paid Nine Hundred Pounds per Annum to Huggins. Whether a Man takes the Fees all at once or not, it is the same Thing.

Green says, that he applied to Mr. Gybbon in order to have a Room, and Mr. Gybbon could not go into the Gaol for fear of this Court of the Prisoners; but at last says, that he did get himself a Room in the House, and did lie there; that he apprehended Gybbon was the Principal, and did act.

...and at last he was carried to the Strong Room, and there he was kept till he died; and never saw Huggins there till about the Middle of September.

London says, that he kept a Boarding-house, and boarded a good many there at five Shillings per Week; and Arne was one; that afterwards, when he came to quit the House and was carried into the Strong Room, he was desired by the Upholders Company to take some Care of him; that the Key was kept by Barnes, so that there was a Difficulty to carry and supply him with Provisions; that he said he would give it up unless he had the Key; that he had no Authority to let him out; and that he did keep the Key till three Days before he died, and then delivered it up. He has given an Account of that Act of Arne's running about with the Feathers, and said he never saw Huggins and Gybbon there, at the Time that Arne was in the Strong Room; and that Huggins was Warden, and Gybbon was Deputy. He has given an Account of the Room when built, and of the sad Condition of it.

Gentlemen, Mr. Gwyn said the same; but that he never saw Huggins there. Another Matter that Mr. Huggins insisted upon, to prove the Evidence not to be true, was, that he was not in Town.

The first Witness that he called was his Son, who said, that from the first of September in that Year his Father came down to him in Hampshire, and continued till the 14th or 15th, and staid fourteen or fifteen Days; I do not find but it might be after that that he was at the Strong Room. Smith proves the same, and that he was down there before in August. Knight said, that he was there in August. Bird, Servant to Mr. Huggins, junior, said, that he was there in August seven Days; and that he was there the first of September likewise. Tucker says, that he was employed by Sir George Oxenden, and that he sent his Coach with Mr. Huggins from Wittenham to Henley-upon-Thames about the 15th of September.

Sir George Oxenden agrees with the Servant; and says, that on the 17th or 18th the Prisoner came to his House, and went away the 18th or 19th. I must observe to you, Gentlemen, that from that Time to the Death of this Man, there is no Account given to you where he was.

Hopkins gave Evidence to shew the Witnesses Mistake. Farrington swore, that when Huggins looked in, Hopkins was with him at that Time; and Hopkins said, that he went out of Town to Oxford, and did not return till the 14th of October. Huggins came from Sir George Oxenden's about the 18th or 19th, and I do not hear from any body that he continued out of Town; and it is natural to believe he came to Town, for Henley is the Road to come up to London. Hopkins said, he did not go out of Town till the 27th of September, so that from the 19th to the 28th both might have been at the Strong Room; and I believe this was the Time, may be it may be the 19th, Hopkins did not go till the 27th. What I must leave to you, Gentlemen, is, that this Witness said, it could not be true that he and Huggins could be together. There was about ten Days from the 17th to the 28th, and it appears they were both in Town; and it does seem to come pretty nigh the Time. You see, Gentlemen, Huggins came again a second Time; the first Time does seem to tally, and run very well, if not both.

Gentlemen, you must take this with you, whether Hopkins does not confirm what Farrington says, though he said he was out of Town. Farrington says, once upon a Time, he was at the Strong Room Door; the Door was open, and that he did see the Witness, (meaning Hopkins) and that Arne crept into the Feathers of his Bed; and Hopkins said, that he was there, but he could not see the Feather-bed; that he was in something half up and half naked, which Evidence rather confirms than weakens the Evidence. He (Hopkins) does contradict another Matter; that he does not know that Mr. Huggins was there at the Room, or that he ever saw him there; that he (Hopkins) was at the Strong Room Door, and that he was in the same Manner as the Witness that was there said. And he does contradict, that Barnes was a Servant of Huggins's, and says that Huggins was not to be at the Charge of executing the Office. All that Hopkins says, is, that he was Clerk of the Inquiries, and that he did apply to Mr. Huggins, and that Mr. Huggins did not think fit to put him in, but he sent him to Gybbon to be Clerk of the Inquiries. But that he was Clerk to Mr. Huggins at his Home, he did own it; but in a very extraordinary Manner, that he took him to do his Business for nothing. He said, that the Management of this Office was not solely and clearly under Mr. Gybbon; but, Gentlemen, as to Things of Consequence, there Mr. Huggins was called in, so that it appears that there was a View of his looking after the Prisoners; and it was very well, Gentlemen, that he should, for he was the first Resort upon all Occasions. Hopkins says, that he does not remember any Discourse about Arne with Mr. Huggins, but if he was desired to do any thing as to Arne. It seems, Gentlemen, that he was examined in a strict Manner, and a wise Inquiry made, as appears by an Examination taken before Edward Hughes, Esq. which was produced, and shews, that he had given Evidence to you contrary to that Examination. In that he says, Huggins was Warden; and that he (Hopkins) went from the Fleet to him every Day, and told Huggins, whatever was considerable that was done there; and told him of Arne. He agrees, that there was a Discharge of Prisoners on the 7th of September 1725, when fifty or sixty were discharged; and cannot say, but when they were gone, but that there was Room enough to put Arne in. He denies that Bishop and Gybbon spoke to him about Arne, which Bishop swears.

Vol. IX.

The next Witness is Mr. Arne, who was a Relation to the Deceased; he says, that the first Account he received of his miserable Condition was about a Week or ten Days before the poor Man died; he then went to see him, and found him grovelling at the Door, that he was not only become hoarse, but almost speechless: He was crept down and fallen at the Door, and lay like a Dog. He found him, upon opening the Door, in a bad Condition; his Voice was so far gone, that it was a Difficulty to understand him. He had a Gold Watch, and he did get out of him by half Words and Sentences where it was; and said, that the Place was not fit for any Creature whatsoever, neither sick nor well; and that he could not have lived a Week in it. Gentlemen, I asked one of the Witnesses, who appeared to be a very strong Man (London), if he had been there half the Time, would it not have been the Occasion of his Death? Who owned that it would.

The Observation my Brother Carter made is very just: That if a strong Man, being put into that filthy, vile Place it would kill him, to put into such a Place him that wanted Health, Death was more sure. If he was a weak Man, there was no Danger of his escaping, no Danger of going out.

As to his being in that Room being the Occasion of his Death, there need not much be said.

And what is said by Mr. Huggins, except one Thing, carries little or no Weight; and there is only that can deserve your Consideration, Whether he did die by the Cruelty of Gybbon or Huggins? That he did die by Duress, it is not to be supposed to the contrary.

That in Point of Law, wherever there is a Deputy appointed, the Superior must answer; for had a Prisoner of 20,000 l. escaped, Mr. Huggins must have paid the Money.

In criminal Cases I do not think, that the Warden or any other Officer should answer for Murder, unless he was privy and consenting. If this sole Act was Gybbon's, and Huggins no ways consenting, I think the Murder lies upon Gybbon, not Huggins. Though this was the Act of Gybbon and Barnes, whoever has a Hand in it, and the Authority and Power as he had, if it is true that he saw him, and he would not give a helping Hand to assist him, the excepted Rule of Scripture would be true, That he that is not for me must be against me: And if he was any way privy to the carrying him and confining him there, he must answer for the Murder both in this and the next World.

If this is the Act of Gybbon solely, Huggins is not to answer for it; but if Huggins was privy, and he was Warden, he could and ought to have relieved him.

One Thing more, in the latter Part of the Defence Mr. Huggins made for himself, was, to call vast Numbers of Gentlemen of the first Quality; Sir George Oxenden, Sir John Hinde Cotton, in all about twenty he called to his Character and Credit; and if these Gentlemen are not sufficient, I do not know what will be: His Character has been fully established; but I must observe to you, whatever the Character a Man bears, if he is guilty of that Act which destroys his Character, his Character goes for nothing: If there was Difficulty or great Doubt happened upon Circumstances, whether Mr. Huggins was guilty or not, then it was the constant Practice to be governed by a Character: I think Nobody can have a better; he has had a very great Character given him.

Not long since a Person produced twenty-seven People, that gave him a Character, with no Comparison to this, only the Greatness of Numbers.

Notwithstanding which, it there was not doubted, he had committed the Fact; and the Jury very justly brought in their Verdict, Guilty.

Verdicts, in convicting of People, are to be founded upon the Evidence that the Jury has had before them; and I hope I do not express myself so for them to found themselves upon any thing I have said; for they will determine according to the Evidence that has been before them.

Mr. Attorney-General produced three Witnesses, that came to nothing.

I must take notice of one Piece of Evidence given by Mr. Hughes, a Gentleman of Probity and Distinction, one of the Committee appointed by the House of Commons. He tells you, that when Mr. Huggins was under Examination before the Committee, relating to Escapes during the Time he was Warden, Huggins confessed to many had escaped, he could not remember them all; he owned one Oliver Read had escaped, and was retaken; and that he himself sent to Newgate for Irons, and ordered Read to be stapled down and ironed; and that he owned he paid five hundred Pounds to Read's Creditors for the Escape of Read: This was whilst Gybbon acted as Deputy.

Mr. Huggins does give this Answer to that; that Hopkins proved that Gybbon acted, and so he was Warden in Law; I cannot tell what Condition Gybbon was in; and what Security he had given; Huggins was liable for all Escapes.

I have taken Pains to state the Evidence to you as fully as I can; and I hope you will consider it; and that God will direct you to do for the best.

Then one was sworn to keep the Jury, and they withdrew, and Mr. Justice Page and Mr. Baron Carter left the Bench; and Mr. Serjeant Raby with the Lord Mayor remained there; and in about two Hours and an Half the Jury returned.

Clerk of Arraignment. Are you all agreed in your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?—Omnes. Foreman.

Clerk. John Huggins, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the Prisoner: Is he Guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. We are agreed to bring in our Verdict Special to the Court.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is their Doubt in Point of Law?

Mr. Serj. Raby. What that Doubt is, must be referred to the Court.

Foreman. Was there any Medium between bringing him in Guilty or Not Guilty?

Mr. Serj. Raby. You may find the Fact specially, and refer the special Matter to the Court. If any Matter of Law arises upon that Doubt, it will be explained. You may give a general Verdict in order to refer that to the Judgment of the Court. You must agree upon the Fact; you must state the special Matter: It is usual to state the Point of Law that you doubt in. If you have any Doubt as to the Law, that you must refer to the Court; but as to the Fact, you must determine yourselves.

T

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is it upon the Question?

Mr. Serj. Raby. The Jury do believe the Prisoner is guilty, but not of the whole Indictment.

Foreman. We cannot find any of the Evidence come up to show he was aiding, abetting, and assisting Barnes in putting him into the Room.

Mr. Serj. Raby. Call over the Jury.

Clerk of Arraignment. Answer to your Names, (Which they did.) Are you all agreed in your Verdict? Is John Huggins Guilty of the Murder and Felony, whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

After considering some Time among themselves, the Foreman speaks as follows:

Foreman. We agree the Prisoner was accessory to the Murder committed upon Edward Arne, but that it was not premeditated in him; that he has been privy to the Cause of this Man's Death, and might have prevented it. Two Witnesses swore, that Mr. Huggins was at the Door of the Dungeon, and saw Arne there; and, as he did not discharge him at that Time, he was accessory to that.

Mr. Serj. Raby. If he was privy, he was guilty of that; if he was privy and consenting, if he did concur in that Act, he is guilty; for it will imply Malice.

If he died by Duress, and he was concurring and consenting to it, then he was guilty of this Act, in that he had Power to redress it, and did not. If he was privy, you must consider if he was concurring.

Mr. Att. Gen. If he was privy and consenting, it does imply it.

In all Special Verdicts the Jury never find Malice.

In no Special Judgment they find Malice.

Foreman. Several of us don't think him guilty of the Malice.

Mr. Att. Gen. The Law will imply the Malice.

Mr. Serj. Raby. You are to consider and find the Fact.

Foreman. We all agree that Arne died by Duress; there are two Witnesses to prove that; but that the Prisoner had no Forethought.

The Jury again considered among themselves; but not immediately agreeing, withdrew, and staid out some considerable Time, and then returned.

Clerk of Arraignment. Are you all agreed?

Foreman. "We are agreed, that there is sufficient Evidence to prove, that they saw Mr. Huggins at the Strong Room."

"We agree that he was Warden of the Fleet-Prison; and that he was Head-Warden at the Time the Fact happened, as mentioned in the Indictment; and that Gybbon was Deputy, and acted as such."

"That James Barnes appeared to us to be Servant to Gybbon, and was employed and acted under him in taking care of the Prisoners, and had the Custody of them; and particularly of Edward Arne."

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Tanner, you must write down the Verdict of the Jury.

Mr. Serj. Raby. Get Pen, Ink, and Paper ready. Gentlemen, you must tell him what he is to write, (which is as follows) viz.

"That James Barnes, at the Time mentioned in the Indictment, made an Assault upon Edward Arne, being then a Prisoner in the Fleet Prison; did take and imprison him without his Consent, prout in the Indictment."

Mr. Att. Gen. They will find the Description and Situation of the Room as in the Indictment; they can have no Reason to doubt of that.

"That James Barnes and John Huggins, at the Time of the Imprisonment of the said Arne, knew that the Room was newly built; and that the Walls were moist and damp, as in the Indictment."

Mr. Strange. Mr. Huggins did not know it at first, at the Time he was there, when the Door was open.

Mr. Att. Gen. Are the Jury satisfied that Mr. Huggins knew the State and Condition of the Room during the Time Arne was there?

Foreman. "We agree he saw the Building, and that he must know it an unwholesome Room, as described in the Indictment."

Mr. Att. Gen. Let me see the Indictment (Which he did, and read the Words as to the Description of the Strong Room). He must know it when he was at the Strong Room Door.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. It is necessary that the Jury should know what the Attorney reads.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Tanner has twice taken it. How long (speaking to the Jury) before the Death of Arne do you find the Prisoner knew the Condition of the Room?

Foreman. I believe it to be fifteen Days at least before the Death of Arne.

Mr. Att. Gen. That during this Imprisonment and Detention in this Room, the said Arne, by reason of the Duress of such Imprisonment, became sick and languished there, and died, prout in the Indictment.

Mr. Hug. The Jury are upon their Oaths, will they find him dead by my Means?

Mr. Strange. I desire the Fact may be found as it is.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Tanner mind, That on the 7th of September he was aiding, abetting, and assisting James Barnes.

Foreman. "We apprehend the Man continued from the 7th of September, and we apprehend he died about the 23d of October."

Mr. Att. Gen. That John Huggins, being principal Warden during the Imprisonment and Detention of the said Arne, was present at the said Room, and saw Arne in that Room under the Duress of that Imprisonment; and that he being present, the Room was locked up with the said Arne in it.

That fifteen Days before the Death of Arne, John Huggins being then Warden of the Fleet, and Mr. Gybbon Deputy-Warden, he saw Arne under the Duress of that Imprisonment; and the said Arne was confined in the said Room, and the said Huggins being then present, he was locked up by James Barnes, and continued in the said Confinement.

Mr. Strange. That is not according to the Evidence. It should be found thus:

That during the Imprisonment of the said Arne, and fifteen Days at the least before his Death, John Huggins being then Warden of the Fleet, and the said Thomas Gybbon, Deputy and acting Warden, was once present, and saw the said James Barnes lock up the Door of the said Room, the said Arne being therein imprisoned.

* Strange's Reports, Vol. II. p. 283.

† From Lord Raymond's Reports, Vol. II. p. 1574, 5, 6, 7, 8, &c.

And at the Time Huggins turned away, James Barnes locked up the Door, and Arne continued under the said Imprisonment Duress, until the Time the Building and the Jury took their Verdict, that Huggins knew the said Arne was in the Strong Room when he was left out in them.

Mr. Att. Gen. I must now add the Words, Aiding, Abetting, and Assisting. And that Huggins knew of the Badness of the Room.

Mr. Strange. They don't find that, during the whole Time Arne was there, Huggins knew of the Badness of the Room.

Mr. Att. Gen. The Jury cannot find what they don't know.

Foreman. "We find the Letters Patent, constituting John Huggins, Esq. Warden of the Fleet, prout in the Indictment."

"That during the Time that Gybbon was Deputy-Warden, Huggins acted as Warden."

Mr. Strange. That does not appear.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who sent for Irons from Newgate?

Ask whether or no they do find, that, at the Time Gybbon was Deputy-Warden, Huggins acted as Warden.—"Beavis in 1725, said Hoptini, came from Huggins about Business; that at the same Time, during the Time that Gybbon acted as Deputy-Warden, John Huggins acted as Warden."

The Verdict was removed, at the Prayer of Mr. Attorney, into B. R. and there argued by Mr. Willes and Serj. Eyre; after which, it was argued at Serjeants-Inn-Hall in Chancery-Lane, before all the Judges, by Serjeant Chisholm, Mr. Attorney, Mr. Solicitor, and Mr. Willes, for the King; and by Serj. Darnell, Serj. Eyre, Serj. Hawkins, Mr. Peter Williams, Mr. Strange, and Mr. Foster, for the Prisoner. But as every Thing insisted on by either side, is taken Notice of in the Opinion delivered by the Lord Chief-Justice Raymond, it will not be necessary to state the Arguments of Counsel.

Mitch. Term. 4 Geo. II. Regis, B. R. 1730.

Rev. vrs. Huggins.

Raymond, Chief-Justice.

This was a Special Verdict, found at the Old-Bailey, on an Indictment of Murder against James Barnes and John Huggins. The Indictment sets forth, "That John Huggins, from the first Day of October, in the twelfth Year of the late King, to the first Day of January next following, and long before and after, was Warden of the Prison of the Fleet, &c. and that James Barnes was, during that Time, Servant to John Huggins, and employed about the Care of the Prisoners; and that James Barnes, existens persona crudelis natura & immanis dispositionis erga prisionarios in eadem prisione existentes, on the first Day of November, in the twelfth Year, &c. made an Assault upon one Edward Arne, then being a Prisoner in the same Prison, under the Custody of the said John Huggins, and him the said Edward Arne, then and there, with Force and Arms, &c. unlawfully, feloniously, wilfully, and of his Malice aforethought, and without the Consent of the said Edward Arne, took, and him with Force and Arms, &c. to a certain Room, within the Prison aforesaid, then newly built, unlawfully, &c. conveyed and led, and him the said Edward Arne, with Force and Arms, &c. in the said Room, for a long Time, to wit, for the Space of six Weeks, then next following, unlawfully, &c. imprisoned and detained, and him the said Edward Arne, then and there, with Force and Arms, &c. for all the Time last mentioned, in that Room, absque salamini ignis necnon sine aliqua matula, scaphio, vel aliquo alia hujusmodi utensili, unlawfully, &c. forced to remain and be (the Walls of the aforesaid Room, made of Bricks and Mortar, at the aforesaid Time of the Imprisonment of the said Edward Arne in the same, being very moist, and the Room aforesaid being situate over the Common Sewer of the said Prison, and near the place ubi sordes & fimo prisionum predicta necnon excrementa prisionariorum predictorum adunc usualiter posita fuerunt, by reason whereof the Room aforesaid then was very unwholesome, and greatly dangerous to the Life of any Person detained in the same). And the Indictment further sets forth, "That the said James Barnes and John Huggins, at the said Time of the Imprisonment of the said Edward Arne in that Room, well knew that the said Room had then been newly built, and that the Walls of that Room, being made of Bricks and Mortar, were then very moist, and that the said Room was so situate as aforesaid." And the Indictment further sets forth, "That the said Edward Arne, during the Imprisonment and Detaining aforesaid, in the said Room, viz. the 7th of November, &c. by Duress of the same Imprisonment and Detaining, became sick, and thereby from the same 7th Day of November, until the 7th Day of December, then next following, in the Room aforesaid, languished, on which said 7th Day of December, the said Edward Arne, by Duress of the Imprisonment and Detaining aforesaid, in the Room aforesaid, died, &c." The Indictment further sets forth, "That the said John Huggins, being a Person of a cruel Nature, and savage Disposition, and a grievous and inhumane Oppressor of the Prisoners in the same Prison, under his Custody being, during the said Imprisonment and Detaining of the aforesaid Edward Arne, in the Room aforesaid, viz. the said 7th Day of November, &c. and divers other Days and Times, during that Imprisonment and Detaining, at London, &c. feloniously, wilfully, and of his Malice aforethought, was present, aiding, abetting, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the aforesaid James Barnes, feloniously, wilfully, and of his Malice aforethought, the said Edward Arne, in Manner aforesaid, to kill and murder: and so the Jurors aforesaid, upon their Oath aforesaid, say, That the said James Barnes and John Huggins, the said Edward Arne, in Manner and Form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of their Malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the Peace, &c."

On Not Guilty pleaded by the Prisoner, Huggins, the Jury find a Special Verdict, as follows: "That Queen Anne, by her Letters Patent, bearing Date the 22d of July, in the twelfth Year of Her Reign, granted to John Huggins, named in the Indictment, the Office

of the Prison, and Keeper of the Prison, and Gaol of the Fleet, and of the Prisoners then committed, or to be committed, to the Prison and Gaol of the Fleet aforesaid; and the capital Messuages for the Custody of the Prisoners, and Messuages in the Parish aforesaid, and all other Messuages, &c. and all that Rent, Fee or Salary of seven Pounds, twelve Shillings and one Penny yearly, payable and to be paid by the Hands of the Sheriffs of her City of London, and her County of Middlesex, &c. and all other Rents, &c. and him the said John Huggins, Warden or Keeper of the Fleet, and of the Prison and Gaol of the Fleet aforesaid, for herself, her Heirs and Successors, did make, ordain, and constitute, by the same Letters Patent: To have, hold, enjoy, and exercise the said Office, Messuages, Lands, &c. to the aforesaid John Huggins, by himself, or by his sufficient Deputy or Deputies, for and during his natural Life, in as ample Manner and Form as Sir Jeremy Whitchot, Baronet, or any other Warden of her Prison of the Fleet aforesaid, the said Office and other the Premises, or any of them, had before had, held, used or enjoyed, or ought to have had, held, used, or enjoyed, with the usual Averments: And they farther find, that the said John Huggins, first of September, in the twelfth of the late King, and for divers Years before, and continually from thence after, until the first of January then next following, was Warden or Keeper of the said Prison of the Fleet; and that one Thomas Gybbon for all the same Time was Deputy of the said John Huggins in the said Office of Warden or Keeper of the Prison of the Fleet aforesaid, by the same John Huggins appointed, and acted as such his Deputy: And they further find, That James Barnes, in the Indictment named, for all the same Time was Servant of the said Thomas Gybbon, Deputy of the said John Huggins, in the same Office so as aforesaid being, and acted under the said Thomas Gybbon, &c. in and about the Care of the Prisoners committed to the said Prison, and in the same Prison being, and particularly in and about the Care of Edward Arne, in the Indictment named, then and there a Prisoner in the same Prison being: They farther find, That the said James Barnes, the seventh of September, in the twelfth Year, &c. in and upon the said Edward Arne, a Prisoner in the same Prison then as aforesaid being, in Manner and Form as in the said Indictment is specified, made an Assault, and him the said Edward Arne, then and there without his Consent, in Manner and Form as in the said Indictment is specified, took, and him the said Edward Arne to a certain Room within the said Prison, then newly built, in the same Indictment mentioned, without his Consent, in Manner, &c. conveyed and led, and him the said Edward Arne, in the said Room for a long Time, to wit, for the Space of forty-four Days from thence next following, without the Consent of him the said Edward Arne, in Manner, &c. imprisoned and detained, and him the said Edward Arne, then and there for all the Time last-mentioned in that Room, absque solamine ignis necnon sine aliqua matula, scabbio, vel aliquo alio hujusmodi utensili, to remain and be without his Consent, in Manner, &c. forced: And they further find, That the Walls of the said Room were made of Bricks and Mortar; and at the said Time of the Imprisonment of the said Edward Arne in the same were very damp; and that the said Room was situate over the Common Sewer of the said Prison, and near the Place ubi sordes et fimo prisonum prædictarum necnon excrementa prisonariorum prædictorum adunc usualiter posita fuerunt, by Reason whereof the said Room was then very unwholesome, and greatly dangerous to the Life of any Person detained in the same: And they further find, That the said James Barnes, at the said Time of the Imprisonment of the said Edward Arne in that Room, well knew that the said Room had then been newly built; and that the Walls of that Room were made of Bricks and Mortar, and were then very damp; and that the said Room was situate so as aforesaid: And they further find, That during the said Imprisonment, and detaining of the said Edward Arne in the said Room, to wit, by the Space of fifteen Days at least before the Death of the said Edward Arne, the said John Huggins knew that the said Room had been then newly built, and that the Walls of that Room were made of Bricks and Mortar, and then were damp; but whether the said John Huggins knew, that on the said seventh Day of September, in the twelfth Year, &c. the Jurors know not: And they further find, that the said Edward Arne, during the said Imprisonment and Detaining of him the said Edward Arne in the said Room, to wit, the tenth Day of the same Month of September, in the twelfth Year aforesaid, by Durefs of the same Imprisonment and Detaining, became sick in the said Room; and thereby, from the same tenth Day of September, in the twelfth Year aforesaid, until the twentieth Day of October then next following, in the said Room languished; on which said twentieth Day of October, in the twelfth Year aforesaid, the said Edward Arne, by Durefs of the said Imprisonment and Detaining in the Room aforesaid, died, to wit, at London, &c. And they further find, That during the Imprisonment and Detaining of the said Edward Arne in the said Room, to wit, by the Space of fifteen Days at least before the Death of the said Edward Arne, the said John Huggins was once present at the said Room, and then and there saw the said Edward Arne in that Room, under the Durefs of the said Imprisonment, and then and there turned away; and the said James Barnes locked the Door of the same Room, at the same Time in which the said John Huggins turned away as aforesaid (the same Edward Arne, at the said Time in which the said Door was locked by the said James Barnes, being in the said Room under Durefs of the said Imprisonment). And they further find, That the said Edward Arne, in the said Room, under Durefs of the said Imprisonment remained, and was continued from the said Time in which the said Door of the said Room was so locked by the said James Barnes as aforesaid, until the said Time in which the said Edward Arne so as aforesaid died: And they further find, That the said John Huggins sometimes acted as Warden or Keeper of the said Prison, during the Time in which he the same Thomas Gybbon was Deputy of the said John Huggins in the said Office as aforesaid; but whether upon the whole Matter, &c.

The Record of this Indictment and Special Verdict being removed into the King's Bench by Certiorari, it was argued on Tuesday the sixteenth of June, 1730, by Mr. Willes, for the King; and Mr. Serjeant Eyre, for the Prisoner. And on the last Day of Michaelmas Term following, after the Case had been argued on the fourteenth of November, at Serjeants Inn Hall, before all the twelve Judges, the Lord Chief Justice (Raymond) delivered the Opinion of the Judges.

In this Case two Questions have been made, first, What Crime the Facts found upon Barnes in the Special Verdict will amount to? Second, Whether the Prisoner at the Bar is found guilty of the same Offence with Barnes?

First, As to the first Question it is very plain, that the Facts found upon Barnes do amount to Murder in him. Murder may be committed without any Stroke. The Law has not confined the Offence to any particular Circumstances or Manner of Killing; but there are as many Ways to commit Murder, as there are to destroy a Man, provided the Act be done with Malice, either express or implied. Hale P. C. 46. 3 Inst. 52. Murder is, where a Person kills another of Malice, so he dies within a Year and a Day. Hale P. C. 43. And Malice may be either expressed or implied. In this Case the Jury have found the Malice express; for the Facts charged on Barnes are laid in the Indictment to be ex malitia sua præcogitata, to wit, that he, having the Custody of Arne, assaulted him, and carried him to this unwholesome Room, and confined him there by Force against his Will, and without his Consent, and without proper Support, ex malitia sua præcogitata; by Means of which he languished and died. And the Jury have found that Barnes did all these Facts, modo et forma prout in indictamento prædicto specificatur.

But upon the finding of these Facts there is also a plain Malice arising in Construction of Law. Hale P. C. 46. The Law implies Malice in respect of the Person killing. If a Prisoner, by Durefs of the Gaoler, comes to an untimely End, it is Murder. It is not necessary to make it Durefs, that there should be actual Strokes or Wounds. And in 3 Inst. 35. the putting into a Dungeon is Durefs, or into a Place too strait, 3 Inst. 91. plus arctum que deoat, Cromp. 90. The untimely End, mentioned by Lord Chief Justice Hale, is what is meant by Briton, cap. 11. fol. 18. If a Man die in Prison, the Coroner is to take an Inquest upon the View of the Body; and if it is found by the Inquisition, that the Person was brought nearer to Death, and farther from Life, per dure gard del gaoler, it is Felony.

The Reasons why the Law implies Malice in such Cases are plain. Because it is a Breach of his Duty, and of the Trust which the Law has reposed in him. A Prisoner is not to be punished in Gaol, but to be kept safely. Fleet. 38. Braet. 105. The Act also is deliberate. And the Nature of the Act is such, as that it must apparently do harm. It is also cruel; as it is committed upon a Person that cannot help himself. And it is committed by Force, and without the Consent of the Prisoner. So that the Charge in the Indictment against Barnes is Murder; and these Facts found in the Verdict, as to him, fully maintain the Indictment, and amount to Murder. But Barnes is not before the Court, he having fled (as it is said) from Justice.

Second. The next Question is, Whether the Prisoner, Huggins, is found guilty of the same Offence as Barnes; or how far it appears, by this Special Verdict, that he has been aiding and assisting to Barnes in the committing of these Facts?

In the Indictment the Offence is as strongly charged upon Huggins as upon Barnes. The Indictment charges, that the Prisoner at Bar, during the Imprisonment of Arne in the said Room (the Situation and Condition of which the Indictment expressly charges Huggins to have the Knowledge of), on the seventh of November, et diversis diebus et vicibus, during that Imprisonment, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his Malice aforethought, was present, aiding, abetting, comforting, and assisting the said Barnes, the said Arne feloniously, and of his Malice aforethought, to kill and murder, &c. which if found by the Verdict, would certainly be Murder in the Prisoner. But there is a great Difference in the finding the Verdict. As to Huggins, the Jury have only found these Facts, viz. That he had the Office of Warden of the Fleet, &c. granted to him by Letters Patent of 22 July, 12 Ann. to hold for his Life, and to execute by himself or his Deputy: That he, 1 Sept. 12 Geo. I. and before and from thence to 11 Jan. 12 Geo. I. was Warden of the Fleet: That Thomas Gybbon was, and for all that Time acted as his Deputy in that Office: That James Barnes was for all that Time Servant of Gybbon, and acted under him about the Care of the Prisoners, and particularly about the Care of Arne: Then they find, that Barnes assaulted and carried by Force the said Arne into the Room, and kept him there against his Consent, prout in the Indictment, forty-four Days: Then they find the Situation and Condition of the Room, whereby it was very unwholesome, and dangerous to the Life of any Person kept therein: That Huggins, during the Imprisonment of Arne in that Room, viz. for fifteen Days before Arne's Death, knew that the Room was then lately built, and that the Walls were made of Brick and Mortar, and were then damp; but whether he knew it the seventh of September, ignorant: That Arne, the tenth of September, 12 Geo. I. by Durefs of Imprisonment, became sick, and languished to the twentieth of October, and then died by Durefs of Imprisonment in the said Room: That during the Imprisonment of Arne in that Room, viz. per spatium quindecim dierum ad minus before his Death, Huggins was once present at that Room, and then saw the said Arne in that Room, sub duritie imprisonmenti prædicti ac adunc et ibidem se avertit, and the said James Barnes, the same Time as Huggins turned himself away, locked the Door; the said Arne, at the Time when the said Door was locked by Barnes, being in the said Room, sub duritie imprisonmenti prædicti; and that Arne remained under that Durefs till his Death: That Huggins acted sometimes as Warden, during the Time Gybbon was Deputy: But it is not found that he acted as Warden during the Confinement of Arne.

The Judges are all unanimously of Opinion, that the Facts found in this Special Verdict do not amount to Murder in the Prisoner at the Bar; but as this Special Verdict is found, they are of Opinion that he is not guilty. Though he was Warden, yet it being found that there was a Deputy, he is not, as Warden, guilty of the Facts committed under the Authority of his Deputy. He shall answer as Superior for his Deputy civilly, but not criminally. It has been settled, that though a Sheriff must answer for the Offences of his Gaoler civilly, that is, he is subject in an Action to make Satisfaction to the Party injured, yet he is not to answer criminally for the Crime of Murder, if he is criminally punishable who immediately does the Act. See Reg. v. Bland, 12 Mod. 645. So that if a Man is found to have done the Act, it is done by the Command or Direction of the Prisoner, the Prisoner is criminally punishable for the Crime of Murder. In this Case the Fact was done by Barnes; and it so appears in the Special Verdict, that the Prisoner at the Bar ever commanded, or directed, or consented to this Dureff of Imprisonment, which was the Cause of Arne's Death. 1. No Command or Direction is found. And 2. It is not found that Huggins knew of it. That which made the Dureff in this Case was, 1. Barnes's carrying and putting, and confining Arne in this Room by Force and against his Consent. 2. The Situation and Condition of this Room. Now it is not found that Huggins knew of these several Circumstances, which made the Dureff. 1. It is not found that he knew any thing of Barnes's carrying Arne thither. 2. Nor that he was there without his Consent, or without proper Support. 3. As to the Room, it is found by the Verdict, 1. That the Room was built of Brick and Mortar. 2. That the Walls were velde bumide. 3. That the Room was situate on the common Sewer of the Prison, and near the Place where the Filth of the Prison and Excrement of the Prisoners were usually laid, ratione quorum the Room was very unwholesome, and the Life of any Man kept there was in great Danger. But all that is found with respect to the Prisoner's Knowledge is, that for fifteen Days before Arne's Death he knew that the Room was then lately built, recentior; that the Walls were made of Brick and Mortar, and were then damp. But it is not found, nor does it appear, that he knew they were dangerous to a Man's Life, or that there was a Want of necessary Support. Nor is it found that he directed or consented that Arne should be kept or continued there. The chief Thing relied upon is, that the Verdict finds, that once the Prisoner at the Bar was present at the Room, and saw Arne sub duritie imprisonmenti predicti, et se advertit, &c. which, as was objected, made him an Aider and Abettor. But in Answer to this, 1. Being present alone, unless he knew all the Circumstances, and directed that Arne should continue, or at least consented that he should, cannot make him an Aider or Abettor in the Murder. Kelynge 113. A Man may be present, and be entirely innocent. He may be casually present. 2. The Verdict is, vidit sub duritie imprisonmenti predicti. He might see him, and see him while he was sub duritie imprisonmenti predicti, that is, while he was in Fact under the Dureffs by Barnes; but it does by no means follow from thence, that he knew that the Man was under this Dureff, and it is not found that he did know it. It was objected, that if he saw the Man under this Dureff he must know it, and it was his Duty to deliver him. But we cannot take Things by Inference in this Manner. The vidit does not imply a Knowledge of the several Facts that made the Dureff. If the Nature of this Dureff be considered, it is impossible that it should be discovered by one Sight of the Man. It consists of several Ingredients and Circumstances, that are not necessarily to be discovered upon Sight: For though he saw Arne in the Room, yet by the View he could not tell that he was there without his Consent, and by Force, or that he wanted necessary Relief. It is not found that the Man made any Complaint to him, or that any Application was made to him on the Man's Behalf. If he was there with his Consent, it would take off the Dureff. His seeing is but Evidence of his Knowledge of these Things at best, and very poor Evidence too. And therefore the Jury, if the Fact would have borne it, should have found that Huggins knew that Arne was there without his Consent; and that he consented to and directed his Continuance there. Which not being done, we cannot intend these Things, nor infer them. For in Special Verdicts in criminal Cases the Court must never intend nor infer Facts, but judge upon the Facts found, and not on the Evidence of the Facts. Kelynge 78. Whether a Man is aiding and assisting in Murder or no is matter of Fact, and ought to be expressly found by the Jury, Kelynge, 111. Rex vers. Plumme. It does not appear by the Special Verdict there that Glover, or the Person unknown, who shot off the Gun, did discharge it against any of the King's Officers, but it might be for aught that appears for another Purpose: Though upon the particular Circumstances in the Special Verdict there are Things found which were a sufficient Evidence, that the Gun was discharged against the King's Officers, and so it might be reasonably intended, considering they were all armed, and in Prosecution of an unlawful Act in the Night, which they designed to justify and maintain by Force; especially when the Gun was shot off upon the Watchword given; and as the King's Officers were endeavouring to seize the Wool; the Jury thereupon might well have found that the Gun was discharged against the King's Officers. But since they had not found it, the Court were confined to what they had found positively; and were not to judge the Law upon Evidence of a Fact, but upon the Fact when it is found. See Kelynge, 118.

This Case was so well argued on both Sides, that some Objections on the Part of the Crown must be taken notice of, though they are already in a great measure anticipated. As,

1. That Huggins, as Warden, though he had made a Deputy, had still the Care of the Prisoners; and it was incumbent on him to see that there was no illegal Dureff: And to explain what the Law means by Dureffs, Brit. cap. 11. fol. 18. If a Prisoner is brought nearer to Death and farther from Life per dure gard del keeper; and Staunf. P. C. lib. 1. cap. 35. If he keeps him more strictly than of Right he ought, it is Dureff. And the Dureff need not be by the Hand of the Gaoler; for if it is done with his Privy, it will affect him. But that is a Mistake; for when an Officer has Power to make a Deputy, and has appointed a Deputy, he has discharged himself of the whole Care: The Deputy has the whole Power, and it is incumbent upon the Deputy till the Principal resumes his Office. Indeed, when the Principal comes to execute his Office himself, the Power of the Deputy ceases; but a bare accidental coming to the Place will not determine the Deputation, unless he comes with an Intent to resume his Office. The Case of a Disseise coming to dine with a Disseisor, or to see his Pictures, may be very properly compared to this.

"I take it that the Point on which the Case turned was this, it did not appear from any of the Facts found, that the Gun was discharged in Prosecution of the Purpose for which the Party was assembled. But had it been positively found, that it was discharged against the Officer or his Assistant, the Court, upon this finding, might, without encroaching on the Province of the Jury, have presumed that it was discharged in Prosecution of their original Purpose. In Cases so circumstanced, Res ipsa loquitur." Foster's Reports, p. 352.

But his Consent to this Dureff is not found; it entirely depends on his seeing the Man, which does not appear in the Verdict, for want of his Knowledge of the particular Facts.

3th Objection. When he was present, the Power of his Deputy ceased; and then he might have eased the Man of his Dureff, and his suffering him to continue afterwards under the same Dureff infers that he knowingly suffered him to continue till his Death; and his not reforming this Abuse implies his Consent to it. But these Inferences are by much too strong; and the not reforming an Abuse does by no means infer a Consent to all the Consequences of it.

4th Objection. A Person absent may be Principal in Murder, as in the case of poisoning. An Infant was laid in a Hog-stye, and a Sow eat it, and held Murder, Palsgrave, 247, 548. The same Opinion in the case of a sick Man laid in the Cold. So in the case of laying an Infant under Leaves in an Orchard, and a Kite struck it, Poph. 13. Qw. 98. Hale P. C. 53. There the Person who did the Act occasioned the Death; but in this Case no Act was done by the Prisoner at the Bar. There are indeed Cases of Murder where no Act was done by the Persons guilty, as the letting loose a wild Beast, which the Party knows to be mischievous, and he kills a Man. 3 Edw. III. corone 311. Staunf. 17. Crompt. 24. 2. the Owner of the Beast is guilty of Murder. In Answer to those Cases, there is a Difference between Beasts that are feræ natura, as Lions and Tygers, which a Man must always keep up at his Peril, and Beasts that are mansuetæ natura, and break through the Tameness of their Nature, such as Oxen and Horses. In the latter Case an Action lies, if the Owner has had Notice of the Quality of the Beast; in the former Case an Action lies without such Notice. As to the Point of Felony, if the Owner have Notice of the mischievous Quality of the Ox, &c. and he uses all proper Diligence to keep him up, and he happens to break loose and kills a Man, it would be very hard to make the Owner guilty of Felony; but if through Negligence the Beast goes abroad, after Warning or Notice of this Condition, it is the Opinion of Hale (H. P. C. vol. 1. 431.) that it is Manslaughter in the Owner. And if he did purposely let him loose and wander abroad, with a Design to do Mischief; nay, though it were but with a Design to fright People and make Sport, and he kills a Man, it is Murder in the Owner.

5th Objection. It is found that Barnes shut the Door in the Presence of Huggins; and therefore the continuing of Arne under that Confinement will affect Huggins. But there is no Consent found to his Confinement. What is found is, at most, but Evidence of a Consent; and even not that, it is only vidit et se advertit.

6th Objection. It is not necessary for the Jury to find the Consent in express Words, and if Facts are found that amount to a Consent, the Court will judge it a Consent. As in the Case of Malice, the Court will judge it upon the Facts found; and Malice is an Act of the Mind as well as Consent. To this it is answered, that Malice is Matter of Law, and proper for the Court to judge, but the Consent of one Man to the malicious Acts of another, is Matter of Fact which ought to be found by the Jury. And here is no Consent found, nor that Huggins aided or abetted Barnes; nor is there any positive Fact found, that must necessarily be construed an aiding and abetting.

There is another Matter which the King's Counsel insisted upon, That if the Court were of Opinion that they could not give Judgment upon the Facts found in this Verdict, that the Prisoner was guilty of Murder; that yet the Verdict was so uncertain, as that they could not give Judgment of Acquittal: And therefore, that a venire facias de novo ought to go. And this brought it under the Consideration of the Judges, whether a venire facias de novo ought to be granted in this Case. And to speak to that Point, the Counsel on both Sides were heard before all the Judges on Wednesday the 24th Instant.

It was said by the Counsel for the King, that they spoke to this Point without Prejudice. For they insisted, that as to the Verdict itself there were sufficient Facts found affecting the Prisoner, to induce the Judges to be of Opinion that they amounted to Murder. But for Argument's Sake, in case the Judges should be of Opinion, that they were too uncertain to found a Resolution upon, that the Prisoner was guilty of Murder, then they argued that a venire facias de novo ought to go, though it was in a capital Case.

1. In a civil Case, if a Verdict is found so uncertainly and ambiguously as that no Judgment can be given, a venire facias de novo must issue. Co. Li. 227. 2 Roll. Abr. 693. Venn. vers. Howall. Cr. Car. 322.

It was observed that the Book of Co. Li. 227. speaks of Verdicts in general, and does not say in what Cases: But as to civil Cases there is no Doubt.

2. In criminal Cases Writs of venire facias de novo have been granted. Co. Inter. 393. b. Hil. 4. Car. I. B. R. rot. 32. Rex vers. Fisher.

3. In capital Cases a venire facias de novo must go. 1. In Cases of Mistrial. 6 Co. 14. a. Arundel's Case, the Point agreed. 2. For Misbehaviour of the Jury in giving in their Verdict. Hil. 8 Hen. VII. rot. 3. placit. reg. Rex vers. Wayner. Agreed. 3. As to granting a venire facias de novo, after a Special Verdict found, they were so candid as to own, that tho' there was Search made with the greatest Diligence, yet they could not find one Instance, nor so much as an Opinion of a Judge, except what was said by Lord Chief-Justice Holt, in the Case of the King vers. Keitt. Comberb. 408. Holt says, "I should not be much against a venire de novo." (Comyns 17.) And this was remembered by some others that heard that Opinion. The Jury had found in that Case that the Prisoner had killed the Man; but it did not certainly appear whether the Fact was Murder or Manslaughter. Mr. Attorney General insisted, that if there was such an Uncertainty, as that no Judgment could be given in a capital Case; the same

Reason

Reason held in such Case as in civil and other criminal Cases; tho' there is no Precedent of it as yet; for ubi eadem est ratio, est eadem lex. And therefore, supposing (for in this it was argued upon a Supposition) that the Verdict was too uncertain to give Judgment against the Prisoner, they insisted that a venire facias de novo ought to go.

But the Judges came to no Resolution, that a venire facias de novo could not issue after a special Verdict in any capital Case; it being unnecessary for them to determine that Question: For as every special Verdict depends upon the particular finding of the Verdict, so the present Question relates only to the present Verdict before us as found. And as to that we were all of Opinion, that this Verdict was not so uncertain as that Judgment could not be given upon it. For the Facts found are all positively found; but those Facts in the Nature of them joined together, are not sufficient to make the Prisoner guilty of Murder. And if so, then the Prisoner must be acquitted; for it is not that the Verdict is uncertain, but it is not full enough to convict him. Perhaps the Jury might have found other Facts which they have not, but the Court can judge only upon what is found. (Kelyng, 78, 79.) We all agreed in the Case of Green and Bedell, on a special Verdict, that the Verdict was not full enough as to them, for us to judge it Treason in them; because the Verdict only found that they were present, and found no particular Act of Force committed by them; and did not find that they were aiding and assisting to the rest. And it is possible they might be there only out of Curiosity to see; and whether they were aiding and assisting is Matter of Fact, which ought to be expressly found by the Jury, and not left to the Court upon any colourable Implication; and accordingly those two Persons were discharged. And yet as to Green, he was found to be among the Persons assembled, &c. calling up his Cap, and hallooing with a Staff in his Hand; and that whilst he was among them he was knocked down by a Party of the King's Soldiers that came to suppress them; and was then taken. And as to Bedell, it was found that he was there, and being pursued by one of the King's Soldiers, called out to the rest of the Company to face about, and not to leave them (a).

Upon the whole, there is no Authority against the Court's giving Judgment of Acquittal, upon a Verdict that is not sufficient to convict; and therefore this Verdict not finding Facts sufficient to make the Prisoner guilty of Murder, he must be adjudged not guilty. And he was discharged.

(a) Strange, in his Reports, vol. II. p. 888. after mentioning this Case of (Messengers) Bedell and Green, in the Opinion delivered by the Chief-Justice, adds to it, (from Kelyng, p. 66.) "On a Special Verdict it was found, that Thompson and his Wife were fighting, and Dawes endeavouring to part them was killed by Thompson; and it not being found, that Thompson knew Dawes intended only to part them, it was held Manslaughter, without sending it back to the Jury to be certified of his Knowledge. "These are Cases directly in Point as to this Head; and I must observe that Plummer's Case was after the Case of Keit, wherein Holt, Chief-Justice, had had this Point under "his Consideration."

XII. The Trial of THOMAS BAMBRIDGE, Esq. late Warden of the Fleet, for the Murder of Mr. ROBERT CASTELL, before the Right Hon. Sir Robert Baylis, Knt. Lord-Mayor of the City of London, the Hon. Mr. Justice Page, the Hon. Clerk of Arraignment. Thomas Bambridge, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)
Clerk of Arraignment. Thou standest indicted, &c.

Clerk of Arraignment. How sayest thou, Thomas Bambridge, art thou Guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?
Mr. Bambridge. Not Guilty.

Clerk of Arraignment. How wilt thou be tried?

Mr. Bambridge. By God and my Country.

Die Jovis, 22^o Die Maij, 1729.

Proclamation was made for Information.

Clerk of Arraignment. Thou the Prisoner at the Bar, these Men that thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our Sovereign Lord the King and thee, upon the Trial of thy Life and Death, therefore if thou wilt challenge them, or any of them, thy Time is to speak as they come to the Book to be sworn, before they are sworn.

Then the Pannel was called over, and Mr. Bambridge challenged twenty.

Mr. Justice Page. You have challenged the full Number allowed by Law, without any Reason assigned, now take care.

Then the Jury sworn were as follow:

George Baker,	Oliver Slowcock,
John Goodinch,	John Nemes,
Robert Hampshire,	Thomas Playseed,
Richard Mason,	William Mills,
William Bernard,	Robert Everett,
Roger Penny,	Moses Freeman.

Clerk of Arraignment. Hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)

Clerk of Arraignment. You, Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, hearken to his Charge, he stands indicted by the Name of Thomas Bambridge, &c. (prout in the Indictment Mutatis Mutandis.)

Mr. Bambridge. I desire the Indictment may be read in Latin, as it is.

Mr. Justice Page. That you shall have done.

Mr. Holland. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King. This, Gentlemen, is an Indictment against Thomas Bambridge, Esq. late Warden of the Fleet Prison, for the Murder of Mr. Robert Castell; and the Indictment sets forth, That Thomas Bambridge, upon the 14th of November, had the Care and Custody of the Prisoners in the said Prison, but being a Man of a cruel Temper, did upon the 14th of November last past, assault the said Robert Castell, and carry him to Richard Corbett's, a Spunging-house, and at the Time of this Imprisonment, one Joseph White was sick of the Small-Pox, and Mr. Castell never had them; that Mr. Castell several Times desired he might not be there, for that he was afraid if he should catch it, it would be his Death. That from the 16th of November to the 12th of December following, Bambridge forced him to continue there; and that Castell (after his Request made to Bambridge to be removed from that Place, and Notice had been given to Bambridge, that the Person was sick of the Small-Pox) fell sick of the Small-Pox, and languished under it in the same House until December 12, and then died: Therefore the Indictment concludes, that the said Thomas Bambridge did feloniously and maliciously murder the said Robert Castell, against the Peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity. To this Indictment the Defendant pleaded Not Guilty; but if the Fact is proved, I don't doubt but you will find him Guilty.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, Thomas Bambridge stands indicted for the Murder of Mr. Robert Castell, a Prisoner then in his Custody. Gentlemen, Prisoners must be treated with Humanity and Tendernefs, unless unruly, and then the Gaoler has an Authority to restrain them; but those that behave well, he has no such Authority over. This Person came to the Fleet the 28th of June, as will be shewn by the Books of the Warden, and Bambridge had been a Deputy Warden some Time before. I wish he had not learned to treat People with Severity. On the 30th of September he came to be Warden in right of himself, and Mr. Castell had performed every Thing that was necessary; for the Liberty of the Rules had given Security, and to continue that Liberty of the Rules, found additional Security, Security to his Satisfaction, approved on by the Clerk of the Enquiries, yet on the 14th of November, he was forced into Corbett's; and I must submit it to you, my Lord, if it is not contrary to Law, as he lodged in the Rules, at one Mr. Underwood's, to carry him to a Spunging-house, Houses where they make a Property of all Prisoners. 'Tis the Duty, Gentlemen, of a Gaoler, that has Prisoners in his Custody, when he thinks they cannot be continued safely in the Rules, to put them into Prison, and not into Spunging-houses, where large Reckonings are run up upon them. Their Method is, Gentlemen, to make the Security uneasy, and then to tell the Prisoners that they shall be carried into Spunging-houses, till they can work them up to a Temper to pay such Sums of Money that they want to get from the unhappy Prisoners. Gentlemen, Mr. Castell was given to understand, that a Man was ill of the Small-Pox in the same House, and Mr. Castell had never had them, and said, he should die if he had, let me not be carried into this House. This did not take Effect, Bambridge insisted upon his renewing his Security, and when he was carried there, Savage went from him to Bambridge, and told him that Mr. Castell never had the Small-Pox, and that one White was ill of them, and begged that he might be carried back into his Lodgings, or into the Gaol. One would have thought Bambridge should have had some Consideration of him, but he had no Answer to his Satisfaction; he continued there very melancholy till the 4th of December, and then the Distemper took him; he sickened with the same, the Danger increased, and he died on the 12th, so that it was apparently the Occasion of his Death. It was Bambridge's Duty, when he was informed the Distemper was in the House, to have removed him. This is the State of the Evidence, and as we shall be able to prove the Facts, I doubt not but you will find the Defendant Guilty.

Mr. Attorney-General. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, Thomas Bambridge stands indicted for the Life of an unhappy Man, who died under his Custody. As the Law has armed Gaolers with a sufficient Authority, for the safe Custody of their Prisoners, and for the securing their Properties, so the Law has taken Care that they shall not put any Prisoner into hard Durefs, and if the Man dies, the Life of the Prisoner lies to the Gaoler, and whether the Person dies being so confined, or whether it was the Distemper occasioned by means and by reason of his illegal Durefs, I submit it to your Lordship's Direction, to be Murder; for where actual Force should be committed, and the Offender does an unlawful Act, by which Death ensues, I must submit it whether, being mixed with actual Force, it is not Murder. This is a particular Case of this Prisoner, for he had given Security for the Enjoyment of the Indulgence of the Liberty of the Rules, during the Time he was in those Lodgings; but for what Reason does not appear, that Bambridge ordered Corbett to take him out, and not to bring him into Prison, but carry him into Corbett's House, that will appear to be an illegal Act of imprisonment; for by the Statute 22d Charles II. it is provided, no Gaoler, or other Officer, having Prisoners in his Custody, shall carry them to any public Victualling-House; therefore Bambridge ordering Mr. Castell to be carried to a Victualling-House, and not into the Prison, is an illegal Act, and the Consequence of that, I apprehend to be an illegal Confinement: At the Time when carried there, White being sick of the Small-Pox, it will appear to you, Gentlemen, that Bambridge was acquainted that the Small-Pox was in the House, (it was a contagious Distemper) and that Mr. Castell was afraid of catching it. Frequent Messages were sent to desire he might be removed, and it will appear that Mr. Castell did personally apply to

U

Bambridge

Bambridge himself at Corbett's; after this, the Small-Pox being mentioned to be in the House when Bambridge was in Company with Mr. Castelli, he said he never had had them, and if he caught the Contagion, it would kill him, and desired to be removed; but Bambridge refused to let him go, and continued the unlawful Durefs upon Castelli; he did catch the Distemper, and of that Distemper, so taken into Corbett's, under this Durefs, died. If this Matter is proved, it is a point of Law, if it is not Murder; as to the Fact, it must appear by Evidence, and if my Brief be true, it will be fully made out to you. If the Gaoler does so treat a Prisoner to put him in hazard of his Life, and by such Durefs he dies, I submit it whether the Gaoler is not guilty of Murder.

Mr. Sol. Gen. We will call the Witnesses to prove the Facts.
Call Richard Longborne (who was sworn), and produced a Copy of Bambridge's Patent.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Where had you it from?—Mr. Long. From the Rolls.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Is it a true Copy?—Mr. Long. It is a true Copy.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Deliver it to the Clerk to be read, (which he accordingly did) and it appeared to be dated the 30th of September, in the second Year of his present Majesty.

Call Thomas Cotton. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Cotton, what Officer are you belonging to the Fleet Prison?—Mr. Cot. I am Clerk of the Papers.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Produce the Commitment Books of the said Office, and see when Mr. Castelli was committed Prisoner.

Mr. Cot. He was committed the 15th of July 1728, upon Mesne Process.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When was he charged in Execution?

Mr. Cot. The 9th of November following, for 180l. at the Suit of William Waring.

Mr. Bambridge. I do not hear Mr. Cotton, and therefore desire he may raise his Voice (upon which the Court admitted Mr. Bambridge to come to the inner Bar); I must observe, my Lord, the Writ was brought in 1726, and entered in 1728.

Call Richard Corbett. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Corbett, what House do you keep?

Mr. Cor. A Publick-House.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long have you lived there?

Mr. Cor. Eleven Years.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you know Mr. Castelli was in your House?

Mr. Cor. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who brought Mr. Castelli to your House?

Mr. Cor. Myself, his Security sent for me to the Rainbow Coffee-House.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Where was he before he was carried to your House?

Mr. Cor. At his own Lodgings.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Where was that?

Mr. Cor. At Mr. Underwood's, in the Rules of the Fleet.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now go on.

Mr. Cor. My Lord, the Security sent for me to the Rainbow Coffee-House to take up Mr. Castelli; but having some Respect for Mr. Castelli, I sent to him to let him know that his Security intended to surrender him, and afterwards, at five or six o'Clock in the Evening, the Security sent for me again to the King's-Arms Tavern (where Mr. Castelli was) to surrender him, and I told them I would not take Mr. Castelli into Custody without I was paid; and they gave me Half a Guinea, and then asked me, Why I did not lock him up? Said I, He is my Prisoner now, not yours, and I left him there, and went to the Judge's Chambers; whilst I was gone, a Servant was sent to my House to have a Fire made and a Bed got ready for Mr. Castelli.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How came he to go to your House?

Mr. Cor. It was at his own Request.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long did he continue there?

Mr. Cor. Till he died, which was on the 12th of December following.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was one White there?—Mr. Cor. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long?—Mr. Cor. A considerable Time. White had been well about 14 Days before Mr. Castelli came.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was Bambridge there?

Mr. Cor. He was there several Times.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did Mr. Castelli ever desire you to go to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Cor. He did desire me to go to Bambridge, and said he was afraid, he had never had the Small-Pox, for if he had, it was when he was very young; and I went to Bambridge to tell him, that Mr. Castelli desired to go to his Lodgings.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When was this?

Mr. Cor. Nine or ten Days after the Security had surrendered him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did Mr. Castelli tell you to say to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Cor. He told me to tell Mr. Bambridge he was afraid of the Small-Pox, and to solicit him to let him go to his Lodgings; and I went accordingly to Mr. Bambridge, at the King's-Arms, on Ludgate-Hill, and did solicit him to let Mr. Castelli go to his Lodgings, and Bambridge made answer to me, that he could not let a Man go, that was charged in three Executions, without Security.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What was the Reason you told Bambridge that Mr. Castelli never had the Small-Pox, and desired to go to his Lodging at Ludgate-Hill?

Mr. Cor. I told Bambridge that one White had the Small-Pox.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Room was it Mr. Castelli died in?

Mr. Cor. I have kept a Club in the Room where Mr. Castelli died.

Mr. At. Gen. When did you first acquaint Mr. Bambridge with Mr. Castelli's being at your House?

Mr. Cor. The 15th of November, the next Day.

Mr. At. Gen. What said you to Bambridge?

Mr. Cor. I told him Mr. Castelli's Security had surrendered him; and Bambridge asked, Where is he? I said, At my House; to which Bambridge answered, That was well.

Mr. Bambridge. Be pleased to ask, my Lord, if Corbett had any Directions from me to take Mr. Castelli into Custody.

Mr. Justice Page. Corbett, answer that Question.—Mr. Cor. I had not Mr. Bam. When was I admitted into my Office?

Mr. Cor. On the 15th of December.

Mr. Bam. I desire Mr. Corbett to be asked, if he was not in Court when I qualified myself for the Place, and desire he may give an Account of it.—Mr. Cor. I was in Court.

Mr. Justice Page. I cannot admit him to give an Account of what was done in Court, for that must appear by the Records thereof.

Mr. Bam. My Lord, I desire Mr. Corbett may acquaint you what part of the House Mr. Castelli lay in, and what part White.

Mr. Cor. White lay in the old House, in the Garret, and Mr. Castelli in a House newly taken in, on the first Floor.

Mr. Justice Page. Had Mr. Castelli and White any Communication together?

Mr. Cor. I never suffered White to come down for eight Weeks.

Mr. Justice Page. How high was the House where he lay?

Mr. Cor. Three Stories.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long was it before White went out of his Chamber after Mr. Castelli was there?

Mr. Cor. Not till six Weeks after Mr. Castelli was dead.

Call John Savage. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Savage, do you know Mr. Castelli being any Time a Prisoner in the Fleet?—Mr. Savage. I was daily with him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know any thing of his being sent to Corbett's?

Mr. Sav. I was several Times in Company with him, and he seemed apprehensive of his Bail surrendering him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you go to him to Corbett's?

Mr. Sav. I went to Mr. Castelli the Day after he was carried there, and he complained that he was afraid he should not get Day Rules to go out with, though it was Term-Time, to transact his Business.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Had he the Small-Pox at that Time?—Mr. Sav. No.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How soon did you go to Mr. Castelli again?

Mr. Sav. I went to him again in a Day or two, and he expressed a great Concern for fear of the Small-Pox, and said if he caught that Distemper, it would be very fatal to him; and I went to Mr. Bambridge, and told him of it, and Bambridge said he would not let him go to his Lodgings.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was you with Bambridge at any other Time?

Mr. Sav. I was at the Coffee-House with him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Request did you make then?

Mr. Sav. I don't remember any.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How many Times did you go to Bambridge?

Mr. Sav. Four Times I went to him, and the second Time I mentioned Mr. Castelli's Fear of having the Small-Pox.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see Mr. Castelli after he had the Small-Pox?

Mr. Sav. I did not see him, in regard to some of my own Family who had not had them.

Mr. At. Gen. Mr. Castelli was carried to Mr. Corbett's the very Day he was surrendered, pray what was it he desired at that Time?

Mr. Sav. He said it was a great Misfortune not to have the Benefit of Day Rules to negotiate his Business with his Friends.

Mr. At. Gen. When did you first go to Mr. Castelli?

Mr. Sav. The next Day after he was carried there, and it was mentioned that Mr. Castelli was fearful of having the Small-Pox.

Mr. At. Gen. Was not that the first Day that he was carried there?

Mr. Sav. I am not sure it was the first Day.

Mr. At. Gen. How did you hear it?

Mr. Sav. I had it from Mr. Castelli the next Day after, or the Day after that.

Mr. At. Gen. When you went first to Mr. Bambridge from Mr. Castelli, what did you desire?

Mr. Sav. I did desire that he might have the Benefit of the Day Rules, and Mr. Bambridge said he could not, being charged in Execution to the amount of 900l.

Mr. At. Gen. When did you go to Bambridge?

Mr. Sav. I believe I went in a Day or two after Mr. Castelli was carried in, and then mentioned Mr. Castelli's Fears of having the Small-Pox.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you say any thing of the Small-Pox being in the House?—Mr. Sav. I knew nothing of them.

Mr. At. Gen. How came you to talk of the Small-Pox to Bambridge?

Mr. Sav. I heard it from Mr. Castelli, that the Small-Pox was there.

Mr. At. Gen. What was the Reason of Mr. Castelli's Fear, and Message to Bambridge?

Mr. Sav. Mr. Castelli told me the Small-Pox was there at Corbett's.

Mr. At. Gen. What did you tell Bambridge?

Mr. Sav. I told Bambridge that Mr. Castelli was fearful of having the Small-Pox, and that he desired to be carried to his own Lodgings.

Call Mary Corbett. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Mrs. Mary Corbett, you are Wife of Mr. Corbett?

Mrs. Cor. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. When was Mr. Castelli brought to your House?

Mrs. Cor. The 14th of November, at ten o'Clock at Night, and a Drawer came from the Tavern, and brought a Message to have a Fire made, and a Bed prepared for Mr. Castelli.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Where was the Message brought from?

Mrs. Cor. The Message was from the King's-Arms Tavern.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did Mr. Castelli come?—Mrs. Cor. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Was White there?

Mrs. Cor. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How long had White had the Small-Pox?

Mrs. Cor. I believe he had had the Small-Pox ten Days.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Was there any Mark of the Small-Pox remaining?

Mrs. Cor. He kept the Scars on.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. How long was he sick?

Mrs. Cor. Ten Days.

Mr. Serj. Chesb. Did he sit up?

Mrs.

Mrs. Corbett. He got up every Day.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Pray, if they are a good Sort, do they not turn in nine Days?—Mrs. Corbett. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. So that the Day after the Small-Pox had turned, Mr. Castell came into your House: How long had Mr. Castell been in your House before he had the Small-Pox?

Mrs. Corbett. Mr. Castell had not the Small-Pox till about eight Days after he came to my House: I was by chance speaking of the Small-Pox, and saying a Person in the House had them, and Mr. Castell said he was very sorry for it, because he had never had them.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Did he then desire any thing of you or your Husband, as to speaking to Mr. Bambridge?

Mrs. Corbett. Mr. Bambridge was in the Room at the same Time.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. What did Mr. Castell say?

Mrs. Corbett. He desired that he might go home to his Lodgings with a Keeper, and Bambridge said in answer, he never knew any thing of that kind done.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Did you give any Instance?

Mrs. Corbett. I told him that it happened when Mr. Conway, a Master in Chancery, was committed to the Fleet Prison, and there was no Convienency in the Prison, nor at my House, and then Mr. Gybbon sent a Keeper with him to his Lodging.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. What did Bambridge say then?

Mrs. Corbett. He said no more.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. During the Time Mr. Castell was at your House, were there any Securities given?

Mrs. Corbett. Yes, I believe there were, for Mr. Castell said his Securities were come, and said only for Codnor's coming with Bonds, and Codnor told me there was Security given.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Do you know nothing but what Codnor said?

Mrs. Corbett. I saw two Men there, whose Names I do not know, in order to give Security.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Do you know that they gave Security?

Mrs. Corbett. I saw Codnor, the Deputy Clerk of the Papers, go up Stairs with some Papers, which Mr. Castell said was his Bonds.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Did you hear Bambridge say, or own, that Codnor had taken Security?—Mrs. Corbett. No.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. How long was this after Castell came to your House?

Mrs. Corbett. About ten Days.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. Do you remember the Time how long after he sickened and died?

Mrs. Corbett. He sickened on the 4th Day of December, and died on the 12th.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. What did he die of?

Mrs. Corbett. Of the Small-Pox.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the Request of Mr. Castell, when he had the Conversation with Mr. Bambridge at your House?

Mrs. Corbett. His Request to Mr. Bambridge was, to be moved to his own Lodgings with a Keeper.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did he agree or refuse?

Mrs. Corbett. His Answer was, he never knew any thing of that kind done.

Mr. Att. Gen. When was Mr. Castell first brought into your House?

Mrs. Corbett. On the 14th of November, about ten o'Clock at Night.

Mr. Lee. Was you in Company at the Tavern?—Mrs. Corbett. No.

Mr. Lee. How long after your Husband was gone there, did you receive the Message about Mr. Castell's coming?

Mrs. Corbett. An Hour and an Half.

Mr. Lee. Who brought him to your House?

Mrs. Corbett. He came in Custody, but I did not see him.

Mr. Lee. How long was it after that Mr. Bambridge came to your House?

Mrs. Corbett. In about a Week.

Mr. Lee. Did you hear Bambridge say any thing when he was at that Time at your House?

Mrs. Corbett. He did not say any thing to me.

Mr. Lee. Are you sure of it?—Mrs. Corbett. Yes.

Mr. Lee. White lay ill of the Small-Pox then, was it in the same Stair-case?

Mrs. Corbett. They went up the same Stair-case, but Mr. Castell lay in the new House one Pair of Stairs, and White in the old House three Pair of Stairs.

Mr. Lee. How long was it after Mr. Castell had been at your House, that you mentioned White's having the Small-Pox?

Mrs. Corbett. About a Week after he had been there, I said to Mr. Castell (Mr. Bambridge being by) that there was one in the House had the Small-Pox; to which Mr. Castell replied, I am sorry to hear it, for I never had them.

Mrs. Lee. How long had White been ill before you happened to speak of his Illness to Castell?

Mrs. Corbett. To the best of my Remembrance eight Days.

Mr. Bambridge (showing a Paper to Mrs. Corbett) says, Mrs. Corbett, pray look on that Paper.

Mrs. Corbett. I have, and remember the Coroner's coming to my House, but did not know who he was.

Mr. Just. Page. If you intend to produce any Evidence in respect to the Inquest, she is not a proper Person; for that you must produce the Coroner himself.

Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, I shall submit, and desire Mrs. Corbett may repeat what she said in relation to Mr. Conway.

Mr. Just. Page. Mrs. Corbett, pray repeat that.

Mrs. Corbett. My Lord, Mr. Conway was at a Friend's House on Ludgate-Hill, and the Reason was, the Gaol was very full, and there was no Room at my House, and Mr. Gybbon sent a Keeper with him to his Lodging, but that in two Nights and two Days, when there was Room, he came there.

Mr. Just. Page. Do you know of your own Knowledge, what House he was at?

Mrs. Corbett. No, I do not, but that he was kept in the Rules of the Prison, with a Keeper, till he was brought to my House.

Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, I desire she may acquaint you what sort of Intimacy there was between Mr. Castell and myself?

Mrs. Corbett. Mr. Bambridge used to be at a Club at my House, where some Persons met, and among them Mr. Castell, and I always thought him and Mr. Bambridge to be friendly together.

Mr. Bambridge. When Mr. Castell spoke about enquiring after new Securities, what Answer did I make?

Mrs. Corbett. That you would take the Security as it came.

Mr. Bambridge. When I was speaking to a Gentleman, who told me Mr. Castell was sick of the Small-Pox, what did I say?

Mrs. Corbett. You said, that you was very sorry to hear it, and that Mr. Castell should trifle with you, and himself too, about the Securities.

Mr. Bambridge. When Mr. Castell applied about Securities, what did I say?—Mrs. Corbett. You said it should be done.

Mr. Bambridge. Was it not esteemed a Favour, or Part of Friendship?

Mrs. Corbett. It was.

Mr. Bambridge. Was you by when Mr. Castell desired to go to his Lodgings on Ludgate-Hill?—Mrs. Corbett. I was.

Mr. Bambridge. What was the Reason of Mr. Castell's desiring to go?

Mrs. Corbett. I believe he was afraid of the Small-Pox.

Call Richard Corbett again.

Mr. Just. Page. Mr. Corbett, you said that White was recovered of the Small-Pox fourteen Days before Mr. Castell was brought to your House; are you certain of that?

Mr. Corbett. I heard so, my Lord, I never went up to see him, and the Nurse is here, and can inform your Lordship better.

Mr. Just. Page. You may go, you know nothing of it.

Call Hannah Stretch. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mrs. Stretch, was you sent for to Mr. Castell when he was ill?—Mrs. Stretch. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When did you leave White?

Mrs. Stretch. Some time in November last.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was you Nurse to Mr. Castell?—Mrs. Stretch. I was.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know how Mr. Castell got the Small-Pox?

Mrs. Stretch. I do not.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long did you stay with White?

Mrs. Stretch. Full three Weeks, and in that Time White had not been out of his Room. I went from White on the Thursday, and was sent for to Mr. Castell on the Tuesday following.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Condition was White in when you left him?

Mrs. Stretch. When I left him he was out of all Danger, he had taken three Doses of Physick.

Call Thomas Dawson. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Dawson, do you remember Mr. Castell's being brought into Corbett's?

Mr. Dawson. I never saw Mr. Castell till after he was dead.

Call John Noel. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Noel, did you know Mr. Castell?

Mr. Noel. I was a Prisoner at Mr. Corbett's when he came there.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was one White ill of the Small-Pox then?

Mr. Noel. I never saw Mr. White, but was informed he had the Small-Pox above Stairs; I was then in the House.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know how long White had them?

Mr. Noel. He was never suffered to come down in two Months after.

Call James Codnor. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mr. Codnor, was you concerned in the Prison of the Fleet as a Clerk?

Mr. Codnor. I did act there as Deputy Clerk of the Papers, by the Approbation of Mr. Bambridge.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you know of any Securities given by Mr. Castell?

Mr. Codnor. Some time in November last, in Michaelmas Term, I received Orders from Mr. Bambridge to attend Mr. Castell as often as his Security should come to him to compleat his Bonds, who had then three Securities, and I received three Habeas Corpus very soon one after the other, and Mr. Castell could not get the Bonds signed so soon till Execution came against him, and then the Security was objected to, because a greater Charge came against him.

Mr. Serj. Chesbire. What were those Bonds that had been given?

Mr. Just. Page, } We cannot admit you to ask any Questions as to and } the Bonds, unless you had applied to Mr. Bambridge for them, and he had refused to deliver them.
Mr. Bar. Carter. } Then the Prisoner was directed to proceed in his Defence.

Mr. Bambridge. I have a great many Witnesses to prove my Regard for Mr. Castell, if occasion; but shall submit the rest to the Evidence given for the Crown.

Mr. Just. Page. You may go on if you think fit.

Mr. Bambridge. No, my Lord, I will submit the whole.

Mr. Just. Page. Gentlemen of the Jury, Mr. Bambridge stands indicted for the Murder of one Mr. Castell. If this has not been proved, Gentlemen, you are not to find the Man Guilty. That the Evidence for the Crown is not sufficient to find him Guilty, for so far from being Guilty, Mr. Castell desired to come there, and the Warden, if he is apprehensive that a Man will run away, then it is the Duty of a Warden to carry him to a Place of safe Custody. It is said, indeed, that when Mr. Bambridge came to Corbett's, in about eight Days after Mr. Castell was carried there, Mr. Bambridge was by, and Mr. Castell expressed his Fear of having the Small-Pox, and desired to be removed to his Lodging, but then he never asked to go into the Custody of the Gaol. Mrs. Corbett indeed said, that one of the Masters in Chancery, Mr. Conway, was allowed to be at his Lodging two Days before he was carried to the Gaol, but the Reason was, there was no Room in the Gaol. Gentlemen, the Gaoler must keep his Prisoners as well as he can, for they must not be put like Hogs together. Gentlemen, here was Execution upon Execution, which came to the Sum of 900l. therefore it was requisite to have him in a Place of Safety. Another Witness says, that the Deputy Clerk of the Papers was ordered by Mr. Bambridge at all Times to attend Mr. Castell about his Securities, and so far from the Prisoner's having a malicious Intent, that there was no Quarrel, no ill Nature, no Difference, and they met frequently at Corbett's at a Club, and there was no Quarrel, but always a Friendship between them. And when Bambridge heard that he had the Small-Pox, he declared that he was sorry that Mr. Castell had them, and that he had trifled with himself and him about the Securities. It must appear, Gentlemen, to you, that Mr. Castell was murdered maliciously, to find the Prisoner Guilty; if it appears otherwise, you must acquit him.

Clerk of Arraignment. How say you, is Thomas Bambridge Guilty of the Murder whereof he stands indicted, or not Guilty?

Foreman of the Jury. Not Guilty.

Upon this Acquittal, Mary, the Widow of Mr. Robert Castell, brought an Appeal against the said Thomas Bambridge and Richard Corbett, for the Murder of her Husband. We shall here give the Trial on the Appeal, though it is not in the Order of Time, yet as it relates to the same Fact, is proper to follow the Trial of Bambridge for the Murder.

What follows first, is a short Account of the Proceedings previous to the Trial, on the Appeal.

Hilary Term, 3 Geo. II.

Castell, Vid. vers. Bambridge, et Corbett.

The Defendant Bambridge, having been prosecuted on the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, for the Murder of the Plaintiff's Husband, who was a Prisoner in the Fleet, under the Custody of Bambridge the Warden, and having on the Trial been honourably acquitted, upon the Prosecutor's own Evidence, was followed with an Appeal, to which Corbett, who on the Cross Examination appeared to be a material Witness for Bambridge, was now also made an Appellee; and the Writ of Appeal running quia Maria Castell vidua fecit nos secur de clamore suo prosequendo per Thom' Wagstaffe et Peston Stracey, contrary to the usual Form, which is, si the Appellant fecerit nos (i. e. the King) secur Application was made to the Lord Chancellor King, to supersede this Writ, upon Affidavit that the Appellees were both in Custody upon it, but that no Security had been given, and the Writ reciting it as an Act done before the Emanation of it, the Sheriff had not taken any, as he would have done if it had been put by way of Condition, si fecerit. And it was argued by me that the Statute of Westminster 2. C. 12. giving the Appellee a Remedy against the Appellant, her Pledges, and Abettors, it was not a Matter of Form, but Security should be entered into by Persons of Ability; to which it was answered by Mr. Attorney-General, that it was sufficient if there were Pledges at any Time before Judgment. Sir T. Jones, 154. 9. Coke, Dr. Hufsey's Case. Croke Jac. 413.

To this it was replied, that at that rate the Appellee would never have any Remedy against the Pledges; for if he was convicted, he would be intitled to none, and if he was acquitted, the Appellant would never pray Judgment, and it would be an Artifice to elude the Law.

Notwithstanding all which the Chancellor would do nothing in it, but said, if the quia fecerit vos was wrong, we might have Advantage of it, and so refused to make any Order.

Upon the first Day of Michaelmas Term last, the Writ being returned, and the Appellees both brought by Habeas Corpus, and turned over to the King's Bench, it was there moved to have the Proceeding set aside, upon the same Affidavit of there being no Pledges; and the Court here were of Opinion it was a very good Objection, and a Foundation to supersede the Writ; but then they said, it was not in their Power, who were to take the Writ as they found it, and not to hear Affidavits, to contradict the Suggestion of the Writ; and therefore the having Security, being recited as an Act done, they must take it so, and could not relieve.

Upon this the Appeal was arraigned, setting forth that the Appellant's Husband was a Prisoner in the Fleet, under the Custody of Bambridge the Warden, who made an Assault upon him, and contrary to his Will carried him to the House of Corbett, a Victualling-house within the Fleet, and there imprisoned him, where one White then lay ill of the Small-Pox, which Castell had never had; that the Appellees had Notice of this, and were desired to suffer him to remove to another Place in the Prison, which they refused, and afterwards Castell fell ill of the Distemper, and died in Corbett's House; whereby the Court concludes, the Appellees were Guilty of Murder.

Without staying for a Copy of the Declaration, the Appellees instantly plead Not Guilty, and their Plea was rehearsed in French, and Issue joined.

Then it was moved, that the Appellees might be bailed; and, upon Debate, the Court were of Opinion to bail Bambridge, and not Corbett; and the Reason they gave was, that Bambridge had been acquitted, which was a strong Presumption of Innocence; and the Judge before whom he was tried, had certified that he was very well satisfied with the Verdict, and they said they would bail him in all Cases after an Acquittal; and that was the Reason they denied to bail in Slaughterford's Case, because Holt, Chief-Justice, had sent out the Jury again, to consider whether they would stand to their Verdict of Acquittal; and when they insisted upon it, he himself ordered the Appeal.

But as to Corbett, there was no Foundation to bail, for they denied that it was of Course to bail in an Appeal; so Bambridge was bailed by two Persons, Corpus pro Corpore, who justified in 1000*l.* each. And it was agreed, that in an Appeal by Writ, on the Civil Side, two Bail only are required; but had it come on the Crown Side by Certiorari, there must have been four.

Then it was moved to fix a Time for the Trial, the Appellees offering to take short Notice; but it being by Original, there was a Necessity to have fifteen Days between the Teste and the Return of the Distingas, and they could not be tried on the Venire, because being in London, there could be no Trial at Bar, (the Citizens not being to be brought out of the City) and as it must be tried at Nisi Prius, there must be a Distingas.

Towards the latter End of the Term it was moved, that the Appellees might be discharged, there being a Discontinuance, for that no Venire had been taken out; and in Appeals, which are a recent Prosecution, every Delay is a Discontinuance: and Cro. Jac. 283. Yelv. 204. were cited. But upon Consideration the Court held, that it was not necessary to take out the Writ and make it returnable the soonest it might be, though it must bear Teste the Day the Issue is joined; and then the Appellant took out a Venire, Teste 23d October, and returnable the 25th of November, which the Court looked upon as an affected Delay, and therefore admitted the other Appellee, Corbett, to Bail. They said it appeared he might have been tried the Sitting after the Term, and then upon his Acquittal, he must have been instantly discharged by the Judge of Nisi Prius, according to the Statute 14 H. VI. C. 1.

Both being thus out upon Bail, appeared on the several Continuance Days, according to their Recognizance, and the Appellant also appeared; and in the Beginning of this Term the Appellees moved for a Rule on Mr. Tanner, the Officer who keeps the Records at the Old Bailey, to attend the Trial with the Record of Bambridge's Acquittal; he not being allowed a Copy of it. But the Court refused to make any Rule, and said, if it was brought it could be no Evidence. Strange's Reports, Vol. II. 854.

XIII. The Trial of THOMAS BAMBRIDGE, Esq. and RICHARD CORBETT, at Guildhall, London, on an Appeal for the Murder of Mr. Robert Castell, before the Right Hon. the Lord Chief-Justice Raymond, January 26, 1729-30.

Mr. Filmer.

MAY it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the Appellants. This is an Appeal of Murder, brought by Mary Castell, against the Defendants Thomas Bambridge and Richard Corbett, for the Death of her late Husband. The Declaration sets forth, that upon the 14th of November, in the Second Year of his present Majesty, the said Thomas Bambridge was Warden of the Prison of the Fleet, and having the Custody of the Prisoners, did make an Assault, and with Force and Arms, and Malice aforethought, did carry and convey him to a Victualling-house, being the Defendant Corbett's Mansion-house, and did detain him there till the 12th of December, against his Will, and without his Consent; and that one Joseph White was then sick of the Small-Pox, and that Robert Castell had never had the Small-Pox. That on the 16th of November, Robert Castell requested they would not detain him, and gave the Defendants Notice that White was sick of the Small-Pox, and that he Castell had never had the Small-Pox, and that he was afraid of his Death from this Distemper; notwithstanding which, the Defendants imprisoned and detained him from the 16th of November to the 12th of December, and forced him to remain all that Time in the said House: And further sets forth, that on the 4th of December he began to grow sick, and languished to the 12th of the same December, and on the 12th died; so that the Defendants, with Malice aforethought, killed Robert Castell aforesaid, the Husband of the said Mary Castell. To this Declaration the Defendants have pleaded Not Guilty, but if we prove the Facts you will find them Guilty.

Mr. Reeves [afterwards Lord Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas]. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the Widow. This is an Appeal of Murder, brought by her against the two Defendants, Thomas Bambridge and Richard Corbett. Bambridge, Gentlemen, is laid to be Warden of the Fleet, and Corbett a Person that kept a Spunging-house, where Prisoners were sometimes kept. It was for his Advantage to have Prisoners brought to his House, in order to get Money of them. Mr. Castell, Gentlemen, was so unfortunate to become a Prisoner under the Controul of Bambridge, and Bambridge was Head Warden. He came in a Prisoner before Bambridge was Warden, in June 1728, and at that Time Mr. Huggins was Warden; and after being a little Time in Prison, Security was given to Mr. Huggins for Mr. Castell's having the Liberty of the Rules. The first Action was at the Suit of one Waring, for 186*l.* tho' there was only 86*l.* due, and so sworn: another Cause was for 15*l.* at the Suit of another Plaintiff, so that the whole Charge against him then was 86*l.* due to Waring, and 15*l.* due to the other Plaintiff; so that Security was given upon his coming in; there was a Bond entered into by two sufficient Persons in the penal Sum of 200*l.* only; after, further Charges came against him in the Time of Bambridge. We shall shew you the Time when Bambridge became Warden, which was on the 30th of September 1728, in the Second Year of his present Majesty, then it was he was appointed Warden in his own Right, tho' some time before he came in his own Right; on the 30th of September he was sworn in, tho' on the 28th he was Warden, and acted in his own Right. Gentlemen, a little while after Bambridge came to be Warden, a Sum of Money 125*l.* Castell received; after this Money was paid to Castell, Bambridge knowing of it, contrived how to get some of this Money, and Corbett was to go Shares. It was this View of getting something from Castell, that was the Cause of the Demand for farther Security; and it was given: But some other Charges coming in, he gave a Bond for 800*l.* there was one of 200*l.* given before, and now it came to be 800*l.* then there was a third Security demanded, and given for 1000*l.* so that then the three Bonds as Security to the Warden, were 200*l.* 800*l.* and 1000*l.* these together made up the Sum of 2000*l.* for Security to be a true Prisoner to the Warden, and at that Time there was not 400*l.* due; one would have thought that when the Warden had 2000*l.* Security for 400*l.* this would have been sufficient; but that was not the Business intended, there was something farther to be done; for notwithstanding this ample Security, Castell was to be taken up, as they pretended, till he gave farther Security to the Warden, the Defendant Bambridge. Gentlemen, the Time of his being taken up was the 14th of November; the 28th of September Bambridge became Warden, Mr. Castell had then the Liberty of the Rules, and lodged at one Mr. Underwood's in the said Liberty. Corbett he took him up (it becomes them to shew by what Authority), and was for carrying him away; Castell expostulated with Corbett, and asked him by whose Authority he did it? Corbett said he did it by the Direction of the Warden. Gentlemen, when he was taken up, he was carried away from his Lodging, contrary to his Will, to the King's-Arms Tavern, and from thence in the Evening

...from thence, and carried him to the King's Arms Tavern; there he was continued till the Evening, that during his Continuance there, he sent for a Person who will appear here as Witness, who went to the Defendant Bambridge at the Desire of Castell, and he desired him to acquaint Bambridge, that he found there was an Intention of carrying him to Corbett's, and that the Small-Pox was there, and he never had them, and was afraid of catching them, and begged of Bambridge that he would not let him be carried there: The Witness accordingly went to Bambridge, and told him of the Request of Castell, but before he came back Mr. Castell was carried to the House of Corbett, and when he found him there (and was going on) —

Mr. Fazakerley. He found him at the Tavern when he came back.

Mr. Lee. The Difference, Gentlemen, is this, that this Person at the Request of Castell went to Bambridge, and upon his Return (the Fact is that he found Corbett and Castell at the King's Arms Tavern) said, that upon his Application to Bambridge he could get no Answer, no Directions that Castell should not be carried there. Castell, his Fear continued upon him, and the same Witness went next Day to Bambridge, and petitioned for the same thing, but could get no Satisfaction from Bambridge. We have Accounts of several other Applications, but without Answer to the purpose, and particularly one from Castell himself. When Bambridge came to Corbett's House, it was that Castell complained to him himself of the Hardship of being confined there, and desired Bambridge to let him go to his Lodgings with a Keeper, or into the Walls of the Gaol, which he chose much rather, from the Fear he had of catching the Small-Pox: The Answer then given by Bambridge to Castell was, that he should neither go into the Gaol (tho' there was Room enough), or go to that other Place. Gentlemen, it must be under the Fear and Apprehension Castell had of catching the Small-Pox, that he made this Request. How a Man could appear with so much Inhumanity I can't conceive, for Bambridge himself said, upon a time when he was at the Tavern with Castell, that he never saw a Man so much shocked at the Small-Pox; notwithstanding which, when Castell complained to him, and desired to be removed from Corbett's, this was Bambridge's Answer to him then, That he should not go into the Prison or any where else, unless he had a Sum of Money for going.

Gentlemen, the whole of his Charge at this time was under 400*l*. He was committed in June 1728; on the first of December Security was found for no less than 5200*l*. the first Bond was for 200*l*. the next 800*l*. the third 1000*l*. a fourth 1000*l*. and the fifth 2000*l*. Notwithstanding these Bonds were given on the first Day of December, this Man was still continued a Prisoner, and I must submit it to your Lordship, whether he was not continued in such a Manner as to make it Duress. By the Statute of 28 of K. C. II. no Man is to be carried to a Spunging-house without his own Request. He was kept, Gentlemen, in this Place even after the fifth Bond was given three Days, and on the 4th, which was the 4th of December, he took the Distemper. This Gentleman was so much affected with the Hardship of his Case, that he often complained of this Usage, and of Bambridge in particular; and in his last Words, when he lay upon his Death-bed, when it can hardly be imagined, that any thing could come from a Man but Truth, then his constant Declarations were, that his Death was owing to Bambridge.

This, Gentlemen, is the Nature of the Case, and we will beg leave to call our Witnesses, and if they come up to Proof, it must be thought the Widow has done very right; and though Corbett, when he appeared as a Witness, did not give Satisfaction, (I would not say it, if it was not in my Brief) yet probably the Witnesses now called will give you Satisfaction why Corbett did not give Satisfaction.

Call Robert Reading (who was sworn, and produced a Copy of the Patent creating Thomas Bambridge Warden of the Fleet).

Mr. Reeves. Did you examine that? — Mr. Reading. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Is it a true Copy? — Mr. Reading. Yes.

[Then the Clerk read so much of the Copy of the Patent as to prove Mr. Bambridge Warden of the Fleet.]

John Noel (Deputy to the Clerk of the Papers) was sworn, and produced the Commitment-Books of the Fleet Prison.

Mr. Reeves. Do you know that Bambridge acted as Warden of the Fleet Prison? — Mr. Noel. I always apprehended he did act.

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know of the Commitment of Mr. Castell?

Mr. Noel. Yes, it is in that Book (which he had before produced).

[Then the Clerk turned to, and read the Entry in the Book.]

Clerk. Decimo Octavo Die Junii 1728.

Mr. Noel. There are several other Entries (reading again).

Clerk. One Hundred and Eighty Pounds, sworn to be Eighty-six Pounds.

Lord Chief-Justice. The Writ was made for 180*l*. Penalty. Read on.

Clerk. William Thomas.

L. C. J. It is necessary for me to take notice of all the Commitments.

Mr. Strange. To see the Sums before the 14th of November.

Mr. Fazakerley. First is 86*l*.

Mr. Kettleby. 'Tis sworn to 86*l*. and upwards, for that is sufficient to hold to Bail.

L. C. J. How much is that on the 9th of July?

Clerk. The 9th of July is 20*l*.

Mr. Strange. How much that Debt is, don't appear.

L. C. J. Don't go on so fast.

Clerk. — Dis — 212*l*. — George Colvert.

L. C. J. That is another.

Clerk. Another 20*l*. the 13th of October. — Waring 180*l*.

Mr. Fazakerley. That is the same.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. The first appears to be on Bond.

Clerk. There is 180*l*. Principal; 3*l*. 10*s*. Costs.

Mr. Fazakerley. That is the same.

Clerk. Twenty-third of November, — Execution at the Suit of Thomas — 19*l*.

Mr. Strange. He is charged in Execution likewise on Colvert's.

Mr. Reeves. That is after being taken up.

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know Corbett's House?

Mr. Noel. Yes.

Lord Chief-Justice Raymond. What were the last Bonds?

Mr. Reeves. One was for 1000*l*. the other for 2000*l*. Gentlemen, this last Bond was given in the Beginning of December; he was kept in Custody till the Time of giving the fifth Bond, which was the Beginning of December; and notwithstanding the fifth Bond was given, he was kept in Custody three Days after; at last he had some Apprehension of having his Liberty, and upon the 4th of December there was an Order sent to his Lodging, as he had before, to get them ready; but he was disappointed, having thought he had done every thing that was reasonable, but it happened unfortunately, that on the 4th of December having been confined in this House under the Terror of that Distemper, he fell ill, and on the 12th of December died of that Distemper. We say, Gentlemen, that his Death was occasioned by his unlawful Imprisonment, and that the Hardship he suffered was the occasion of his Death. If you shall be of Opinion on the Circumstances, that this Apprehension of him served only to get Money from him, it will be Duress. There is one Witness that heard the Conversation between Castell and Bambridge at Corbett's, and the Witness will tell you, that Castell did expostulate with Bambridge, that he was in danger of his Life, and that he should catch the Distemper and die, and desired then to be carried to the Prison or any other Place, and not to be in the Place where his Life was in so much danger; and his Answer was, that he should neither go into the Prison, nor to such Place, without such a sum of Money; it was not to get Security as before. If we prove this to be the case, we prove the Declaration, and you must find the Defendants Guilty.

Mr. Lee [afterwards Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench]. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the Appellant. This poor Woman has for some time staid, in hopes to see that this Affair would have appeared in a true and just Light at a former Trial, had against one of the Prisoners, in which the other Prisoner who now appears here, was examined as Witness. The Appellant waited with great Satisfaction, under a Belief that the Truth of the Fact would have appeared at that Trial, and did not commence her Appeal, nor would she if she could have received Satisfaction on the former Trial. Gentlemen, she did not receive that, and therefore was at liberty to bring her Appeals; for, by the Statute of Harry VII. it is provided, that notwithstanding any Prisoner is tried and acquitted, that the Party Appellant has a Right to a full and entire Examination into the Fact. That Act of Harry has preserved that Right, notwithstanding he was before acquitted; and, as I apprehend, the Affair now stands as open as if nothing had been done. This being the case, the Matter, Gentlemen, for your Consideration will be, how far, by the Witnesses, we are able to satisfy you in respect to your Apprehension of the Manner of her Husband's coming to his Death. It has been opened to you, Gentlemen, that Mr. Castell was a Prisoner in the Fleet, and that the Defendant Bambridge was acting Warden in June 1728; the Defendant, Corbett, was by his Office a Tipstaff, and as such was under the Direction of the Warden. When Prisoners are out upon the Rules, the Tipstaff is the proper Officer for taking them into the Fleet, and that to be under the Warden's Direction, and Corbett was such a Tipstaff. This Castell being committed in June 1728, (he was a Gentleman that lived in good Figure) did procure Security in July, and a Bond was given in the Penalty of 200*l*. and another 800*l*. and a third 1000*l*. Gentlemen, he was out of Gaol upon this Security, and the Warden was satisfied as to his being abroad, but on the 14th of November he was taken up. On the 3d of October before this, Gentlemen, he received a Sum of 125*l*.; on the 22d of October, according to my Instructions, this came to the Knowledge of the Defendant Bambridge, then came these Demands of fresh Security; it was very likely the Means to insist upon having Money in hand or fresh Security; notwithstanding this, upon the 14th of November, Corbett came to his

Mr. Penakerley. What kind of a House is it? Were the Prisoners kept there by Bambridge's Order?

Mr. Noel. I was there Prisoner from the 23d of October for two Months, and never saw any Thing exacting, but very humane.

Mr. Penakerley. Is it not a public Victualling-house?

Mr. Noel. They have Victuals and Drink.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. This is very material. I will ask you a Question or two, you was at Corbett's two Months?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. I ask you whether you found any Exaction or Oppression?

Mr. Noel. I never found any to any body, but they visited Mr. Castell with a deal of Respect and Humanity.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. When was you carried there?

Mr. Noel. The 23d of October, 1728.

Lord Chief-Justice. How long did you remain there?

Mr. Noel. I staid there till the 19th of December.

Lord Chief-Justice. Was this one of the Houses that always remained to the Warden as Part of the Gaol?

Mr. Noel. My Lord, I have heard so.

Lord Chief-Justice. Was you at Corbett's House all the Time Mr. Castell was there?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Lord Chief-Justice. Do you know the Time of his taking his Illness?

Mr. Noel. He was taken ill on the 4th of December, and died on the 12th.

Lord Chief-Justice. Do you remember Joseph White?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Lord Chief-Justice. Were they in the same House?

Mr. Noel. No, my Lord; White lay up three Pair of Stairs in one House, and Mr. Castell one Pair of Stairs in the other.

Lord Chief-Justice. I ask you if White was ever suffered to come down Stairs?

Mr. Noel. I have heard express Orders, that White should never come down, and nobody go up to him, for fear any body should catch it.

Lord Chief-Justice. I ask you, according to the best of your Observation, whether he ever came out of his Room?

Mr. Noel. I believe he never did, except one Time; and then he came to speak to me.

Lord Chief-Justice. Was Castell there then?

Mr. Noel. No, my Lord; I believe he never was nearer to him than my Room.

Mr. Strange. I desire he may describe the Situation of Corbett's House.

Mr. Noel. There are two Houses laid into one.

Mr. Strange. Where did White lie?

Mr. Noel. White lay three Pair of Stairs in one House, and Mr. Castell one Pair of Stairs in the other.

Mr. Strange. When did Mr. Castell first come to Corbett's?

Mr. Noel. Castell first came into Corbett's the 14th of November.

Mr. Fazakerley. My Lord, if they ask Questions to a particular Point, I hope they will not examine him to different Facts.

Lord Chief-Justice. I cannot interrupt them; you will have an Opportunity to reply: They are intitled to it.—Where did Castell lie?

Mr. Noel. Mr. Castell lay in one House, up one Pair of Stairs, and White in the other, up three Pair of Stairs.

Lord Chief-Justice. When did Mr. Castell come to Corbett's?

Mr. Noel. The 14th Day of November.

Mr. Strange. How long was White well before Castell came there?

Mr. Noel. He never had been down, but I believe he might have come down.

Mr. Strange. Did White continue up Stairs all the Time Mr. Castell was there?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Mr. Strange. What was the Reason of his being kept there? There might be other People that had not had them. Did you ever see White come down during that Time?

Mr. Noel. White came down two or three great Stairs.

Mr. Strange. Who took care of Mr. Castell?

Mr. Noel. Corbett and his Spouse.

Mr. Strange. During the Time he was ill, did he complain?

Mr. Noel. He never complained for any Thing, but said he was very uneasy at having the Small-Pox.

Mr. Strange. Who took care of him?

Mr. Noel. All the Family took care of him.

Mr. Strange. Did you ever see Bambridge in Company with Mr. Castell at Corbett's?

Mr. Noel. I never saw Mr. Bambridge in Company with Mr. Castell, but Mr. Corbett I have.

Mr. Strange. Was there a Club there?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Did you see Bambridge and Castell together at that Club?

Mr. Noel. No.

Mr. Strange. Where did Castell lie?

Mr. Noel. Castell lay in a Room by himself; he had a Room fitted up on purpose.

Mr. Kettleby. Do you know whether when Mr. Castell's Wife was sent to, she did come to him, or not?

Mr. Noel. I have heard Corbett say, that his Widow was sent to, but did not come.

Lord Chief-Justice. That is no Evidence.

Mr. Kettleby. Do you suppose you should have seen her if she had come?

Mr. Noel. I should have seen the Woman.

Mr. Kettleby. What Sort of a Room was Mr. Castell in?

Mr. Noel. A very convenient Room, very near as big as this Court.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. How came Mr. Castell first to be brought to Corbett's?

Mr. Noel. The Body of Castell was surrendered, his Security told me so.

Lord Chief-Justice. That is not Evidence.

Mr. Lee. Was you frequently with White?

Mr. Noel. No; only that Time.

Mr. Lee. Was Mr. Castell taken ill before or after that Time?

Mr. Noel. I cannot tell whether he was sick before or after.

Mr. Lee. Did you use to be with Mr. Castell?—Mr. Noel. Sometimes.

Mr. Lee. Was you with Castell the same Day you saw White?

Mr. Noel. I cannot recollect whether I saw Castell the same Day or not.

Mr. Lee. Was there one or two Stair-Cases?

Mr. Noel. There were two Houses laid into one, but one Stair-Cafe.

Mr. Lee. Was not the Passage near Castell's Room?

Mr. Noel. The Passage comes by the Head of the Stair-Cafe?

Mr. Lee. Must not all those that go to the Newbery-Block go by Castell's Room?—Mr. Noel. Yes.

Call ——— Sinclair was called and sworn.

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know Corbett's House?

Capt. Sinclair. Upon the 14th of December, 1727.

Mr. Fazakerley. Sir, do you know this House of Corbett's?

Capt. Sinclair. Yes.

Mr. Fazakerley. Was you there in September, October, November, or December, 1728?

Capt. Sinclair. I was not brought in then, I was fifty-two Days at Corbett's House.

Mr. Fazakerley. How was you used then?

Capt. Sinclair. I must submit it to the Court, whether, as I have a Prosecution against Bambridge, what I may say may not prejudice myself; whether any Thing I say now may not be prejudicial to me.

Lord Chief-Justice. It is impossible for me to tell you. If you say any Thing that they can make use of, without doubt they will.

Mr. Bambridge. I desire, my Lord, the People may be kept from the Witnesses behind.

Lord Chief-Justice. If you hear any body prompt the Witnesses, they shall be removed.

Mr. Filmer. We desire to know what Sort of a House Corbett's is?

Capt. Sinclair. I was carried to Mr. Corbett's House contrary to my Inclinations; when I was there I was put in a Garret, with some of the Domestics.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. It is not proper Evidence.

Lord Chief-Justice. Let me know what it is; I don't know whether it is material or not.

Mr. Lee. My Lord, the Witness is come to give you an Account of this House; that it is a Victualling-House.

Capt. Sinclair. It is a Victualling-house and Spunging-house, and they take exorbitant Sums of Money. I was there from the 14th of December, 1727, till the 3d of February following.

Lord Chief-Justice. I think you say it was a public Victualling-house and Spunging-house?—Capt. Sinclair. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Reeves. I desire you'll inform my Lord and the Jury, whether it is continued the same Sort of House since?

Capt. Sinclair. There was one Blackwell there.

Lord Chief-Justice. When was that?

Capt. Sinclair. In the Month of January, 1727.

Lord Chief-Justice. That is not Evidence. Do you know nothing of this House since 1727?

Capt. Sinclair. Since I have been discharged I have not been in the house; but when I was there, I was obliged to pay one Shilling a Night for a Bed.

Lord Chief-Justice. That was a very wrong Thing, but that was in 1727?

Capt. Sinclair. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Let me ask you one Question. You call it a Victualling-house and a Spunging-house; what is a Spunging-house?

Capt. Sinclair. Those that take exorbitant Fees.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Did you pay any Thing above the Fees?

Lord Chief-Justice. This is no Evidence in point of Time: You all know Evidence, and should keep to it.

Call ——— Wilson (who was sworn).

Mr. Reeves. Do you know Corbett's House?—Mr. Wilson. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. What Sort of a House is it?

Mr. Wilson. It is a Public-house.

Mr. Reeves. What do they sell there?

Mr. Wilson. Beer, Ale, Cyder, Wine, Punch, and Victuals.

Mr. Reeves. Was the House used for that Purpose when Mr. Castell was there?—Mr. Wilson. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. You know Castell was there?—Mr. Wilson. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Was it then made use of for this Purpose?

Mr. Wilson. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Where had Mr. Castell Victuals and Drink?

Mr. Wilson. In that House.

Mr. Reeves. Do you know the Situation of the Room where Mr. Castell lay?—Mr. Wilson. Very well.

Mr. Reeves. Do you know the Room where White was in?

Mr. Wilson. No.

Mr. Fazakerley. How much did he (Mr. Castell) pay a Night for his Bed?—Mr. Wilson. Mr. Castell told me ———

Mr. Strange. That is not Evidence. Had he a Room up one Pair of Stairs?—Mr. Wilson. The latter Part of his Time.

Mr. Strange. Was you with him often?

Mr. Wilson. Yes, till he had the Small-Pox.

Mr. Strange. Did his Wife come near him during the Time he was ill?

Mr. Wilson. No.

Lord Chief-Justice. If you are examining the Witnesses, I cannot hear. Then Mr. Strange asked the Witness some Question, which for the Noise in the Court was not heard.

Lord Chief-Justice. If you ask any Question, you must propose it to the Court.

Mr. Strange. Was you Servant to Mr. Castell?—Mr. Wilson. No.

Mr. Strange. Was you his Companion?

Mr. Wilson. Yes; and drank several Bottles of Wine with him; and I have heard Mr. Castell say, that Cambridge and Corbett were all Rogues alike.

Call ——— Collett (who was sworn).

Mr. Filmer. Do you know Mr. Castell?—Mr. Collett. Yes.

Mr. Filmer. Did you know of any Money he received?

Mr. Collett. Yes, 125*l*.

Mr. Filmer. When?—Mr. Collett. The 3d of October, 1728.

Mr. Filmer. Do you know of Cambridge being privy to it?

Mr. Collett. I believe he was; Mr. Castell told me so.

Mr. Kettleby. My Lord, that is no Evidence.

Mr. Filmer. Do you know of your own Knowledge that he knew of it?

Mr. Collett. No.

Mr. Lee. Where was this 125*l*. paid to Mr. Castell?

Mr. Collett. It was paid at Woodward's.

Mr. Lee. Where was Woodward's?

Mr. Lee. I saw a Draft.
 Mr. Lee. When was Woodward's?
 Mr. Lee. In Bank Alley; I thought all the World knew that.
 Mr. Lee. So Woodward paid it?—Mr. Collett. I don't know.
 Lord Chief Justice. I thought you had actually paid the Money to Mr. Collett?—Mr. Collett. I gave a Draft on Woodward.
 Mr. Lee. Was that allowed on Account, do you know?—Mr. Collett. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. You don't know what Hands it was paid into at Woodward's?—Mr. Collett. No.
 Mr. Strange. What Reason have you to believe Bambridge knew of it?
 Mr. Collett. Because I had some Difficulty in paying the Money; there was Mr. Brent, Mr. Alderman Preston, Mr. Kirley, and myself, and we were under some Difficulty, and Castell desired that one of us would go up to Bambridge; upon which Mr. Brent went up, and desired to know if he might pay the Money with Safety; then Brent came down, and gave us Satisfaction, and I paid the Money.
 Mr. Strange. The Force of their Argument is, that as soon as Bambridge knew that he had received this Money, then he pressed him to give fresh Security. If he did not know that he had Money; that Argument will not hold. How was the Note drawn?
 Mr. Collett. To Robert Castell, or Bearer.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Who was the Note payable to?
 Mr. Collett. It was payable to Mr. Robert Castell or Bearer, on Demand.
 Mr. Fazakerley. And this was allowed in Account to you by Woodward?
 Mr. Collett. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. You don't know that it came to Castell's Hands?
 Mr. Collett. No, any Porter might go and receive it.
 Mr. Lee. To whom was the Note delivered?
 Mr. Collett. To Mr. Castell.
 Lord Chief Justice. I went away with it at first as if Castell had received it.
 Mr. Lee. Brent was the Man that went up to Bambridge.
 Mr. Strange. Prove something or other.
 Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, I never had one Shilling of him.
 (Call Mr. ——— Brent, who was sworn.)
 Mr. Fazakerley. Was you present when Mr. Collett drew a Bill upon Woodward, payable to Mr. Castell?—Mr. Brent. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know of any body that went to Bambridge, and what was said?
 Mr. Brent. Sir, I was jealous of Mr. Castell's Circumstances, and I asked Mr. Bambridge if there was any Judgment or Execution against Mr. Castell? and Bambridge told me he was in upon Mesne Process.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Did you at any Time tell him the Occasion of asking that Question?
 Mr. Brent. It is very possible I might give him some Hints, but I cannot be positive.
 Mr. Fazakerley. I desire you will recollect; it was very natural for you to speak to Bambridge, did you mention any Thing of that Money?
 Mr. Brent. I cannot say.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Did Bambridge speak to you concerning it?
 Mr. Brent. I cannot remember that he did.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Did you give him any Reasons for asking the Question?
 Mr. Brent. It is possible I might tell him some Reasons.
 Mr. Fazakerley. I desire you'll acquaint my Lord, whether Bambridge appeared to be assisting to Mr. Castell in that Affair, or have you Reason to believe him so?
 Mr. Brent. I cannot say, unless to satisfy me, I asked Mr. Castell several Questions, and Castell said, if I would ask Bambridge he would satisfy me.
 Mr. Lee. When you went up to Bambridge, when you went to enquire after Castell's Circumstances, what did you say to Bambridge?
 Mr. Brent. I have answered that Question, I cannot be positive, to be particular I cannot.
 Mr. Lee. Where was Mr. Castell then?
 Mr. Brent. I do believe Mr. Castell was with the other Company.
 Mr. Lee. Where was Bambridge, was he with the other Company?
 Mr. Brent. I believe he was not, I don't remember he was in the other Company.
 Lord Chief Justice. Was he in the same Room?
 Mr. Brent. I don't believe he was.
 Lord Chief Justice. Did you go out of that Room into another Room to Bambridge?
 Mr. Brent. I don't believe either Mr. Collett or Preston went out of the Room, but I went myself.
 Mr. Strange. Did you not go up Stairs?
 Mr. Brent. I can't say whether it was in the same Stair-case, or not; I did ask Bambridge, and he did satisfy me.
 Mr. Strange. Did you ask Bambridge if it was safe to pay Mr. Castell any Money?
 Mr. Brent. I can't be certain it was the whole I said, probably I might tell him I was negotiating the Concern.
 Mr. Fazakerley. It will follow most naturally, that the further Bonds were demanded on Purpose to extort Money. Now we shall shew, that Security was given from Time to Time, and in order to that we had given Notice to Bambridge to produce the Bonds.
 Mr. Strange. You know the other Day in the Court of Chancery it was over-ruled.
 Mr. Reeves. Here are Bonds given as a Security to a private Person; we demand the Bonds, and the Proof lies upon them to shew they have delivered them over.
 Mr. Lee. We ought to be let into Parole-evidence, to shew that we gave Notice to produce them.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. I think you are too early.
 (Then Mr. Bendon was sworn.)
 Mr. Lee. Did you give Bambridge any Notice to deliver the Bonds?
 Mr. Bendon. Yes, I have a Copy of it in my Hand.
 Mr. Lee. What did Bambridge say to you?
 Mr. Bendon. Bambridge told me he had but one in his Custody.
 Mr. Strange. Were not the Words, that he had only one executed?
 Mr. Bendon. No.
 Mr. Strange. Tell us the very Words.

Mr. Bendon. When I gave Bambridge that very Paper (which he had then delivered to the Council)—
 Lord Chief Justice. That Paper—it must be produced.
 Mr. Lee. We desire to produce this Paper.
 Mr. Bendon. Bambridge said, to prevent any Disputes in Court, I have but one Bond.
 Mr. Strange. Who was by?—Mr. Bendon. Several.
 Mr. Strange. Did you know any of them?
 Mr. Bendon. There was one Beatniff, that was one of his Security.
 Mr. Strange. How many were there in all?—Mr. Bendon. Five or six.
 (Then the Paper was given into the Hands of the Clerk.)
 Lord Chief Justice. Read.
 Clerk. I do hereby give Notice, to produce on the Trial of this Cause, several Bonds entered into by the Appellant's Husband, or his several Securities, taken by you as Warden of the Fleet, or by the Clerk of the Securities, and particularly two Bonds, dated about November or December, 1728.
 Mr. Lee. Now we will call Peter Ellam. Somebody acted in the Room of Hopkins, who was Clerk of the Securities, and took a Bond wherein Peter Ellam was one of the Securities.
 (Call Peter Ellam, who was sworn.)
 Mr. Reeves. Do you know what Security was given by Mr. Castell to the Warden of the Fleet?—Mr. Ellam. I do.
 Mr. Reeves. Was you one?—Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Reeves. Give an Account of the several Securities you knew given, the Times when, and the Sums.
 Mr. Ellam. Security was given five Times, one in July.
 Mr. Reeves. When was the first?—Mr. Ellam. In July, 1728.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How much was the Sum?—Mr. Ellam. I think 1000.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How much was the Penalty of the Bond?
 Mr. Ellam. I think it was 2000.
 Mr. Reeves. Who was that given to?
 Mr. Ellam. It was given to Hopkins.
 Mr. Reeves. Who was Warden?—Mr. Ellam. Mr. Huggins.
 Mr. Reeves. Who was Deputy-warden?
 Mr. Ellam. I do not know, I believe Bambridge.
 Mr. Reeves. Was there any other Security besides yourself? Who was the Bond given by?—Mr. Ellam. By Mr. Chambers and myself.
 Mr. Reeves. Pray, mind what I ask you. The next Bond was given, how soon?—Mr. Ellam. I believe in about four or five Days.
 Mr. Reeves. How much was that for?
 Mr. Ellam. Eight Hundred Pounds.
 Mr. Reeves. Who were put in that?
 Mr. Ellam. Mr. Curll, Mr. Chambers, and myself.
 Mr. Reeves. There was a third Bond, do you know any thing of that? Who was that given by?
 Mr. Ellam. It was given by Curll, myself, and I believe Mr. Bell.
 Mr. Reeves. Pray recollect yourself, do not be under any Mistake.
 Mr. Ellam. Mr. Curll and myself I am positive of.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Can you be positive of a third Bond; was there three?
 Mr. Ellam. I believe there was, and I signed with him.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How much was the third for?
 Mr. Ellam. The third was for 1000 l.
 Mr. Fazakerley. The third, when was that?
 Mr. Ellam. I can't remember the particular Time.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How long before Mr. Castell died?
 Mr. Ellam. A great while.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Was it before or after making the 4th Bond that he was taken ill?—Mr. Ellam. I believe it was after.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How long after?
 Mr. Ellam. I believe about the Beginning of the Term.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Then that must be in October.—Was there any more?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How much was that for?
 Mr. Ellam. I think the fourth was for 1000 l.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Don't you know that it was for 1000 l?
 Mr. Ellam. I believe it was.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Who entered into that Bond?
 Mr. Ellam. There was Mr. Curll, Mr. Bell, and myself.
 Mr. Fazakerley. When was that given?
 Mr. Ellam. That was given the latter End of November.
 Mr. Fazakerley. You say that was for 1000 l.—Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. You seemed to say something of a fifth Bond being given, how much was that for?—Mr. Ellam. Two Thousand Pounds.
 Mr. Fazakerley. How do you know?
 Mr. Ellam. I was present at reading it, and I took it to be 2000 l.
 Mr. Fazakerley. When was that given?
 Mr. Ellam. On the first of December.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Do you believe it was the 5th or 1st of December?
 Mr. Ellam. I believe it was on a Monday.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Who were bound?
 Mr. Ellam. There was Mr. Curll, my Brother, and myself.
 Mr. Fazakerley. What is your Brother's Name?—Mr. Ellam. John Ellam.
 Mr. Fazakerley. What was the Reason of all these Bonds being given so quick? When was the last Bond given?
 Mr. Ellam. One was given between the 24th and 25th of November, on a Saturday Night, then Mr. Castell was going to his Lodgings, and in two or three Days we went to see him, but could not find him, and they said he was at Corbett's, and we went to him there.
 Lord Chief Justice. When was this? Name the Time.
 Mr. Ellam. It was about the latter End of November, between the 26th and the last.
 Lord Chief Justice. Go on.
 Mr. Ellam. I said, Mr. Castell, what do you do here? You love a Gaol better than I do; what do you do here; what is the Reason of it? Mr. Castell said, I do not know, it is what Bambridge pleases. I said, Mr. Castell, surely your Luck is worse than any body's.
 Mr. Strange. Was Bambridge by?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Strange. Then you may hold your Tongue.

Mr.

Mr. Fazakerley. What were the Bonds given for?
 Mr. Ellam. His Liberty.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Had he his Liberty before the last Bond was given?
 Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Fazakerley. I ask you whether he had his Liberty upon the last Bond's being given?
 Mr. Ellam. No, he never was out after.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know when he first took his Sickness?
 Mr. Ellam. He first took his Sickness on a Monday Morning, the first of December.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Was you a Creditor to Mr. Castell?
 Mr. Ellam. He owed me near 200 l.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Then you was his Security and Creditor at the same Time?
 Mr. Ellam. I knew him to be as industrious a Man as any one living, and that there was no Probability of getting any thing in a Gaol, so thought it was better to run the hazard.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. Did you never apply to have him locked up?
 Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. Do you know of any one else?
 Mr. Ellam. No, I never was present.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. Do you know of the Design of his Security to put him into Prison?
 Mr. Ellam. Not that I know of, it was never mine.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. Did Bambridge never intreat you to continue Security for him?
 Mr. Ellam. All that I know relating to that Matter is, that Chambers withdrew his Security.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. What did Bambridge do to Chambers to have him stand as one of his Security?
 Mr. Ellam. Chambers withdrew his Security.
 Mr. Bambridge. I don't look upon that to be a proper Answer.
 Lord Chief-Justice. You must answer the Question.
 Mr. Ellam. Mr. Chappell was coming to me to tell me that Mr. Chambers would deliver him up, for that if he went out of the Rules, his Counsel advised him that the Security was liable, and I went along with Chambers to Bambridge, and Chambers told Bambridge that he would be Security no longer; upon this Mr. Castell was very uneasy, and Chambers upon cooler Thoughts determined not to give up his Security.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. I ask you whether Mr. Bambridge did not desire Mr. Bell to continue his Security?
 Mr. Ellam. Mr. Bambridge talked very civilly at that Time.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. I ask you whether Mr. Bambridge appeared to have a Kindness for him?
 Mr. Ellam. Bambridge told Mr. Castell, that if his Security delivered him up, he must go to Corbett's.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. What did you do when Chambers said he would not be Security?
 Mr. Ellam. When Chambers told me he would not be Security any longer, it lay upon myself, and I went down to the Tavern then, and told them I was resolved to stand.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. I ask you whether Mr. Bambridge persuaded you to stand, or said that he should be put into the Gaol?
 Mr. Ellam. It did appear to me that Bambridge was civil to him.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. When was this?
 Mr. Ellam. This was before the 4th or 5th Bonds were given.
 Mr. Strange. This was after the Bonds for 800 l. and 1000 l. Tell us whether Mr. Castell did not desire that a Bed might be got there?
 Mr. Ellam. I did not know of his going there.
 Mr. Strange. Pray did not you desire Corbett to take him in Custody?
 Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Strange. Was you by at any other Time?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Fix the Time; hark you, Sir, do you remember the Time when Chambers would not continue Security, I ask you if you can remember when it was?
 Mr. Ellam. I believe it was in November.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. You say you cannot be positive as to the Day of the Month.
 Mr. Ellam. I tell you fairly, that by the Almanack it was on Monday; if Mr. Castell died that Day Se'nnight, it was Monday Se'nnight before that.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. How long after you executed the Bond, how many Days was it before he died?
 Mr. Ellam. It must be Wednesday or Thursday.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. You say Monday the Bond was executed?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes, it must be the first Monday, if he died on the 12th.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. Who were the Bonds given before? Or to whom?
 Was Mr. Bambridge present?
 Mr. Ellam. I never saw Bambridge present when they were given.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. Do you know whether you was excepted to, or remain there till better Security was given?
 Mr. Ellam. I don't know.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. Who was there?
 Mr. Ellam. Codnor was there who acted as Clerk.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. Were you all present when the fourth Bond was given?
 Mr. Ellam. To the best of my Remembrance, we were all present when the fourth Bond was given.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. What say you as to the fifth?
 Mr. Ellam. As to the fifth, I believe that all the Persons were not then present.
 Mr. Serj. Eyre. You can't tell that either of you was excepted to?
 Mr. Ellam. I know no other than as Bambridge told me.
 Mr. Wynn. You said you was uneasy when Chambers said he would not stand; what did you do then?
 Mr. Ellam. I did nothing then, but went home, and next Morning resolved to stand.
 Mr. Wynn. Did you say any thing to Mr. Corbett or Bambridge?
 Mr. Ellam. No; when I went to Mr. Bambridge's Room, I went with a Design to surrender him; and when I came out, seeing Mr. Castell in so great an Agony, I resolved then not to do it.
 Mr. Wynn. What did Mr. Bambridge say?
 Mr. Ellam. He said, he believed that Mr. Castell always behaved himself within Bounds, and believed that we had no Reason to complain; and believed he would not make an Escape.

Mr. Wynn. Did he encourage you to surrender him?
 Mr. Ellam. All that he said at this Time seemed to encourage us to stand as Security.
 Mr. Wynn. When Chambers would not stand, did you take any Counter-security from any one?
 Mr. Ellam. There was a Note drawn, but I never had it; Mr. Curll had the Custody of it.
 Mr. Wynn. What was the Amount?—Mr. Ellam. I believe 100 l.
 Mr. Wynn. I ask you, whether you had not a Bill of Sale from Mr. Castell at that Time?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Wynn. How long before?
 Mr. Ellam. I can't tell the Date; I have it by me.
 Mr. Wynn. Had you not that Bill of Sale before you executed that first Security?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Wynn. Was it between the First and Second?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Wynn. The Second and Third?—Mr. Ellam. Very likely it might.
 Mr. Wynn. What Month do you believe it was in?
 Mr. Ellam. November.
 Mr. Strange. Do you say the Bill of Sale was in November?
 Mr. Ellam. I can't say particularly.
 Mr. Strange. Might it not be before November?
 Mr. Ellam. I don't believe it was.
 Mr. Strange. Can you take upon you to say whether before or not?
 Mr. Ellam. I cannot.
 Mr. Strange. I desire you to see, whether that is your Name; look only on the Name.—Mr. Ellam. I take it to be my Name.
 Mr. Lee. Give it to the Officer.
 Mr. Strange. Then you are not able to say exactly the Day when Bambridge gave you Encouragement not to deliver him up; Was it before the fourth Bond was given?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. There was Curll; was he a Man of Substance?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes; he has been a Housekeeper these forty Years.
 Mr. Strange. Is his Reputation to be a Man of Circumstance?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. There were Bell and others?—Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. Were they Men of good Circumstances?
 Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. There was your Brother?—Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. Were they Housekeepers?—Mr. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. Were they able to answer the Sums they stood bound for?
 Mr. Ellam. The World thinks so.
 Mr. Strange. What will you say you are worth over and above your Debts?
 Mr. Ellam. One Thousand Pounds.
 Mr. Strange. When your Debts are paid?
 Mr. Ellam. The last Time my Books were cast up, I was worth One Thousand Pounds.
 Mr. Strange. Did you say you was not worth 200 l. when in Company with Bambridge?—Mr. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Lee. 'Tis a Question enough to put any Man out of Countenance.
 Lord Chief-Justice. No Man should be obliged to discover his own Affairs.
 Call John Ellam (who was sworn).
 Mr. Lee. You was Security for Mr. Castell to Mr. Bambridge, Warden of the Fleet?—Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Lee. When was it?—Mr. J. Ellam. In November last.
 Mr. Lee. Who was Security with you?
 Mr. J. Ellam. My Brother Peter Ellam and Mr. Curll.
 Mr. Lee. What was the Penalty of the Bond?
 Mr. J. Ellam. Two Thousand Pounds.
 Mr. Strange. He only says what Mr. Castell said.
 Lord Chief-Justice. He said it of his own Knowledge.
 Mr. Lee. When was the Bond executed?
 Mr. J. Ellam. I believe in November.
 Mr. Lee. You can't tell positively?—Mr. J. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Lee. Might it not be the Beginning of December?
 Mr. J. Ellam. I can't exactly tell.
 Mr. Lee. Who was the Bond executed by?
 Mr. J. Ellam. Myself and two others; I signed first, and the other two at Gravesend.
 Mr. Lee. Was you with Bambridge to tell him about it?
 Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Lee. How came you to be his Security?
 Mr. J. Ellam. Mr. Castell sent to me to know if I would be Security in the Room of Mr. Chambers; I said it was a Thing I did not care for, but for him I would; this was in the Morning. Mr. Castell said, You will be Security? I said, Yes. And he said, I don't know whether Bambridge will accept of it; I beg you'll come at Night. I told him I would: I think Bambridge would not then accept of it. One Mr. Shortes was there at Night, and Mr. Castell desired he would go to Mr. Bambridge to desire the Bonds to be executed for him.
 Mr. Lee. When was Mr. Castell taken ill?
 Mr. J. Ellam. Mr. Castell was very ill in November and December.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Where was this?—Mr. J. Ellam. At Corbett's.
 Mr. Lee. Did you go to Bambridge?—Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.
 Mr. Lee. What did you say?
 Mr. J. Ellam. I asked him, whether he thought my Security sufficient in the Room of Mr. Chambers? And Mr. Bambridge said he would accept of it.
 Mr. Lee. Did you execute before your Brother?
 Mr. J. Ellam. I believe I did before Mr. Curll; and Mr. Bell executed, I believe, after.
 Mr. Lee. What was the Sum?—Mr. J. Ellam. Two Thousand Pounds.
 Mr. Lee. Was it Two Thousand? How do you know? Was it in Latin or English?
 Mr. J. Ellam. The Attorney read it; and Mr. Castell told me so.
 Mr. Lee. Was there any Person in the Bond before you signed?
 Mr. J. Ellam. There was only Mr. Curll, my Brother, and myself.
 Mr. Lee. I ask you whether there was any more besides you, your Brother, and Mr. Curll?—Mr. J. Ellam. No.
 Mr. Lee. How many Names were there in the Bond?
 Mr. J. Ellam. None but mine, my Brother, and Curll.
 Mr. Lee. How many Obligors? Do you know what I mean by Obligors?
 Mr.

Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.

Mr. Lee. Then I ask you, How many Persons Names there were besides these?—Mr. J. Ellam. There was mine, my Brother's, and Curll's.

L. C. J. That he said before.

Mr. Lee. When you was sent to Mr. Bambridge, Mr. Castell seemed very impatient to have the Bonds executed; did he complain of any extraordinary Usage?—Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.

Mr. Lee. What did he complain of?

Mr. J. Ellam. I asked him, what made him uneasy? He said, they would not let him out. Then I asked him, what was the Reason? He made answer, I suppose they want more Money of me.

Mr. Lee. Try! Name them. Can you name any body?

Mr. Ellam. I asked him again, Have you given any Money? He said, Yes, I have. I said, Pray how much have you given? He made Answer, About ten Pounds.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. What he said is not Evidence.

Mr. Fazakerley. What he said upon his Death-bed, I apprehend, is Evidence; which is what we shall examine him next to.

L. C. J. That is according to the Nature of the Question; what is declared as an actual Fact, is.

Mr. Faz. Had you any Discourse with Mr. Castell, when he lay on his Death-bed, what was the Occasion of his Death?

L. C. J. [Speaking to the Witness.] Don't be in a Hurry, take time, speak out.

Mr. J. Ellam. He asked me, what I thought the Distemper might be? I said, I cannot tell. The Doctor went down with me; what he said to the Doctor was, I am very ill.

Mr. Strange. This was before he was very ill?

Mr. Faz. When he lay in his Extremity?

L. C. J. Was he near his Death?

Mr. Faz. Did he say any thing what was the Occasion of his Death, when in Extremity?

Mr. J. Ellam. He said upon his dying Bed, that Mr. Bambridge, in not letting him go, was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Faz. Did he know the Distemper he died of?

Mr. J. Ellam. No.

Mr. Faz. How long after the Small-Pox came out?

Mr. J. Ellam. A Day or two.

Mr. Faz. How long did he live after?—Mr. J. Ellam. About—

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Had he an Apprehension of dying before the Distemper came out?

Mr. J. Ellam. He said, if they did not let him out it would be too late, for it would be his Death.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. This was before the Distemper came out?

Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Did he know of this Distemper being there? Was he apprehensive of this Distemper?

Mr. J. Ellam. He said, if it was in any Village of any County, he would go another Way.

L. C. J. Did he know it was in the House there?—Mr. J. Ellam. Yes.

L. C. J. When was this?

Mr. Faz. The Bonds will shew; must not they produce them?

L. C. J. They must produce them, or give some Reason why they don't.

Mr. Strange. The two first were given in Mr. Huggins's Time, I don't know any thing of the other three. Bambridge was sworn the fifteenth of November, so that three were given in Mr. Huggins's Time, and two only in his—I am afraid it is a civil Action.

Mr. Lee. The Action is in a criminal Cause.

L. C. J. What do you think this is? The mixt Action is no Part of the Appeal; it is certainly a criminal Cause.

Mr. Reeves. We give it up, if we don't give sufficient Evidence after.

L. C. J. Can you go no further to fix it on him?

Mr. Reeves. We can prove that Codnor acted as Clerk of the Securities, in behalf of Hopkins.

L. C. J. What was Hopkins?

Mr. Reeves. Hopkins was Clerk of the Papers, and not being well, employed one Codnor, who proves that Peter Ellam entered into several Bonds.

L. C. J. You say he was not sworn in till the 15th of November, the Patent bears Date the 30th of October; let John Ellam be called again, he was the last Witness.

Mr. Reeves. If your Lordship pleases, we will call Peter Ellam, for he executed all the Bonds.

Then Mr. Peter Ellam was again called.

Mr. Reeves. When you executed these Bonds, who was present, and assisted in behalf of the Warden?

Mr. P. Ellam. Hopkins was to the two first, Codnor to the three last.

Mr. Reeves. Who did Codnor act for?

Mr. P. Ellam. I always understood he acted for Hopkins.

Mr. Reeves. Who did you think was the Clerk?

Mr. P. Ellam. I thought Hopkins.

Mr. Reeves. What was the Reason he was not there?

Mr. P. Ellam. It was reported he was sick.

Mr. Reeves. Who was the Bond delivered to?

Mr. P. Ellam. To Codnor.

L. C. J. Who was allowed to be the Master?

Mr. P. Ellam. Bambridge.

Mr. Faz. Was it so in the three last?

Mr. P. Ellam. I think so.

Mr. Faz. Was Codnor there when the last Bond was given?

Mr. P. Ellam. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. What Bonds do you speak to?

Mr. P. Ellam. The third and fourth, and I think the last.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. How many were bound in the last?

Mr. P. Ellam. Myself, Mr. Curll, John Ellam, and Mr. Bell.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. What is become of the Bonds?

Mr. P. Ellam. I don't know.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Should you know it if you should see it again?

Mr. P. Ellam. I believe I should.

L. C. J. Had you any Discourse with Mr. Bambridge about the third and fourth Bonds?

Vol. IX.

Mr. P. Ellam. No, not with him about any of these Bonds.

Mr. Faz. When Chambers declined standing as a Security, how many Bonds were given after?

Mr. P. Ellam. I think it was before the third was given up. Then Peter Ellam withdrew, but was called back; and standing up again was further examined.

Mr. Faz. Recollect the Time you had the Discourse with Mr. Bambridge; How many Bonds did you give after the Time you had the Discourse with Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. P. Ellam. I think it was three; when he came to the third Bond I gave Security, Mr. Chambers having given up.

L. C. J. It don't appear who the Bonds were accepted by, or who delivered to.

Call Mr. Harbin. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Filmer. Who acted as Clerk of the Securities to the Warden of the Fleet when Hopkins was ill?

Mr. Harbin. I don't know of my own Knowledge, but as Hopkins told me.

Call Mr. Edwards. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Reeves. Do you know Hopkins?

Mr. Edwards. Yes.

Mr. Reev. What was his Office?

Mr. Edw. Clerk of the Inquiries, as I believe.

Mr. Reev. Who was Clerk of the Securities?

Mr. Edw. Hopkins, I believe.

Mr. Reev. Do you know Codnor?—Mr. Edw. Yes.

Mr. Reev. Do you know that he acted for Hopkins?

Mr. Edw. I was not privy to such Things.

Call Daniel Hopkins. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Reev. I think you were employed by Mr. Bambridge to take Securities for the Liberty of the Rules?—Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Reev. In November and December 1728, did you employ any one else?

Mr. Hop. In November I was taken ill, about the 20th; and in my Illness Codnor, who acted in the Office, I believe officiated in my Office.

Mr. Reev. Who did he deliver them to? To you?—Mr. Hop. No.

Mr. Reev. Who then?

Mr. Hop. I believe to Mr. Bambridge.

Mr. Reev. Did he account for any Bonds to you?

Mr. Hop. No; but he gave me a Memorandum, that Bonds were taken for Mr. Landman and Mr. Castell.

Mr. Reev. Do you believe Mr. Bambridge appointed him?

Mr. Hop. Yes; Nobody else could.

Mr. Reev. You believe he accounted to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Hop. Yes.

Mr. Strange. You are Clerk of the Inquiries?—Mr. Hop. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Don't you go to enquire after the Securities?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes; and I have taken Bonds.

Mr. Strange. Don't the Clerk of the Papers take Bonds?

Mr. Hop. Not in my Time.

Mr. Strange. Is it not the Clerk of the Papers Business?

Mr. Hop. No.

Mr. Strange. What is your Business?

Mr. Hop. Our Business is, to inquire into the Circumstances of the Sureties before we take them.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Is it not usual to take Bonds de bene esse?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. Suppose you inquire into these Persons Circumstances, if you find them not sufficient do you take them?—Mr. Hop. No.

Mr. Serj. Darn. If any body gets a Day-rule and escapes, who takes them up?—Mr. Hop. The Tipstaff.

Mr. Serj. Darn. If the Security won't stand any longer, but will surrender the Party, the Tipstaff carries them to Prison?

Mr. Hop. Yes, if they desire it; and to their own Houses, if they desire it.

Mr. Serj. Darn. Was it usual to take up a Man without the Security going along with him to surrender him?—Mr. Hop. Sometimes.

Mr. Serj. Darn. Could he do it in the Case of Mr. Castell?

Mr. Hop. I don't know he could.

Mr. Serj. Darn. I desire he may acquaint you, whether he had any Directions from Mr. Bambridge to enquire after this Mr. Bell for Mr. Castell?

Mr. Hop. There was a Bond taken in the Month of July for 200l. Penalty, and another of 800l. and I inquired after the Security by the Direction of Mr. Bambridge, and Mr. Bambridge excepted to the Security first proposed for that Bond, and Mr. Castell was at Liberty to get other.

Mr. Serj. Darn. Did you report them as sufficient?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Was Bambridge satisfied?

Mr. Hop. Yes, in July.

Mr. Strange. I ask you whether you ever observed any Averseness to these Gentlemen, as to the first Bond?

Mr. Hopkins. Never myself.

Mr. Strange. Had you any Directions as to the third Bond?

Mr. Hop. I had Directions to inquire after one Lilly.

Mr. Strange. Did you inquire after Mr. Curll?

Mr. Hop. Not then.

Mr. Strange. After the two first, did you inquire after the Security?

Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Strange. Did you ever enquire after Curll?

Mr. Hop. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Did you report him sufficient?

Mr. Hop. Yes.

Mr. Strange. How many Bonds was he in?

Mr. Hop. He was in the two first, and the last Bond.

Mr. Strange. Have you these two Bonds?

Mr. Hop. No, I delivered them in to the Table at the Committee of the House of Commons, and have not had them since.

Mr. Strange. Do you know Mr. Corbett's?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Do you know what Prisoners pay there?—Mr. Hop. Yes.

Mr. Strange. What is the Price of a Dinner?

Y

Mr.

Mr. Hopkins. One Shilling, and I think it worth it.

Mr. Strange. While Mr. Castell was there, how was he used?

Mr. Serj. Darnell. (not answering directly) Did you ever hear Mr. Castell complain of any ill Usage?

Mr. Hopkins. No: There are some Persons behind interrupt me in giving my Evidence, and say I deserve to be hanged.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Do you know the House where White was?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Do you know the House where Castell was?

Mr. Hopkins. No.

Mr. Fazakerley. The Witness swore that Bambridge said he had one Bond.

Lord Chief Justice. Bandon did say so, for he had applied to Bambridge, and Bambridge said, to prevent Disputes, he had but one.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. Two were delivered to Mr. Huggins, the other two before the Committee; they charged Mr. Bambridge with having Bonds, and Bambridge said, to prevent Disputes, there was but one. If Hopkins could not act, and he had appointed any one, that was the same Thing; as to one Bond, that Bambridge confessed to have. There was an Act made last Session of Parliament, under the severest Penalty, that Bambridge should deliver up all his Books and Papers. If he should produce the other Bond, and it appears that he did not deliver up all Bonds, he would be liable to the said Penalty.

Lord Chief Justice. You are only to deliver the Bonds in Evidence; you must consider, here are three Bonds taken by Codnor; if one of these Bonds came to your Possession, that don't imply the rest being in your Hands; as to the single Bond, it is to be left to the Jury, for if Codnor is the Person, he put it in the Office, and has delivered up one Bond, won't it be implied that he has the other?

Mr. Serj. Darnell. There has been an Application to another Court for the Books of the Office; and it was the Opinion of the Court that the Books could not be delivered up.

Lord Chief Justice. That Excuse will not do here; if you shew they are taken from you, we cannot expect Impossibilities.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. I do confess they are not delivered up.

Lord Chief Justice. They say the Bonds were given for such Sums; you must produce the Bonds, to shew if that is true or not.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. We are desirous to lay all before you we can; these Bonds were only taken de bene esse, only till the Security was enquired after, according to the Method of the Thing; these are not absolute, and that was the Reason why these People were enquired after.

Lord Chief Justice. Then the Question is, Whether they should not go on?

(Call Mr. Underwood, who was sworn.)

Mr. Reeves. Where do you live?

Mr. Underwood. Upon Ludgate-hill.

Mr. Reeves. In the Rules of the Fleet?—Mr. Underwood. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Did Mr. Castell lodge at your House?

Mr. Underwood. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. When did he live there?

Mr. Under. Last July was twelve Months.

Mr. Reeves. How long did he continue there?

Mr. Under. I believe till the Middle of November.

Mr. Reeves. Do you know what happened to him then?

Mr. Under. Corbett came to my House that Morning to fetch him away, but he was not at home; and when he came in, I told Mr. Castell he had been there; and Mr. Castell desired me, if he came again, not to tell him he was at home, and he went to lock himself up; then Corbett came up.

Mr. Reeves. Did he express any Concern?

Mr. Under. Yes, he spoke to me, and said, If Corbett came again he would lock himself up.

Mr. Strange. Did you hear any thing of his Security being uneasy?

Mr. Under. No.

Mr. Strange. Did you never hear Mr. Castell say the Security was uneasy?

Mr. Under. No.

Mr. Strange. Did Corbett use him uncivilly?—Mr. Under. No.

Mr. Strange. What did Corbett say?—Mr. Under. He spoke to me, and asked where he was, and then went up.

(Then Daniel Hopkins was again called.)

Mr. Reeves. Was you in Mr. Underwood's House?—Mr. Hopkins. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. You heard the Discourse that passed?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes, I was in Williams's Room on the Stair-head; I lived up two Pair of Stairs, and Mr. Castell three Pair of Stairs; Williams, Castell, and I were standing together, Corbett came down Stairs; there was Mr. Castell with us; he said, Mr. Castell, you must go with me, your Security has surrendered you; Mr. Castell desired he might not go; Corbett said he must, he had the Warden's Orders, and must obey them.

Mr. Reeves. Who was Warden?—Mr. Hopkins. Mr. Bambridge.

Mr. Reeves. Did not Castell desire him to let him stay?

Mr. Hopkins. Yes; Corbett said, he wished he could; and said several other civil Expressions.

Mr. Strange. Do you know the Time when Mr. Bambridge was sworn?

Mr. Hopkins. I believe it was the 15th of November.

Mr. Strange. How do you know?

Mr. Hopkins. The 16th I took Bonds in his Name.

Mr. Kettleby. How long was it after Mr. Castell was taken from Underwood's before Bambridge was admitted Warden? When was he admitted Warden?—Mr. Hopkins. About the 15th of November.

Mr. Kettleby. What Day was Mr. Castell fetched in?

Mr. Hopkins. About the 14th of November.

(Call Catharine Mackartney, who was sworn.)

Mr. Reeves. Was you present when Mr. Corbett came to take Mr. Castell?—Mrs. Mackartney. No.

Mr. Reeves. What Orders had you from your Mistress about Mr. Castell?

Mr. Kettleby. I must beg Leave to oppose that Question.

Mr. Reeves. Was you with Mr. Castell when he was ill?

Mrs. Mackartney. I went several times to know how he did; when I went the first Day, he kept his Bed, which was the second Day of the Small-Pox coming out.

Mr. Reeves. I desire she may acquaint you, whether she heard him say who was the Cause of his catching the Small-Pox.

Mr. Strange. How long before he died?

Mr. Fazakerley. Did you see him before he died?

Mrs. Mackartney. Every Day before he died.

Mr. Fazakerley. How long before he died, did you hear him say who was the Cause of his Death?

Mrs. Mackartney. I heard him say several Times, that if he died, he laid his Death to Mr. Bambridge, for he was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Fazakerley. Tell the last Time you heard him speak it. How long before he died?—Mrs. Mackartney. Three Days.

Mr. Fazakerley. Was he in a dangerous Condition at that Time?

Mrs. Mackartney. Yes.

Mr. Fazakerley. You say you went several Times by the Direction of your Mistress; did your Mistress supply him with any Thing?

Mrs. Mackartney. The first Day I went to him, he desired me to give his Service to my Mistress, for he wanted several Things.

Mr. Fazakerley. What did he say?

Mrs. Mackartney. He said he wanted to make some Tea, and he could not get Things there to make it.

Mr. Fazakerley. What were the Things?

Mrs. Mackartney. A Spoon, Tea-pot, Cup and Saucer, a Knife, Fork, Plate, and Napkin.

Mr. Fazakerley. When did he make that Declaration, that Bambridge was the Occasion of his Death?

Mrs. Mackartney. I heard him make that Declaration three Days before he died. The last Time I was with him, he held up his Hand, as much as to say, Don't come to speak.

Mr. Fazakerley. Who provided him with Necessaries?

Mrs. Mackartney. I cannot tell.

Mr. Fazakerley. Did your Mistress send them?—Mrs. Mackartney. No.

Call ———— Savage. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Lee. Did you at any Time see Mr. Castell after he was in Custody with Corbett?—Mr. Savage. Frequently.

Mr. Lee. When did you first see him?

Mr. Savage. The Day he was taken in Custody.

Mr. Lee. Where did you first see him?

Mr. Savage. I can't say whether at his own Lodgings, or at the King's Arms Tavern.

Mr. Lee. Did Mr. Castell make any Request to you?

Mr. Savage. Mr. Castell desired I would go to Mr. Bambridge, for that he understood he was going to close Confinement, and that he apprehended the Small-Pox was there; and said, that it was very fatal to his Family, and if he caught it, he should die; and said, it would be a Loss to him in his Affairs.

Mr. Lee. When was this?

Mr. Savage. This was the first Day he was taken in Custody, before he went to Corbett's. I told Mr. Bambridge this, and told him the Apprehension Mr. Castell was under of catching the Small-Pox, and desired he might be indulged to go to his own Lodging, and that he would be at the Expence of having a Keeper there. Accordingly I went to Mr. Bambridge, but he gave me no express Answer.

Mr. Lee. Did you acquaint Mr. Bambridge with what Mr. Castell said?

Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Lee. What did he do after?

Mr. Savage. I went upon the same Message to Bambridge three, four, or five Times, I believe four or five, and never had any Answer till the last Time; then Mr. Bambridge said, he was charged with a pretty deal of Money, and he must take care of his Office.

Mr. Lee. Did you mention any thing of the Small-Pox to Bambridge?

Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Lee. Did he say any thing as to that?—Mr. Savage. No.

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you remember any Conversation at the King's Arms Tavern?—Mr. Savage. Yes, that was some time after.

Mr. Fazakerley. How long?

Mr. Savage. A little before he was taken ill of the Small-Pox.

Mr. Fazakerley. How long before?

Mr. Savage. About a Week or four Days. I was in Company with some other Gentlemen, and Bambridge came in, and said he had been with Mr. Castell, and that an unlucky Accident had happened; and that Mrs. Corbett had mentioned the Danger the Man was in that was ill of the Small-Pox, and Bambridge told us, that Mr. Castell seemed to be much affected, and it gave him vast Uneasiness.

Lord Chief Justice. Was this before Mr. Castell was taken ill?

Mr. Savage. I was at Supper in the King's Arms Tavern, in a Room behind the Bar; then Bambridge came in and told us, that he had been at Corbett's House, and Corbett's Wife had unfortunately mentioned the Person's having the Small-Pox; and that Mr. Castell seemed to turn pale; and it gave him Pain to see Mr. Castell so much shocked.

Mr. Reeves. You say that you told Bambridge, the first time of going to him, of the Small-Pox being there, and you returned immediately to Mr. Castell?—Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Was that the first Day of his being in Custody?

Mr. Savage. Yes, I take it to be so.

Mr. Reeves. You say you went the next Day again?

Mr. Savage. I believe it was.

Mr. Reeves. Did you go by Order of Mr. Castell?

Mr. Savage. At the Request of Mr. Castell.

Mr. Reeves. What did Mr. Castell desire you to say the next Day to Mr. Bambridge?—Mr. Savage. The very same Thing.

Mr. Reeves. Was there any thing mentioned as to the Place Mr. Castell desired to be carried to?—Mr. Savage. It was to his own Lodgings.

Mr. Reeves. Was there any other Place mentioned?—Mr. Savage. No.

Mr. Reeves. Was there any Endeavour used by Bambridge to take him out of that Place?—Mr. Savage. No, I do not know it.

Mr. Filmer. How many Times did you go?

Mr. Savage. Two, three, or four Times.

Mr. Kettleby. I think he said, it would be an Inconvenience, and that he cared not to go to Corbett's?—Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Strange. I ask you, Whether you said it was the first Day, or not, before he went to Corbett's?—Mr. Savage. No.
Mr. Strange. Did you see him there?—Mr. Savage. Yes.
Mr. Strange. How was his Usage?
Mr. Savage. I did not hear him complain.
Mr. Strange. Did you go with any other Request, than that he might go back to his Lodging?—Mr. Savage. That was the Request by me.
Mr. Reeves. What was the Answer the last Time you went to Bambridge; whether he did not say he was in Execution?
Mr. Savage. I cannot take upon me to say.
Lord Chief-Justice. I think what you said, was, that it had been signified by Corbett, that Mr. Castell was to be locked up there, and it had been signified to him that the Small-Pox was there?—Mr. Savage. Yes.
Lord Chief-Justice. What Place was it at?
Mr. Savage. I can't be certain whether at the King's-Arms, or his Lodgings.
Mr. Lee. Do you know the Day he fell ill?—Mr. Savage. I can't tell.
Mr. Lee. Was he well before he went into Corbett's?
Mr. Savage. Yes, he was.
Mr. Lee. When he went into Corbett's, the 14th of November, was he well then?—Mr. Savage. Yes.
Lord Chief-Justice. Did he not talk that it was fatal to his Family?
Mr. Savage. Yes, and said if he caught it, it would kill him.
Lord Chief-Justice. Did you acquaint Bambridge of that?
Mr. Savage. I did tell him it would be fatal.
Lord Chief-Justice. Was the Message the same as the first?
Mr. Savage. I went on the same Message.
Mr. Lee. How many Times did you go?
Mr. Savage. Four or five Times.
Mr. Lee. How long before Bambridge came in into the King's-Arms Tavern, before that Discourse happened?
Mr. Savage. I believe the same Day.
Mr. Bambridge. I desire a Question may be asked the Witness, Whether he came in relation to some Suits of Mr. Castell?
Mr. Lee. We must oppose that.
Lord Chief-Justice. It is between Party and Party, his Counsel must ask Questions.
Mr. Savage. I did understand there was a Negotiation carried on by Mr. Bambridge for Mr. Castell, between him and the Printer; and Mr. Bambridge did tell me, that he had made an End of it for 40 or 50*l*. but I know nothing of it.
Mr. Strange. Did not you come about one Curll?
Mr. Savage. I know nothing of it.
Mr. Strange. Did you come to Bambridge as to Mr. Curll's being Security?
Mr. Savage. I believe I did, and said he was a proper Man for Security, being a Man of Substance.
Call ——— Shortis. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Lee. Did you go to Mr. Castell when at Corbett's?
Mr. Shortis. I went to Mr. Castell at Corbett's, the Morning after he was in Custody.
Mr. Lee. What passed?—Mr. Shortis. Mr. Castell said, he had been very ill used by his Creditors, and believed they had been in Combination, and had combined with Mr. Bambridge.
Mr. Strange. Was you frequently with Mr. Castell while he was at Corbett's House?—Mr. Shortis. Yes.
Mr. Strange. During the Time you was there, what Manner was he used in?—Mr. Shortis. Mr. Bambridge behaved towards him very gentleman-like, so did Mr. Corbett.
Mr. Strange. Did you ever hear him complain?—Mr. Shortis. No.
Mr. Strange. When did you last see him?
Mr. Shortis. A Day or two before he died.
Mr. Strange. Did he complain of Mr. Corbett's ill Usage then?
Mr. Shortis. I believe he had every Thing he wanted from Corbett's.
Mr. Wynn. Did he complain of any Hardship in being carried to Mr. Corbett's House?—Mr. Shortis. Yes.
Mr. Wynn. Who did he complain of, his Creditors, or Mr. Bambridge?
Lord Chief-Justice. That is not Evidence.
Call John Surridge. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Lee. Did you go at any Time from Mr. Castell to Mr. Bambridge?
Mr. Sur. I went two or three Times.
Mr. Lee. When did you see him?
Mr. Sur. I went in the Month of November.
Mr. Lee. What Time?
Mr. Sur. About fourteen Days in the Time of the Term.
Mr. Lee. That was about the Middle of November; it was before he was taken ill.—Did you see him at Corbett's?—Mr. Sur. Yes.
Mr. Lee. When you went to Mr. Bambridge, what did you go with?
Mr. Sur. Two Letters.
Mr. Lee. Did you go by Word of Mouth?—Mr. Sur. No.
Mr. Lee. Had you any Answer to these Letters? Did you deliver them to Mr. Bambridge? Did he give any Answer?
Mr. Sur. He said, he would wait upon Mr. Castell.
Mr. Reeves. Had you any Discourse, concerning his Confinement, with Mr. Bambridge?—Mr. Sur. No.
Call Thomas Goodman. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Reeves. Was you at any Time at Mr. Corbett's, when Mr. Bambridge and Mr. Castell were together?
Mr. Goodman. I was confined a Prisoner there.
Mr. Reeves. Did you remember any Conversation between them two?
Mr. Goodman. I was a Prisoner there, and Mr. Bambridge came into Corbett's, and sent for Mr. Castell down Stairs; and Castell said to Mr. Bambridge, he had sent to him two or three Times, and never could have the Happiness to see him; Bambridge said he was very sorry for that; and Mr. Castell desired of Mr. Bambridge either to go into the House, or the Rules, for the Distemper raged there.
Mr. Reeves. What do you mean by the House? To go into the Gaol? Tell the Discourse that happened; what did Mr. Castell say?
Mr. Goodman. Mr. Castell said, the Distemper raged in the House, and the Distemper would be the Death of him; and Bambridge made Answer, that he should neither go into the House, nor into the Rules, unless he gave him such a Sum of Money.

Mr. Reeves. Where was you when you heard this Discourse?
Mr. Goodman. I was at the Bar, asking for some Bread and Cheese.
Mr. Lee. When Mr. Bambridge said he should not go into the House, or into the Rules, what did Mr. Castell say?
Mr. Goodman. That he had given Security several Times, and fresh Bail, and that he would not give any more.
Mr. Reeves. Did Mr. Bambridge deny that?
Mr. Goodman. No, I did not hear it.
Mr. Reeves. Where did Bambridge order him to be put?
Mr. Goodman. He then ordered Corbett to put him into the Tap-room, and then he went up.
Mr. Reeves. How long did he stay there?
Mr. Goodman. About four Minutes.
Lord Chief-Justice. What Time of the Year was this?
Mr. Goodman. About the Month of November.
Mr. Reeves. Did Castell complain of any Illness?
Mr. Goodman. The next Morning he came down, and said to Mr. Corbett he was very ill, and desired a Fire to be made in his Room, and I believe he never came down again.
Mr. Reeves. How often did Mr. Castell repeat this to Mr. Bambridge?
Mr. Goodman. He desired two or three Times to go into the Gaol, or to the other Place; and Bambridge said he should not go to either, without a Sum of Money.
Mr. Reeves. What Sum was it?—Mr. Goodman. I did not hear the Sum.
Mr. Reeves. Where was this?—Mr. Goodman. At the Bar; I was standing at the Bar asking for Bread and Cheese.
Mr. Serj. Darnell. How long was you there?
Mr. Goodman. Four or five Minutes.
Mr. Serj. Darnell. How long was you a Prisoner?
Mr. Goodman. Four or five Months.
Mr. Serj. Darnell. Did you see them together?
Mr. Goodman. No, it was impossible for me to see them, the Door was shut.
Mr. Serj. Darnell. Did you never give any Testimony before?
Mr. Goodman. No.
Mr. Serj. Darnell. When was you discharged?
Mr. Goodman. By the Act of Parliament.
Mr. Kettleby. How came it you was not examined before?
Mr. Goodman. I don't know.
Mr. Kettleby. Did you make any Declaration of this Matter to any body?
Mr. Goodman. I gave this Account to several, particularly to Mr. Houghton.
Mr. Kettleby. Did you hear of this Trial?
Mr. Goodman. I heard something of it.
Mr. Kettleby. Are you subpoena'd?—Mr. Goodman. I am not subpoena'd.
Mr. Kettleby. Where have you been since you was discharged?
Mr. Goodman. In my Business.
Mr. Kettleby. What Business?—Mr. Goodman. A Printer.
Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, there is a Person, Mr. Botwright, stands behind the Evidence to prompt them, I desire he may be removed from that Place.
Lord Chief-Justice. Let him go to the other Side.
Call ——— Sutton. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Lee. Did you know Mr. Castell?—Mrs. Sutton. Yes.
Mr. Lee. Did you know he had the Small-Pox?
Mrs. Sutton. Yes; Mr. Corbett sent for me, and desired me to look after one White, but I could not, and Mr. Castell was standing there, and said he was afraid of the Small-Pox, and said that he was afraid that I had them, observing something like a Pimple upon my Face.
Mr. Lee. Was there any Thing upon your Face?
Mrs. Sutton. No, nothing but what is now.
Mr. Reeves. Was that after he was in Custody at Corbett's?
Mrs. Sutton. He was not a Prisoner then there.
Mr. Reeves. Was you in the House when Mr. Castell was ill?
Mrs. Sutton. I sat up the Night he died.
Mr. Reeves. Can you tell the Day of the Month?
Mrs. Sutton. I cannot tell.
Mr. Reeves. Do you know the Month?
Mrs. Sutton. I can't tell, it was before Christmas.
Mr. Fazakerley. What Distemper did he die of?
Mrs. Sutton. The Small-Pox.
Call ——— Westbrook. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Fazakerley. What do you know of Mr. Castell's Fear of having the Small-Pox?
Mr. Westbrook. I have been Mr. Castell's Neighbour twenty Years, and often heard him say, that he was very much afraid of the Small-Pox.
Call ——— Kilbury. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know that about the 14th of November, and so for a Month, from that Time till December last, there were empty Rooms in the Prison?—Mr. Kilbury. Yes, there was, one of the most commodious Rooms in the Prison.
Mr. Fazakerley. Where was it?
Mr. Kilbury. Up one Pair of Stairs, No 16, wainscoted.
Mr. Fazakerley. Was there any other Room?
Mr. Kilbury. Yes, one where they kept the Lumber in.
Mr. Fazakerley. Were there other Houses where there were Rooms as convenient?—Mr. Kilbury. I don't know of any.
Lord Chief-Justice. What Time were the Rooms empty?—Mr. Kilbury. From the latter End of October, till the 4th or 5th of December.
Call ——— Booth. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Fazakerley. You hear the Question, whether from the Middle of November till the latter Part of December, any Rooms convenient were empty?
Mr. Booth. There were the same two Rooms as Kilbury mentioned.
Mr. Fazakerley. How long were they empty?
Mr. Booth. They were empty about a Month; from the latter End of October till the 4th of December.
Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know any Thing of a House that there was Room in?—Mr. Booth. I don't know any Thing of that.
Call ——— Cleaver. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know that about the Middle of November, 1728, and so till some Time in December, there was any convenient House, as convenient as Corbett's, to put Prisoners in?

Mr. Cleaver. There was one Room. I was first at Corbett's, and from Corbett's orderd to Britton's: It was the Latter-end of November, or Beginning of December.

Mr. Fazakerley. Was there Room there?

Mr. Cleav. Yes, there were seven Beds made there, and but four or five Prisoners in the House.

Mr. Faz. Was the Small-Pox at Corbett's?---Mr. Cleav. Yes.

Mr. Faz. Was that House made use of as Corbett's?

Mr. Cleav. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Was it fitted up?

Mr. Cleav. Yes, so fitted up as to have Prisoners in it.

Mr. Strange. Were not the Workmen at Work?---Mr. Cleav. No.

Mr. Faz. We shall call no more Witnesses.

Mr. Serj. Darnell. I am of Counsel for the Defendants. The Gentlemen on the other Side say, That this is an Appeal that is brought, with a good deal of Commendation of the Widow; that she was following the Murder of her Husband; and that she traced it with a full Conviction, that though one had been acquitted for it, yet she should now convict both, therefore she waited for this Opportunity of laying it before the Court.

I shall not take Notice what passed upon that Occasion, but observe to you, Gentlemen, what is alledged in the Appeal: The Appeal has charged, that these two Defendants did with Force and Arms make an Assault, and did feloniously take and imprison Robert Castell, without his Consent and against his Will, in the House of Richard Corbett; that there they did imprison him; and that in that House there was one Joseph White then ill of the Small-Pox, a Distemper the said Castell was greatly afraid of; and he believed he should die if he had them.

That being there confined, he caught the Small-Pox and died.

I cannot but say, it is something new, and an uncommon Accusation of Murder; but so far I'll go, that if People do wickedly, they should answer for it.

There is first a great deal to be considered. As to the first Point, Whether he was legally taken and imprisoned? I think there is no Evidence as to that but Hopkins. He told you he was present, and saw Corbett come to Underwood's, and told him his Bail had surrendered him, and told him he must carry him away to Prison, and told him he was sorry for it.

This is the unlawfully and feloniously carrying him there.

He told you he had the Warden's Authority; as he was his Agent and Tipstaff, he was put to take him; he must take him, and did it by the Authority of the Warden, as he was his Officer; this was the general Authority: This is the single Evidence of the first taking the Man. I submit it to your Lordship's Direction, that there is nothing unlawful in this.

The next is, that he was carried to the House where White was sick of the Small-Pox. What is the Evidence as to that? Every Body that speaks as to that, said, the Small-Pox was over ten Days; if it was over ten Days, when is he said to be sick? When is the Small-Pox to end?

What is the Consequence of his coming there? That he dreaded the Distemper, caught it and died. That the catching it was from the 14th of November, till the 4th of December, which was near three Weeks; this comes out to be a Month after the Man had the Small-Pox. It was lawful when he was carried there.

As it is unreasonable to suppose the Time of catching the Small-Pox, are not you to judge? It is so general a Distemper, there is hardly one in a hundred in this Town, that has not caught it. Is it because he had the Small-Pox there, that they had a felonious Intent? Were there all these Circumstances to make it appear? This is the Circumstance that must be left to you, the general Credit that Mr. Bambridge received from almost all the Witnesses, that he treated him civilly, and that even Mr. Bambridge did Business for him, till it came to Goodman, and Goodman gives an odd Account to you, if you can believe it. He says, he stood at the Bar (which in a Publick-House is very noisy); and says, that he heard a Talk through the Door which was shut, and he took it to be Mr. Castell's Voice; and he said he desired to have the Liberty of the Rules, for the Distemper raged in the House.

For a Man to hear this at the Bar, when the Door was shut, and that this should be a Secret so long, is very extraordinary.

I must observe to you, Gentlemen, that Goodman was a Prisoner; and if this Evidence had been thought material, the Vigilance and Industry used to find him out (and very commendable it was), it was impossible to think it should be undiscovered, where so vigilant an Inquiry was made.

This is the only Thing that shews any Iniquity in Bambridge. Here is a Man that wants to go into the Liberty of the Rules; is a Gaoler to let him? If a Gaoler desires Money, I don't know that it is illegal; it was after his Bonds were given up; it would have turned upon his own Head if he had gone away; he must have been answerable.

He charges him with so monstrous an Improbability (it is impossible to think he said it), that we must submit it, whether any Credit can be given to such Evidence.

I chuse to mention Mr. Bambridge; but I am more particularly concerned for Mr. Corbett.

They have called several Witnesses, and they say Mr. Corbett used him very well. And this is alledged to be Evidence, That where Witnesses are wanting, the Man's Declaration upon his Death-Bed is Evidence; because that it may be done without the Privy of any one else; and that a Man at that Time would have Regard to himself in what he said. What was this Declaration? If I die, I lay my Death to Bambridge; but he is not certain that the Man did lay the Misfortune of being brought into Prison to Bambridge; but if he did die by catching it from White, or being confined in a close Air, if I die the Prison is the Occasion of my Death, and consequently the Keeper. Is there any Consequence can be drawn, that there was a felonious Intent? There is nothing at all from Corbett.

But as they have taken up a good deal of Time in shewing that it was a Crime carrying him to Corbett's, though I apprehend it is not material, we shall make it plain that it was no Crime at all.

I must take Notice as to this, that it was insinuated from Circumstances. They have endeavoured to shew Mr. Castell received 125*l.* and alledged, that this Money was to be got from him; this Money was the Means of his being used ill. When they came to prove this, they only shewed that a Note was drawn upon Woodward. If he had any Money, might he not have paid it to his Creditors?

The next Thing I shall take Notice of is, as to the Bonds. Probably the Bonds that had been given to Mr. Huggins were delivered to Mr. Bambridge. Mr. Bambridge said he had but one; and if it was taken in the manner even said by their Witnesses, it did not appear in any manner oppressive; for Chambers said he would surrender him.

When Peter Ellam was examined, he was asked, whether Bambridge said, that he would not have them surrender him? He made answer, that he said something to that Effect; and it was said, that these Bonds were given de bene esse; therefore the Warden was to have a reasonable Time to enquire into the Securities; so it may be likewise taken by the Circumstance, that he desired to have a Keeper with him, and he would pay for it. What Hazard does the Gaoler run, if two or three Persons come to him to ask the Liberties of the Rules, and he gives it them, and the Men escape? Is not he to answer for them? If that was the Case, a Keeper, which is thought to be a beneficial Office, would be soon ruined by Acts of Good-nature.

As to the Case, it stands thus: Mr. Castell was first committed the 18th of June, 1728, and it is customary to bring Prisoners first to this House. Hopkins says, it is common for Prisoners to desire to be there, for they have better Convenience to transact what Business is to be done, than to trouble their Friends to go into the Gaol. Hopkins says, that it was customary; and from this House he did give Security and went to his Lodgings, and continued there till his Security would not stand.

When this Man was brought in, he happened to be an intimate Acquaintance with one Mr. Vanderbank, who spoke himself, and got several others to speak to Mr. Bambridge in his Behalf. He will give you an Account of the very Creditors coming to surrender him; and it is nothing but a Man's Creditors can come; and these People will shew with what Favour Mr. Bambridge treated him, and that he desired Mr. Bambridge to assist him in his Affairs.

Gentlemen, he was removed from Corbett's to his Lodgings, and continued there till his Security surrendered him; and we shall shew you, that Mr. Castell sent to Mr. Corbett's, that this Room might be made convenient and fit for him; which strikes out the first Part of the Appeal; and if we prove he desired to be there, that strikes out the whole; therefore there will be an End of the whole. The Man is carried to the House, but the Communication between them was up two Pair of Stairs: For the Witnesses say, White lay up three Pair of Stairs in one House, and Castell lay up one Pair of Stairs in another. Was there any more Danger lying here than in the next House? The Witnesses say, White never came down, and Nobody insisted that Castell went up; he must have been a Madman if he did. When we shew you that he came there at his own Desire, and had the Bed and Bedding at his own Desire, we must say that this Distemper was the Visitation of God, and came to him as to other People.

We shall call a good many of the People who were his Security, to prove, that as soon as they were inquired after, they were admitted to stand.

Gentlemen, after the last Bond was given, he might have gone about his Business if he would; and that Bond was given de bene esse; and therefore in the Power of the Warden to let them in or not. We will call our Witnesses, and shew you how long White had been well before Mr. Castell came there; that he had taken three times Physick; but for fear of any Accident, because there were other Prisoners in the House, they did not let him come down. This, Gentlemen, we shall be able to prove by several Witnesses; which if we do, you will find the Prisoners Not Guilty.

Mr. Serj. Eyre. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel of the same Side. I shall not go over the whole Case; but only observe to you, that the Gentlemen on the other Side were conscious that they had no positive Proof, therefore they have artfully gone about to prove Circumstances.

They say, that Mr. Castell had 125*l.* paid him; and having this Money, Mr. Bambridge knew of it, and consequently was making use of Endeavours to extort the Money from him.

They are far short, in that they called some People, who only proved that a Note was drawn upon Mr. Woodward, payable to him or Bearer; but it did not appear that Bambridge had any Part of it.

There is another Evidence, one Goodman, who said, that Mr. Bambridge had a View to get some of the Money; one would have thought, that he should have mentioned a particular Sum. That seems to be exceedingly unnatural, for the Answer Castell gives is, that Security was given, and he would give no more.

Consider, Gentlemen, when this happened; in November, when all the Securities had been completed.

It is very extraordinary, that this Witness should never be called on before, and very particular that he should hear so well. He was at the Bar, they in the Room, and the Door shut; and, Gentlemen, I am instructed to say, that it is impossible to hear what any Person says behind the Bar, that stands on the Outside of the Bar.

It is usual to take Securities before their Circumstances are inquired into, What then is the Case? They stand if their Circumstances are good, if not they don't.

How then stands this? If these Bonds were executed on the Second, this Man fell sick on the Third, and this one Bond was only delivered over to the Principal, as a Bond de bene esse.

What I should apprehend was necessary for them to produce, were the Facts in the Declaration, that he was forcibly taken away out of his Lodgings, and carried to Corbett's House: They admit them as Prisoners; and so far from Force, that some of the Sureties, on the 14th of November, said, that they would stand no longer, and desired Mr. Castell to be taken care of.

They say it was very wrong to carry him to a Spunging-House; a Victualling-House it is, but it don't appear to be a Spunging-House; every Gentleman is used according to his Circumstances; they pay one Shilling for their Dinner, which is very reasonable, and Hopkins said well deserves it.

We

we say it is exceedingly lawful to put Prisoners there; it is lawful, and as lawful as his own Lodgings, and any Place in the Liberty of the Rules is lawful. This is not all; he went first to the Tavern, and his Servant bespoke a Room, and had the very Room he bespoke; and we apprehend, Corbett had a lawful Authority to carry him there.

There is another Fact they have alledged, I must beg leave to take notice of; That White was sick at this very Time, and in this very House.

These two Charges are necessary to be proved; but how have they proved them? It appears that these were two distinct Houses, two distinct Stair-cases; and, in my Judgment, I apprehend, appear to be two Houses, not one.

As to White's being sick at that Time, it appears he was not sick, and we shall shew he had taken three Purges.

It is not only necessary for them to prove that this Man was sick at the Time Castell came there, and that he was unlawfully carried there, but it is necessary to prove that this Sickness was infectious; but Castell, on the contrary, did not come there till he was well.

Does it not appear that White lay up three Pair of Stairs, and was enjoined not to come out of his Room, and that he continued there, as Noel said, all the Time? Where was Castell? In one Pair of Stairs in the new House. How can you imagine any Infection to come from the Garret down to Mr. Castell in the one Pair of Stairs Room? Therefore, it was impossible to imagine that Distemper was so taken.

Here is a Man visited with the Small-Pox, and says, "Pray let me not go to Gaol, but let me go to my own Lodgings;" the Bail surrender him, because he was not safe at the Place where he lodged; therefore, it was very ridiculous for him to ask to go to his Lodging, which was unreasonable.

As to the Persons that were his Securities, I don't think they were his Friends in fact; for these Men, who before were drinking at the Bar of this House, designed it should be so.

I must beg leave to make one Observation: Suppose there were some of the Prisoners had the Small-Pox, and a Prisoner comes to the Gaoler, and says, Here is the Small-Pox in a Garret, I desire to go into the Liberty; I don't see how it can be granted, for it is impossible for that or any other Gaoler, if a contagious Distemper comes into it, and the well Prisoners desire to go out, he should give them the Liberty: If Criminals should be let out, it is very plain, in that Case, the Gaoler must answer for them; so I apprehend it would be in Civil Cases: Therefore, I must conclude with saying, that my Clients have done nothing at all but what is humane and right.

Mr. Kettleby. My Lord, I am Counsel of the same Side; and we will call our Witnesses.

Call — Chappel. (Who was sworn.)

Mr. Kettleby. Was you present on the 14th of November, or at any other Time, when Mr. Castell's Security came to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Chappel. Mr. Chambers came and said, he was determined to stand Security for Mr. Castell no longer; and Peter Ellam and Curll the same.

Mr. Chappel. That they gave him Power to take him up.

Mr. Kettleby. Where was this?—Mr. Chappel. At Bell-Savage Yard.

Mr. Kettleby. What did Bambridge say in Answer?

Mr. Chappel. He believed they were secure, and could not imagine the Reason of their withdrawing their Security.

Mr. Kettleby. What did they say to that?

Mr. Chappel. Chambers seemed willing, but Curll would not.

Mr. Kettleby. What Resolution was taken upon that?

Mr. Chappel. He persuaded Ellam to consent, and nothing more was done then; and we left Castell and Bambridge together.

Mr. Kettleby. What Time was this?

Mr. Chappel. I don't know the Day.

Mr. Kettleby. What Month was it in?—Mr. Chappel. In November.

Mr. Kettleby. The Beginning, Middle, or latter End?—Mr. Chappel. I cannot tell; by a Line sent to Mr. the Attorney, it will appear.

Mr. Kettleby. How long before he was carried to Corbett's House?

Mr. Chappel. Three Weeks or a Month.

Mr. Kettleby. Do you know any Discourse that happened between them a little before he went to Corbett's House?

Mr. Kettleby. How near the Time he was carried to Corbett's?

Mr. Chappel. The next Morning.

Mr. Kettleby. Give an Account what passed the Day before he went to Corbett's.

Mr. Chappel. Chambers was twice with Mr. Bambridge; and the first Time Mr. Bambridge desired Mr. Castell might not be surrendered; Mr. Chambers waited two or three Days, and then came to Mr. Bambridge again, to let him know he would surrender him, and said he would be his Security no longer; and Mr. Bambridge said, if he would deliver him up, he must go to the Tipstaff's; then Chambers went to one Corbett, and Corbett said, he must have a Fee; then Chambers gave him his Fee, and Chambers said, he was at the King's Arms. About an Hour after I saw Corbett, Chambers and Castell together.

Mr. Kettleby. What did you see done?—Mr. Chappel. That is all I know.

Mr. Kettleby. Did not you go to the King's Arms Tavern?

Mr. Chappel. No.

Mr. Kettleby. Did you hear the Security say, they would complain to the Judges about it?—Mr. Chappel. Mr. an Attorney, was there.

Mr. Kettleby. What did the Attorney say?—Mr. Chappel. I don't know.

Mr. Kettleby. Did they direct him to take him up? Who did Chambers speak to?

Mr. Chappel. To Mr. Bambridge.

Mr. Kettleby. To do what?

Mr. Chappel. To take Mr. Castell in Custody, for he would be Security no longer; and desired that he would take him in Custody.

Mr. Strange. What did Mr. Bambridge tell him was necessary to be done?

Mr. Chappel. Bambridge said he must employ a Tipstaff.

Mr. Strange. What did Mr. Chambers do to Corbett?

VOL. IX.

Mr. Chappel. He sent to Corbett to the Coffee-house, and Corbett said, he must have a Fee.

Mr. Strange. When was this?—Mr. Chappel. Over Night.

Mr. Strange. Did Chambers threaten him?—Mr. Chappel. No.

Mr. Strange. What did he say?

Mr. Chappel. He said something about giving a Fee; and Corbett went to the King's Arms, and said, he could not find him.

Mr. Reeves. First of all Ellam seemed uneasy, but afterwards was not; Did Peter Ellam concern himself afterwards?

Mr. Chappel. Yes, he sent a Letter to Mr. Scott.

Mr. Reeves. I ask you, whether Ellam did not consent to continue before he was taken up?—Mr. Chappel. Yes.

Mr. Reeves. Did Curll, before Mr. Castell was taken up?

Mr. Chappel. I don't know of that.

Mr. Reeves. You don't know of any others?—Mr. Chappel. No.

Mr. Lee. How come you to be so much concerned?

Mr. Chappel. I was to secure Ellam and myself. I was so much concerned, that he and I were bound for Three-Fourths of One Thousand Pounds.

Mr. Lee. Who went with you to Bambridge the first Time?

Mr. Chappel. I went along the first time to Bambridge with Peter Ellam and Curll.

Mr. Lee. With what Intent did you go?

Mr. Chappel. I went with Peter Ellam and Curll with an Intent to deliver Mr. Castell up, for I had given Security to Ellam to indemnify him a half Part.

Mr. Lee. To indemnify him! Did Ellam decline then?

Mr. Chappel. He seemed inclinable to continue.

Mr. Lee. Was you present when Bambridge said he must go to the Tipstaff's?—Mr. Chappel. Yes.

Mr. Lee. Was he acquainted with Corbett?—Mr. Chappel. I don't know.

Mr. Lee. Was there any body mentioned at the Time when you was with Bambridge?

Mr. Chappel. I can't charge my Memory with any Name.

Mr. Lee. At this Time when you talked about the Tipstaff, was Ellam and Curll there?—Mr. Chappel. No.

Mr. Fazakerley. Pray what Bond was that you talked of, that you was Security in?—Mr. Chappel. I don't hear.

Mr. Strange. You was Security for Mr. Castell?—Mr. Chambers. Yes.

Mr. Chambers. I begg'd of Mr. Chappel, he having Business every Day in Town, to apply to Mr. Bambridge, to let him know that I would be Security no longer; but having long had an Intimacy with Mr. Bambridge, Bambridge desired me to continue Security eight Days longer; and told me, that White at the King's Arms Tavern had given a Note. I said I was determined to deliver him up. Mr. Bambridge said, I was very safe, and desired I would continue; he had been the Instrument of my being Security, and he would not deceive me; if he thought there was any Danger, he would advise me by Letter. I came to Mr. Castell from time to time; he told me, he had other Securities ready, and it would be no Inconvenience to him. I came to tell him two or three times I would not stand, and found he had Nobody ready; and then went to Mr. Bambridge, and found him at the Lodge about seven or eight o'Clock at Night, and told him I was come determined to deliver Mr. Castell up; upon which he said, If you will deliver him up you must. I asked him which way to proceed? He said, I must get a Tipstaff. I asked him, where there was a Tipstaff? He said, there was one Corbett. I asked him, what I must give him? He said, Six-and-eight-Pence. I went accordingly to Corbett, and told him Mr. Castell was at the King's Arms Tavern, and I would give him Half a Guinea to secure him. Mr. Corbett went to the King's Arms, came back, and said he could not find him; then I said, I would be in Town; and I lay at the Bell-Savage Inn; then I came the next Morning, and sent to Corbett's, who came in his Gown and Slippers; and Corbett said, he wished he had not got Notice of our Intention; and said he would go to his Lodgings; and said, he believed there he should find him: Then Corbett came, and said he was at his House; and I gave Corbett Half a Guinea; and I went to Mr. Castell at Corbett's; and he said, he thanked me for my Civility; and said, he believed it was not an Act of my own; and I said it was. As you are going abroad, do not think I use you ill. He said, No; I don't believe it was your own Act. I said, Don't deceive yourself, it is.

Mr. Strange. Did Mr. Bambridge persuade you at first to be Security?

Mr. Chambers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Mr. Castell made no manner of Objection to his being at Corbett's, but thanked you?—Mr. Chambers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. About what Time was this?

Mr. Chambers. About the Middle of November.

Mr. Strange. Was this after he was surrendered?—Mr. Chambers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Did he complain of being at Corbett's House then?

Mr. Chambers. No.

Mr. Strange. Was you at the King's Arms the Day he was taken?

Mr. Chambers. No.

Mr. Strange. Was you with Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Chambers. I sent up to him, and that I was come by the Securities Appointment; and he sent Word again, he had nothing to do with him, till the Security had surrendered him.

Mr. Strange. Did Mr. Bambridge at any Time expostulate with you, why you surrendered him?

 Mr. Kettle. You acted in taking Securities; pray look upon this Bond, and see if it was taken by you?
 Mr. Codnor. I believe it was all my Hand-writing, except the Names of the Persons subscribing as Witnesses and Parties.
 Mr. Kettle. Did you receive any, and what Directions from Mr. Bambridge, as to Mr. Castell?
 Mr. Codnor. I received Directions from Mr. Bambridge to attend Mr. Castell.
 Mr. Kettle. Did he go to Castell?---Mr. Codnor. Never: he sent.
 Mr. Kettle. What was the Purport of the Bond?
 Mr. Codnor. The Purport of the Bond was de bene esse.
 Mr. Kettle. Were there any other Bonds, during the Time you acted, given over to Bambridge; or that one only?
 Mr. Codnor. I cannot recollect that; I remember I took two Bonds; I believe they were only bound de bene esse.
 Mr. Kettle. Were these absolute Bonds, or Bonds de bene esse?
 Mr. Codnor. As to the first Bond, the Parties not being found sufficient, the Penalty---
 Mr. Strange. How much was the Penalty?
 Mr. Codnor. One Thousand Pounds. It was ordered to be cancelled, and a Bond taken de novo.
 Mr. Strange. Was that Bond absolutely completed, or done de bene esse?
 Mr. Codnor. There was not an Inquiry reported.
 Mr. Wynn. Was that Indorsement made at the Time?
 Mr. Codnor. It is my Hand-writing.
 Mr. Wynn. What was wrote there?---Mr. Codnor. De bene esse.
 Mr. Wynn. Was it done at that Time?
 Mr. Codnor. I might go into the Office.
 Mr. Wynn. Was it usual to let Parties execute Bonds before Enquiry was made?---Mr. Codnor. Yes; it was the daily Practice.
 Mr. Reeves. You say it was the usual Practice to take Bonds de bene esse, and you say the other Bonds were cancelled?---Mr. Codnor. I believe so.

Mr. Reeves. Did you see them cancelled?---Mr. Codnor. I did not.
 Mr. Reeves. I ask you then, whether it was usual for you to cancel a Bond that was good before another was executed?
 Mr. Codnor. I would not have taken upon me then to have done it.
 Mr. Reeves. Do you know it was done?
 Mr. Codnor. I can't say I do; it was usual to take new Bonds de bene esse: when Bonds given before were cancelled, and the Persons had been inquired after, and not found sufficient.
 Mr. Reeves. What were your Orders?
 Mr. Codnor. My Orders were, to take the Securities from Time to Time as they came.
 Mr. Reeves. So you took them de bene esse?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. You say you have got a Method to take Bonds de bene esse: Did not you take a Bond de bene esse, which he was in Execution for?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. What, do you take double Times?
 Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Did you say how much he was in Execution for?
 Mr. Codnor. No.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know how much?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Was there any Thing more?---Mr. Codnor. No.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Then that was 500 l.?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Lord Chief-Justice. So your constant Practice is, that the Securities are first bound, and then you enquire after them?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Lord Chief-Justice. You say you took these Bonds by Mr. Bambridge's Directions?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Lord Chief-Justice. What did you do with the first Bond?
 Mr. Codnor. I can't charge my Memory.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Are you sure you took but two?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Mr. Strange. It was very probable that these People might demand 1000l. Bond; the other Bond, when given, was for 2000l. What was the Reason of your taking a larger Security?
 Mr. Codnor. I received three Habeas Corpus's, which was the Reason of taking so large a Security (speaking to Mr. Strange). We always take Security, though charged by the same Plaintiff, for two Sums.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Is that usual?---Mr. Codnor. Yes.
 Lord Chief-Justice. So that you take Security for the Declaration, and take Security for the subsequent Charge in Execution.
 Mr. Fazakerley. When was the last Security given?
 Mr. Codnor. Much about a Week after the first.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Observe; if an Action is brought for 200l. and you take Security, and a Week after that Judgment is had, do you take other Security, and double the Sum?
 Mr. Codnor. Not without a Habeas Corpus is brought.
 Mr. Fazakerley. So you don't increase the Penalty, unless you distrust the Value of the Bail?---Mr. Codnor. No.
 Mr. Fazakerley. Because I observe a great many Judgments are given before the Security is increased.
 Lord Chief-Justice. The last Bond was executed the first of December, and he was taken ill the third.
 Mr. Strange. My Lord, we shall call no more Evidence, but submit it here.
 Mr. Reeves. My Lord, I must beg leave to take notice of the Objections they have made. The first is, that he went voluntarily to Corbett's; that it was his own Desire. In Answer to that, if our Witnesses are to be credited, we have proved the whole Appeal. We have proved, he was taken forcibly; I humbly apprehend that was sufficiently proved; for if Corbett took him without his Consent, it was forcibly, and it was unlawful; it will warrant the Declaration of Appeal.
 The next Fact is, that he was carried to the House of Richard Corbett, where one Joseph White was then ill of the Small-Pox. The Objection did arise, that it was laid to be the House of Richard Corbett, which was one House, and here are two; one where Joseph White lay sick, and they say, he was carried to the other. As to that, it appeared by the Evidence, that before this Fact happened, they were made into one House; and notwithstanding they were made into two Dwelling-houses before Castell was put there, our Witnesses say, they went up Stairs into one and the same House; and that Mr. Castell was carried to the House of the said Richard Corbett, where Joseph White was ill of the Small-Pox.
 The other Objection is, that Joseph White was well of the Small-Pox ten Days before Mr. Castell was brought there. My Lord, we apprehend that That is contradicted by their own Evidence; that the Man was well, and looked upon to be recovered; for I must beg leave to observe, that upon the Evidence of Holdsworth, it appeared that White was blind at that Time when Castell came in; and he remained there a considerable Time after Castell was brought in.
 As to the Points of Law insisted on by the Gentlemen on the other Side, I must submit it to your Lordship, whether this Proof is not sufficient to support the Appeal; that he was carried against his Consent to an unlawful Confinement, and at a Spunging-house.
 Mr. Strange. The Point of Law is, Whether he was unlawfully taken? And though he was unlawfully confined, yet it don't make an unlawful Taking.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Though he was lawfully taken, yet he ought not to be unlawfully confined. He was carried into Corbett's on the 14th of November, and the fifth Bond was given the first of December; which was a great while after he was taken in Custody.
 Mr. Reeves. There was a third Bond given for 1000l. one was in July. In order to make these Bonds clear, they should be produced.
 Mr. Strange. Codnor swears, that he took but two.
 Mr. Reeves. It was sworn by Ellam that there were five.
 Mr. Serj. Darnell. The Confinement was a proper Confinement. A Tiptaff's House is a proper Confinement, and the Taking was not an unlawful Taking.
 Lord Chief-Justice. Is there not a Difference of being carried into the Rules? If not in the Rules, it is not a Part of the Prison; if not, every Prisoner that escapes and dies, the Gaoler is answerable for; and a Prisoner being there, there, will not be looked upon to be a Prisoner at large: Every Part of the Rules is a Part of the Prison, though not within the Walls: if it is not in the Prison, then there is an End: It was both illegal to carry him there, and confine him there. There is another Consideration; they say, capitally Guilty; I don't know but that is the Case here; but then it is not laid so in the Declaration. If a Prisoner dies by Duress, the Gaoler is guilty, and capitally guilty.

Mr. Lee. We humbly apprehend, that the Case must be considered, that he did with Malice aforethought murder the said Robert Castell.

Lord Chief Justice. The Law makes it so.

Mr. Lee. Therefore I apprehend, from the Nature of the Thing, and his Behaviour, that it must be taken, that in this Case they did feloniously carry this Man to the House of Richard Corbett; but that must be decided by the Evidence. They knew the House to be infected; therefore, whether the original taking him up was legal or illegal, is the Thing to be considered: If he was only taken up to be carried into the Gaol, it will have another Consideration; but the Prisoner's Intention is to be judged by the Jury. I don't know whether I should be proper in taking Notice of the Evidence; I should very shortly take Notice of the Evidence in this Trial.

Lord Chief Justice. That can't be done.

Mr. Fazakerley. As to the single Matter of taking, that will be the Consequence of the other.

Lord Chief Justice. Though the Act itself is lawful, the Usage of the Man will make it unlawful: This is a necessary Case for their Consideration; for where a Man dies in Duress, it is Murder in the Gaoler. It is the Nature of Human Bodies to take Infection; and if a Man is put into a Place where such Infection is, it will be Murder in the Gaoler.

Mr. Strange. That does not appear to be done with the Privy of either.

Lord Chief Justice. Is the Proof against Corbett's taking of him? Human Bodies may breathe forth infectious Vapours.

Mr. Fazakerley. We desire to call Noel again.

(Noel standing up again.)

Mr. Fazakerley. What has been the Usage, where an Action has been brought, and Security given for 100 l. and Judgment given upon this Action?

Mr. Noel. I don't know what it was then; but since Mr. Gambier's Time, where a Prisoner is charged with Mefne Procefs, we have taken the Bond for the Sum; but when in Execution, take the Bond in a double Penalty.

Mr. Fazakerley. We desire to call Jonathan Ireland, to ask him a Question or two, as to a Declaration of Holdsworth.

(Call Jonathan Ireland, who was sworn.)

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you know Holdsworth?

Mr. Ireland. Yes.

Mr. Fazakerley. Had you any Discourse with him about a Bed being brought out of White's Room?

Mr. Ireland. No, I had no such Discourse.

Lord Chief Justice. Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Appeal of Murder, brought by Mary Castell for the Death of her Husband. I must take Notice of the whole Appeal, because Proofs are required of the Facts as there laid. It charges, that on the 14th Day of November, in the second Year of his present Majesty, he was duly committed to the Custody of the Warden; that on the 14th of November, Richard Corbett took her Husband, arrested him, and carried him to the House of him, the said Richard Corbett, and kept him there for the Space of twenty-one Days, against the Will, and without the Consent of the said Robert Castell. Then it goes on, and says, that the said Richard Corbett did unlawfully, violently, and of Malice aforethought, imprison and detain the said Robert Castell in his the said Richard Corbett's House; and that, at the Time of taking and imprisoning of the said Robert Castell, White was ill of the Small-Pox in the same House; which Distemper Robert Castell never had.

Further sets forth, That while her Husband was there, on the 16th of November, he requested Bambridge and Corbett, that they would not detain him in the House; and then gave Notice that White was sick of the Small-Pox, and that Castell had not had them; and if he got that Distemper, it would be the Occasion of his Death: That notwithstanding this Distemper was there, they detained him there, and there kept him till the 12th of December.

Further sets forth, That on the 4th of December he fell ill of this Distemper; and on the 12th of the same December he died of the same.

To conclude, that these two Appellors did feloniously, voluntarily, and of Malice aforethought, kill and murder the said Robert Castell.

To which the two Defendants have pleaded Not Guilty. The Question for you, Gentlemen of the Jury, to consider of, is, If the Appeal is proved, and not what is opened by the Counsel: You must regard that no further than it is proved by the Evidence.

This Appeal is grounded upon this Law; that as the Law has particular Guards and Privileges in justifying the Right of Gaolers in detaining of Prisoners in safe Custody; so on the other Hand, that though they had the Liberty of keeping Prisoners secure and safe, yet they must treat them humanely, and put them into such Places as do not prejudice their Limbs and Lives; for if they should be put in such Places as they do, and they die, it lies at their Doors; that is Murder.

If a Gaoler brought Bodies that were infectious into a Room, by which a Prisoner should catch a Distemper; or put a Man into Irons, by which he should die, it would be the same Thing. If a Gaoler will take Persons that have not a Distemper, and carry them to a Room against their Consent, after Notice was given him that such a Distemper was there, it is at his Peril. Gentlemen, I must observe to you, that in the present Case all these Circumstances must be concurrent:

That he was carried there against his Will; that the Distemper was in the House; that he had Knowledge of the Distemper being there, and that the Nature of it was infectious; that Application was made on his Behalf; that notwithstanding he was carried there, and there kept; and by that Means caught that Distemper, which was the Occasion of his Death; because Distempers may arise from Human Bodies.

This is the Foundation upon which the Appeal is founded.

The first Witness is only to shew, that Mr. Bambridge was Warden of the Fleet; and for that End, he produced a Copy of the Letters Patent.

VOL. IX.

I shall take Notice of the Time, which is the 30th of September, 1728: It said, he was not admitted till after, but there is no Proof to be admitted.

The next, John Noel, is to prove, that he was committed the 18th of June, 1728. I need not trouble you with all the particular Sums, but that all together they come to 527 l. When they have proved this, it was necessary to shew that he was a Prisoner at large.

As to Corbett's House, he says, he was a Prisoner there two Months, and that he never saw any Thing but what was very humane; the House was in the Liberty of the Rules, and so consequently Part of the Prison; the Questions that were asked by the Defendant's Counsel were to shew, that he had a Right to take him up, because he might have went away before; that the House belonged to the Warden, and that the Behaviour of Corbett to him, and his Usage while he was there, were very humane.

He told you he was taken ill the 4th of December, and died the 12th; that as for the House, there were two Houses laid into one; and White was not properly in the House, because one was in the first Floor in one House, and the other was up three Pair of Stairs in the other; and that Direction was given, that White was not to come down; and White never came down during the Time Mr. Castell was there, before he died.

That as to Corbett's Wife, when Mr. Castell was ill, she did look after him as much as if he had been her own Child; and that Mr. Castell did not complain, but did say, he was very sorry he had the Distemper, and that Corbett and Castell had been of a Club together; that as to the Room, it was a very commodious Place. As to what Evidence else was given by him, I shall mention but little of it now, for I am now only summing up for the Appellant.

The next Evidence that was called was Captain Sinclair; he did not speak to the Time in Question, but spoke only to 1727; he was going on, but the Counsel knew that was not proper, so stopped him.

The next Witness was Wilson; he says, that it was a Publick House, and that they sell Beer, Ale, and Wine; and that Castell had Provision there, and paid for it. I desire, if I omit any Thing, I may be put in mind of it.

The next was Captain Collet; they made use of him for another Purpose, to prove that Mr. Castell had received 125 l. therefore they insisted, that Mr. Bambridge having Notice of this, he might take the Occasion of insisting upon further Security, in order to extort Money from him.

Mr. Lee. There is a Juryman and the Prisoner talking all the Time.

Lord Chief Justice. I must have no Obstruction of Justice; you must not disturb the Court.

The first Thing to be done was to prove, that Bambridge had Knowledge of Mr. Castell's receiving the Money for that End; Collet and Brent were called, who proved, that a Note was given to Castell, payable to him or Bearer, for the Sum; and that it was afterwards allowed in Woodward's Account. Collet says, he was in the same Room with Castell, talking about the Judgment, and says, That it was possible that he might mention the Money that was to be paid by Castell to Bambridge; that is the material Thing. They would infer on the other Side, that it cannot be proved, unless it came to the Knowledge of Bambridge; for though Brent went up to Bambridge, he cannot take upon him to say, he mentioned any thing in relation to that Sum.

What is insisted on by the Appellant's Counsel, is, that several Securities were given upon Account of Mr. Castell, and therefore Security was given before; and in order to prove that, they called Witnesses to shew he demanded several Bonds, and that Notice was given to Mr. Bambridge to produce them. As to that, the Answer that was given was, that to prevent Disputes in Court he had but one Bond. Then they called upon Witnesses to prove the Circumstances. Mr. Peter Ellam, who says, he gave Bond five Times, the first in July, 1728, for 200 l. in the second Bond one Chambers and Peter Ellam were bound; the third was for 1000 l. entered into by him and Curll; the fourth was for 1000 l. entered into by Curll, and him, and Bell, the latter End of November, in order for Mr. Castell to have the Liberty of the Rules; and there was a fifth for 2000 l. given: He says it was on a Monday, but that is a Mistake; Peter Ellam, and John, and Curll were bound in that. He says, that between the 26th and last of November, he saw Mr. Castell at Corbett's, and he asked him what was the Reason of his being there? And he made Answer, That he did not know, it was what Bambridge pleased. Then he tells you how he came to be bound; that he was a Creditor of Mr. Castell's in the Sum of 200 l. that he had a good Opinion of Mr. Castell's Industry, and that he had a Bill of Sale from him, but did not know the Date; then the Defendant's Counsel produced a Paper, which shews it was the 22d of October, 1728.

That is the Point controverted, as you will see by and bye. He says, that there was one Chambers bound, who did not care to continue any longer; he says, he himself was inclinable to give it up, but that Castell probably might get over his Difficulties, so he was resolved to continue. He was asked, Whether Bambridge did dissuade them from continuing Securities? He says, he did encourage them to continue, rather than dissuade them from it. Afterwards the Security was to be delivered up, and he was carried to Corbett's, after the 4th or 5th Bond was given; but he can't take upon him to say that Mr. Bambridge did ever accept of it; then was the other Security, in November, 1728, given by himself, John Ellam, and Curll, the Clerk attended at Gravesend; he says, he did send to them (Castell being uneasy) to have the Bonds executed: He says, That he was with Castell before he died; and he says, he was much concerned at having the Distemper, and that he did say, that Bambridge was the Occasion of his Death, for he applied to him to let him go, but he did not let him go; and told him, if he did not let him go out soon he knew he should die. This was not above two days before he died.

Then, Gentlemen, they go on upon the former Enquiry about the Bonds, to fix the Bonds upon Bambridge, and called Daniel Hopkins. He says, he was Clerk of Inquiries; but that he was taken very ill, and Codnor officiated for him. He supposes Bambridge did, if any Security was not found sufficient, scruple to continue him; and says, when Security surrenders a Man, it is the constant Practice to take them up by a Tipstaff, who brings them in Custody, and puts them into a Spunging-house: As to the House of Corbett, he knew the House, and that there was good Usage there, and that Mr. Castell had not any ill Usage there. Then they they go to shew Mr. Castell was carried there without his Consent; and in order to prove that, called Mr. Underwood, who says, that last July was twelve Months (he continued in Custody till he died) Corbett came one Morning to inquire after Mr. Castell; then he was not at his Room, and Castell seemed much concerned at the hearing of it, and said he would go up and lock himself in; that Corbett came at nine o'Clock in the Morning, and took Castell, and he seemed very much concerned; but Corbett did not use him ill. Hopkins says, that Corbett said he must go along with him, his Security had surrendered him; upon which Castell desired to stay there; and Corbett said to that, he had the Warden's Order for it, and he must obey it; he wished he could excuse it.

Then they called Catharine Mackartney; she says, she was with Mr. Castell, and saw him the Day before he died; and says, she saw him about three Days before that, and he said, if he died, he would lay his Death to Mr. Bambridge. She says, that he wanted some Necessaries, as a Tea-pot, Knife and Fork; and that her Mistress supplied him.

Savage was the next; he says, he saw Mr. Castell a little before he was taken into Custody; and Mr. Castell sent to him, to desire him to go to Mr. Bambridge, to acquaint him that they had the Small-Pox in the House; and that he was afraid of catching them; for his Family had suffered very much thereby; so he was directed to deliver himself as to his Message; and that he had a great Inconvenience, to be locked upon respect of going out by Day Rules: He says he did go, but the Defendant gave no Answer till the last Time; he says, he went two or three times; he don't know but he went three or four times; and he delivered the same Message every Time, and he had no Answer till at last, and then he said he was in Execution; and after said, he was charged with great Sums of Money, and he must take care of his Office. He says, that some time after Castell was taken ill of the Small-Pox. He says further, Gentlemen, that Bambridge came to the King's-Arms Tavern, and said that he had been at Corbett's, and that the Small-Pox being mentioned before Mr. Castell to be there, he said that Castell was extremely affected with it, and greatly concerned. He did go about some sort of Business to Mr. Bambridge.

Shortis was the next; he gave you Evidence, which I shall not repeat, it did not come to the Time; but he being cross-examined, said Bambridge treated him well.

Then Surridge was called; who said, he went with two Letters from Castell to Bambridge, and Bambridge said he would send an Answer. This is only introductory, to shew that Castell made Application to Bambridge.

Goodman was the next; he says, he was at Corbett's, and Bambridge came there, and Castell said he had sent several Messages to him; and pursuing the Discourse, Castell desired to go into the Gaol, or go into the Rules, because the Distemper was there, and he certainly should die if he caught it. He swears, that Bambridge said he should neither go into the Gaol, or into the Liberty of the Rules, without a certain Sum; (he could not take upon him to swear what it was) to which Castell said, he had given Security enough, and he would give no more. Then he went into the Tap-room, and the next Day he was taken ill, and desired a Fire in his Room. The Counsel on the other Side, they did examine him to know the Description of the Place, and asked him if he could hear what was said; he said the Door was shut, but he took upon him to swear he did hear.

Then Sutton was called; who says, that Mr. Castell was very timorous; and says, she was sent for to White; that Mr. Castell looked her in the Face, and fancied she had the Small-Pox; she said she had no more Mark than at this time; and she swears he did die of the Small-Pox.

Westbrook was the next, who spoke to the same Purpose, to shew his Apprehension of catching the Small-Pox.

Then they go to the other Evidence, to shew that there was no Necessity of carrying him to this Place. There was a Room Kilbury swears was an empty Room from the Latter-end of October till about the 5th of December, No. 16; there was a Lumber-Room besides, that might have been made commodious.

Booth he says the same.

Beaver was called next, to give an Account, that there was not only a Room in the Prison empty, but that there were Rooms empty in another Spunging-house. This is the Substance of the Evidence, as near as I can lay it before you. The Evidence given by Savage is the most material; and the Evidence given by Goodman and the other Witnesses, of his Fear of having the Small-Pox.

This being the Evidence for the Appellant; for the Defendants, they insisted upon some Points of Law, that the Party here was not illegally taken, and say this was laid so in the Declaration. This was urged, because they will shew you in their Evidence, that it was proper for the Warden to take him up by a Tipstaff; that this was a legal Taking, and that it will be the Consequence only of — that will be taken Notice of when that Part of the Case comes to be considered; that it is laid to be in one House, but there are two: Though they are different Apartments, this must be considered as one House.

The next Thing that was laid, was, that White was sick at the same time when Mr. Castell was brought in. Now say they, having proved that, they have proved the Declaration.

I don't see that the Man can be said to be ill of the Distemper when he was brought down; though the Defendant's Witnesses say, that he had not taken all his Purges; that Evidence will take off the Objection made by the Appellee's Counsel.

Then they go on further, and say, that he did actually catch this Distemper; and on the other hand, they say there was little Reason to believe it, when he was kept so long before he came down. This is true, it is to be considered in that Manner. As to the Objection of that Part of the Declaration of Mr. Castell, where he declared Bambridge was the Occasion of his Death; I must acquaint you, where a Man is wounded, and dies in a little time, we have admitted what he said to be given in Evidence. These Things were at the time when he had the Distemper, a little time before he died.

The Counsel for the Defendants gave this Answer, that if they bring him there, that his Declaration would not signify, for if they confine him there, they have a Right; it would be justifiable in them to do it.

After this Observation, they do say, that it was very incredible to hear what was said in the Room at the Bar; the Room was close boarded to the Top, and the Door was locked, and this was a long time before it was discovered; and called Witnesses to prove, how incredible it was to hear what was said in that Room.

Then the Defendants Counsel come to give Evidence that his Security had surrendered him. The Witness they make use of was Mr. Chappel, to shew that Chambers would not continue as Security any longer: He gives an Account, that Chambers would not stand, that Peter Ellam was of the same Mind, but afterwards did recede, and Bambridge said he thought them very secure; what could induce them to withdraw their Securities, don't appear; both the Ellams would stand. Chambers told Bambridge himself, that he desired to take him up; and Bambridge said, if he must be taken up; you must go to a Tipstaff, and directed him to Corbett, and Corbett demanded his Fee. That he could not find Castell at first, but went a second Time, and took him.

Ellam first refused, afterwards he was Counter-security to Ellam; that was the Reason he called the Note from Chambers.

Chambers desired Mr. Chappel to tell Bambridge, that he then came to Town in order to give him up; and Bambridge told him he was very safe, and he desired him to continue Security still. The Use they make of this is, that if Bambridge wanted him in Custody, he would not have persuaded him to continue Security. He says, that on Bambridge's saying that, he did continue some time longer; then he came to Town, and was resolved he would deliver him up; he told him again, if he was resolved, he must go to a Tipstaff, and give Six Shillings and Eight-pence for his Fee; that Chambers went that very Day to Corbett's, and had Castell taken up; and Castell said to Chappel, that he was set on; and Chappel said, he was not; and Castell said, he did not believe it; and says that Mr. Castell did not complain of any ill Usage.

Joseph Pains was the next; he says that Chambers came to his House (he was not there after he spoke to Corbett), and asked him, whether he had seen Corbett? He said, he had seen him that Day: He came there again, and met with Corbett, and told him he intended to surrender Mr. Castell, for that he was informed he was going abroad with Lord Londonderry. He says, that he charged Corbett to look for Castell; and said, if he did not get him, he would move the Court against him, and make him pay the Debt.

Woodyer, he gives an Account, that Mr. Castell was at the King's-Arms, and says, that Mr. Castell ordered him to get a Room ready, to air the Sheets, and get a Fire; and he says, he sent the Boy thereupon, but that he never saw Mr. Castell after; that Mr. Corbett went with him; that he went away easy, and did not make any Complaint.

The next is Downs; he did not say that he received the Message from Mr. Castell to get the Room ready, and that the Night before he lay at Underwood's, that he attended him there till he died; and as to Necessaries, he had every thing that was fit, and there was a Club kept there, and Corbett used to be with them.

Then Holdeforth the Chamberlain was called; who says, that Mr. Castell came in there, and wanted nothing; he seemed to complain of nothing; before he came in there the Bed was aired. They asked him, whether they could hear on the Outside of the Bar, what was said in the Room behind it? (to take off the Evidence of Goodman) He says, in his Opinion he could not hear, unless they spoke very loud. As to White, he says, he lay up three Pair of Stairs, and Castell up one Pair of Stairs; that two Houses were laid together only at the Top, and that one Stair-case was stopped up five or six Days before Castell came there.

That the Bed White lay on was brought down into Mr. Castell's Room, but the Bedstead being too little, it was carried up again; this was five or six Days before Mr. Castell came there.

The next Witness is Norton; he tells you, that a Message was brought to have a Fire made in the best Room, and to have the best Bed got ready in the best Room. He tells you, as to the Bar, that you can't hear what is said in the Inner-room.

They then called Doctor Gardiner; when he was charged in Execution, he says, he was with him at that Place; talking how Mr. Bambridge and Corbett used him, he said he was used with great Civility.

This was the last Day of Michaelmas Term, which was long after Mr. Castell was carried there, for he was carried there the 14th of November; and says, that he went back again with him.

The next was Blake; who gives an Account, that she saw Hartshorn drink made; that she never had the Small-Pox, and staid in the House the whole time White was there, but never went out.

Mr. Moor says, he found him in a convenient Room, and that he wanted nothing.

Mrs. Smith was the next; who said, that Corbett said to Bambridge, that poor Castell was ill of the Small-Pox, and Bambridge desired to let him have every thing that was necessary for him; and Corbett came again the next Day, and said the Gentlemen were uneasy, and he said he had thoughts to remove him; and Bambridge said, if they are afraid, let them go into the Gaol.

The next was Captain Martin; he tells you, that he never heard that he particularly complained; that the Second Day after the Small-Pox came out, he went to Bambridge, and was telling him how Mr. Castell was, and Bambridge said he was very sorry for it; then he went up to Mr. Castell, and told him what Mr. Bambridge had said, and Mr. Castell desired he would not mention his Name.

Then there was a Paper produced to shew what he did by a Bill of Sale.

Then King was called; who says, that Mr. Castell was at Corbett's, and that Bambridge used him very well, and Bambridge paid his Reckoning on the 21st of November, which is about seven Days after he came into Corbett's House.

One Hawson, another Witness, says, that Mr. Castell owed him Money, and that Bambridge was employed for him, and this was about ten Days before Mr. Castell died.

Then they come to shew you what became of the Bonds.

Peter Ellam proves that there were five; but then it was not proved they were delivered to Bambridge.

Cadnor, he was Clerk, and says, he had repeated Directions, from time to time, to take Mr. Castell's Security as soon as they came; he says, there were but two taken; there was 1000*l.* 1000*l.* and 2000*l.* but he only admitted of 1000*l.* and 2000*l.*

He

He says, that the Bonds were taken de bene esse, in their Language, which was only to be taken in order for an Inquiry; one was taken up and cancelled, the other was only de bene esse.

He tells you likewise, that all the Charges was 500*l.* this was taken in the Penalty of 2000*l.*

He says, that where the Charge is first for 100*l.* and Judgment for 100*l.* they take Bonds for double.

There are other Witnesses say, that the Custom is otherwise lately: they say what the other said; and that the same Man may have a Declaration for one Sum, and Judgment for another.

Counsel says positively, that the two last Bonds were only taken de bene esse. This Evidence has been long, according to the different Things; if any thing is omitted, you'll remind me of it.

Gentlemen, you are to consider in the first place, as to Corbett, that only Part of the Evidence relates to him; as to the taking Mr. Castell up; but as it does not appear he had any Knowledge of the Small-Pox being there then, I apprehend it is not sufficient to convict him: Then as to Bambridge; if Bambridge had notice that he never had this Distemper, that he was afraid of catching it, that he desired not to go there; if he did carry him afterwards, against his Will, and Castell did catch this Distemper of White, and he died of that Distemper, then he is Guilty. The Appeal depends upon these Circumstances. I take it in point of Law, they must all concur; if they do not, you will not find them Guilty; if they do, you will find them Guilty.

Clerk. Gentlemen of the Jury, answer to your Names. (Which they did.)

Clerk. Who shall say for you?—Jury. The Foreman.

Clerk. Are you agreed?

Omnes. Yes.

Clerk. Are the Defendants, or either, and which of them, Guilty or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Not Guilty.

Upon this Acquittal, Mr. Kettleby moved the Court, on the Statute of 13 Edw. I. c. 12. which enacts, That upon a false Appeal, by Malice, the Appellor shall suffer a Year's Imprisonment, and restore the Parties appealed their Damages, at the Discretion of the Justices.

But the Court would not allow the same; the Chief-Justice said, * He was only to try the Issue, and that the Application was proper above, or by Writ of Conspiracy, and all he could do was to record the Verdict.

Upon 3 February following, the Appellees appeared in Court, and having given a Rule upon the poslea, which they then produced, and Nobody appearing to say any thing against them, they were discharged. Strange pro Appellatis.

Clerk. Hold up your Hand. (Which he did.) You of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, and hearken to his Charge. He stands indicted by the Name of, &c. (prout in the Indictment mutatis mutandis.)

Mr. Acton. I desire the Indictment may be read in Latin.

Mr. Strange. I desire Mr. Serjeant Baynes may be here, before it is read.

Mr. Baron Carter. I have staid an Hour already, I can't stay any longer.

Crier, make Proclamation to keep Silence upon Pain of Imprisonment. This is a Trial for Life and Death, and I shall commit any one that don't hold their Peace.

Mr. Harding. William Acton stands indicted for the Murder of Thomas Bliss. The Indictment sets forth, That John Darby was Keeper of the King's Palace-Court at Westminster, and had the Custody of the Prisoners there.

That William Acton, during the Time he was Servant of the said John Darby, was employed in and about the Care and Custody of the Prisoners there.

That the said William Acton, being a Person of an inhumane and cruel Disposition, did on the 21st of October, in the Thirteenth Year of the late King, cruelly, barbarously, and feloniously beat, assault, and wound the said Thomas Bliss, then being a Prisoner under the Custody of the said John Darby; and of Malice aforethought did carry the said Bliss into the Strong-Room, and put on Irons and Fetters of great Weight upon his Legs; and the said Bliss was exposed to the Damp, and Wet, and Cold of the said Room; which is a dangerous, damp, noisome, filthy, and an unwholesome Place.

The Indictment further sets forth, that he put on an Iron Instrument, and Engine of Torture, upon the Head of the said Thomas Bliss, called the Scull-Cap; and also Thumb-Screws upon his Thumbs; and that he remained there three Hours under all this Torture and Torment.

At the Time of the imprisoning the said Thomas Bliss in the Room aforesaid, he knew it to be damp, noisome, and filthy; and consequently very unwholesome.

That during the Detention of the said Thomas Bliss in the said Room, by Durefs of the Imprisonment, by being assaulted, beat and wounded, the said Thomas Bliss became languid, and contracted such an Indisposition, and ill Habit of Body, that he languished; and, by reason of this Durefs, died.

The Indictment concludes, that he did feloniously, voluntarily, and of Malice aforethought, murder the said Thomas Bliss.

Gentlemen, the Prisoner has pleaded Not Guilty; and if we prove him guilty, you will find him so.

Mr. Marsh. I have the Honour to be Counsel for the King against William Acton, the Prisoner at the Bar. The Offence is Murder; and Nobody can be guilty of Murder, but by being a Person of a malicious and cruel Nature. The Law determines all Differences between all Subjects; and by the Laws of this Land, the Body and Person of the unfortunate Debtor is liable to Imprisonment till he pays the Debt; and the Law takes care, that Gaolers and Keepers of Prisons should have a particular Encouragement and Defence against the Persons that offer Abuses to them in the Capacity of a Gaoler; and on the other hand, the Law takes care, that they shall not use their Prisoners inhumanely or cruelly.

The Nature of all Custody is to answer for the Debt owing, or Injuries done; and the Person is to be kept safe there, till justly delivered in Court. Where a Person is condemned in an Action where Judgment is had against him, then the Gaoler is to keep the Prisoner in safe Custody, but not to use any inhumane Treatment.

That, by the common Fate and Inequality of human Affairs, Mankind cannot be alike in point of Fortune, and it must fall to the Lot of many to become insolvent; and it would be very hard for these of the Unfortunate, when they are reduced by the Confinement and Miseries of a Gaol, to be made more miserable by the Cruelty of the Gaoler; who ought to treat his Prisoners with Lenity and Humanity. Bliss was put in Gaol, and was there kept for a small Debt.

The Indictment takes notice, that Darby had the Custody of the Gaol; and that Acton was his Servant, and stood in his Place; and performed the same as Darby ought to have done.

That the Prisoner at the Bar, by a long Train and Series of cruel and inhuman Usage, maltreated the Deceased (I would not be hard upon a Man in his Circumstances); I may say what the Law allows, that he being under Darby as Servant, assaulted Bliss, who was a Prisoner for Debt under his Care, and prosecuted that, by putting him into that Place, where he would not have put his Swine, or other Beast.

A Place so damp, in which were so many noxious Humours, that any one that was put there must be in Danger of Death, not only from the noxious Vapours, but from the want of a due Covering at Top; and from its being so remote from the Sun, that it could have no Influence upon it, and mult for want of it grow noxious, even to Infection.

To make Misery more miserable, he put him there without Bed or Bedding.

A Bed would have kept him warm, but he was denied that, which is seldom denied even to Criminals and Convicts; nor would he afford him the cold Comfort even of Straw; but he was restrained from the Liberty of looking out for any thing to relieve him from the Injuries of the Place.

He was several times very hardly used; he was so beat with a most terrible Instrument of Correction, a Bull's-pizzle, that his Clothes were forced to be cut off his Body.

There is no punishing the Body without the Concurrence of the Mind. The Prisoner sent for this poor Man out of this terrible Place, in Sport and Ridicule, to the Lodge where he had Company; and there had an Iron Instrument fixed upon his Head, Thumb-screws on his Thumbs, that the Blood started from his Thumbs. He had another Instrument, called a Collar, put about his Neck; it was very far from being easy; it there made an Impression that the Mark plainly appeared: He had a Load of heavy Irons on, worse than any Yoke of Servitude; after these Instruments were fixed on him, he had Fetters put upon his Legs, of great Weight.

What

What then were the Fetters put on for? To add to the Affliction of the Man, and to shew the Cruelty of the Prisoner, I have already mentioned, that he was a Prisoner for Debt: They should not be loaded with Fetters, upon any Pretence whatever.

Indeed, by an old Act of Parliament, where Auditors of Accounts were found indebted to their Principal, and are imprisoned, and refuse to account, they may be ironed; but this is an obsolete, disused Law, and being in a particular Case excludes all others. Lord Coke takes Notice, that it is not lawful, that Prisoners for Debt by the Common Law should be put in Durefs.

The Indictment does not say, that it was the Occasion of his immediate Death; but it would have been better that one of those Instruments had put an End to his Life, that he had expired under these Cruelties, his Death would have put an End to him and them together; for every body would rather choose to die immediately, than to be so punished, when Death must be the Consequence. But though he survived them, the Effects remained; the Man soon died, and that shews that it was the Cause of his Death. The Indictment charges, that the Prisoner killed and murdered him. If we prove the Facts, they will justify that Conclusion; and then we must submit to your Lordship, if it is Murder. If a Gaoler brings a Prisoner to his Death by Durefs, it is Murder; and the Law in such Case judges it to be Malice prepenfe.

There is one Thing I should have taken Notice of; that in Case of the Death of any Prisoner, the Law requires the Gaoler to have the Coroner's Inquest to sit upon the Body, to inquire the Cause of his Death: I don't find that was done.

Mr. Ward. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel of the same Side. If a Gaoler, or the Servant of a Gaoler, kills a Prisoner by Durefs, I take that to be Murder; the Reason of the Law is plain: By the Constitution of this Country, a Prison is only for the safe Custody of the Prisoners till tried or discharged: If that is turned into Cruelty, it is contrary to the Law; and he must answer for it. If Bliss came to his Death by Aiton, if that Usage was the Occasion of his Death, I must conclude, as in the Indictment, that he is guilty of Murder. To shew you, Gentlemen, that Aiton used him in that barbarous manner, we shall shew, that the Place he kept him in was unfit for any human Creature; it was not defended from the Violence of the Rains and Seasons, which made it moist and damp, and very unwholesome. He was kept here without a Bed; this might be the Occasion of his Death; but if he had Force used upon him afterwards, there can be no Reason to doubt it.

We shall shew you that he had actual Force used upon him. He had a Cap of Iron fixed on his Head, and a Collar of Iron on his Neck, so that he could not open his Jaws; even his Sustenance was forced to be pulled into little Pieces, for it was impossible before to get it into his Mouth, which was occasioned by the Weight of his Collar. The Man did address himself to a Person, who condescended to chew it fit for him to get it into his Mouth.

Besides these Irons he had Thumb-Screws on his Thumbs, and the Blood gushed out of them; besides this, he was beat with a Bull's Pizzle and a Rope, and was black all over. Not content with this, the Prisoner at the Bar stamped upon his Belly, till the Swelling was so great, that his Clothes were forced to be cut off his Body.

Further, to be more barbarous, he put him into Fetters so strait, that they made an Impression on his Legs, and eat into the Skin; which occasioned a Wound and Mortification in his Legs. This was the Usage of the Prisoner, to a poor Man who was only to be kept in safe Custody by him. If he did not die immediately, but languished of his Wounds, and then died of them; that will be as much chargeable upon him.

If we call our Evidence, and prove the Case, you will find him Guilty: That he feloniously, and of Malice aforethought, assaulted and murdered Thomas Bliss.

Mr. Trigg. A Person confined for a very small Debt, to have all those Engines of Torture upon him, is contrary to Law.

Mr. Ward. It is set forth in the Indictment, that Darby was Keeper of the Prison; therefore it is proper to proceed to prove that first.

John Wilson being produced.

Mr. Marsh. What is your Name?—Mr. Wilson. John Wilson.

Mr. Marsh. Have you been sworn?—Mr. Wil. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. Do you know the Marshalsea Prison?

Mr. Wil. Yes, I have been a Prisoner there ever since April 1726.

Mr. Marsh. Who was the Keeper?—Mr. Wil. John Darby.

Mr. Marsh. Do you know the Prisoner at the Bar, William Aiton?

Mr. Wil. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. In the Year 1726 was Mr. Aiton concerned, and in what Manner?

Mr. Wil. He acted as chief Turnkey, and succeeded one Burleigh.

Mr. Marsh. What is the Nature of Turnkey?

Mr. Wil. He acted under Mr. Darby, in taking care of the Prisoners.

Mr. Marsh. Acquaint my Lord, and the Jury, if you remember Thomas Bliss.—Mr. Wil. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. I must put you in mind, you have only examined to the Year 1726.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he (Aiton) continue under Mr. Darby?

Mr. Wil. I can't justly say how long; till Mr. Darby farmed out the Gaol.

Mr. Marsh. How long had it been farmed out?

Mr. Wil. I believe it had been farmed out a Year, more or less.

Mr. Marsh. When was it farmed out?—Mr. Wil. I believe in May 1727.

Mr. Ward. You say, you believe it was farmed out in 1727; Who took care of the Prisoners then? Who in May 1727?

Mr. Baron Carter. You need not go so far; take any Part of the Year 1727, to the Death of Bliss.

Mr. Ward. From what do you know he was Turnkey? How long was he so before 1727?

Mr. Wil. He was so the Time I was committed. I was committed in 1726.

Mr. Ward. You believe he did continue as such from 1726 to 1727.

Mr. Wil. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Did Aiton ask?

Mr. Wil. Aiton did ask, if seldom saw Darby there.

Mr. Marsh. Give an Account what Condition Bliss was in.

Mr. Wil. When I was committed a Prisoner in 1726, he was then put in the sick Ward; a little before the Act passed, to prevent frivolous and vexatious Arrests, there was a Draught made of four Prisoners out of each Ward, to be put into the Pump-Ward, and I and Bliss were among them: He then appeared to be a sad Object, very lame, and I took an Opportunity to ask him the Cause of it, and he told me that he attempted to escape; but being seen by a Woman, he was discovered in the Attempt, and fell down and dislocated his Ankle; and that one Rogers and Pope took him, and brought him into the Gaol again, who he said had beat him.

Mr. Aiton. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked, if he ever saw Bliss in Irons?

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that.—Mr. Wil. No, my Lord.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask him, my Lord, if Bliss ever fell off the Top of the House.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?—Mr. Wil. He did.

Mr. Baron Carter. He said so before.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, my Lord, if he ever saw Bliss beat, or confined in the Strong Room.—Mr. Wil. I never saw him beat.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, my Lord, if he saw my Behaviour to the Prisoners in general.

Mr. Baron Car. What say you to that?

Mr. Wil. I have seen People beat, and put in Irons.

Mr. Ward. By whose Directions?—Mr. Wil. I believe by Aiton's.

Mr. Ward. Have you seen Aiton strike Prisoners?

Mr. Wil. I have seen him strike Prisoners with his Fist.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Bliss with an Iron Instrument on?—Mr. Wil. No.

Mr. Bar. Carter. What Behaviour did Aiton use towards his Prisoners?

Mr. Wil. He behaved very well to some, and used others ill.

Mr. Strange. Wilson's Evidence is Hear-say, being only the Declaration of the Deceased.

Mrs. Anne Bliss sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know Thomas Bliss?—Mrs. Bliss. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. Who was he?—Mrs. Bliss. My Husband.

Mr. Marsh. Do you remember the Time when he was put into the Strong Room?

Mrs. Bliss. He was a Prisoner in the Marshalsea for a small Debt.

Mr. Marsh. Did you use to visit him?

Mrs. Bliss. I went to him every Night and Morning.

Mr. Marsh. Acquaint my Lord, and the Jury, with every Step as to the Treatment of your Husband.

Mrs. Bliss. My Husband went to make his Escape, and was betrayed.

Mr. Ward. Tell the Time.

Mrs. Bliss. He and six or seven others went to break into a Baker's, and Aiton came in.

Mr. Ward. Name the Time.

Mrs. Bliss. I can't be sure when it was, but one Murlimus, when he was put in, was there, and was collared.

Mr. Marsh. Was you by?

Mrs. Bliss. I saw it next Morning; I went into the Strong Room, and Murlimu had an Iron Collar on, but my Husband was only fettered.

Mr. Marsh. I confine my Question only to your Husband. What Room was he in?—Mrs. Bliss. The Strong Room.

Mr. Marsh. Describe it.

Mrs. Bliss. It is a Room floored with Boards, and there is a Hole big enough to put in a Pot of Beer, and I saw him in there thro' the Hole.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he lie there?

Mrs. Bliss. He lay there three Weeks, in the Winter-Time.

Mr. Ward. You say, there is a little Hole, big enough to put in a Quart Pot?—Mrs. Bliss. Yes, there is, just on the Side of the Door.

Mr. Baron Carter. Stay a little, I can't hear one Word. You say you could not go into the Room, but looked thro' the Hole?—Mrs. Bliss. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you observe the Condition of the Room?

Mrs. Bliss. The Floor was very damp, and it had rained that Night, and had rained in.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was it covered at Top?

Mrs. Bliss. Yes, but the Rain came in through the Boards.

Mr. Foster. Were the Irons heavy he had on?

Mrs. Bliss. Yes, they were.

Mr. Ward. What Time of the Year was it?

Mrs. Bliss. It was much about Christmas Time.

Mr. Ward. How long ago?

Mrs. Bliss. About three Months after he was in Gaol.

Mr. Ward. What Time did he first go into Gaol?

Mrs. Bliss. I cannot tell the Month.

Mr. Ward. Can't you be certain as to the Time?

Mrs. Bliss. I think it was after Christmas, not much.

Mr. Ward. How long since?

Mrs. Bliss. It was much about three Years; it was much about four Years since the first Time he attempted to escape. He went to make an Escape a second Time, by a Rope, about two or three Months after the first Attempt; and then Aiton pursued after him, and took him.

Mr. Ward. Do you know this of your own Knowledge?

Mrs. Bliss. When I came the next Day to the Prison, Nichols said, there is the Bitch his Wife, and Aiton ordered me to be called into the Lodge; and said, Damn you, Madam, I will have you before Justice Ladd, for bringing the Rope to your Husband: Damn you, I will confine you; and he put me into the Place where they put the Irons in, adjoining to the Lodge, and kept me there an Hour. Whilst I was there, he sent for my Husband into the Lodge, and put on the Scull-cap, Collar, Thumb-Screws, and Fetters.

Mr. Ward. Were they all put on at the same Time?—Mrs. Bliss. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Who put them on?

Mrs. Bliss. They were put on by Aiton's Order.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him order it?

Mrs. Bliss. I heard him order it, I did not see it.

Mr. Ward. Did you see them on your Husband?

Mrs. Blifs. I did. My Husband said, As you are a Man, I hope you will use me as such; Aston said, If you will confess who brought you the Rope; and ordered him into a Place called the Dungeon; and when he was put there, sent for me, and said, I will now have you before Justice Ladd; but having a Friend there, who interceded, I was let go out of the Gaol, and came the next Morning, and found my Husband in the Dungeon; he spoke to me thro' the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him?

Mrs. Blifs. I did not see him, but thro' the Hole. He said, This Place, and the cruel Usage I have had, will be the Death of me. He was beat so, that his Cloaths were forced to be cut off, and his Body, Stomach, and Belly, were very much swelled.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him beat?—Mrs. Blifs. I saw the Marks.

Mr. Ward. When did you see him in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Blifs. About two Hours after I came in, in the Morning; Aston came down the Yard at the same Time.

Mr. Ward. Had he all these Irons on when Aston came down?

Mrs. Blifs. He had them all on.

Mr. Ward. When were his Cloaths cut off?

Mrs. Blifs. His Cloaths were cut off from his Body after Nichols beat him, because he was swelled.

Mr. Ward. You told us that you saw your Husband, what had he on?

Mrs. Blifs. I saw him with the Scull-cap, Collar, and Irons on.

Mr. Ward. By whose Order were they put on?

Mrs. Blifs. I heard Aston order them to be put on.

Mr. Ward. What was he swelled with?

Mrs. Blifs. He was swelled with the Blows that Aston had given him, as my Husband told me.

Mr. Foster. How long was this before his Death?

Mrs. Blifs. His Cloaths were forced to be cut down; and Aston told the Nurse of the sick Ward, to take a deal of Care of him.

Mr. Foster. Recollect what Year this was in?

Mrs. Blifs. It was about two Years and Three Quarters ago.

Mr. Richardson. When he was in this Place, (the Strong Room) did you see any Blood about him?

Mrs. Blifs. He bled at the Mouth, and he told me, that it was caused by having the Iron Instrument on his Head; and the Blood flowed from under the Nails of his Thumbs.

Mr. Harding. Did you make any Complaint of this Usage?

Mrs. Blifs. A Friend of mine did.

Mr. Harding. How long did he continue in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Blifs. Above a Month at one Time, a Week at another, and another Time about three Days.

Mr. Harding. How long before he died?

Mrs. Blifs. About seven or eight Months before he died.

Mr. Richardson. Did you see your Husband beat?

Mrs. Blifs. He was black as any thing with the Marks of the Bull's-pizzle Aston kept. Rogers and Nichols knocked him down with a Bunch of Keys, as I was told.

Mr. Richardson. From the time you saw him in this Condition, till he died, how long was it?

Mrs. Blifs. About seven or eight Months.

Mr. Richardson. When did he die?

Mrs. Blifs. He died on Lady-day.

Mr. Richardson. What Condition of Health was he in?

Mrs. Blifs. He was a pretty while in the sick Ward, and then was removed into his own Ward.

Mr. Richardson. How long after this Usage was it before he died?

Mrs. Blifs. Seven or eight Months.

Mr. Richardson. Was it in Summer-time?

Mrs. Blifs. It was at the Beginning of Summer.

Mr. Baron Carter. I must be forced to tell you, not to ask the same Questions over and over again.

Mr. Richardson. What was the Occasion of Death?

Mrs. Blifs. I verily believe the cruel Usage of Aston and Nichols; for he said to me a little before he died, I must soon leave you, and Nobody is the Death of me but Aston and Nichols.

Mr. Baron Carter. The first Witness, Wilson, put it right, when he came in April 1726, to Lady-day 1727; you must keep her to that Time.

Mr. Harding. What Time did you see him in Fetters?

Mrs. Blifs. Seven or eight Months before he died.

Mr. Aston. My Lord, please to ask her if I was by when the Scull-cap was upon her Husband's Head.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?

Mrs. Blifs. I saw it on in the Strong Room.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, my Lord, if he was not well after this, and went into the Country to work.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that Question?

Mrs. Blifs. He went to Enfield to work, but was so ill he could not work; he did not do three Hours Work there.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked, if he had not got a violent Cold by working.

Mrs. Blifs. When he came home, he said he was very bad, and I got him Half a Pint of Wine, and put him to Bed; he continued very ill for a Week, keeping his Bed some Part of the Time, and some Part sat up; and then desired me to get him into the Hospital, for that he could not recover it, and Aston was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, if any body was by when her Husband told her I was the Occasion of his Death.

Mrs. Blifs. He made the Declaration as I was sitting on the Side of the Bed.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked, if he had not strained his Ankle by a Fall from the House, when he attempted to escape.—Mrs. Blifs. Yes.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, my Lord, how long it was after her Husband died, before she complained to any body that I was the Cause of his Death.

Mrs. Blifs. I never complained to any body, because I had no Money to go to Law, nor Friends, nor any body else to stand by me.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, who she lodged with when her Husband died.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that?—Mrs. Blifs. I lodged with my Sister.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask her, if she ever complained to her Sister.

VOL. IX.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?—Mrs. Blifs. No, I did not.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, if she complained to her Father or Mother.

Mrs. Blifs. I had no Father, and as to my Mother, I did not see her in half a Year; it was above a Quarter of a Year after my Husband's Death.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked again, if she did not tell her Mother.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did not you tell your Mother?

Mrs. Blifs. No, I had a Difference with my Mother, on account of her marrying a second Husband.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked, when was the first time of her complaining, whether it was voluntarily, or whether she was sent for; and by whom, and whereto.

Mr. Baron Carter. You hear the Question.

Mrs. Blifs. One Mr. Newland, an Acquaintance of my Father's, knowing how my Husband was used, sent for me.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked, when and where.

Mrs. Blifs. To his own House.

Mr. Aston. Please, my Lord, to ask how long ago.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that.—Mrs. Blifs. I believe half a Year.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask her, my Lord, when Mr. Newland sent for her, what he sent for her for; and whether he did not say there was Money for her.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?

Mrs. Blifs. Knowing how barbarously my Husband was used, he said he would have me right his Death; and ordered me to go to a Gentleman about it; but said nothing of Money.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask, my Lord, if she did not tell Hester Long she was to have Money to swear her Husband's Death to me.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you tell Hester Long so?

Mrs. Blifs. No; my Sister came to me, and said, Mr. Newland desired to see me; and she said, she believed there was Money for me. Afterwards I saw Newland, and he told me to go to the Gentleman.

Mr. Aston. I desire she may be asked again, if she did not tell Hester Long, she was to have Money to swear her Husband's Death to me.

Mrs. Blifs. No.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask her, if she did not tell Hester Long, she was to have fifty Shillings, or three Pounds.

Mr. Baron Carter. I must take care you do not ask her Questions to injure herself.

Susannah Dodd, being produced and sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you see Blifs in Prison?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes, a hundred times, and once in Irons.

Mr. Marsh. What Time did you see him Irons?

Mrs. Dodd. He had them on the next Day after he was put in the Strong Room.

Mr. Marsh. What Time of the Year?

Mrs. Dodd. Between Winter and Summer.

Mr. Marsh. How long before he died?—Mrs. Dodd. A Quarter of a Year.

Mr. Marsh. Do you know when he died?

Mrs. Dodd. I was not with him.

Mr. Marsh. When do you know he died? Have you been told when he died?

Mrs. Dodd. I knew he was dead, because his Wife came and said he was dead.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was it the first or second Time he made his escape he was out two or three Months?

Mr. Aston. My Lord, he was not out then at all.

Mr. Baron Carter. I will call the Woman again.

Mrs. Blifs being called.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was your Husband twice in Goal, or once?

Mrs. Blifs. Only once.

Mr. Marsh. What Gentleman did Mr. Newland send you to?

Mr. Baron Carter. It is not usual to ask Questions after a Witness has been examined, and only called again to explain a Fact.

Mr. Marsh. It is only to clear up what she has already given in Evidence.

Mrs. Blifs. Mr. Newland, an Acquaintance of my Father's, only sent for me.

Mr. Marsh. How long since?—Mrs. Blifs. Three Weeks last Sunday.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who is Newland?—Mrs. Blifs. He lives in Southwark.

Mr. Baron Carter. What is he?—Mrs. Blifs. He is a Baker.

Mrs. Dodd standing up again.

Mr. Ward. When did you see him last in Gaol?

Mrs. Dodd. About three Months before he died.

Mr. Ward. When did he die?

Mrs. Dodd. I can't be certain when he died.

Mr. Ward. What Condition did you see him in?

Mrs. Dodd. I went to the Strong Room to carry him some Victuals, and he had Thumb-screws on his Thumbs, Irons on his Legs, an Iron Cap on his Head.

Mr. Ward. Had he Fetters on his Legs?

Mrs. Dodd. He had very large Fetters on his Legs, and Irons cross his Legs too. I spoke to him thro' the Hole.

The said Irons being produced and viewed by the Witnesses.

Mr. Ward. Are those the same you saw upon Blifs?

Mrs. Dodd. They are.

The Irons called Sheers being shown her particularly.

Mr. Ward. Look on them, had he any other Irons on his Legs than those?

Mrs. Dodd. He had the Sheers cross his Legs, and Fetters on besides. The Deceased asked me to give him Relief, and desired me to chew his Victuals, for his Mouth was sore; and I pulled it to Pieces, and fed him.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of his Mouth being sore?

Mrs. Dodd. He was confined two Days in this Condition.

Mr. Ward. How do you know it?

Mrs. Dodd. By being sent backwards and forwards of Errands.

Mr. Ward. Did he speak to you?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes, he spoke to me several times.

Mr. Hard. Could he chew?—Mrs. Dodd. I don't believe he could chew.

Mr. Foster. How long was he in this Condition in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Dodd. A Day or two.

Mr. Ward. How long ago?—Mrs. Dodd. Five or six Months ago.

Mr. Ward. How long ago is it since you saw him in that Condition? Recollect yourself, how long ago it might be.

B b

Mrs.

Mrs. Dodd. I can't tell exactly.
 Mr. Ward. How long was it after he was turned out, before it was reported he was dead?—Mrs. Dodd. About half a Year.
 Mr. Ward. How long was it then, before he was in that Condition?
 Mrs. Dodd. This was about a Quarter of a Year before.
 Mr. Ward. What Time of the Year was it?
 Mrs. Dodd. It was about Southwark Fair-time.
 Mr. Ward. Did you see him bleed at the Mouth, or any where else?
 Mrs. Dodd. There is a great Hole on the Side of the Door, and I saw him screwed, and saw him bleeding at his Thumb Nails.

Being again shewn the Iron Instrument called the Sheers.

Mr. Ward. How was it used?—Mrs. Dodd. It goes between the Legs.
 Mr. Harding. What Sort of a Place is the Strong Room?
 Mrs. Dodd. It is a large Room, and strong.
 Mr. Harding. Describe the Room. Is it damp?
 Mrs. Dodd. It is not damp; it is dry enough.
 Mr. Harding. Is it covered at Top?
 Mrs. Dodd. It is leaded over at Top. I gave him Drink through the Hole by the Door, while he held his Head backward; he could not take it himself, because of his Hands being confined.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, if he was well in Health when he came to lodge at the House where she lived?
 Mrs. Dodd. He was only lame in his Legs; he was well as to every Thing else.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask her, if she did not see him the Day after he came out of the Strong Room.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him the Day after he came out of the Strong Room?—Mrs. Dodd. No, it was two Days after.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him when his Cloaths were cut off?

Mrs. Dodd. No.

Ruth Butler, being produced, was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Blifs in the Gaol?

Mrs. Butler. I was a Prisoner in 1725.

Mr. Ward. How long did you continue a Prisoner?

Mrs. Butler. I continued till I was cleared by the late Act, about fourteen Days ago.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Blifs?—Mrs. Butler. I did.

Mr. Ward. How long was he in Prison, while you was there? Give an Account of what you knew of Blifs.

Mrs. Butler. He was a Prisoner, I cannot say how long; but I saw him going over the House, and he fell off; and was taken on the other Side, and brought in again; and was put in the Strong Room by Acton, Thomas Nichols, Rogers and Page.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton put him there?

Mrs. Butler. I saw Acton concerned in putting him there. He kept him there till the other Prisoners were locked up, and then brought him into the sick Ward, and Acton beat him with a Bull's-pizzle there, and stamped upon his Body several Times, he (Blifs) lying upon the Ground. He had hurt his Leg with the Fall, and thought it was broke. He continued in the sick Ward that Night, and the next Day they carried him into the Lodge, and there put Irons on.

Mr. Ward. What Irons?

Mrs. Butler. They put on long Irons, that kept his Legs to a vast Extent.

Mr. Ward. When was this?

Mrs. Butler. The next Morning after he fell in going over the House; in the latter End of February, or the Beginning of March.

Mr. Baron Carter. You say it was the latter End of February, or the Beginning of March. Was it the first Time of his escaping?

Mrs. Butler. Yes.

Mr. Richardson. Did you see him after he went out of Gaol?

Mrs. Butler. I never saw him after he went out of Gaol.

Mr. Ward. How long was he out of Gaol before he died?

Mrs. Butler. I don't know.

Mr. Ward. Recollect the last Time you saw him in Gaol; when was it?

Mrs. Butler. I cannot say.

Mr. Harding. Did you see him when he left the Gaol? How was he?

Mrs. Butler. He was very bad, very ill; I heard him often say after this Usage, that the Bruises and Hurts Acton gave him by stamping upon him, would be the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Richardson. Do you believe that those Bruises and that ill Usage was the Occasion of his Death?

Mrs. Butler. I verily believe they were the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Richardson. What State of Health was he in when he left the Gaol?

Mrs. Butler. In a very ill State of Health.

Mr. Baron Carter. For my Satisfaction and the Jury's, give an Account particularly when he was beat with the Bull's-pizzle.

Mrs. Butler. He was first beat with the Bull's-pizzle; then flung upon the Ground, and stamped upon.

Mr. Baron Carter. Whereabouts did Acton stamp upon him?

Mrs. Butler. Betwixt his Belly and his Stomach, and upon his Belly.

Mr. Baron Carter. How many Times did you observe him to stamp upon him (Blifs)?—Mrs. Butler. Three Times.

Mr. Richardson. I will ask you one Question.

Mr. Baron Carter. I can't admit you to ask any Questions now; I asked them for my own, not your Information.

Matthew Bacon (being called and sworn.)

Mr. Ward. Did you see the Deceased?

Mr. Bacon. Yes, several Times; I saw him when he was sick, and when his Legs were swelled.

Mr. Ward. What State of Health was he in?

Mr. Bacon. He was very sickly and very lame; his Legs were swelled, and he complained of the Bruises that he had received from Acton.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Bacon. I was not a Prisoner then; I was a Prisoner from about the latter End of April to Michaelmas following, and then I was discharged. He was sick great Part of that Time, and said he should do well enough, if not for the Bruises; and that that Rogue, Acton, had done that to him which he should never recover.

Mr. Harding. What State of Health was he in when you left the Prison?

Mr. Bacon. He was sickly.

Mr. Richardson. Do you know the Strong Room?

Mr. Bacon. Yes; it is standing at the South-East Part of the Gaol; and is a Terror to all those that behave themselves ill; and is not fit to put a human Creature in, to remain there.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after you was discharged?

Mr. Bacon. I was discharged about Michaelmas, 1726, and went to the Gaol to see him between Michaelmas and Christmas; and I am positive he was never well while I saw him in Gaol.

Mr. Ward. Did he complain of any Thing?

Mr. Bacon. He complained of Pains in his Side, which he attributed to Acton.

Mr. Harding. What Sort of a Place is the Strong Room?

Mr. Bacon. It is a Square, as big as the Square between the Posts in the Court; and has no Light but through a little Hole on the Side of the Door; and it is damp.

Mr. Harding. Is it unwholesome?

Mr. Bacon. It is undeniably to all Mankind unwholesome. I have seen People dead in it.

Mr. Baron Carter. What is the Prisoner's general Character in the Gaol?

Mr. Bacon. A great many give him an ill Character, but I never had any Abuse from him; I never deserved it.

Mary Gillis (being sworn.)

Mr. Ward. Do you know Blifs?

Mrs. Gillis. Yes; I was a Prisoner nineteen Months, and remember Blifs very well.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what you know in relation to Blifs.

Mrs. Gillis. The Account I can give is this: The Man was almost perished for Want, and with a Rope had attempted to escape, being tied round his Middle; but being discovered, the Rope was cut, and he fell into the Yard on the other Side, and received Damage in one of his Legs; and though he could not stand, Acton and his Servants brought him into the Lodge.

Mr. Ward. When was it?

Mrs. Gillis. In an Evening; about the Beginning of March.

Mr. Ward. Who were Acton's Servants? Name them.

Mrs. Gillis. Richard Page, Nichols and Rogers. Acton was there himself; they pulled and hawled him about, and Acton beat him with a Bull's-pizzle; he stood upon one Leg, for he could not set the other to the Ground, and cried out for Mercy; and they asked him, who gave him the Rope? He said, Thomas Crabb. Then they put him in a Hole, a little Place under the Stairs, and he lay there a little while; and when he came out, they ironed him on one Leg.

Mr. Ward. Do you believe this Usage was the Occasion of his Death?

Mrs. Gillis. I believe in my Heart he died for Want of Food, as well as by being so used.

Mr. Richardson. Did you see his Body?—Mrs. Gillis. I never did.

Mr. Harding. They wanted him to confess who brought the Rope?

Mrs. Gillis. Yes; they did ask him who brought it.

Mr. Harding. What Time was it?

Mrs. Gillis. It was Candle-light; I came out of one Carey's Shop.

Mr. Ward. What State of Health was he in when he left the Gaol?

Mrs. Gillis. I came out before him. He was sick in the Sick Ward when I came out.

Mr. Ward. What Irons had he on?

Mrs. Gillis. I never saw him but with one Iron on.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him beat?

Mrs. Gillis. Yes; I did stand by, and saw him beat; and he fell down through Weakness from the Hurt.

Mr. Harding. Did you ever hear him complain of the Injuries he received?

Mrs. Gillis. I never went near him, nor asked him.

Mr. Harding. How many Blows did you see him receive?

Mrs. Gillis. I cannot tell.

Mr. Harding. How long were they using him in that Manner?

Mrs. Gillis. They were half a Quarter of an Hour using him in that Manner.

Mr. Harding. Was Acton by?

Mrs. Gillis. He was present at the same Time he was beat; but he was beat mostly by Nichols.

James Abbot was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Blifs?

Mr. Abbot. Yes; I saw him drubbed, so that no Man was so drubbed.

Mr. Ward. By whom?—Mr. Abbot. By Acton's Servants.

Mr. Ward. With what?—Mr. Abbot. With a Rope and a Bull's-pizzle.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton by?—Mr. Abbot. I can't say that.

Mr. Ward. Who were they that beat him?

Mr. Abbot. He was beat by Page and Nichols.

Mr. Ward. You say they beat him with a Bull's-pizzle and a Rope?

Mr. Abbot. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton in the Prison then?—Mr. Abbot. Yes, he was.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton in the Yard?

Mr. Richardson. Did you see Blifs in the Strong Room?

Mr. Abbot. No.

Mr. Baron Carter. Will you (speaking to the Prisoner) ask any Questions?

Mr. Acton. My Lord, please to ask the Question, Whether I ever used the Prisoners ill during the Time he was there.

Mr. Abbot. I did see him beat a great many People, but can't say who.

Matthew Brandon was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Blifs?

Mr. Brandon. Blifs was a Prisoner when I came in, in 1726; I went there on the 16th of March, 1726.

Mr. Ward. How long did you continue there?

Mr. Brandon. Six Months.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Blifs?—Mr. Brandon. Yes.

Mr. Ward. What Condition did you see him in?

Mr. Brandon. He was a Cripple.

Mr. Ward. From what Time do you count the Year?

Mr. Brandon. From the 25th of March; I cannot be sure whether it was 1725 or 1726.

Mr. Trigg. What Manner did you see his Legs in?

Mr.

Mr. Brandon. I saw one very much bruised by the Irons that were put on. There was a Mark about as big as the Top of one's Finger.

Mr. Ward. Was his Leg swelled?

Mr. Bran. It was very much swelled.

Mr. Ward. Did you see both his Legs?

Mr. Bran. I took it to be the left Leg.

Mr. Ward. Was his Ankle strained?

Mr. Bran. I don't know any thing of the straining of his Ankle; it was much about the Ankle.

Mr. Baron Carter. If it was his Leg that he hurt; that's an Answer.

Mr. Ward. That remains upon them to prove. Had the Skin been broke?

Mr. Bran. The Skin had been broke, and it was swelled above and below, and there was the Mark of the Iron.

Mr. Harding. What Sort of Mark was it?

Mr. Bran. It was a circular Mark.

Mr. Hard. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mr. Bran. I gave him Part of a Mug of Ale; and as he was relating his Grievances to me, he told me he desired me to see Acton prosecuted, in case he died.

Mr. Hard. What did he tell you?—Mr. Bran. He told me he was very barbarously used by Acton, and he was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Hard. How long was it before you left him in Gaol, that he made this Declaration? What Time of the Year was you discharged?

Mr. Bran. I went out in August.

Mr. Acton. My Lord, please to ask, how long it was after Blifs's Death before he made Complaint.

Mr. Bar. Car. What say you to that?

Mr. Bran. I made no Complaint of this but since I have been at home; I have been beyond the Seas.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, how long it was before he went out of England, after he was discharged.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that.

Mr. Bran. I was discharged in August, and went abroad in about two Months Time; and it is three Months since I came home again.

Mr. Ward. Did you ever see any Irons upon Blifs?—Mr. Bran. No.

Mr. Ward. Did you ever see him beat?—Mr. Bran. No.

Mary Renwood was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. I beg you would let us know the Time better; I should be glad to be satisfied as to that.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what you know of Blifs.

Mrs. Renwood. I never was a Prisoner, but carried him Victuals.

Mr. Baron Carter. You knew Blifs; Did you see him in Irons?

Mrs. Ren. Yes, my Lord, once. After his Fetters were taken off, I saw his Legs where the Irons had been on; and the Irons had eat very deep into both his Legs.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see the Irons on?

Mrs. Ren. I saw the Irons on in the Yard, but that was before.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was the Soreness of his Legs occasioned by the Irons?—Mrs. Ren. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. Upon what Occasion did you go to him?

Mrs. Ren. I went to carry him Victuals and Clothes. When I saw him in the Sick Ward, the Small of his Legs were swelled as big as the Calf.

Mr. Ward. When was this?—Mrs. Ren. I can't be certain as to the Time.

Mr. Ward. Go on.

Mrs. Ren. The Skin was broke, and his Legs were fore and raw in the Places where the Marks of the Irons were.

Mr. Richardson. What did you carry him?

Mrs. Ren. I carried him a Pair of Stockings, but he could not put them on.

Mr. Ward. Had he no Stockings on?—Mrs. Ren. When I went to him, he had no Stockings, no Shirt, only a Blanket.

Mr. Ward. What Size were the Stockings?

Mrs. Ren. They were my Husband's Stockings, but of a Small Size.

Mr. Ward. If his Legs had not been swelled, might he have got them on?—Mrs. Ren. I believe he might.

Mr. Ward. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mrs. Ren. He said, he was afraid he should never be his own Man again, by the ill Usage he had received in the Gaol.

Mr. Ward. Did he say who used him ill?

Mrs. Ren. No; I did not ask him.

Peter Purchase being sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Blifs when in Prison?

Mr. Purchase. Yes; he was a Prisoner some time before I was a Prisoner, in the Year 1726; and he related to me the Usage he had had.

Mr. Ward. When was you a Prisoner?—Mr. Pur. I became a Prisoner the 26th of March 1726. I was discharged some time before he was.

Mr. Ward. When had you the Discourse with him?

Mr. Pur. In May or June.

Mr. Ward. How long did he continue in Gaol?

Mr. Pur. He was there 10 Months during the Time I was there; he told me he was ironed, and—

Mr. Baron Carter. You must not speak to Hear-say. What he told you don't signify. Did you see his Legs?

Mr. Pur. I did; and the Marks of the Irons were upon them. His Legs were swelled very much both of them; and one continued swelled until he went out of the Gaol.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of their being swelled?

Mr. Pur. It was occasioned by wearing the Irons.

Mr. Ward. Were they raw?—Mr. Pur. They were not raw; but I saw the Marks of the Irons upon them.

Mr. Ward. Did you see his Thumbs?

Mr. Pur. I did; and he told me, that he had been Thumb-ferewed.

Mr. Ward. Did you see any Marks upon them?

Mr. Pur. I saw his Thumbs very black, and much bruised about the Joints; and he told me, he had wore the Scull-cap.

Mr. Ward. Did he complain of any Bruises?

Mr. Pur. He complained of his Side.

Mr. Ward. When did he go out?—Mr. Pur. I cannot tell the exact Time; I went out a little before him.

Edmond Commins, being sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Blifs?—Mr. Commins. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton do any thing to him?—Mr. Com. No; but he told me, he believed he had got his Death by Acton.

Mr. Ward. Did you see any Irons on him?

Mr. Com. I saw them; they were very remarkable; he declared to me that Acton put them on, and beat and abused him.

Mr. Ward. Did you see his Legs?—Mr. Com. I did; and his Legs were like a Horse's Fetlock cut with a Clog.

Mr. Ward. What Time?—Mr. Com. I cannot say.

Mr. Ward. How long before his Death?

Mr. Com. A considerable Time; when he died, I was abroad in India; I was there two Years and three Months. I was by when Acton put Blifs and some others in the Strong Room; and I heard him say to Blifs, I thought I had given you enough already, but I will give you more.

Mr. Ward. What kind of a Place is the Strong Room?

Mr. Com. I have been twice in that Prison; it is very damp, and if it rains never so little, it comes through.

Mr. Ward. Had he any Bed?

Mr. Com. No; there is no Bed allowed to be carried in.

Mr. Ward. Is there any Place to let in the Air or Light?

Mr. Com. There is a small Hole, about twelve Inches, on the Side of the Door.

Mr. Ward. Was it proper to put a human Creature in?

Mr. Com. No; I have seen Hogs lie in a better Place: The Common Sewer runs underneath it, and the Drain from the Vault.

Mr. Ward. Is it unwholesome?—Mr. Com. It is very unwholesome.

Edward Murfey was sworn.

Mr. Richardson. Did you know the Deceased?

Mr. Mur. I did; he was in Prison when I came.

Mr. Rich. What Condition was he in? Did you see him?

Mr. Mur. Yes; I heard him say, that he had so much beating in the Lodge, that he could never recover it.

Mr. Rich. Did you see any Irons upon him?

Mr. Mur. I saw him in the Strong Room with Handcuffs on his Hands, and large Fetters on his Legs.

Mr. Rich. Did you see his Legs? What Condition were they in?

Mr. Mur. I saw them; they were black and blue; and they were raw in a Circle, and the Skin was off.

Mr. Rich. Did he complain of any Bruises?

Mr. Mur. He complained of his Side.

Mr. Acton. Did he never talk of falling off the House, and that he was hurt thereby?—Mr. Mur. I never heard him.

Ellis Roberts was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Blifs?—Mr. Roberts. I saw him in Prison, and saw the Fetters upon both his Legs.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he went out?—Mr. Rob. I can't say.

Mr. Ward. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mr. Rob. He told me, that his Legs were very bad, and desired me to go to Mr. Darby about it; which I did, but was afraid to speak in the Prison, seeing People used so ill; and I spoke to him at the Door, and Darby said—

Mr. Baron Carter. What Darby said is no Evidence.

Mr. Ward. Upon what Account did you go to him?

Mr. Rob. I went to Darby to desire the Fetters might be taken off; or otherwise, that those might be taken off, and bigger put on; for his Legs were swelled so much, that they hid the Irons; the Iron hung almost out of Sight on one Side.

Mr. Ward. Did he shew you any other Marks?—Mr. Rob. No.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Rob. I did see him in the Strong Room; and I saw several more there lying upon the Ground, coming to see him after Work.

Mr. Ward. What Sort of a Place is it?

Mr. Rob. There is only one Place to look in at, a Hole on the Side of the Door. It is very dismal to look into.

Mr. Ward. Was it dry?

Mr. Rob. I can't say. At the same Time Blifs was there, I saw another Man with an Iron about his Neck in the same Room.

Mr. Baron Carter. Would you (speaking to the Prisoner) have me ask any Questions?—Mr. Acton. No, my Lord.

Mr. Rich. It was insinuated, that the Man went to work. We shall produce the Person where he went to work, to shew he was not able.

William Cowley, Master Carpenter, was sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know Blifs?

Mr. Cowley. I remember his coming out of Gaol; and after he came out of Gaol, he came to work with me.

Mr. Marsh. What Trade are you?

Mr. Cowley. A Carpenter.

Mr. Marsh. Give an Account what State of Health Blifs was in when he came to work for you?

Mr. Cowley. I had a Job of Work at Southgate, and came to Town generally on a Saturday Night; and he came the Day after, and said he was coming to work for me; I said he was too weak, and he had better be purged and blooded before he went down. I left him in Town, and when I came again from the Country, he came to me; I asked him, How he did then? He said, Pretty hearty. I and the rest of the Men went down; and on Monday he came down after us to Southgate. I asked him, How he got down, and if he came to work? He said, I don't doubt but I shall, in Grace of God. I got him some Mutton, and made Broth of it; and he endeavoured to work, but was very little able, and did nothing that Day. The next Day he came to work, and plained three Boards; and then said, he could not work any longer. I asked him, What he would have? Give me, says he, a Dram of Geneva, or Brandy, one of which they got; and laid him down, and threw their Clothes over him. I asked him, if he could eat any thing? He said, He believed he could eat some Bacon; but when it came, he could not touch a Bit. I said, Can you eat any thing else? He said, No,

No, nothing. I then spoke to the Woman of the House to get him Sugar-lops, which she did; but it did him no good; he grew worse and worse. I asked him, if I should send to the Apothecary? He said, No: He attempted to come up, but could not. On Saturday Night I came to London; I asked him, if I should leave any thing? He said, No; but desired his Sister might be sent for; and I think I sent for her, and my Son, Thomas, sent for the Apothecary. And when I came back on the Monday he was worse, and the People were uneasy with me for bringing a sick Man; so I got the Man, that carried my Timber, to bring him to London; and he was put into the Hospital; and on the 25th or 26th of March he died.

Mr. Marsh. Was you with him in the Hospital?

Mr. Cowley. Hearing he was abused, I went to see him. He had Holes in his Legs when he came down to me; and his Words were, Master, that Rogue, Acton, and those other Rogues, are the Death of me; this was about a Month before he died.

Mr. Marsh. How long was he with you in the Country?

Mr. Cowley. About nine Days.

Mr. Marsh. Did he complain of any thing?—Mr. Cowley. About a Month before he died, he complained for a Week together.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did the Deceased complain of his Side?

Mr. Cowley. He told me, that they took and held him by the Legs, and his Head knocked on the Ground; and kept him chained in Irons.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of his Side?

Mr. Cowley. He complained of inward Bruises.

William Cowley, junior, sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Acquaint my Lord with what you know of Blifs.

Mr. Cowley. After he came out of Prison he come to see for me at my Lodgings.

Mr. Marsh. Don't tell all you know in your Life-time.

Mr. Cowley. When Blifs came to see for me, I met him in Crooked Lane, and asked him, How he did? He said, as well as can be expected; for the Bruises I have received from those Rogues I shall never recover.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see his Legs?

Mr. Cowley. Yes, and they were black, blue, and yellow, about the Calf. When he came to Southgate, I asked him then how he did; he said as well as can be expected; for I have got those Bruises I shall never recover.

Mr. Marsh. Tell how he was at Southgate?

Mr. Cowley. After he had done Work, he went up to Bed, and said, I hope I shall do well; and putting his Hand to his Breast, said he was very sore. After he began to work, he fainted. We had a Fire made, and laid him down, and asked him if he could eat; he said if we could get him some Bacon; but when it came he could not touch it. Then we got him some Bread and Ale, and he could but just take it down, and brought it up again, and complained of Pains. He was afterwards blooded, and the Blood was of all Manner of Colours, and mighty watery.

Mr. Marsh. Did you see any Marks but in his Legs?—Mr. Cowley. He said those Rogues had given him Bruises he should never recover.

Mr. Marsh. Did he name any body?

Mr. Cowley. Yes, he named Acton, and a little Fellow he had shewn to me when at the Gaol.

Mr. Baron Carter. When he was going away, what did he complain of?

Mr. Cowley. He said, I shall never overcome the Blows received by these Villains; and I must lay my Death to Acton and those Rogues.

Samuel Parker was sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know Thomas Blifs?

Mr. Parker. I knew Thomas Blifs when he came out of Gaol; I saw him come down to Southgate to work, but he was fitter to go to Bed. He worked with me, and lay down on the Bench seven or eight times.

Mr. Marsh. Did he complain?

Mr. Parker. He complained of his Stomach and Legs, and said that his Stomach was beat to a great Degree, and that Acton had put on Irons on his Legs, (which extended them a Yard) and put on an Iron on his Head, Thumb-screws on his Thumbs, so that the Blood gushed out at the End of his Thumbs.

Mr. Marsh. Did you see his Legs?

Mr. Parker. Yes; they were swelled so, that he was forced to wear old Slippers; and they looked of many Colours; and there was a Hole in one of them big enough to put your Thumb in.

Mr. Marsh. What Condition was he in?

Mr. Parker. In a very weak Condition, not fit to work.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he work?

Mr. Parker. About a Quarter of an Hour, and then said, Master, I can't work any more; he then laid down, and they made a Fire for him.

Mr. Marsh. Had he any Apprehension of Death?

Mr. Parker. He said, that the Bruises and the Blows he had received were the Occasion of his Death, and he should never recover them, and hoped some good Person or other would prosecute them for it.

Mr. Baron Carter. Now, you have heard the Charge against you, by sixteen Witnesses, you stand upon your Defence.

Mr. Acton. Notwithstanding what the People have sworn against me, I hope to make it appear that I am innocent.

Thomas Blifs, was a Prisoner in December 1725, and he attempted to escape by a Rope, to get over a House; but some People seeing him, he fell off the House on the other Side, which is twenty-four Feet high: I went round, and found him lying on the Ground; I took him up by the Arm, and asked him the Reason why he did so; he said, he was poor, and he could not get out, without Somebody would assist him: I put him into the sick Ward, to be taken Care of, and allowed him Two-pence per Day; and had a Surgeon to bathe his Leg, which he had hurt in the Fall. He continued in Custody, and continued in the sick Ward only till his Leg was well, and then went into the Pump Ward, where he was chose Constable, but for some Misdemeanor was turned out; it was for cheating the other Prisoners of the Ward. After he was discharged, he continued three Weeks at one Gresham's near the Marshalsea Gate, and was fuddled several Days. He went into the Country and came up again, and said he had caught Cold, was put into the Hospital, and there died of a Fever. My Lord, since his Fall, he never had any Irons on, and he lived near twelve Months after. I have several Witnesses ready to prove those Facts, which I will call.

Samuel Bullock was sworn.

Mr. Acton. Give an Account of what Usage Blifs had in the Prison.

Mr. Bul. (After making a long Pause.) My Lord, I may be a little startled, having never been before such an Audience before, therefore desire a little time to recover myself.

Mr. Baron Carter. You must propose what Questions you would have asked, to the Court.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, if Blifs was on the Top of the House, and what Usage he saw when he came back.

Mr. Bul. In March 1725, or 1726, I went to see Mr. Acton, and there was an Out-cry He was here, he was there; and Acton went into Axe and Bottle Yard, and brought Blifs along with him. I saw no Barbarity used, but saw some of them strike him.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if he saw any Irons on.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?

Mr. Bul. I saw no Irons on. He continued with Mr. Acton till he was confined in the sick Ward, and a Friend and myself gave a Shilling a-piece, because he complained he was destitute, and had no Sustainance.

Mr. Acton. My Lord, please to ask, if he did not complain of his Legs and Back by the Fall.

Mr. Bul. I saw him in a miserable Condition.

Mr. Baron Carter. The Question was, if he did not complain of his Leg and Back by the Fall?

Mr. Bul. He complained of his Ankle and his Side.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, if there was any Irons on should he have seen them.

Mr. Baron Carter. I think that Question will not be so much for your Service; you may have it asked if you please.

Robert Holmes was sworn.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask him, my Lord, whether he remembers the Escape of Blifs, and when.

Mr. Holmes. I know of Blifs's breaking out into Axe and Bottle Yard, and saw Acton and Rogers bring him into the Prison, supporting him upon their Shoulders.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if he had any Irons on, or Abuse given him.

Mr. Holmes. He had no Irons on, no Abuse given.

Mr. Acton. What did he complain of?

Mr. Holmes. He only complained of his Legs.

Mr. Acton. Where did he go after he was discharged?

Mr. Holmes. He went and lodged at one Gresham's, and I drank with him very often in an Evening, and he and I took a Walk together, and he then declared to me, that Acton had used him very well, and if it had not been for him, he must have perished before he got discharged; and when we came back to Mr. Gresham's he told me, he was to go to Work at Southgate, which he did, and staid there nine Days; and when he came back, he said he had caught an Ague, and took a Sweat; and two or three Days after that went into St. Thomas's Hospital. I met Blifs's Wife on the Bridge, and she said —

Mr. Marsh. I apprehend what she said cannot be Evidence.

Mr. Baron Carter. I tell you how far; she is a good Witness to contradict herself.

Mr. Marsh. You can only call this Witness to invalidate her Testimony. What did she say about her Husband's Death?

Mr. Baron Carter. She has said, the Blows he received from Acton were the Occasion of his Death; and the Witnesses may be asked to what she said as to that. Did you see any Irons upon Blifs, after the Fall from the House?

Mr. Holmes. No.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was he in the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. No, he was in the Sick Ward.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, how long he was in Prison after he came out of the Sick Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that Question?

Mr. Holmes. Seven or eight Months.

Mr. Acton. What Condition of Health was he in?

Mr. Holmes. Very good.

Mr. Act. Please to ask, if he ever complained of any thing but his lame Leg.

Mr. Holmes. I never heard him complain of any thing else. He was at Work several times in my Room.

Mr. Ward. He did complain of one Leg you say; did he not complain of both?—Mr. Holmes. No, he never did.

Mr. Harding. Did you never see him fettered after he attempted to escape?

Mr. Holmes. No, I never did.

Mr. B. Carter. Before he went into the Sick Ward, was he in the Lodge?

Mr. Holmes. I came down into the Lodge with him.

Mr. Baron Carter. Where was he carried next?

Mr. Holmes. He was set down there.

Mr. Baron Carter. You did not see him in the Yard?—Mr. Holmes. No.

Mr. Baron Carter. The Witnesses say, that he was first brought into the Lodge, and there had Irons put on, and then was carried into the Yard, and there it was that all the Witnesses say he was beat.

Mr. Marsh. I did not hear that.

Mr. Baron Carter. It is so said.

Mr. Marsh. When did he fall from the House?

Mr. Holmes. About seven or eight o'Clock at Night.

Mr. Marsh. What time of the Year was it?

Mr. Holmes. I can't say, I believe about March.

Mr. Baron Carter. Let the Time be whenever it will, it must be taken after the Fall off the House.

Mr. Marsh. When did he fall?—Mr. Holmes. As near as I can guess, in March next coming, four Years ago.

Mr. Marsh. You was speaking of his continuing well when he came out of the Sick Ward; When did he come out?

Mr. Holmes. About two Months after March.

Mr. Marsh. Was you a Prisoner then?

Mr. Holmes. No, I was a Prisoner before.

Mr. Marsh. You was discharged then, and lived in the Prison?

Mr. Holmes. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. Had you not the Privilege of the Gate?

Mr. Holmes. I was no Prisoner.

Mr. Marsh. Had you no Privilege granted you?

Mr. Holmes. Yes, by Prison; he gave it me.

Mr. Marsh. When was Mr. Holmes. About March.

Mr. Acton. I desire to see Mrs. Blifs.

Mr. Holmes. I met Mrs. Blifs. I met her at the House; she thanked God her Husband.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did she die? What did she say?

Mr. Holmes. That she was in the Hospital. I met her on Tuesday.

Mrs. Blifs. My Lord, such Words; there was a Her.

Mr. Acton. Don't you Mr. Baron Carter. I was he fell off the House; ask.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask Mr. Chapman. Blifs was brought in; he had hurt the Sick Ward; Dr. Drow he thought proper.

Mr. Acton. My Lord, Mr. Baron Carter. Blifs.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who was the Occasion of his being let out?

Mr. Fletcher. He always gave Alton a good Word; and said, he was released by a Gentleman coming there with Charity-Money.

Mr. Alton. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked, if he (Blifs) had any Irons on.

Mr. Fletcher. I never saw him with Irons on.

Mr. Baron Carter. When he came out of that Room, and was put into the Sick Ward, had he any Irons on then.

Mr. Fletcher. He had no Irons on.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask, if there was any Bedding.

Mr. Fletcher. I saw some Bedding, and asked who lay There. They did not tell me the particular Man, but told me a Gentleman.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask him, as to the Strong Room, if it was damp.

Mr. Fletcher. I do not think it was any ways damp.

Mr. Ward. You say, there was a great Swelling upon one of his Legs;

Was it not eat into?—Mr. Fletcher. No.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask, if there was any Contusion of the other Leg.

Mr. Fletcher. There was not.

Mr. Alton. Did you ever see Blifs in Irons?

Mr. Fletcher. I have seen him with Fetters on.

Mr. Trigg. Do you remember the Time of Blifs's making his Escape?

Mr. Fletcher. Yes.

Mr. Trigg. Were there other People put in Irons?

Mr. Alton. I desire he may be asked, whether he ever saw Blifs in Irons, after his last Attempt to escape.—Mr. Fletcher. I did not.

Mr. Baron Carter. What was Alton's Behaviour to the Prisoners, ac-ording to your Observations.

Mr. Fletcher. I never saw him appear otherwise than very handsome, and very well to them.

Thomas Whitford was sworn.

Mr. Alton. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked, if Blifs did not attempt to escape.

Mr. Baron Carter. It is agreed.—Tell me how he was after his Fall off the House.

Mr. Whitford. I saw him in Prison.

Mr. Baron Carter. Tell me how he was.

Mr. Whitford. From October to February (I was discharged the same Day) he was as well as ever.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask, what he said in relation to me.

Mr. Whitford. He (Blifs) said, that if it had not been for Alton, he should not have got out of Prison; and he himself had spoke respectfully of him, and so had his Wife.

Mr. Alton. Did you go to Mrs. Blifs?

Mr. Whitford. I went to Mrs. Blifs, in the Alehouse, where she lived; and she desired I would take no notice that her Husband was dead; and told me, he went into the Country to work, and there caught Cold, and was carried into the Hospital, and died of it; which was thought the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Alton. What do you think of the Strong Room?

Mr. Whitford. It is a Strong Room; but the best Room on the Common Side of the Gaol.

Mr. Baron Carter. Do you say, it is the best Room on the Common

Side?—Mr. Whitford. Yes, for Wholesomeness and Cleanness.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask, what was my general Behaviour to the rest of the Prisoners.

Mr. Whitford. I never saw you strike a Man.

Mr. Alton. What was my Character among them?

Mr. Whitford. You had a very good Character; you gave Viſuals to them every Week.

Robert Walter was sworn.

Mr. Alton. Did you ever see me misuse Blifs?

Mr. Walter. Blifs was never used ill by you.

Mr. Alton. Had he any Irons on?—Mr. Walter. No.

Mr. Alton. Did he make any Complaint? Was I there?

Mr. Baron Carter. I remember the Question when Huggins was tried; it was asked then, if he was there or not? You know I advised Huggins against answering it (speaking to Mr. Strange). What Condition of Health was Blifs in after his Fall?

Mr. Walter. In a small Process of Time he walked about the Gaol as well as I did, and spoke hearty.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you hear Blifs say any thing of Alton?

Mr. Walter. Never any thing unhandſome.

Mr. Baron Carter. That is not the Question. Have you heard him say any thing about Alton?

Mr. Walter. I have heard him speak in praise of him.

John Chope was sworn.

Mr. Alton. Please to ask, my Lord, what State of Health Blifs was in.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Blifs? What Condition was he in after his Fall?

Mr. Chope. He was in very good Condition. About February I eat and drank with him out of the Place at Gresham's, and he was in good Health then, and talked of going into the Country to work.

Mr. Baron Carter. What did he complain of?—Mr. Chope. Nothing.

Mr. Bar. Cart. Did you see him when he came back from the Country?

Mr. Chope. I did; and he said, the Country Air did not agree with him.

Mr. Bar. Cart. Did you ever hear him complain of the ill Usage of Alton?

Mr. Chope. No, his Wife told me.

Mr. Baron Carter. I must not hear you tell any thing of her, but what may contradict what she (Blifs) said. Pray, what did you hear Mrs. Blifs say, in relation to her Husband's Death?—Mr. Chope. Nothing.

William Bolland was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What have you to say? Do you know of Blifs's breaking out?—Mr. Bolland. I saw him after it.

C c

Mr.

Mr. Baron Carter. What did he complain of?
 Mr. Bolland. Only of hurting one Leg.
 Mr. Acton. Please, my Lord, to ask, how he was in Health.
 Mr. Bol. In as good as I am.
 Mr. Acton. Did you eat and drink with him?
 Mr. Bol. Often, at one Gresham's.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if he did not fetch Bread.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What signifies that, I don't see how it affects you one way or the other. Did you see him after he was out of Custody?
 Mr. Bol. Yes, I saw him at Gresham's; and I met his Wife on Tuesday last, and asked her to drink some Gin.
 Mr. Baron Carter. I must not let you go on so.—What did he (Bliss) say of the Prisoner?—Mr. Bol. That he was very civil and kind to him.
 Mr. Ward. Did Mrs. Bliss tell you what her Husband died of?
 Mr. Bol. She said, she believed he died of an Ague and Fever.
 Mr. Ward. Did you see his Legs after he fell?
 Mr. Bol. Yes, both, and one of them was swelled.
 Mr. Ward. You are sure both were not swelled.
 Mr. Bol. No, only one.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What is that he says?
 Mr. Strange. Repeat the Answer to my Lord.
 Mr. Bol. I saw only one of his Legs swelled.
 John Westby was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. How was Bliss in Health, after the second Attempt to escape?
 Mr. Westby. I saw him the Night he was brought in.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of one or both Legs?
 Mr. Westby. One only.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What Health was he in?
 Mr. Westby. He was in the Sick Ward, and I don't apprehend he wanted Health; he was only lame.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What did Bliss say was the Occasion of his Death?
 Mr. Westby. His Wife told me, he was at Southgate at Work four or five Days, and he came home on the Sunday following; and his Wife said, he was very well, but the Country was too cold for him; but he went back the Week following, and she said, he worked a Day, or a Day and Half, but the Country was so cold he could not bear it. I did not see her after his Death.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What did Mrs. Bliss say?—Mr. Westby. That he had caught Cold, which she took to be the Cause of his Illness.
 Christian Fandy was sworn.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Bliss after the Fall from the House?
 Mr. Fandy. He lay by me four Months in the Queen's Ward.
 Mr. Baron Carter. The Queen's Ward?
 Mr. Acton. He was removed from the Sick Ward to the Queen's.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What Health was he in? Did he make any Complaint?
 Mr. Fandy. I never heard him make any Complaint, but of his Ankle.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain only of one Leg?
 Mr. Fandy. It must be one Leg. He could not lye down at Nights; and the other Leg was only swelled.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him at the Dolphin?
 Mr. Fandy. I did several Times.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of any thing at his coming out of the Gaol?
 Mr. Fandy. He desired me to lend him Half a Guinea, and he would go to Work.
 Mr. Acton. Be pleased, my Lord, to ask, if he saw him in the Hospital.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?
 Mr. Fandy. Mrs. Bliss told me her Husband was gone to the Hospital; and I went into the Hospital to him, and asked him how he came there? He said, he was at work in the Country, and pulled off his Waistcoat, and caught Cold.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What was the Prisoner's general Behaviour?
 Mr. Fandy. I had been there ten Months, and never saw any Harm done to any Prisoner in that Time.
 Hester Long was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. I desire, my Lord, she may be asked, if she saw Bliss after he came out of Prison.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?
 Mrs. Long. I staid at the Dolphin Ale-house to drink when he came out, and I wished him well of being out; he thanked me, and said it was owing to Mr. Acton; and said, God blest him, he got me out. I asked him, If he was arrested again, what he would do? he said, Acton would stand by him. Mrs. Bliss, my Sister-in-law, came there, and she said, that he was as well as ever in his Life; and on the Saturday Se'nnight after, he came to my House, in East-Smithfield, and said to his Wife, Go home to Dinner, for I must go to Mr. Cowley, for I have seven Shillings and Six pence to take of him for Wages; and afterwards I saw him in the Hospital.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What was the matter with him?
 Mrs. Long. Mrs. Bliss desired to lodge with me; which she did, and she told me, her Husband wanted to see me; and when I went to him, he said, Sister, I am going to leave the World: I said, it was only going a little before me.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Pray tell whether he made any Complaint to you of any thing?—Mrs. Long. No.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What Distemper did he die of in the Hospital?
 Mrs. Long. He said no more, than that he caught Cold at Southgate.
 Mr. Acton. I desire, she may be asked, what she heard Mrs. Bliss talk about any Money she was to have in this Prosecution, and from whom.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that Question.
 Mrs. Long. I never heard no more talk till within these four Months; and then a Messenger came, and said, there was Money for Mrs. Bliss in Southwark; and when she went there, the Gentleman was not at home; and when she came back, she said, she should have thirty or forty Shillings. I asked for what? She said upon account of going to swear against Mr. Acton.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, whether Somebody gave her any Cloaths, and who.
 Mrs. Long. The next Day after, she gave out, that she was to go to some Gentleman; and I asked to whom? She said, to the Committee, and she should have forty or fifty Pounds; and when she came home, I said, Nanny, I hope you will not be so foolish to go to take away the Life of a Man for forty or fifty Pounds. After that she went to Service.

Mr. Acton. Did you not see Bliss and her Brother together, and what was the Conversation?

Mrs. Long. I said Anne Bliss and her Brother together, and he cautioned her to take care what she did; and she said she was to have forty or fifty Guineas; and he said, Make it up; if you go to Acton, he will give you a couple of Guineas; and she said she could not go, for her Master said she should take a hundred Pounds. She (Bliss) came and said, some time after, she had two Guineas given her by one of the Gentlemen of the Committee, and that she did go and live with him in an Alley by Little Moor Fields.

Mr. Baron Carter. You talk faster than I can take Notes of what you say; you have no Occasion to talk so much. Who did you say, she said, she went to live with?

Mrs. Long. One of the Committee.

Mr. Oglethorpe. My Lord, with humble Submission, I desire leave to speak.

Mr. Baron Carter. Sir, you may.

Mr. Oglethorpe. Then, my Lord, I desire this Matter may be thoroughly sifted, and the Evidences may be confronted.

(Upon which Mrs. Bliss was called to confront Hester Long.)

Mrs. Bliss. When I went to my Sister Long, she said, she would have me consider, not to be ruled by Mr. Newland, and if I would, she could go to Mr. Acton and make it up, and he would give me something: I told her, she never liked my Husband, and Mr. Jennings would not forgive me, if I made up my Husband's Death; and she (Long) said again, her Husband would not forgive me, and wondered how I could pretend to go. I told her after that, my Master Jennings had lent me two Guineas, and desired the Gentleman, where I went to live, that he would see the Money laid out; and gave the Gentleman the Money with his own Hands, and his Wife laid it out for me.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you not say, that you was to have forty or fifty Pounds?

Mrs. Bliss. I said no such thing.

Mrs. Long. The Person that came from Newland said, it would be a great deal in her way.

Mr. Oglethorpe. I desire she may be asked, who that Person was, and whether he was one of the Committee.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who was Mr. Newland?

Mrs. Long. A Baker in Southwark.

Mr. Baron Carter. Mrs. Bliss, I ask you, whether you said, that Mr. Jennings told you, that you should not take root.

Mrs. Bliss. He said, if they were to offer me 100*l*, I should not take it, not to do Justice to my Husband.

Mr. Baron Carter. How came you to leave Jennings's Service?

Mrs. Bliss. There were so many came flocking up and down after me, that I could not live with him. There came two Gentlemen last Sunday.

Mr. Richardson. You say you could not live with your Master, because so many people came after you. Who did they come from?

Mrs. Bliss. They said they came from Acton.

Mr. Baron Carter. What they said is no Evidence.

Mr. Oglethorpe. My Lord, I must with all humble Submission beg leave to speak. Reputation is a very valuable Thing; and here is an Aspersions thrown out at random against a Member of a Committee, which may affect the Characters of several Gentlemen who are not here present.

Mr. Baron Carter. There are many Committees, and I should have taken notice if any thing had been said of any Committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Oglethorpe. There are many Committees, as your Lordship says; there is one of Aldermen, there was also another, which I find is not forgot. I would have them explain what Committee they mean; the Charge is a very heavy one, no less than Subornation of Perjury, and this founded on a Hearsay, so as to render it impossible for any Persons to justify themselves: I therefore desire this may be strictly examined into, and insist upon knowing who this Person was, and his Name.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was there any Name mentioned?

Mrs. Long. She said, one of the Committee, and the Committee's Spouse was to lay out the Money for Cloaths.

Mr. Richardson. I ask you, whether or no she said she was to have two Guineas from Jennings, or any one else?

Mrs. Long. From Nobody but Mr. Jennings.

Robert Cole was sworn.

Mr. Acton. My Lord, please to ask Robert Cole if I gave Bliss Money?

Mr. Cole. Some time after the Committee met they had sat once or twice, I met Mrs. Bliss on London-Bridge, and asked her, if she had been with the Committee or Acton. She said, No; but if Acton would give her five Pounds, she would not mention any thing of her Husband's Death.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long was this before Acton was taken up?

Mr. Cole. About three Weeks; I can't be certain.

Mrs. Bliss. I said no such Thing.

Mr. Richardson. Are you subpoena'd?—Mr. Cole. No.

Mr. Richardson. How came you here, if not subpoena'd?

Mr. Cole. Hearing Mr. Acton was to be tried.

Mr. Richardson. How did you know he was to be tried?

Mr. Cole. I heard it by being in the Marshalsea as a Prisoner.

Thomas Rogers was sworn.

Mr. Acton. What Usage did Bliss receive after he fell off the House at the Marshalsea?

Mr. Rogers. His Ankle was swelled as big as his Calf.

Mr. Acton. I desire he may be asked, how the other Leg was.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?—Mr. Rogers. As usual.

Mr. Acton. I beg he may be asked, whether he was with Bliss when he was brought into the Lodge?

Mr. Rogers. Mr. Acton and I supported him.

Mr. Baron Carter. This Man was accused of beating Bliss; I will not press the Thing upon him to affect himself.

Mr. Serj. Baynes. If he thinks himself innocent, he may be voluntarily a Witness, though he could not be obliged to it.

Mr. Baron Carter. He may be a Witness; but don't let me lead him into any thing that may injure himself.

Mr. Acton. I desire then he may be asked, if he saw Bliss in the Sick Ward?

Mr.

Mr. Rogers. I did; and Mr. Aiton sent for a Surgeon into the Sick Ward to bathe his Leg.

Mr. Aiton. I desire he may be asked, if he was put in Irons.

Mr. Rogers. He was not.

Mr. Aiton. Was you by there all the while?—Mr. Rogers. I was.

Mr. Aiton. I desire he may be asked, if he continued a Prisoner after Blifs was discharged.—Mr. Rogers. I did.

Mr. Ward. You are asking too many Questions.

Mr. Aiton. I desire he may be asked, if he ever saw him after he was discharged.

Mr. Rogers. I did see him, and drank with him; and he was very merry and well.

Mr. Aiton. Rogers, my Lord, was in the Gaol; I beg he may be asked, if the Iron Cap was ever made use of?

Mr. Baron Carter. That is a proper Question. Did you ever know that it was made use of?

Mr. Rogers. I saw it there in Burleigh's Time, and never saw it used from that Time to the Time of my Discharge; it hung up.

Mr. Ward. I ask you, whether you never saw Blifs beat with a Bull's-pizzle, or Rope?—Mr. Rogers. I never saw him beat at all.

(Mr. Baugh was sworn.)

Mr. Aiton. I desire Mr. Baugh may be examined (he has belonged to this Court many Years), whether he has not seen such an Instrument used in burning Felons in the Cheek.

Mr. Baugh. I have seen such an Instrument used to burn People in the Cheek.

(John Grace was sworn.)

Mr. Aiton. I desire he may be asked, whether the Iron Cap was not in the Prison before I came.

Mr. Grace. My Lord, I remember the Marshalsea Prison above a Year before Mr. Aiton knew it; and the Iron Cap hung up there, and I enquired the Use of it. There was an Act in King William's Time for burning Felons in the Cheek; and it was used for that Purpose; and that was the County Gaol, till within these five Years and an Half.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask if there were not Irons left behind?

Mr. Grace. These Irons were.

Mr. Ward. How do you know?

Mr. Grace. I was Clerk of the Papers five Years.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask if there was not an Inventory left.

Mr. Grace. When Burleigh left the Gaol, there was an Inventory.

(John Boswell was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Blifs after his Fall?

Mr. Boswell. I saw Blifs brought in: I was in the Lodge at that Time, and Aiton had him to the Sick Ward, and had a Surgeon to bleed him, and sent for Ointment to anoint him.

Mr. Baron Carter. Where was he hurt?

Mr. Boswell. It was the Small of both his Legs.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of both Legs being hurt with the Fall off the House?

Mr. Boswell. He did; it was twenty-four Feet high.

Mr. Ward. Was he dressed of both his Legs?—Mr. Boswell. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Whether the Deceased, before he went into the Sick Ward, had any Irons or Thumb-screws on him?—Mr. Boswell. No.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him carried through the Lodge into the Sick Ward?—Mr. Boswell. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. What way was he carried?

Mr. Boswell. Cross the Yard.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long was he in the Sick Ward?

Mr. Boswell. Two Months.

Mr. Baron Carter. Where was he afterwards?

Mr. Boswell. In the Queen's Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he go out of the Sick Ward into the Queen's Ward?

Mr. Boswell. He went into another Ward before?

Mr. Baron Carter. Was it the Pump Ward?

Mr. Boswell. Yes; he went into the Pump Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did any one meddle with him when he went cross the Yard?—Mr. Boswell. Nobody.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, my Lord, how he was in Health after he was abroad.

Mr. Boswell. He lay three Weeks next Door to the Gaol, at the Dolphin; being very intimate, I asked him how he did; he said, very well. And he worked for me in the Gaol now and then a Day, when he was able.

Mr. Baron Carter. How was he when he was out of the Gaol?

Mr. Boswell. He said he was very well in Health, but his Legs were not quite come to.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of one or both Legs?

Mr. Boswell. Of both.

(Samuel Davenish.)

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Blifs after his Fall from the House?

Mr. Davenish. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. What State of Health was he in?

Mr. Davenish. In a good State of Health, only lame of his Foot; I never saw any thing otherwise.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him after he was out of Gaol?

Mr. Davenish. I did, and drank with him at the Marshalsea Gate; he was in very good Health.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, if he ever saw any Irons upon Blifs.

Mr. Baron Carter. You hear the Question, answer it.

Mr. Davenish. No, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did Aiton behave himself well to his Prisoners?

Mr. Davenish. He never behaved himself indecently to any of the Prisoners.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was his Behaviour good or bad?

Mr. Davenish. Very good; I never saw an ill Action of his in my Life.

(Benjamin Brown was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you say?

Mr. Brown. As to what?

Mr. Baron Carter. As to Blifs?

Mr. Brown. I saw Blifs when he fell from the House, and he complained of both Legs; one was worse than the other.

Mr. Baron Carter. What was Aiton's Behaviour towards the Prisoners in general?—Mr. Brown. Very good.

(John Bowdler was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you know of Blifs?

Mr. Bowdler. I was in the same Ward with him seven Months, and he was very hearty and well.

Mr. Baron Carter. How was he after the Fall from the House?

Mr. Bowdler. He had hurt one Leg by the Fall.

Mr. Baron Carter. What was the Prisoner's general Behaviour?

Mr. Bowdler. I never had anything but very good Usage while I was there, which was three Years and three Months.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was the Prisoner there all that Time?

Mr. Bowdler. Yes.

(Elizabeth Gosling was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. How was Blifs after his Fall, when he was brought into Prison?

Mrs. Gosling. He had sprained one of his Ankles, and was carried into the Sick Ward for three Months; he lived at my House, and said, he was as hearty as ever in his Life, only as to the Sprain of his Ankle.

Mr. Baron Carter. What was the general Behaviour of the Prisoner?

Mrs. Gosling. I never heard him have an ill Character, or that he struck any one in his Life.

(Robert Gresham, the Man that kept the Dolphin Alehouse, was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. What State of Health was Blifs in after he came out of Prison?—Mr. Gresham. In February 1726, or 1727 he came to lodge at my House, with two more, and lodged there near three Weeks.

Mr. Baron Carter. Pray take Notice of the Question that was asked. What State of Health was he in?

Mr. Gresham. He looked pale, but eat his Victuals well.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of any ill Usage?

Mr. Gresham. I never heard him complain of any ill Usage.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see him after he had been in the Country?

Mr. Gresham. Yes; he came to my House, I was not at Home when he came, but went up after; and he said the Weather was too sharp for him, and he caught Cold, and could not stay in the Country.

(Jane Lapworth was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. What are you?—Mrs. Lapworth. Nurse of the Hospital. I was there on the 11th of March; Blifs was in there a few Days before.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Condition was he in?

Mrs. Lapworth. He was ill of a Fever, Dr. Coatsworth had the Care of him, and he took Medicines for a Fever and Flux.

Mr. Baron Carter. When did he die?—Mrs. Lapworth. I went to the Hospital on the 11th, and he died on the 25th or 26th.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he say what was the Occasion of his Death?

Mrs. Lapworth. I heard him say no more, than that he had been in the Country, and caught an Ague and an intermitting Fever.

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you take to be the Cause of his Death?

Mrs. Lapworth. The Fever was the Cause of his Death.

Mr. Aiton. I desire she may asked, whether after he was laid out there were any Bruises in his Head or Face.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that Question, Woman?

Mrs. Lapworth. His Head was shaved, and I saw no Wound, Bruises, or Scabs in any Part whatsoever.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask if his Wife was there.—Mrs. Lapworth. No.

Mr. Aiton. Did she sit up with him in his Illness?

Mrs. Lapworth. She sat up one Night.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, if he voided Blood or not.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that.—What do you hesitate at?

Mrs. Lapworth. Not during my Time, from the 11th to the 26th of March.

Mr. Harding. Did you see no Marks about him?—Mrs. Lapworth. No.

Mr. Aiton. My Lord, I'll rest this Part of my Defence here, but beg Leave to call some Witnesses to my Character.

Mr. Baron Carter. Call who you will.

(Sir John Darnell, Serjeant at Law, and Judge of the Marshalsea Court, was sworn.)

Sir John Darnell. My Lord, I did not hear any thing of this Affair, till I came here to the Assizes. I think, my Lord, 'tis five Years ago since I had the Honour of having the Patent for Steward of the Palace-Court; and it is three Years since Aiton has been in the Office that he now is in; and in all the Time that I have known, him both as Turnkey, and when he came to be Deputy, I always thought him a very humane Man. I have often heard Complaints of the Prisoners, and have spent whole Days to mediate between their Keeper and them; and never found but he was very willing to have them made easy. This only I must say, that he was careful of the Custody of them. In my whole Observation, I neither thought him cruel or severe.

Mr. Ward. Do you believe he was guilty of murdering Prisoners by Durefs?—Mr. Baron Carter. I can't ask him that Question.

Mr. Marsh. Was there no Application by Petition to you, as Judge of the Court, from the Deceased?

Sir John Darnell. No; I never heard that he was a Prisoner.

Mr. Marsh. Was there no Petition to you in relation to six Persons being put in Irons?—Sir John Darnell. No.

(Edmond Halfey, Esq. was sworn.)

Mr. Baron Carter. Sir, the Prisoner calls you to his Character.

Mr. Halfey. I have known the Prisoner ever since he was at the Marshalsea, both before and since he was Deputy, and never heard an ill Character of him, but that he was a very honest Trader, and a humane Man, and paid very well for what he had.

Mr. Ward. Does he keep a Shop?—Mr. Halfey. He buys Bread and Beer. (Malthus Ryall, Esq. one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Surry, was sworn.)

Mr. Ryall. I have known the Prisoner better than twelve Months, and I thought him improper for the Post he was in, from his too great Compassion.

John

John Lade, Esq. (one of his Majesty's Justices of Peace for the said County) was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. You must speak to the general Character of the Prisoner.

Mr. Lade. I live in the Neighbourhood, and most commonly am applied to if any Abuses have been committed in the Prison; and I never have heard any Complaint of the ill Usage of Prisoners.

Mr. Baron Carter. What is his general Character?

Mr. Lade. His general Character is good.

Mr. Haysey was sworn.

Mr. Haysey. The Prisoner was four Years a Servant with my Father, and his Behaviour was very well; he was a good-natur'd Man.

Mr. Ward. In what Capacity did he serve your Father?

Mr. Haysey. As a Butcher.

John Morris was sworn.

Mr. Morris. For almost fifty Years last past I have visited all the Prisons about London, and I believe I have discharged three hundred poor Prisoners, and I never found better Usage in any Gaol than in this.

Mr. Aston. I desire he may give an Account what Sort of Place the Strong Room is.

Mr. Morris. I have been of the building Trade, and have taken particular Notice of the Strong Room; and would choose it rather than any other on the Common Side. This rises ten Inches from the Surface, and is boarded, and covered at Top with a Tarpaulin; and the others go down a Step.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask if any Wet could come in.

Mr. Morris. I don't believe any Wet could get in.

Mr. Marsh. It had not been built long when he saw it.

Mr. Terrant, in the Borough.

Mr. Terrant. I live in the Borough, and the Prisoner has as good a Character as any one in the Neighbourhood.

Mr. Aston. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked as to the Strong Room.

Mr. Terrant. I was curious to see the Strong Room. It is a boarded Place of nine Feet Square.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see it?—Mr. Terrant. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was it dry?—Mr. Terrant. It was.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was there any Stench?—Mr. Terrant. It is very close.

Mr. Marsh. When did you go to see it?

Mr. Terrant. About two Months ago.

Mr. Marsh. Was it over the Common Sewer?—Mr. Terrant. No.

Mr. Ward. Was it dry Weather when you saw it?—Mr. Terrant. It was.

Mr. Taylor, of the Borough.

Mr. Aston. I desire he may acquaint the Court what is my Character.

Mr. Taylor. In relation to his Character he is a very honest Man, and a Man of Humanity to all People.

Mr. Aston. I desire he may be asked as to the Strong Room.

Mr. Taylor. The Strong Room is dry; there is a Drain runs some Distance from it, but not near it.

Mr. Whitaker, of the Borough.

Mr. Whitaker. I have been with Aston in and out of Gaol, and never saw him do any thing ill.

Mr. Aston. Please to ask him, my Lord, about the Strong Room.

Mr. Baron Carter. Give an Account of what you know of that.

Mr. Whitaker. The Strong Room is dry, there is no Drain runs under it, but there is a Drain about five Yards from it.

Mr. Lamb was sworn.

Mr. Lamb. I have had the Happiness of knowing him these three or four Years. He has had a good Character, and was a Man of Humanity.

Mr. Sydall, of the Borough, Apothecary.

Mr. Baron Carter. What was the Prisoner's Character?

Mr. Sydall. Having had recourse to the Gaol, the Prisoners told me he had a very good Character.

Mr. Brown was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Character had the Prisoner?

Mr. Brown. I believe as good as any Man's can be.

Mr. Harrison was sworn.

Mr. Harrison. I have known his Character these three or four Years, and he is a very modest Man, and of a good Behaviour.

Mr. Aston. My Lord, I humbly apprehend I have called a sufficient Number of Witnesses to my Character, and will rest my Defence here. I apprehend it can't be conceived, that any Man can be guilty of such Inhumanity as is here laid to my Charge, and to live a Year.

Mr. Baron Carter. You must not say that; for then there could have been no Room for the Prosecution.

Mr. Aston. By all Circumstances, my Lord, this Man must certainly die a natural Death; and I humbly apprehend, that they must be mistaken in point of Time, for that no Irons were used the second time of his attempting to escape.

Mr. Marsh. I would not be wanting to my Clients, and yet would preserve all Rule and Order, and must beg leave to observe—

Mr. Serj. Baynes. I have been concerned in several criminal Prosecutions, and never knew it admitted.

Mr. Strange. The Prisoner is not allowed Counsel to speak for him in his Defence; therefore the King's Counsel have no Right of Reply. It was not allowed in Huggins's Trial.

Mr. Baron Carter. In Huggins's Trial, Mr. Justice Page and myself would not allow it.

Mr. Baron Carter. Gentlemen of the Jury, the Prisoner stands indicted for the Murder of Thomas Bliss.

To prove this, a great Number of Witnesses have been called on the Part of the King, not less than sixteen, to make good the Charge.

The first Thing necessary to be proved is, that the Prisoner at the Bar had the Care and Custody of the Prisoners; for which Purpose John Wilson was called, who proved that Darby was Keeper, and the Prisoner Aston Turnkey and Servant, and acted under Darby. That Part stands plain, that the Prisoner at the Bar had the Care and Custody of the Prisoners; and if he has behaved in such a Manner to Prisoners as Death ensues, he must answer for it. It is said, that every Prisoner must be treated with Humanity, and the Law is very tender, and directs that no Prisoner shall die in Gaol, but the Coroner's Inquest must sit upon his Body; and the Reason of that is, that he should not be killed by the Duties of the Gaol.

The Question stands singly, whether upon what you have heard, there has been such a Behaviour of the Prisoner to Bliss, that it has been the Occasion of his Death. If that is so, then you will find the Prisoner Guilty.

Wilson spoke much of the Escape; he talked about it, but did not know when he escaped; he only goes to that. He says, that he never did see Aston beat him; but that he was well to some, and beat others, which came from the Prisoner's own Question; therefore I was put to ask it, and I have told you the Answer.

The next Witness, the Wife of the unfortunate Man, says, that her Husband was there for a small Sum of Money, but that is not material; her Husband was almost famished and starved, and therefore attempted a second Time to escape. The Means he used to escape is not material, that is not what you are to rely upon. She says, there was some Assistance given him; a Rope was provided, and he unfortunately miscarried in the Attempt; and he was brought back into the Prison again, and she saw him beaten by Nichols, Page, and Rogers; and, what is remarkable, she saw the Prisoner beat him with a Bull's-pizzle, and the End of a Rope; that he cried out, if he had any Mercy, he would have Mercy upon him. He then put him into the Strong Room. As to the Nature of the Place, that is a Consideration I shall take up by and bye. She says, she saw him with an Instrument of Iron on his Head; that the Blood came out of his Mouth, and out of his Thumbs; that he had Thumb-screws on his Thumbs, and Sheers on his Legs; that she saw him flung down, and saw the Prisoner on Top of him several times. After he had treated him in this Manner, he began to relent, thinking he might die, and it was time for him to take Care of him, and sent him a Piece of Meat. She says, his Legs were swollen, his Body was swollen; she got him a Pair of Stockings, but his Legs were so swollen, she could not get them on. After this, when he was removed to another Ward, she said, he grew something better. That when he was discharged, he used his Endeavours to get Work; (Gentlemen, you did observe the Question came from the Prisoner) but tho' he was with the Man that he treated with, he got another, he could not work, his Legs were swollen, and there were Marks on them. All the Time, to the Time he was put into the Strong Room, he constantly complained of one Breast and his Side; and afterwards, when he became so bad that he could not work, he was put into the Hospital. One thing is very observable, that all his Discourse was, when any one asked him concerning his Usage, that he said, he did believe that he should never recover it, but would lay his Death to Aston; this Evidence was given by the Widow; she was asked by a Question from the Prisoner, whether she told her Sister of this? She said, No; did you tell your Mother, No; her Mother and she were not upon good Terms, and she never was with her but a very short Time. Then she was asked, if Newland did not send for her; she said Yes; it was thought that he was a very considerable Man; and when she was asked, what did he say to you, he said, he would have her Husband done Right to. Then there was a Question asked of Hyster Long, as to Money, she (Bliss) said she was to have; and Bliss says, that she never did say any such thing.

Susannah Dodd; she gives you an Account that she has seen Bliss in Irons in the Strong Room; that he was treated cruelly; that he had then Screws upon his Thumbs. There was a very particular Circumstance, that he desired her to chew his Meat for him, for that he could not do it himself, by reason of having the Scull-cap on; that she carried him a Three-farthing Mug of Ale, and the Screws were upon his Thumbs, therefore, she was forced to give him the Drink, as he could not put the Mug to his Mouth to drink, because of his Thumbs being confined; that she saw Fetters, very large ones, on his Legs, and there was a Pair of Sheers cross his Legs; that he continued there two Days, and she saw him after, and saw his Thumbs bleed; and the Strong Room was a Strong Room, and ledead, and that she thinks it not an unhealthful Room.

Butler, she gives an Account of his Attempt to escape; and tells you, that she saw the Prisoner beat him (Bliss) with a Bull's-pizzle, and that when Nichols was beating him, she saw him fling the Deceased down, and saw Aston stamp upon him three times, and shewed the Place of his Breast that he complained of, and that his Death was owing to such Usage. It was his Belly and Stomach that he stamped upon, and that he was very ill when he did it; that both Legs were swelled; but that he said, he should do very well but for the Pain in his Side. She says, that the Strong Room was not fit to put in any human Creature; that he went out about August, and came about Christmas. The Prisoner asked as to his Character: she said, it was good and bad; and says, that she heard there was a Complaint made, that Aston was the Author of his Death.

Matthew Bacon taken no notice of, Sic MS.

Mrs. Gillis, she agrees as to the Fall from the House; and she says, that Nicholas, Page, and Rogers held Bliss till Aston beat him with a Bull's-pizzle; that he was carried to the Sick Ward. She was asked how long they were using him in this Manner; she said, half a quarter of an Hour. Reputation is not so material to be made use of; you are to consider if the Fact was done.

The next Witness was one James Abbot; he saw Bliss, (I will take it in his own Words) he saw him so drubbed, that he never saw any one so drubbed in his Life, with a Rope and Bull's-pizzle. He says, he did not see Aston there, but after charges him with it; and he agrees as to the cruel Behaviour of Aston. If the Act was committed, he might be there, and yet Aston not seen by him. He was asked, as to his (Aston's) Character; and he said, he saw him beat many.

Matthew Brandon says, that his Legs were much swollen, and the Skin was broke; that he saw the Marks of the Irons. As to the Fall from the House, and the straining of one of his Legs, he knows nothing of it. He swears directly to the Skin's being broke of both Legs; and he says, that he often talked with Bliss, and he said, that he did believe the Injuries he had received from the Prisoner would be the Death of him, and gave an Account, that the Marks round his Legs were circular; that it must be owing to the Irons, and not to arise by a Strain, is the Observation the Counsel make, but you will be governed by Sense and Reason.

May

Mary Remond; she says, that she saw him very often, and that his Legs were so bad, that the Irons were forced to be pulled off; that the Irons eat into his Legs; and into his Ankle, they had eat very deep; that the Skin was broke, and they were sore; this she saw in the Sick Ward: That he was in so terrible a Condition from his Poverty, that he had nothing to help him, no Cloaths, but a Piece of Blanket; she relieved him, and carried him some of her Husband's Cloaths. It is remarkable, that she carried him a Pair of Stockings, and they would not fit; she could not get them on. She says, they were her Husband's, and that her Husband was not a very large Man.

Peter Purchase; he says, that his Legs were very much swelled, and he took it to be the Marks of the Irons; he saw his Thumbs very black, which he took to be hurt by the Thumb-screws.

Commins; he says, that his Legs were very much swelled, and apprehends it to be occasioned by the Irons; compares it to the Fetlock of a Horse cut with a Clog; that the Strong Room was a Place of Terror, to keep them from being disorderly; and that he heard Acton say to Blifs, he thought he had given him enough, but he would give him more.

Edward Murfey says, That he never saw any thing so much beaten in his whole Life; that his Legs were black, and blue, and green. The Counsel desired you, Gentlemen, to take Notice what this Witness said, that he complained of his Side, which had been hurt by the Bruises he had received from Acton.

Roberts says, That he went to Mr. Darby upon a particular Occasion; but I can't mention to you what he said, because 'tis not Evidence; that he confirms the others in some Measure, that he had rather have larger Irons; that his Legs were so swelled, that he could scarce see the Pair of Fetters on the Side, because the Swelling came over.

The King's Counsel called three Witnesses, as to the Deceased working at Southgate. Cowley says, he wanted Work, and he was willing to let him have it. The Man went down, and came up again, and the second Day he treated him with Mutton Broth, &c. but this is not material. But he says, he complained of his Side, and always said he had received it from the Prisoner at the Bar; he said, there were Holes in his Legs, and that Acton was the Author of his Death.

Cowley, the younger, says the same; that they treated him like an old Acquaintance, and provided him with Broth; that the Man was so sick he could not work; that his Legs were swollen black and blue, and he complained of his Breast; both shewed with their Hands how, by pointing to their own Breast, and said, he pointed to his; and that Blifs said, if he died, he would lay his Death to that Rogue Acton.

Parker says, That he was to be his Comrade, to be employed in some Task-work; that though they laid him by the Fire, his Sickness increased, and they brought him to Town in a Cart; and all his Complaint was, thro' the Injury he had received from Acton; that his Legs were swollen.

Therefore, upon the whole, what Credit you will give to the Witnesses for the King, is in your own Breasts.

Now, as you have given great Attention to what has been said against him, you will take Notice of what has been said on his own Part; if it is contradictory, I can't say any Thing to that, you will weigh them in an equal Balance.

He has called twenty-three Witnesses, to answer the Evidence for the King. The first is,

Samuel Bullock; he says, That he saw Blifs brought in after his Fall; that he had hurt his Ankle; but he saw no Barbarity used; and saw him carried into the Sick Ward. The next is,

Robert Holmes; he says, That there were no Irons only on one Leg; and Acton always used him well, and if it had not been for Acton, he would have perished. This Character differs from what has been laid before you. He gave an Account that he caught a bad Cold, which was the Occasion of his Death; he says, that he never saw him in the Strong Room; and that as to his Health, it was very good the whole Time. This is their Opinion of Blifs; these People would make you believe that he was perfectly well, and had received no Injuries from Acton. He says, further, that he met the Woman on Saffron-Hill, he asked how her Husband did? When he asked her, she said, she thanked God he was dead, (the Woman was glad to get shut of him) and said he died of an Ague and Fever.

Chapman saw him after the Fall. The first Place he begins with, is the Sick Ward, and that Acton sent Doctor Draper, and that nothing was done to him in the Yard. The Yard is the Place that the principal Evidences speak to; that the Prisoner was humane to him, that he had so great Compassion for him, that he allowed him Two-pence Halfpenny or Three-pence a Day, till he was better; therefore, he would have you to believe he was a very humane Man, and that he could not use the Man as others say the Prisoner did. He says, that he was removed to the Pump Ward, and was Constable there, and came to the Tap; that he saw him at Gresham's very well, and saw him after he came from Southgate very well. It is very remarkable he should never complain of Acton. He says, that he looked upon it that the Occasion of his Death was, from the Cold he caught at Southgate; that the Strong Room was not so terrible a Place; that it was a dry Room, though a Strong Room; that the Prisoners were so far from thinking this Room a Terror, that they chose it; that he complained only of one Leg, which differs from the other Witnesses. All were conversant with it.

Thomas Fletcher you will find was a Surgeon; he says, one Leg was very much swollen, from the Fall he got; he said it was a Tumour, in his Way of Dialect; he went home, and brought proper Things, got some Ointment and a Sear-Cloth. He says, that Blifs told him he should never have been discharged but for Acton.

Thomas Whitfield; he tells you Mrs. Blifs told him, that her Husband had got Cold in the Country, and had a Fever and Ague. He was asked in relation to the Strong Room, which he said was the best Place on the Common Side; that the Prisoner had a good Character, and gave Victuals to many of the Prisoners that wanted.

Robert Walter says, he was not privy to any ill Usage Blifs received from the Prisoner; that he walked well, and talked heartily, and complained of nothing, only one Leg, which he apprehended he had hurt by the Fall. He spoke in praise of the Prisoner for his Humanity.

The next is John Chope; he says, Blifs was well in the February before he died; he complained of nothing of the Prisoner; that after he was discharged, he says, he went to Southgate; that he came from thence, and after that complained of a great Cold.

William Bolland says, that he never saw the Prisoner misuse Blifs; that he complained only of his Leg; that he eat and drank well; that he saw him after he was discharged, and he said, that the Prisoner had been civil and kind to him.

Westbury says, That he complained of one Leg only; that he went into the Country and caught Cold, and that was the Occasion of his Illness.

Fandy; he says, that he lay with him in the Queen's Ward several Months. I don't apprehend he was in the Queen's Ward, but he did prove him to be there. I will tell you how that Matter was: This Man speaks to a considerable Length of Time after his escaping; the Time is not settled, both are at a Loss on the one Side and the other; it should have been reduced to a Certainty, because the Indictment is confined to the Second Escape. He says, one Leg was bruised only, the other swelled; that he liked to drink, and did not go to Bed, and sat up, and that was the Reason of it; that he saw Blifs in the Hospital, and he said to him that he had caught cold; that he was at Work in the Country, and that he was brought into that Condition by an Ague and Fever.

Hester Long has given a long Evidence; I hope you have taken it, because it is a very long Evidence, and affects the Character of Blifs. She says, That she saw him several Times, and that he was as well as ever he was in his Life; that he was to go to his Master for Seven Shillings and Sixpence, the Profits of his Labour; therefore he was fit to work, and had obtained that Liberty from Acton. It seemed he had some Discourse with Mrs. Blifs, and said she was her Sister-in-Law, and she desired Leave to lodge with her. After the Death of her Husband, she never heard any Complaint made about Blifs; that four Months ago, a Gentleman sent to her (Blifs) to swear against Acton; that Long was there, and Anne Blifs's Brother, and he cautioned her not to concern herself; that a Man's Life ought to be taken care of with the utmost Caution; that she was to leave her Master, one Jennings, to go to another Place; and Jennings said, that she should not make it up for forty or fifty Pounds. Her Brother said, that if she would make it up with Acton, she might have forty or fifty Shillings. Blifs denies that she had any Sum, that she was never offered forty or fifty Pounds to swear, and her Master said she should not take any, and advised her, that if they would give a hundred Pounds not to take it, to hinder the Prosecution. She (Blifs) says, that Jennings let her have two or three Guineas, and she went into another Service, and not being very capable, had two or three with her to lay it out for her.

Cole says, That Anne Blifs told him, she was to have five Pounds for swearing against Acton. This Discourse was upon London Bridge. How far you will think this probable, not having any other Discourse, that she should immediately introduce this, I must leave to you.

Rogers; he says, That he held the Man after the Fall; that he saw him that very Day; that he complained only of one Leg, and that he never knew the Scull-cap used.

Grace says, That he had seen such an Instrument in the Prison, and that it was made use of to keep their Heads steady, when Felons were burnt in the Cheek; that this Instrument was never designed for any Prisoner; that this was the County Gaol a few Years ago, and that it was not made use of since.

Boswell says, He knew Blifs when in the Sick Ward; that he was lame of both Legs; sometimes was lame of one, sometimes of both, but was very well in Health.

Samuel Davenish says, That he was with him frequently, and that he was always very well, only had a lame Foot, and said he had no Irons on. The Prisoner asked him in respect of his Behaviour; he gives him a very good Character, that his Behaviour was just, charitable, and humane.

Brown says, That he complained of both Legs, one was worse than the other; and as to his Behaviour, gives him a very good Character.

Bowdler, he was with him in the same Ward; and says, that he only complained of one Leg, the other was very well, and gave him a very good Character.

Gosling saw him carried into the Sick Ward, and says he only complained of his Ankle.

Robert Gresham says, That he lodged at his House three Weeks after he was discharged, and only complained of a Cold he had got from the bad Weather in the Country.

Jane Lapworth, the Nurse; she is a very maternal Witness indeed; she says, that he had an Ague and Fever, and gave a Description of the different Operations of it. He, poor Man, died of a Fever; he had Medicines applied by Doctor Coatsworth. She says, she apprehended he died of a Cold, which brought him into a Fever; what was very remarkable, she laid him out, and there were no Bruises on his Head; all his Body was clean from Scabs, or any thing that looked like ill Usage.

Now, Gentlemen, what Credit this will receive from you, I can't say; but this Evidence strongly contradicts all that have given you a different Account. I am very glad you have taken Notes; and I desire, if I have made any Mistake, you will tell me, on either Side.

As to the Character of the Prisoner, his Witnesses say he is a very humane Man; and if you have them down, they are in Number sufficient too.

My Brother Darnell says, he has been Steward of the Palace Court about five Years, and never heard any Complaint against the Prisoner; that it is three Years since Acton has been in the Office he now is in, and in all that Time he thought him a very humane Man, and never thought him cruel or severe.

Mr. Halfey says, he was a very humane Man.

Mr. Ryall, Mr. Lade, Mr. Haysey, give him a very good Character.

Mr. Morrison says, That the other Rooms were under Ground, and this Strong Room was ten Inches above; it was a dry Place, and covered over the Top with Lead.

Mr. Terrant says, That he thinks the Strong Room a very dry Place; and gives Acton a good Character.

Then, Gentlemen, Mr. Taylor says, he was a Man of Humanity; and that there was no Drain near the Strong Room.

Mr. Bowdler gives him a good Character; and four or five other Witnesses have been called up, and given him a very good Character. As to the Strong Room, I don't find much Evidence to affect the Prisoner as to that. There is great Difference in Opinion as to what immediately gave him the Distemper to carry him off. A great many again say, that he did seem to be pretty well in Health; but what will particularly affect the Prisoner, is what happened in the Prison Yard. Upon the whole, if you are satisfied that the Prisoner treated Bliss in that Manner as the King's Witnesses said, and that was the Occasion of his Death, and that he had treated him ill, and beat him, you will find him Guilty; but if he was not so treated, and it was not the Occasion of his Death, you will find him Not Guilty.

There are great Contradictions in the Evidence, I scarce ever heard so great. It is a Matter of great Consequence, and deserves your mature Consideration.

Then one was sworn to keep the Jury, and they withdrew, and Baron Carter went to Dinner; and when he returned, they gave their Verdict.

Cl. of Arraignment. Gentlemen, are you all agreed in your Verdict?
Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Arraignment. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Clerk of Arraignment. William Acton, hold up thy hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the Prisoner; how say you; Is he guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

XV. The Trial of WILLIAM ACTON, for the Murder of JOHN BROMFIELD, at Kingston upon Thames, in Surrey, before the Hon. Mr. Baron Carter, August 2, 1729.

Die Sabbati, 2 Die Augusti, 1729.

Proclamation was made for all Persons concerned to attend.

Clerk of Arraignment.

YOU good Men that are impanelled to inquire, &c. answer to your Names, and save your Fines.

Clerk of Arraignment. William Acton, hold up your Hand. (Which he did.) You stand indicted by the Name of William Acton, &c.

How sayest thou, William Acton, art thou guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

William Acton. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Ar. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

William Acton. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Ar. God send you a good Deliverance.

He was also severally arraigned upon two other Indictments; one for the Murder of Robert Newton, and the other for the Murder of James Thompson, to which he severally pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon God and his Country in Manner aforesaid.

Then Proclamation was made for Information.

Cl. of Ar. Thou the Prisoner at the Bar, those Men that thou shalt hear called are to pass between our Sovereign Lord the King and thee, upon the Trial of thy Life and Death; therefore if thou wilt challenge them, or any of them, your Time to speak is as they come to the Book to be sworn, before they are sworn.

Then the same Pannel was going to be called over, which had tried him the Day before.

Upon which Mr. Paxton, the Solicitor for the Crown, three several Times insisted upon a new Pannel.

Mr. Strange. The other Pannel cannot write; these are Men of Ability and Experience.

Then the Pannel was called over.

Mr. Ward. We challenge Robert Parkhurst, we have an Affidavit ready to produce if Occasion (but the Challenge being allowed, the Affidavit was not read).

Then the Jury sworn were as follows:

Thomas Cole,	William Goswell,	William Browne,
Miles Poole,	John Sigins,	John Walter,
Vincent Hollis,	George Wadbrook,	Robert Patten,
Charles Buckland,	Thomas Bandford,	James Wellbeloved.

Cl. of Ar. William Acton, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)

Mr. Strange. My Lord, you will please to admit him to the other Bar.

Mr. Baron Carter. It shall be allowed.

Cl. of Ar. You of the Jury, look upon the Prisoner, and hearken to his Charge. He stands indicted by the Name of William Acton, &c. (prout in the Indictment mutatis mutandis.)

Mr. Acton. I desire it may be read in Latin.

Mr. Baron Carter. You had the Indictment Yesterday read in Latin, you found it no Advantage to you; if you purpose any Advantage by it, you may have it read.

Mr. Acton. I desire my Counsel may hear it read.

Mr. Baron Carter. Let it be read. (Which was accordingly done.)

Mr. Harding. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel for the King. The Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted for the Murder of John Bromfield. The Indictment sets forth, That—

We Will call our Witnesses, and don't doubt, if we prove him guilty, but you will find him so.

Mr. Ward. Gentlemen of the Jury, you see what the Nature of the Indictment is; it is for the inhumane and barbarous Treatment of John Bromfield, of which he died. If we shew you, that that was the real and true Cause of his Death, it cannot be doubted but that he put him to Death. Gaolers ought to treat their Prisoners with Humanity; they are to confine them in a Place of a secure Custody, but not to treat them inhumanely.

On the first of March, 1725, Capt. Bromfield became a Prisoner in the Marshalsea Prison, Gentlemen; he fell under the Displeasure of Acton, the Prisoner at the Bar, and in order to satisfy his Resentment, he beat him inhumanely and unmercifully, that the Marks and Strokes of the Blows were visible after his Death. Not satisfied with this, he put him in double Irons, which the Man could scarce well bear; and put him into a Hole which is damp, dirty, and strait; so that he could not stand upright, or lie at length: He was kept there for several Days. The Prisoner then began to relent, and took him into another Place, but did not take the Irons off at that Time; but the Man having contracted an ill State of Health, when the Prisoner thought it would be the Occasion of his Death, he then took off the Irons; but that was too late, for he soon died. This, Gentlemen, will shew you the Reason why, consequently, the Coroner's Inquest should have sat upon the Body of Captain Bromfield; but no Coroner's Inquest did sit; and the Reason is plain that it did not, for if it had, they would have seen that he had come to his Death by a violent Occasion. If we prove this to be the Case, Gentlemen, you will do Justice to your Country, and find him guilty.

We will call our Witnesses to prove the Facts.

William Wheeler was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Do you know the Prisoner at the Bar?

Mr. Wheeler. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Do you know whether he was Turnkey in 1725?

Mr. Wheeler. He was Turnkey to Mr. Darby.

Mr. Ward. What was the Business of Turnkey?

Mr. Wheeler. To take care of the Prison and Prisoners.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Captain Bromfield to be a Prisoner then?

Mr. Wheeler. Yes; he was a Prisoner in the Beginning of the Year 1725.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what Usage you saw Captain Bromfield have.

Mr. Wheeler. I lodged in the same Room with him. We were locked up; and coming down Stairs there was a Hatch, which was locked, and one Perkins kept the Key of it; and he made Words to let Captain Bromfield come down.

Mr. Ward. What was Perkins?

Mr. Wheeler. Servant to the Gaoler.

Mr. Ward. Go on.

Mr. Wheeler. There were some Words passed; but at last Perkins did let the Captain down, and he went into the Chandler's Shop, and Perkins and the Captain fell into greater Disputes; and the Captain took a Knife, and jabbed it into Perkins's Breast.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton there?

Mr. Baron Carter. What did he do then?

Mr. Wheeler. He dropt down the Penknife, and it was found in the Chandler's Shop. The Captain was carried into the Pound.

Mr. Baron Carter. Where is the Pound?

Mr. Wheeler. The Pound and the Chandler's Shop join.

Mr. Baron Carter. Where was he carried from thence?

Mr. Wheeler. He was carried from the Pound to the Lodge; further I could not see. He took him away refractory.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him with Irons on?

Mr. Wheeler. I saw him with Irons on in the Evening.

Mr. Foster. What did Acton order?

Mr. Wheeler. After the Court broke up, Acton came down and spoke to the Captain; and asked him, what was the Reason that he stabbed the Man in a Passion.

Mr. Ward. Did you see the Fetters on?—Mr. Wheeler. I did.

Mr. Ward. How long was he confined in the Hole?

Mr. Wheeler. He continued in the Hole from the Time he was taken out of the Lodge, till the next Day Nine of the Clock.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton with him during all or any Part of this Time?

Mr. Wheeler. When Acton had ironed him, he turned him over from the Master's to the Common Side.

Mr. Ward. How long had he the Irons on?

Mr. Wheeler. He had the Irons on about five Days; Acton sent him from the Hole to the Common Side, to George's Ward.

Mr. Ward. When did he die?

Mr. Wheeler. He died the latter End of June.

Mr. Baron Carter. When did he die?

Mr. Wheeler. About four Years ago, the latter Part of June 1725.

Mr. Baron Carter. Tell me when the Fact was?

Mr. Wheeler. I can't tell the Month.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he was dead?—Mr. Wheeler. Yes.

Mr. Ward. What Condition was his Body in?

Mr. Wheeler. It was all black.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of its being black?

Mr. Wheeler. It was said to be the Jaundice.

Mr. Ward. When did it turn black?

Mr. Wheeler. It turned black after his Decease.

Mr. Ward. Was it one continued black, or was it in Streaks?

Mr. Wheeler. It was one intire black.

Mr. Ward. Did the Coroner's Inquest sit upon him?

Mr. Baron Carter. That is no Charge upon the Prisoner. It was not in Fiens's Case; if the Coroner's Inquest had sat on all others, and had not sat upon this Man, then this had been Evidence; but as 'tis generally omitted, it is no Evidence.

Hugh Martin was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Capt. Bromfield?

Mr. Martin. Yes; he was Prisoner about the Beginning of the Year 1725.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what Usage he received from Acton.

Mr. Martin. He was Bedfellow with me in the Nursery Ward, and on a Court Day he was down in the Chandler's Shop; and one of Acton's Servants would have had him go up into his Ward, but he refused to go, and, upon that, the Servant would force him up.

Mr. Ward. What is the Servant's Name?

Mr. Martin. John Perkins.

Mr. Ward. Go on.

Mr. Martin. As they had a Scuffle together, Capt. Bromfield privately stabb'd him, and dropt down the Knife. There was an Outcry, and a Doctor was sent for; and in the Time that he was called, Acton's Servant carried the Captain to the Common Side.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton there at that Time?

Mr. Martin. I did not see Acton.

Mr. Ward. Who took him away?—Mr. Martin. Acton's Servants.

Mr. Ward. Did Acton give any Orders?—Mr. Martin. I don't know.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton in the Yard?—Mr. Martin. I saw Acton in the Yard, or between that and the Lodge.

Mr. Ward. Which Way was Captain Bromfield carried?—Mr. Martin. He was taken out of the Chandler's Shop, and carried through the Pound.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton in the Chandler's Shop, or Pound?

Mr. Martin. No.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton before Captain Bromfield was carried into the Yard?

Mr. Baron Carter. You say you saw Acton in the Yard, and that Captain Bromfield was put on the Common Side?—Mr. Martin. Yes.

Mr. Ward. After he was brought into the Yard, did you see any Thing done to him?—Mr. Martin. I did not see any Thing done to him, because I could not go out, I was confined.

Mr. Ward. Did you see any body beat him?

Mr. Martin. No, but I saw Irons on him.

Mr. Ward. What Irons?

Mr. Martin. They were double Irons; I saw him come out of the Hole the next Morning with Irons on, between eight and nine o'Clock.

Mr. Ward. Who put him in the Hole?

Mr. Martin. I was not there to see it.

Mr. Ward. What Sort of a Place is the Hole?

Mr. Martin. It is a little Place under the Stairs; a little bigger than a large Coffin in Width and Length.

Mr. Ward. Did he lye or stand?—Mr. Martin. He stood, but could hardly stand upright; he had nothing but the Earth to lie on.

Mr. Ward. Was the Earth wet?—Mr. Martin. It was dampish.

Mr. Ward. How do you know?—Mr. Martin. I saw it at that Time.

Mr. Harding. Was there any Door to it?—Mr. Martin. There was.

Mr. Harding. When it was shut, was there any Place to let in the Light?

Mr. Martin. There was the Key-hole, and a Crevice of the Door.

Mr. Ward. When did he come out?

Mr. Martin. Between eight and nine o'Clock the next Morning.

Mr. Ward. Where did he go afterwards?

Mr. Martin. Afterwards he lodged in George's Ward, opposite against the Hole, upon the Left-hand; I think it is called George's Ward.

Mr. Ward. Had he Irons on in George's Ward?—Mr. Martin. Yes.

Mr. Ward. How long?—Mr. Martin. I don't know.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he was dead?

Mr. Martin. I did; I helped him into his Coffin. His Body was a sad Spectacle; but I can't say whether by the Distemper or not.

Mr. Ward. What State of Health was he in before he was confined in this Hole?—Mr. Martin. He was in good Health on the Day the Scuffle happened.

Mr. Ward. What sized Man was he?

Mr. Martin. A middle-sized Man.

Mr. Ward. Was he in bodily Health?—Mr. Martin. I did not discern his Body; he was healthy, and eat his Victuals when he had it.

Mr. Ward. Did you hear him complain of any Illness?

Mr. Martin. I never did.

Mr. Harding. How did he appear?

Mr. Martin. As a Man used to appear with Irons on. He was altered miserably after, about a Week before his Death.

Mr. Harding. How long was it from the Time of his coming out of the Hole, to the Time of his Death?—Mr. Martin. I believe it may be three Weeks or a Month, to the best of my Knowledge.

Mr. Harding. How soon did you see him after he was taken out of the Hole?—Mr. Martin. I saw him the same Morning he was put in George's Ward.

Mr. Harding. How was he then?—Mr. Martin. He was in good Health, but went crippling by, having the Irons on.

Mr. Harding. What do you apprehend was the Occasion of his Death?—Mr. Martin. I believe the ill Usage, and lying in the Hole, were the Occasion of his Death, and for want of Necessaries.

Mr. Acton. When he was in George's Ward, whether he did not lye in a Hammock?—Mr. Martin. He lay under a Hammock.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Distemper do you look upon it he died of?

Mr. Martin. Some People were apt to judge that he died of the Jaundice. (John Saunders was sworn.)

Mr. Ward. Did you know Captain Bromfield?

Mr. Saunders. I did; he was a Prisoner on the Master Side; he came on the first of March, 1725.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what Usage he had.

Mr. Saunders. It was upon a Court Day, at the latter End of May, Captain Bromfield was brought up from the Master Side to the Common Side, and there locked up.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him brought along?

Mr. Saunders. He was brought along by Rogers and Nichols, and Acton followed, and ordered him to be taken to the Lodge, and ironed, and from thence they brought and put him into the Hole, under the Stairs, adjoining to George's Ward.

Mr. Ward. How long did he continue there?

Mr. Saunders. Three or four Nights and Days.

Mr. Ward. Was he let out in that Time?—Mr. Saunders. He was let out sometimes, when they thought fitting, to ease his Body.

Mr. Ward. What Sort of a Place is it?

Mr. Saunders. It is a Place under the Stairs, which a Woman used to put Greens in; it was not fit for a Christian to be in; there was no Floor, and a Cold Place, and there was nothing to sit on, but what the Woman put her Greens on, which was an old broken Chair.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him there?

Mr. Saunders. I saw him every Day.

Mr. Ward. What sized Man was he?

Mr. Saunders. He was taller than me, and I don't believe he could stand upright in the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Could he lye down?—Mr. Saunders. He could not lye at Length, and he durst not lye down, it was so damp and wet.

Mr. Ward. What did Acton order?

Mr. Saunders. Acton ordered him to be taken to the Lodge, and ironed.

Mr. Baron Carter. What did he order after?

Mr. Ward. Was there any Application made to Acton?

Mr. Saunders. One King attended Bromfield, and Bromfield desired me to go along with him to Acton; and I said it was more proper for King.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer my Question.

Mr. Saunders. I saw Captain Bromfield carried into the Lodge, and from thence immediately into the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Was Acton there?—Mr. Saunders. I saw Acton there at the Time when he was carried to the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Was he by when the Irons were put on?

Mr. Saunders. He was by then, and ordered the Captain to be carried from the Lodge into the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Was he first ordered to the Lodge?—Mr. Saunders. That Order to carry him to the Lodge was first given.

Mr. Ward. What did he order after?

Mr. Saunders. He then ordered him to be carried into the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Whether you saw any other Force or Violence used to him by any one?—Mr. Saunders. As to this Purpose, Acton came himself, and saw the Irons put on.

Mr. Ward. Were the Irons taken off?—Mr. Saunders. I heard they were taken off by King and Rogers, with Darby's Leave.

Mr. Ward. Where was Captain Bromfield put, when he was taken out of the Hole?—Mr. Saunders. He was carried into George's Ward; I went with him into the Ward.

Mr. Ward. Were his Irons taken off then?

Mr. Saunders. They were taken off when he was ill and weak.

Mr. Ward. What State of Health was he in before he was put into the Hole?—Mr. Saunders. He appeared to me to be a Man in perfect Health; if he had any Distemper, I did not know it.

Mr. Ward. Do you believe his being confined in the Hole, and the ill Usage, were the Occasion of his Death?—Mr. Saunders. I do, in my Conscience, believe they were the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Ward. How long did he live after this Usage?

Mr. Saunders. I believe, from his being first put into the Hole, to the Day of his Death, was about fourteen Days.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he was dead?

Mr. Saunders. I helped to put him into his Coffin, and his Body was of several Colours, black and yellow.

Mr. Ward. Were there any Marks upon his Body?

Mr. Saunders. I saw no Marks.

Mr. Harding. Was you with him when he died?

Mr. Saunders. I staid by him when he died; (he said the Night before he should not live till Morning) and he gave me his Hand, moved his Mouth, but could not speak.

Mr. Ward. You was with him when he died; did he declare then, or at any other Time, what was the Cause of his Death?

Mr. Saunders. The Night before he died he declared, that the Punishment (which was being put in Irons, and confined in the Hole) was the Occasion of his Death. In the Morning he could not speak.

Mr. Ward. Was there any Coroner's Inquest sat on the Deceased?

Mr. Saunders. No, there was no Coroner's Inquest sat upon any one then.

Mr. Baron Carter. If the Coroner's Inquest had sat upon all others, and not sat upon this Man, then this had been Evidence; but as it is not generally so, it is no Evidence.

Mr. Ward. How soon was he buried after he died?

Mr. Saunders. He was hurried away, I believe, the same Day of his Death. (Martha Johnson was sworn.)

Mr. Ward. Did you know Captain Bromfield?—Mrs. Johnson. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of the Usage he had.

Mrs. Johnson. I never saw any thing done to him.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him in Irons?—Mrs. Johnson. I saw him come out of the Hole in Irons, and go into George's Ward.

Mr. Ward. Who brought him out?

Mrs. Johnson. When the Door was unlocked, he came out of himself.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he was dead?

Mrs. Johnson. I saw his Body.

Mr. Baron Carter. When you saw his Body, did you see any Marks?

Mrs. Johnson. His Body was covered when I saw it, he did not lie naked.

Mr. Ward. We shall call no more Witnesses; for if what John Saunders says is true, it is a full Proof of the Indictment.

Mr. Baron Carter. You have heard the Charge and Evidence against you, you may now proceed upon your Defence.

Mr. Acton. Captain Bromfield stabbed Perkins, and I went for a Surgeon, and whilst I was gone, Bromfield was put in Irons. Mr. Darby had him put in Irons, till the Man was out of Danger. After this, he was very well; and had the Yellow Jaundice, of which he died. As to the Coroner's Inquest, there was none ever sat upon the Bodies of any Prisoners at that Time.

Mr. Baron Carter. You are not to answer for that.

Mr. Acton. I will call my Witnesses. Call George Carew.

(George Carew was sworn.)

Mr. Acton. My Lord, one Witness says, that Captain Bromfield continued one Night in the Hole, and the other says, he continued two or three Nights.—Did you see Captain Bromfield stab Perkins?

Mr. Carew. Acton went for a Surgeon.

Mr. Acton. What was done whilst I went for a Surgeon?

Mr. Carew. John Littleton, who was Turnkey, came in with two or three more, and took Bromfield from the Pound, and carried him to the Lodge, and ironed him.

Mr. Acton. What was done with him after?

Mr. Carew. He was brought on the Common Side, and there ordered to be put in George's Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who brought him there?

Mr. Carew. John Littleton.

Mr.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did Acton give any Directions for putting him into the Hole?—Mr. Carew. No.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who put him in?

Mr. Carew. John Littleton put him in.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long did he continue there?

Mr. Carew. Three or four Hours, as I heard.

Mr. Acton. How was he after he came out of the Hole, as to his Health?

Mr. Carew. I saw him come out of the Hole, and he was very well in Health.

Mr. Ward. He has contradicted himself; he just now said, he was carried from the Common Side to George's Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. If the Man mistakes, you must allow him to correct himself. How soon after he came out of the Hole did you see him?

Mr. Carew. The next Day, I saw him walk about the Yard.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, whether Bromfield was in Irons before I returned back from the Surgeon.

Mr. Carew. Yes, and he was put on the Common Side.

Mr. Acton. When did he die?

Mr. Carew. He was on the Common Side a Month before he had any Sickness.

Mr. Baron Carter. When did he die?—Mr. Carew. In six Weeks Time.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Distemper did he die of?

Mr. Carew. Of the Black Jaundice, as it was given out in the Gaol.

Mr. Acton. Did you see him a Week before he died?

Mr. Carew. Yes, and his Face was yellow and black.

Mr. Ward. You saw him when the Scuffle happened; he was very well then?—Mr. Carew. I can't say he was very healthy in Constitution.

Mr. Ward. Who carried him to the Hole?

Mr. Carew. He was carried by John Littleton to the Place.

Mr. Ward. Were there no Orders given by Acton?

Mr. Carew. Acton was gone before John Littleton came into the Pound for him; he was gone for the Surgeon, as he said he would.

Mr. Ward. Who carried him to the Lodge?

Mr. Carew. Littleton carried him to the Lodge, and after that to the Common Side.

Mr. Ward. Was not the Common Side shut?—Mr. Carew. It was then.

Mr. Ward. How did he get in?—Mr. Carew. He was let in.

Mr. Ward. How long did he continue on the Common Side?

Mr. Carew. Six Weeks.

Mr. Ward. Was he not put in the Hole?

Mr. Carew. I don't know that he was in the Hole at all, for I saw him put on the Common Side.

Mr. Harding. After the Stroke with the Penknife, was not Bromfield seized?—Mr. Carew. No.

Mr. Harding. When did Acton come?

Mr. Carew. Acton came down when Bromfield was in the Pound.

Mr. Harding. How long was Acton gone?—Mr. Carew. Some Minutes.

Mr. Harding. Might not Acton give Orders to Littleton, before he went for the Surgeon?

Mr. Baron Carter. I must not hang a Man upon a might or might not. Did Acton come back with the Surgeon?—Mr. Carew. He brought the Surgeon back, and stood by till Perkins was dressed.

Francis Cartwright was sworn.

Mr. Acton. I desire, he may give an Account of what he knows of this Matter.

Mr. Cartwright. Mr. Acton came out of the Court into the Pound, hearing a Noise, and they told him that Captain Bromfield had stabbed Perkins; Bromfield was ironed, and Littleton put him into the Hole, without Acton's Directions.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was he in the Pound before Acton came down?

Mr. Cartwright. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did Acton say any Thing about ironing him?

Mr. Cartwright. No, but said, that he would fetch a Surgeon.

Mr. Baron Carter. When was he taken out of the Hole?

Mr. Cartwright. He was taken out in about six Hours. They usually lock up the Prisoners at nine o'Clock at Night, after Lady-Day, and he was taken out, and put in George's Ward, about that Time.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long did he remain there?

Mr. Cartwright. He staid there three or four Months after the Thing was done.

Mr. Baron Carter. Who used to lock the Prisoners up?

Mr. Cartwright. The Servants to Acton used to lock them up every Night.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer me another Question. What State of Health was Captain Bromfield in?—Mr. Cartwright. He was always a very weakly Man, but very mischievous.

Mr. Baron Carter. When was he taken ill?

Mr. Cartwright. After I was gone.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was he ill whilst you was there?

Mr. Cartwright. He was not ill, only poor and weak.

Mr. Ward. When was Bromfield ironed?—Mr. Cart. Littleton ironed him, while Acton was gone for the Surgeon, and put him into the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Where was he ironed?

Mr. Cartwright. He was carried first into the Lodge and ironed, and then put into the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Where is the Hole?—Mr. Cart. On the Common Side.

Mr. Ward. Did you see George Carew there?

Mr. Cartwright. I don't know whether he followed him down.

Mr. Ward. Did Carew go along with Littleton, when he put him into the Hole?—Mr. Cartwright. I can't say, whether he did or not.

Joseph Wood, a Surgeon, was sworn.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask him, my Lord, if I came to fetch him.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?

Mr. Wood. Acton came to me, and desired me to go along with him; which I did, and found a Person stabbed in the Breast. The next Day I went to the Person who had wounded him, and I asked him how he could be so barbarous.

Mr. Baron Carter. That is not material. What State of Health did Bromfield seem to be in?

Mr. Wood. Bromfield seemed to be pretty well in Health.

Mr. Acton. Where did you see Bromfield?—Mr. Wood. In the Lodge.

Mr. Acton. Did you say any Thing to him?

Mr. Wood. I said, I find you are ironed: I think you deserve it; and he said, that Darby ordered him to be ironed, and he was glad Acton went for a Surgeon.

Mr. Ward. What Time did you see Bromfield?

Mr. Wood. The next Morning, about nine o'Clock.

Mr. Ward. Where did you see him?—Mr. Wood. In the Yard.

Mr. Ward. How long did you stay there?

Mr. Wood. I staid there a trifling Time, about half an Hour, and left him there.

Lewis Jones.

Mr. Acton. I desire, my Lord, he may give an Account of what he knows as to Captain Bromfield.

Mr. Jones. Bromfield came in April from the Master Side to the Common Side, and was put in Irons by John Littleton.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask what State of Health he was in.

Mr. Jones. Bromfield was in a sad State of Health, he fell sick of the Gaol Distemper, he had the Jaundice on him.

Mr. Acton. What did he die of?—Mr. Jones. A Fever.

Mr. Acton. How do you know?

Mr. Jones. I am a Surgeon; I took Notice of him continually.

Mr. Acton. How did I behave myself to Captain Bromfield?

Mr. Jones. You was kind to him at all Times.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, how I behaved myself to the Prisoners in general.

Mr. Jones. Acton would never suffer any Thing of Hardship.

Mr. Acton. Have you seen any Acts of Friendship?

Mr. Jones. Both your Pocket and your Table have been made use of.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Captain Bromfield put in the Hole?

Mr. Jones. I saw Nobody put in the Hole.

Mr. Ward. Did not you see Bromfield in the Hole?

Mr. Jones. I never saw him in the Hole.

Mr. Harding. I beg leave to make an Observation (and was going on).

Mr. Baron Carter. You can't observe; I don't think you have used me well before. A Gentleman that is a young Counsel, should open no more than the Record.

Mr. Harding. I opened no more than the Fact.

Mr. Baron Carter. Gentlemen of the Jury, the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted for the Murder of John Bromfield. The Indictment sets forth,—

You are to consider, whether you have sufficient Evidence, to induce you to believe him Guilty of this Fact. Whatever is opened by the Counsel, that is not proved to you, is to have no Weight with you. It is set forth, that he was beat, and that the Marks and Strokes were upon him. I don't observe by the Evidence, that any Stroke was given to the Man at all.

Gentlemen, let the Consequence be what it will, Evidence is to determine every Man's Fate.

The Indictment sets forth, that Darby was Keeper of the Gaol on the 15th of July, and that Bromfield died the second.

The Fact is charged preceding to that Time; the Fact is laid in April, and all this is laid to be in the Space of five Days.

Wheeler, the first Evidence for the King; he says, that Acton was Turnkey, and Servant to Darby; that he knew Bromfield; that he lodged in the Nursery, and coming down the Stairs, there was a Hatch upon the Stairs, and Perkins kept the Key; that he and the Captain quarrelled, and that they went into the Chandler's Shop, and quarrelled further, and then Bromfield stabbed him with a Pen-knife, and thereupon dropt the Knife. He was carried from thence to the Pound, and carried from thence away to the Lodge, and was refractory; but he did not hear Acton order any Thing.

He says, Gentlemen, that he saw Fetters on him, when he came out of the Hole the next Morning; and that he was turned from the Master's to the Common Side; that his Body was all over black, and turned so after his Decease. He says, that it was not in Streaks, but one continued Blackness.

The second Witness, Hugh Martin, says, that he knew Captain Bromfield; that he was his Bedfellow; that he saw the Captain in the Chandler's Shop, and Perkins refused him a Favour, and Bromfield stabbed him; that he did not see Acton there, but saw him in the Yard, and saw him go to the Court-House. That he saw Bromfield on the Common Side with Fetters on, and saw him in the Hole, but saw no Beating; that he continued in there all Night, and the Hole is a little Place, has no Floor, and is damp; that there is no Place to let in the Air and Light, but the Key-hole and Crevice. He says, that he saw Bromfield in George's Ward in Irons; that it was three Weeks or a Month before he died; that he wanted Necessaries, and that he was apt to judge he died of the Jaundice.

On the 11th of March, 1725, Saunders says, that Bromfield became a Prisoner; that Nichols and Littleton brought Bromfield along; and that he saw him ironed by Acton's Orders. This is the only Witness that says Acton ordered it. That Bromfield, he believes, was in the Hole three Days, it might be a little longer; that the Hole was under a Pair of Stairs, there was no Light, nothing in it, but a Piece of a Chair that a Woman set her Greens on: That Bromfield could not stand upright, that he dared not lie down, because it was so wet; that King and Bromfield spoke to Acton to take the Irons off, but he could not do it without Darby's Order. It was his Opinion that Bromfield was well, and that the hard Usage was the Occasion of his Death. That he saw his Body after he was dead, and it was of several Colours. He was asked, if he saw any Sign of a Stroke on his Body, and he said that it was all of a Colour. He says that Bromfield told him, that the Usage of the Hole, and the Fetters, where the Occasion of his Death, the Night before he died. So that what he said is Evidence, and ought to have its Weight; such Cruelty should not have been continued.

Martha Johnson; she says, that she saw Bromfield come out of the Hole in Irons.

So that there is but one Witness that says he was put there by Acton's Order; and the Prisoner insists, that he did not order him there; and if he did, he did not die by Durels, but by the Jaundice.

George

George Carr, the first Witness for the Prisoner, says, he was there; and Acton went for a Surgeon, and Littleton came from the Lodge, and took Bromfield there, and ironed him, and put him into George's Ward, but that Acton gave no Directions; that he was in there three or four Hours, and that he saw him well the next Day, and that he walked about the Yard. That he fell ill of the Jaundice, and his Face was black and yellow a Week before he died. He was asked by the King's Counsel, if he was a healthful Man? And he said, he was not. He says, that Acton was gone before Littleton came; so that in his Opinion, Acton did nothing; and says, that Bromfield died of the Jaundice.

The second Witness for the Prisoner says, that he saw Acton run out of the Court into the Pound, and Acton said he would go for a Surgeon. That Littleton ironed him, and put him into the Hole, and it was all done before Acton came from the Surgeon. He was there before Littleton came, and said, he would go and fetch a Surgeon. He says, that Bromfield was in the Hole six Hours; that he locked him up every Night, and he looked upon him to be a weak Man.

Wood says, that he saw Bromfield the next Day, and talked with him about Irons; and he said he was ironed by the Direction of Mr. Darby; and that Acton was always very kind to him.

Jones says, that Littleton ironed Bromfield; and that it was in April, and he died in June. He says, that he was a Surgeon, and that Acton was always very kind to the Deceased.

Gentlemen, in the first place you are to consider, whether the Man was put into the Hole by the Direction of Acton; and in the next Place, if it was done by Acton, and this was not the Occasion of his Death, you will acquit him as to that. But if you believe Acton ordered him into his Hole, and that it was the Occasion of his Death, he was guilty of Duress; but that will be contrary, four Witnesses to one.

The Jury agreed upon their Verdict immediately, without going out of Court.

Clerk of Arraignment. Gentlemen, are you all agreed in your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Ar. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Our Foreman.

Cl. of Ar. Hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the Prisoner; How say you; Is he Guilty of the Murder and Felony whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

XVI. The Trial of WILLIAM ACTON, for the Murder of ROBERT NEWTON, before Mr. Baron Carter, at the Affizes held at Kingston upon Thames, for the County of Surry, August 2, 1729.

Die Sabbati, 2 Die Augusti 1729.

The said William Acton having been before arraigned for the Murder of Robert Newton, the Counsel proceeded as follows:

Mr. Harding. MY Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King. This is an Indictment against William Acton for the Murder of Robert

Newton. The Indictment sets forth—

Mr. Marsh. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment against the Prisoner at the Bar, William Acton, for the Murder of one Robert Newton. It sets forth that Darby was principal Gaoler, and Acton under him. Newton and Hartness were Chums or Ward-mates: and whilst they were there, one of them attempted to escape; they were prevented in that; and Acton clapped on Newton very severe Shackles, and he was ordered into a Place called the Strong Room, a Place, we think to satisfy you, was a Room not at all fit to put Persons into. We say it is a very bad Place, and a very dangerous Place to the Health; there this Newton was confined for a considerable Time; there he was locked up, and the Key kept by an inferior Officer of the Gaol. And Acton was so very sensible he was in a declining Way, that purely for his own Safety, he first ordered him out of that Place into the Lodge, then carried him into the Sick Ward. He continued there some time, and complained of this Hardship, this Imprisonment, and the Hardship put upon him by Acton; and that that Rogue of a Man was his Murderer: For that he had applied to the Judge of the Court, and he was pleased to make an Order, after being very angry with what Acton had done, to release him out of his Hardship; but he, notwithstanding, disobeyed that Order. Therefore, if we call our Witnesses to shew he contracted by this Usage an illness of which he languished and died, it will remain on the Prisoner to shew what he died of, and that he died of some other Distemper; and then you will judge of the Fact.

Mr. Ward. I am Counsel of the same Side, and we will call our Witnesses.

Captain Tudman was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Robert Newton?

Mr. Tudman. I did; he was a Prisoner in May 1725.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what you know concerning him?

Mr. Tud. Newton and Hartness lay in the Park when they were Prisoners in the Marshalsea; and they broke out, and afterwards were retaken, and committed to the Prison again; and Acton put them in Irons. Newton fell sick, and languished for some time, and died.

Mr. Ward. Who had the Care of the Prisoners then?

Mr. Tud. Mr. Darby was Head Man, and Acton was under him.

Mr. Ward. How long were the Irons continued on?

Mr. Carr. Double Irons; an Iron on each Leg, such as I had.

Mr. Ward. What might the Irons weigh?

Mr. Carr. Twenty Pounds, or less.

Mr. Ward. Who was with him, when he was brought from the Lodge?

Mr. Carr. I saw Nobody but Rogers and Clark.

Mr. Ward. Did you see Acton in the Lodge?

Mr. Carr. I did not look in to see if he was there or not.

Mr. Marsh. Who ordered the Irons to be put on?

Mr. Carr. I don't know.

Mr. Marsh. Did Acton go to the Strong Room?—Mr. Carr. I can't tell.

Mr. Marsh. Was Newton locked up there?

Mr. Carr. He was locked up every Night close.

Mr. Marsh. Had he Liberty of coming out of Days?

Mr. Carr. It is a boarded Place, and there is a damp Hole under it; and there is no Drain to carry the Water off.

Mr. Marsh. I ask you, what kind of a Place it is? Whether there is any Place to let in the Air; and whether the Sun visits it?

Mr. Carr. It is an odious Place, and there is only a little Hole to let in the Air; it is built against the Side of a Wall, and the Sun does not visit it; it is covered with Boards, and seemed like the Deck of a Ship.

Mr. Marsh. What was the Occasion of his being taken out of that Room?—Mr. Carr. He was taken out for Sickness.

 Mr. Carr. I believe they were coequal.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Answer me another Question. You was saying there was no Drain to carry off the Water, where does the Water come in?
 Mr. Carr. There was a Place about as big as the Table in the Court, where the Water settles, and runs under the Room, and makes it damp.

 Mr. Ward. He is a Foreigner, and can't speak English to be understood, therefore we desire he may be allowed an Interpreter, who is here ready.
 Mr. Acton. He can speak English very well; here is one that heard him, who can prove it.

Mr. Baron Carter. When I went the Oxford Circuit, the Welch would not speak English, because it was a Dishonour to their Country: If he can talk English to be understood (which I shall judge of when he is examined), I can't allow him an Interpreter.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account, as well as you can, of what you know of Newton.

Mr. Demotet. I knew Newton the Time he broke out of the Room; he was retaken three or four Months after, and was carried into the Strong Room very soon in the Morning.

Mr. Demotet. He fell sick there; both of them were lousy; his Wife and young Child came to take care of her Husband, and petitioned to Sir John Darnell to have him released; he was put in the Sick Room, and there died in four or five Days after. His Wife broke her Heart, and she and the little Child died in the same Week.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of his being sick?

Mr. Demotet. That he was on the Ground, he had no Bed to ly on, and the Water came in at the Top.

Mr. Ward. What Kind of a Place is the Strong Room?

Mr. Demotet. It is not fit to put a Man in, the Rain comes in.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was you ever in it?

Mr. Demotet. I was in it myself; Grace put me in there.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long was you in the Strong Room?

Mr. Demotet. I was in there for ten Minutes, and there were two dead Men in it at the same Time, and I fell sick for five Months.

Mr. Marsh. Was it infested with Rats?

Mr. Demotet. It was very much infested with Rats and Vermin.

Mr. Acton. Do you know Hester Overstoun?

Mr. Marsh. Did you see him confined in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Johnson. I never saw him confined in any Place, but I saw him in Irons.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what you know of Newton.

Mr. Johnson. I saw Newton in the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. What Sort of a Place is it?

Mr. Johnson. It is a close Place.

Mr. Ward. Is it fit to put any one in?

Mr. Johnson. It is not fit to put a Man into.

Mr. Ward. Was there any Smell there?—Mr. Johnson. There was a noisome Smell, and so there was on all the Common Side.

Mr. Ward. Is it more or less healthy than the other Rooms on the Common Side?

Mr. Johnson. They are all unhealthy, it is much the same as the rest.

Mr. Acton. I desire he may be asked, when he went to Captain Delagol in the Strong Room, if the Door was open.

Mr. Johnson. It was open; it was opened for me to go to shave him.

(Ruth Butler was sworn.)

Mr. Ward. Did you know Newton?

Mrs. Butler. I remember Newton very well; he was confined on the Master Side in the Park, and there broke out; he was retaken, and brought to the Prison again, and put into the Strong Room by Mr. Acton's Order; I heard Acton give the Orders.

Mr. Ward. Was he ironed?—Mrs. Butler. He was ironed on both Legs; I heard Acton order them to be put on.

Mr. Ward. How long did he continue in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Butler. He continued there a good while, more than a Month; he was sick there.

Mr. Ward. How long was Newton confined in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Butler. About two Months.

Mr. Ward. Are you sure it was two Months?

Mrs. Butler. I really think it was so long.

Mr. Ward. When was he taken ill?

Mrs. Butler. He fell ill in the Strong Room, and continued there some time after he was taken sick, and then was carried to the Sick Ward, and died in three or four Days after he was put there.

Mr. Ward. When were his Irons taken off?

Mrs. But. His Irons were taken off in the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of his Sickness?

Mrs. But. I can't tell what it was occasioned by, unless by the Rain and Wet that came in.

Mr. Ward. Was it covered at Top?

Mrs. But. It was boarded at Top, but the Rain came through the Top, the Boards not being close enough to keep the Rain out.

Mr. Ward. How near is the Common Sewer to it?

Mrs. But. The Common Sewer runs just by it, and smells very offensive.

Mr. Ward. Had Newton any Bed there?—Mrs. But. No.

Mr. Ward. Was it a fit Place for any Man to be put in?

Mrs. But. It was not fit for any Man to be in it.

Mr. Ward. What gave the Man his Sickness?

Mr. Bar. Car. She has answered that Question already.

Mr. Ward. Did he make any Complaint?

Mrs. But. He complained his Legs were sore with the Irons; I saw his Legs when his Stockings were off, in the Sick Ward, and his Legs were swelled, the Irons being too tight for him.

Mr. Bar. Car. Will you ask her any Questions?

Mr. Aiton. No, my Lord.

Nicholas Purden was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Do you know the Strong Room?

Mr. Purden. I was in it several Times, when two unhappy Men were in it, who came from the King's-Bench. Every Time it rains, the Rain runs through, and there stagnates, till it dries through the Boards.

Mr. Bar. Car. When was that?

Mr. Pur. About a Year and a Half ago.

Mr. Bar. Car. That is short of the Time laid in the Indictment.

Mr. Ward. I allow it short of the Time.

Edmund Cummins was sworn.

Mr. Ward. Give an Account of what you know of Newton.

Mr. Cummins. I remember Newton's being put in the Strong Room; at that Time it rained in, and settled between the Joists.

Mr. Ward. Did it rain in when Newton was there?

Mr. Cum. It did rain in then, and so it did when I was there.

Mr. Ward. Had Newton Irons on?

Mr. Cum. I saw him in Irons in the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. What kind of a Place was it?

Mr. Cum. It was wet and dirty, the Rain coming thro' at that Time; and it was not fit to put any Person into.

Mr. Ward. Was it a wholesome Place?—Mr. Cum. No.

Mr. Ward. We shall call no more Witnesses.

Mr. Bar. Car. Now, Prisoner, say what you will.

Mr. Aiton. On the 26th Day of July, Hartnefs and Newton broke out of Gaol, and were retaken in Kent, and brought to the Gaol; and I dispatched a Messenger to Mr. Darby, to know if he would have them put in Irons; and he sent Word back, they should. They were not put in that Night, but were put in Irons the next Day, and went about the Yard; and in about eight or nine Days time were discharged. Newton was afterwards taken ill, and put in the Sick Ward, and there died.

Robert Holmes was sworn.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask him, what he knows of Newton.

Mr. Bar. Car. Give an Account of what you know.

Mr. Holmes. Newton escaped out of a Room in the Park, and was retaken and brought to the Gaol, and I helped one of them down into the Lodge, and Aiton bid me go to Mr. Darby, to know how to dispose of them; and Darby's Orders were to iron them, and put them in the Strong Room.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, my Lord, if he brought the Message back to me, or any other Person.

Mr. Holmes. I came back to Aiton, and told him, that Mr. Darby's Orders were to have them put in the Strong Room, and ironed; and the next Day they were put in Irons by Greenway and Nichols.

Mr. Aiton. Did Darby come there the next Day?—Mr. Holmes. Yes.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, if they were locked up and unlocked, as the rest of the Prisoners.—Mr. Holmes. Yes, they were.

Mr. Bar. Car. What Irons had they on?

Mr. Holmes. Common Irons, as the Felons used to wear.

Mr. Bar. Car. How long were they confined there?

Mr. Holmes. Seven or eight Nights.

Mr. Bar. Car. What Day did they come in?—Mr. Hol. On a Thursday.

Mr. Bar. Car. How long were they in Irons?

Mr. Holmes. Seven or eight Days.

Mr. Bar. Car. What Condition of Health were they in then?

Mr. Holmes. In perfect good Health.

Mr. Aiton. How long did Newton continue so, after he was taken out of the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. Newton went into the Duke's Ward, and staid there six Weeks, and was in good Health all that Time; I drank with him several Times, and played at Trap-ball with him.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, whether his Friends did not bring him Necessaries.

Mr. Holmes. There were his Wife and Sister came to him; but Hartnefs's Wife did more than either.

Mr. Aiton. What was the Cause of his Death?

Mr. Holmes. The Gaol-Distemper; there were a great many sick at that Time.

Mr. Aiton. Were other Persons sick of the same Distemper at the same Time?—Mr. Holmes. It is my Opinion, but I can't be certain.

Mr. Aiton. What think you of the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. I think it is the best Room on the Common Side for any two or three to lie in, and I have known several desire to lie there.

Mr. Marsh. Consider with yourself, that many Persons have said, that he lay fourteen or fifteen Days in the Strong Room, and was then carried to the Sick Ward; and you say, that he was six Weeks in the Duke's Ward.

Mr. Holmes. It was when he was taken out of the Strong Room, and carried to the Duke's Ward, he got his Illness, to the best of my Knowledge.

Mr. Marsh. When was he taken after the Escape?

Mr. Holmes. He was taken the latter End of August.

Mr. Marsh. When was he put in the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. He was brought to the Gaol the latter End of August, and put in the Strong Room on a Thursday.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he continue in the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. He continued there eight Nights.

Mr. Marsh. Was he sick there?—Mr. Holmes. He was not.

Mr. Marsh. What Day did he die on?

Mr. Holmes. I can't tell what Day.

Mr. Marsh. Do you know the Month?—Mr. Hol. He died in November.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, whether, when his Sister or Hartnefs's Wife visited him, he made any Complaints to them.—Mr. Holmes. No.

Mr. Marsh. What Sort of a Place is the Duke's Ward?

Mr. Holmes. It is a Place that will contain thirty or forty, and there are as many put in on Nights; it is the common Place where People are put into when they come into the Gaol. I imagine he got his Illness there.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he lie in the Sick Ward before he died?

Mr. Holmes. I did not visit him.

Mr. Bar. Car. If you can, ascertain the Time he died.

Mr. Marsh. I ask you when he was carried to the Strong Room, and how long he continued there?

Mr. Holmes. He was carried into the Strong Room on Thursday Night, and continued there till Thursday Se nnight.

Mr. Ward. Where did he go afterwards?

Mr. Holmes. From the Strong he went into the Duke's Ward, and continued there six Weeks.

Mr. Ward. Are you sure he continued there six Weeks?

Mr. Holmes. I am sure he continued there above a Month.

Mr. Ward. What Service have you, or what Capacity are you in? Do you serve in the Gaol under Aiton?

Mr. Holmes. None. By Mr. Darby's Leave I have a Lodging there.

Mr. Ward. You say, Prisoners have chose to lye in the Strong Room; pray name one.

Mr. Holmes. Capt. Thompson desired me to go to Mr. Aiton, to let him lie there.

Mr. Bar. Car. When was the Strong Room built.

Mr. Holmes. It has been built about four years, rather more.

Mr. Ward. How many Years ago is it that you was speaking of Newton?

Mr. Holmes. About three Years.

Robert Walter was sworn.

Mr. Bar. Car. What do you know of Newton?

Mr. Walter. After he was retaken, he was put into the Strong Room, and remained there eight Days, and then was put into the Duke's Ward, and continued there five Weeks.

Mr. Bar. Car. What Condition was he in?

Mr. Wal. He never complained for Want.

Mr. Bar. Car. What Distemper had he?

Mr. Wal. It was commonly said, the Gaol Distemper.

Mr. Bar. Car. What do you think of the Strong Room?

Mr. Wal. I have worked many a Day and many a Week in it, and asked it as a Favour to be there.

Mr. Aiton. Had Newton a Bed there?

Mr. Wal. Newton had a Bed; I lent it him.

Mr. Aiton. Was Newton confined there continually, or let out?

Mr. Wal. He was locked up, and let out as we were.

Mr. Marsh. When did Newton die?—Mr. Wal. I can't tell justly, in about ten or twelve Weeks after he was retaken.

Mr. Marsh. When was he retaken?—Mr. Wal. The latter End of August.

Mr. Marsh. When did he die?

Mr. Wal. He died in November, to the best of my Knowledge.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he continue in the Strong Room?

Mr. Wal. Seven or eight Days.

Mr. Marsh. When was he put in the Strong Room?

Mr. Wal. The next Morning after he was retaken.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he continue in the Duke's Ward?

Mr. Wal. A Month or five Weeks, and then was removed into the Sick Ward.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he lie there?

Mr. Wal. He lay in the Sick Ward five or six Weeks, or more.

Mr. Marsh. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mr. Wal. I never conversed with him.

Mr. Marsh. When you worked in the Strong Room, had you any other Place to work in?

Mr. Wal. I had another Place to work in, in George's Ward, but I was hunted about by other Prisoners. I would choose to lie there, and have lain there for a Week together, rather than lie in a Place where there are thirty or forty; for it is better to lie in a clean Place where there are not so many.

Mr. Ward. You say, you furnished Thompson with a Bed; How came you to have a Bed to spare?

Mr. Wal. I purchased several Beds, and let them out to hire.

Mr. Bar. Car. He said he sent in a Bed like an Upholder.

Mr. Ward. I was really surprized, that a Prisoner should have more than one.

Sarah Hartnefs, Wife of — Hartnefs, was sworn.

Mr. Aiton. Please to ask, if she was in the Strong Room when Newton was there, if he had a Bed?

Mr. Bar. Car. What say you to that?

Mrs. Hart. I was in the Room with Newton, and he had a Bed there.

Mr. Bar. Car. Had he Liberty to go out?

Mrs. Hart. He had Liberty to go out of Days.

Mr. Bar. Car. When he went out of the Strong Room, where did he go?

Mrs.

Mrs. Hartnefs. I think he went into the sick Ward.
 Mr. Baron Carter. When he went out of that Room, how was he?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. Very well.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How long after was it before he was taken ill?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. He was not taken ill in three Weeks after.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Where did your Husband go, when he left the Strong Room?—Mrs. Hartnefs. Into the Petitioning-Room.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How long did Newton live after he went out of the Strong Room?—Mrs. Hartnefs. Six Weeks, or better.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask her, if one Captain Delagoll was not there at the same Time?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. He was; and my Husband and Newton were very glad that they were favoured so much, in having so good a Gentleman with them, he having Candle there.
 Mr. Baron Carter. What Sort of a Place was the Strong Room?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. It was clean and dry; I could have wished my Husband there all the Time.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, whether she ever heard them complain of ill Usage?—Mrs. Hartnefs. No.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did Newton complain that the Irons had hurt his Legs, and that they were swelled?—Mrs. Hartnefs. No.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Who were the Irons taken off by?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. They were taken off by Darby's Order.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if Newton ever complained of me?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. I never heard him say a miss Word of you.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask, my Lord, if she applied to Darby to have the Irons taken off.
 Mrs. Hartnefs. I went to Darby on a Court Day, and he said, he would have them off.
 Mr. Ward. Who do you live with?—Mrs. Hart. One Col. Brown.
 Mr. Ward. Where does he live?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. He lives in Charles-street, Covent-Garden.
 Mr. Ward. How comes it that you live with Colonel Brown?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. I am Servant to Colonel Brown.
 Mr. Ward. What is your Husband?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. He is Cook to the Captain of a Ship.
 Mr. Ward. Where did Newton lye after he came out of the Strong Room?—Mrs. Hartnefs. My Husband and Newton were Bedfellows.
 Mr. Ward. I expected you worse than I find you. After your Husband came out of the Strong Room, where was he carried to?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. To the Petitioning-Room.
 Mr. Ward. Was your Husband in the sick Ward?—Mrs. Hart. No.
 Mr. Ward. How could they lye together?
 Mrs. Hartnefs. I spoke of this before they went out.
 Mr. Baron Carter. She does not say a Word as to the Strong Room; one lay in the Petitioning-Room, and the other in the Sick Ward.
 Mary Berkley was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. Do you remember Newton being in the Strong-Room?
 Mrs. Berkley. I do.
 Mr. Acton. Had he a Bed there?—Mrs. Berkley. He had.
 Mr. Acton. What kind of a Place is the Strong Room?
 Mrs. Berkley. It is a boarded Room, and floored at Bottom; it was every Day washed; I washed it.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did he not complain of any Hardship?
 Mrs. Berkley. No.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Where did he go when he came out of the Strong Room?
 Mrs. Berkley. He went into the Duke's Ward.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How long was he there?—Mrs. Berk. Seven Weeks.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Where did Newton fall ill?
 Mrs. Berkley. In the Duke's Ward.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did you see Newton when sick?
 Mrs. Berkley. I did see him, I was Nurse; his Distemper was the Gaol Distemper, an Ague and Fever; he was taken ill with a Shivering and Shaking.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did you look after him all the Time he was ill?
 Mrs. Berkley. Yes.
 Mr. Baron Carter. When did he die?
 Mrs. Berkley. He died in November.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of any hard Usage?
 Mrs. Berkley. No; he went about with his Fetters.
 Mr. Acton. Did you see him after he died?
 Mrs. Berkley. Yes, I washed him; he was a very clever, clean Corpse, without Spot or Blemish.
 Mr. Marsh. Did you see no Marks of the Irons?—Mrs. Berkley. No.
 Mr. Marsh. Did you wash the Strong Room with the Water that fell from the Heavens? You dried it up—
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did it rain in?
 Mrs. Berkley. It never rained in there; it was a dry, neat Place.
 Mr. Ward. Have you no Office in the Gaol?
 Mrs. Berkley. I looked after the Sick.
 Mr. Ward. Had you any Allowance as Nurse, and by whom paid?
 Mrs. Berkley. I had no Allowance.
 Mr. Ward. Had you nothing paid you?
 Mrs. Berk. Who should pay me?
 Mr. Ward. What did you do it for?
 Mrs. Berkley. I did it for Christianity Sake.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Did Acton make you any Allowance?
 Mrs. Berkley. I had Three-pence a-piece from the People that came in to the Ward, which was paid at the Bar.
 Mr. Ward. Had you nothing but Three-pence?—Mrs. Berkley. No.
 Mr. Ward. Who was you appointed by?
 Mrs. Berkley. The Men in the Gaol chose me.
 Mr. Ward. How came they to choose you?
 Mrs. Berk. They took me to be a sober, modest Woman, and so chose me.
 Mr. Baron Carter. You see you have an Answer; she is a sober, modest Woman.
 Mr. Ward. But 'tis difficult to get the Truth out of her.
 John Boswell was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. Did you build the Strong Room?

Mr. Boswell. I did; it was made to put Pirates in.
 Mr. Acton. Is it a wholesome Place?
 Mr. Boswell. It is a very wholesome Place; it is nine Inches from the Ground.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Is the Common Sewer under it?
 Mr. Boswell. It is not, it is twenty-four Feet from it.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How come you to know it?
 Mr. Boswell. Because I measured it several Times.
 Mr. Acton. Was there a Covering at the Top?
 Mr. Boswell. It was covered with whole Deals, and pitched and tarred.
 Mr. Morris was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. Do you know the Strong Room?
 Mr. Morris. I do, and it is better than any Ground-Room on the Common Side; there is a Step up above the Surface.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask him, what Business he is.
 Mr. Morris. I am a Carpenter.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How is the Room covered?
 Mr. Morris. With Boards, and I think there is a Tarpaulin at Top.
 Mr. Baron Carter. How near is the Common Sewer to it?
 Mr. Morris. It is above eighteen Feet from it.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Is it offensive?
 Mr. Morris. I don't think there is any Thing offensive.
 Mr. Ward. Do you know when it was built?
 Mr. Morris. It was built about four or five Years ago.
 Overston was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. What did you hear Mr. Demotet say concerning me?
 Mrs. Overston. I heard Mr. Demotet say, he would hang Acton, right or wrong, to be an Example to all other Gaolers; and that he was maintained by some Gentlemen to hang him.
 Mr. Ward. How long ago was it that you heard him say this?
 Mrs. Over. It was the fourteenth Day of July last, in the Cellar of the Fleet Prison.
 Mr. Marsh. How came you to be in the Fleet?
 Mrs. Over. I went backward and forward to the Fleet.
 Mr. Marsh. What are you?
 Mrs. Over. A Servant, I live in Fetter-Lane.
 Mr. Demotet was called, to confront Overston.
 Mr. Marsh. Do you know that Woman?—Mr. Demotet. I do.
 Mr. Marsh. What was it you said to her?
 Mr. Demotet. I said, I would say nothing but the Truth, and do nothing but what the Law required.
 Mr. Marsh. Overston, What was it Demotet said to you on the 14th of July, in the Fleet Prison?
 Mrs. Overston. He was in the Cellar there, and said he would swear against Mr. Acton, right or wrong, in order to make an Example of him.
 Mr. Demotet. I said, I would say what was Truth.
 Elizabeth Clayton was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. What did you hear Demotet say?
 Mrs. Clayton. In the Cellar in the Fleet Prison?
 Mr. Marsh. Mistress, hold; Was not you a Prisoner in the Marshalsea?
 Mrs. Clayton. I was a Prisoner there twelve Months; but hearing that Demotet had sworn against Acton, I had a mind to talk with him about it; and he said, that Acton had killed a hundred, and that he would be revenged of him, if he swore himself to the Devil.
 Mr. Marsh. She was a Prisoner in the Marshalsea; how came she into the Fleet?
 Mr. Baron Carter. How came you there?
 Mr. Clayton. I went to Mrs. Overston, she was at one Mr. Solas Wife's.
 Mr. Dem. (In a Passion) She is an old Bawd, and brought Whores to Solas.
 Mr. Baron Carter. You must not behave yourself ill to Witnesses.
 Mr. Demotet. What she has said, is not true.
 John Hull was sworn.
 Mr. Acton. Please to ask him, what Demotet declared to him.
 Mr. Hull. Mr. Demotet declared, that he would hang Acton right or wrong, to be an Example to all other Gaolers.
 Mr. Ward. There is a very remarkable Difference in the Witnesses, in relation to the Place the Man was supposed to go to, after he came out of the Strong Room.
 Mr. Baron Carter. Gentlemen of the Jury, the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted for the Murder of Robert Newton; the Indictment sets forth, that he put him, against his Will, into a Place called the Strong Room, and kept him there fourteen Days; that there were unwholesome, noisome Smells; that it was damp and wet, and that he got a Distemper there whereof he died. To prove this, they called several Witnesses. The first, was Captain Tudman; he says, that he knew Newton and Hartnefs, and that they broke out; and in a Month or two after, Newton was taken again, and brought into the Lodge, and ironed, and then carried into the Strong Room; he says, that there is a little Hole to put in Drink; and says, that before Newton went into this Place, he was a hale, strong young Fellow.
 Carr; he says, that he saw Newton in the Marshalsea; that he came ironed out of the Lodge, and that he was brought out by Rogers, and carried to the Strong Room, and he, and Hartnefs, remained there two Court Days; that Newton was a strong, hale Fellow, and that he fell ill in the Strong Room; Gentlemen, it was of the Gaol Distemper, which he thought the Jaundice, such as they were used to, no uncommon Disease. He was asked then, whether the Strong Room was opened on Days, and locked up on Nights; he says, that after two or three Days, the Door was opened on Days.—He says, Gentlemen, that there was no Drain to carry off the Water; that the Sun does not visit it; that it is built in a Corner in the Yard, and the Sun does not shine upon it, and says, that Wet comes from the Top; that he was with Newton a Week before he died, and Newton said, that the Confinement was the Occasion of his Death, and the Witness thinks so too. He says, Gentlemen, Hartnefs was all the Time in the Strong Room, and ironed, and caught no Distemper.
 Edward Phillips says, that he knew the Strong Room; that there is a Sort of a Pool, where the Water settles, that comes from the Necessary-house that is under it, so makes it damp; and says, that it was sometimes open; That, upon asking him his Opinion, if there were any noisome Smells, he says, that it was a noisome Place, and not fit for a human Creature to to be in. He says, that the Irons were small, and he believes Newton was in the Strong Room ten or twelve Days, and that it was so long before he was taken ill; that Hartnefs was not so strong a Man as Newton, and he received no Injury by being there; but that Newton's Confinement was the Occasion of his Sickness.

Robert Smith says, that he knew Newton; that he was a lusty, hale Man; but he can't say that he was sick in the Strong Room; he was in it, and saw it opened.

Mr. Demotet says, that he knew Newton; that he broke out, and was retaken, and was put in the Strong Room, and continued there fourteen or fifteen Days, on the Ground, without having a Bed; that he came out of the Lodge ironed, and Allen came and followed him, and saw him locked up in the Strong Room; that his Wife came to see him, and he died in three or four Days after he came into the sick Ward; and that the Occasion of his Death was Vermin and Lice; that the Water came in at the Top, and it was not fit to put a Man in; that the Floor was bad. He says, that he himself was in the Strong Room about ten Minutes, and it was infested with Rats.

Martha Johnson says, she never saw him confined.

John Johnson says, that he saw Newton once in the Strong Room; that it is a close Place; that there is no Air, and it has the same noisome Smell as the Common Side, and the Door was opened for him to go and have him.

Ruth Butler says, that she knew Newton; that he was retaken and put in the Strong Room; that Irons were put on his Legs; that he fell sick there, and died in three or four Days in the sick Ward; that she can't tell the Occasion of his Death, unless the Injury caused from his Confinement. She says, that the Strong Room is boarded at the Top, but that the Rain comes in. Gentlemen, she says, what was not mentioned before, that he complained of his Legs.

Nicholas Purden said nothing to the purpose.

Cummins said, that it was an ugly Room; that it was never swept, and was wet and dirty.

This is the Substance of the Evidence for the King.

The Prisoner is infisted upon to be a severe Man; it is said, that he put Newton into this Place; now says he, if I did not do it, I am not affected.

What was the Consequence; if he did not put him into Irons, he put him in the Strong Room.

Holmes, the first Witness for the Prisoner, says, he was there when the Man came back, and said, that Darby ordered him to be put in Irons; admit he had given Orders, the Irons were not of so extraordinary a Weight; the Room was not so bad.

The Witnesses called for the King all agree, that he fell ill in the Strong Room; now the Witnesses for the Prisoner will shew you, that the Man was taken out of the Strong Room, and was taken into the Duke's Ward, where he remained a considerable Time; that when Hartnefs and Newton were uneasy under the Irons, they desired to have Relief, and applied to Darby, and he ordered the Irons to be taken off. That is a Confirmation that Darby had the sole Power. This is the Manner of the Evidence in his Favour. If Darby did do it, Acton was not to answer for it.

The first Witness is at a Loss as to the Time of the Man's Death. When he came in, according to the Evidence given for the King, he remained fourteen or fifteen Days in the Strong Room, and was carried to the Sick Ward, and died in three or four Days.

Holmes says, he was in very good Health; he drank with him several Times, and played at Trap-ball; and he believes he remained six Weeks before he died, and that he died of the Gaol Distemper. He says, that he was retaken the latter End of August, and died in November; here are two Months complete; and the Witnesses for the Crown account but for six Weeks. He says, that it is the best Room on the Common Side for two or three to be in; and that several, of his own Knowledge, desired to be there. The Counsel pressed him very much, to name any one Person that was there, by his own Desire; so he said, that one Thompson was there. He says, that it could not rain through, because it was just built.

Walter says, that he knew Newton in the Duke's Ward; and says, that he was there about four Weeks; that he heard him make no Complaint, but just before he was carried there: He had a good Opinion of the Strong Room, and requested to work there, and says, that he let Newton have a Bed; which contradicts all the other Evidences. He was asked about the Beds, and said, that he got them by his Savings; and that he let them out to hire.

Hartnefs says, that she knows very well that Newton had a Bed, and her Husband and he lay together, and a Captain was there; that she never found the Room wet, nor any thing like it; that they went out of Days, and were locked up in the Strong Room of Nights; that Newton was six Weeks or two Months, before he died, in the Duke's Ward; that her Husband received no Damage. She says, that it was a clean Room; that she never heard Newton complain of his Irons, or ill Usage of the Prisoner. She says, that she went to Darby to have the Irons taken off, and he ordered them to be taken off, while she stood by, and gave Directions accordingly.

Barton says, that she saw Newton in the Strong Room, and she saw a Bed; so there are three Witnesses as to that. She says, she washed the Room every Day; it is very extraordinary, after so many have sworn it to be very dirty. She says, that he never did complain of the Prisoner; that he went into the Duke's Ward for seven Weeks; that she was Nurse, and that he died in November, and died of an Ague and Fever; that she laid him out, and never saw a finer Corpse; and that the Rain never came into the Strong Room. In order to take off Part of her Testimony, she was asked, Whether she was not obliged to the Prisoner at the Bar? She said, that she was Nurse, and that she had Three-pence a-piece of those she took care of; and that she was chosen by the free Election of the Prisoners.

The Prisoner called two or three others, to the Strong Room.

Boswell says, he built it, and that it was very wholesome, and it was twenty-four Feet from the Common Sewer.

Morris says, the Strong Room was very wholesome, and that it was better than any Ground-Room on the Common Side, and that there was a Tarpaulin at Top.

Overston was called to impeach the Credit of Demotet. She says, that in the Fleet Cellar, she heard him say, that he would hang Acton right or wrong, as an Example to other Gaolers, to deter them from being Rogues. The Prisoner called two others. Elizabeth Clayton says, she heard him say, that he would hang Acton, tho' he sent himself to the Devil; and the other, John Hull, heard him say, that he would hang Acton right or wrong. Demotet, being called to confront these Witnesses, denies he ever said what they assert he did.

This is the Evidence on both Sides; therefore you will consider if Acton caused him to be put into the Strong Room; for if he did not, then he must be acquitted: If he did put him in, you are to consider, whether this Place is such a Place as they have set forth.

There is not a single Witness for the King that does not give the same Account of the Strong Room: It is pretty extraordinary, that to a Man the Witnesses should remain in one Opinion for the self same Purpose; their Words were, that it was not fit for a Human Creature to be in.

The Witnesses for the King say, that he died in two or three Days after he was taken out of the Strong Room; the others say, that he lived two Months; therefore consider, if he was put in this Room, and it was not the Occasion of his Death, he ought not to be found Guilty, in that he was very well for a Month, some say six Weeks after; and that he fell sick of the Gaol Distemper in the Sick Ward.

If he did nothing in relation to the Irons, he must be acquitted as to that.

If the Room was such as was fit for a Man to be put in, there was no Harm in putting him in there.

If he did not die by Durefs, by being put in that Room, I believe he must be acquitted on that Head.

If he was put in the Strong Room by Acton, against his Will, and it was so unwholesome that he caught a bad Distemper, and died of it, you must find him Guilty.

The Jury agreed upon their Verdict immediately, without going out of Court.

Clerk of Arraignment. Gentlemen, are you all agreed in your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Clerk of Arraignment. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Clerk of Arraignment. William Acton, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.) Look upon the Prisoner. How say you, Is he Guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

XVII. The Trial of WILLIAM ACTON, for the Murder of JAMES THOMPSON, at the Assizes held at Kingston upon Thames, in Surrey, before the Hon. Mr. Baron Carter, August 2, 1729.

Die Sabbati, 2 Augusti, 1729.

William Acton having been before arraigned for the Murder of James Thompson, and pleaded Not Guilty, the Counsel proceeded as follows.

Mr. Middleton. MY Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King. The Indictment sets forth--- We will call our Witnesses to prove the Fact.

Mr. Marsh. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, the Evidence for the King against the Prisoner at the Bar for murdering one James Thompson, is to this Effect: That the poor Man had the Misfortune to be troubled with a Diabetes; and, according to the Account given of that Distemper, it does occasion Persons to void a great deal of Water. The Prisoner was so far from compassionating him, that he put him against his Will into the Strong Room, and he lay there ten Days or more in a bad Condition; that no Regard was had to him; he was there suffered to continue without a Bed till his Left Side mortified. It was a very bad Place. Some of the Witnesses for the Prisoner did give an Account of it, that it was built for Felons and Pirates: This Place was built up for them, that is now said by the Prisoner to be the best Room in this Gaol. One of the Witnesses in the last Cause spoke of the Pirates being put there. When Thompson was in this Place, this was done; his miserable Condition was represented to Acton, and he made use of a very harsh Expression, 'Damn him, let him lie there, and perish.' We will call our Witnesses to shew the Fact, and it must be left to you to consider whether he is Guilty or not.

Vol. IX.

There was so little Care taken of this Man, that after he was carried into the Duke's Ward, he was suffered to be put again into this Place, and there died.

Edmund Cummins was sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know James Thompson?---Mr. Cummins. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. Whose Care was he under?

Mr. Cummins. He was under the Care of Acton.

Mr. Marsh. Who put Thompson in the Strong Room?

Mr. Cummins. He was put in the Strong Room out of the Ward.

Mr. Marsh. What was the Occasion of his being put there?

Mr. Cummins. I don't know what was the Reason of his being put there; but Acton gave that Reason, that the Ward Company complained of him.

Mr. Baron Carter. He was asked, who put him into the Strong Room? And he told you the Ward Company.

Mr. Cummins. My Lord I could not say so.

Mr. Baron Carter. I heard you say so.

Mr. Cummins. My Lord, I heard you---just now indulge a Witness for the Prisoner to explain herself. I thought your Lordship would not take so much notice of one of the King's Evidence making a Mistake. I came here to speak the Truth; and if your Lordship will not give me leave to explain myself, I will go down.

Mr. Baron Carter. Indeed you behave yourself very impertinently; but go on.

Mr. Cummins. Mr. Acton did say that was the Reason, that the Ward Company complained of him for making Water.

Mr. Amer. Did Acton order him in again?
 Mr. Jen. I heard Acton order him to be put there again.
 Mr. Amer. What was you then?
 Mr. Jen. I was then one of Acton's Watchmen; I went to see the Gentleman, and he said, he should certainly perish if continued in that Place; and I desired Acton to have him removed; and Acton said, What Business have you to meddle with it? Let him die like a Son of a Bitch, and be damned.

 Mr. Marsh. How did it smell?
 Mrs. Seaf. Very badly; I have seen there a Score of Rats at a Time.

Mr. Ward. Did you know Capt. Thompson?
 Mr. Snape. Yes, he was first in the Pump Ward, and went from thence into the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. By whose Orders?

 Mr. Snape. Three or four Days.

Mr. Ward. Did he make any Complaint?—Mr. Snape. No.

Mr. Acton. Was he confined there all the Time, or did he go about?
 Mr. Snape. I saw him go out and in to the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. When was he laid out?
 Mr. Snape. Between six and seven o'Clock in the Morning.

Mr. Bacon. I can't say he did; but after he was dead, his left Hip appeared black.

Mr. Marsh. What, in your Opinion, was the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Bacon. The hard and cruel Usage was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Marsh. Was the Strong Room washed, or swept, or kept clean?

Mr. Bacon. It was not; and if any Person swore so, they did not swear true.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was you there every Day?

Mr. Bacon. I can't say every Day.

Mr. Richardson. Was it fit to put a Man in?

Mr. Bacon. It was contrived for a Punishment, for People who had committed great Crimes against the Government.

Mr. Richardson. Were there other Rooms fit to put Thompson in?

Mr. Bacon. Yes, there were.

Mr. Richardson. Was there any Application to have him removed?

Mr. Bacon. There was none by me.

Peter Purchase was sworn.

Mr. Ward. What Part of the Prison was Thompson confined in?

Mr. Purchase. He was first in the Pump Ward, and was taken out of that Room contrary to his Inclination, and put in the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. How do you know it was contrary to his Inclination?

Mr. Purchase. He often said so.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him removed from the Pump Ward to the Strong Room?—Mr. Purchase. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Was he carried there?—Mr. Purchase. No, he walked there.

Mr. Ward. You was by when he went into the Strong Room?

Mr. Purchase. Yes.

Mr. Ward. Was you by when Acton gave Orders to carry him there?

Mr. Purchase. No.

Mr. Ward. Who was with Thompson when he went there?

Mr. Purchase. Nichols and Rogers went along with him; and they said, they had Orders to go to the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. How long did he continue in the Strong Room?

Mr. Purchase. I can't be certain of the Time.

Mr. Ward. But you saw him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Purchase. I frequently visited him in the Strong Room.

Mr. Ward. Did you observe that it was washed or cleaned?

Mr. Purchase. It was not, during the Time I was a Prisoner there.

Mr. Ward. What kind of a Place was it?—Mr. Purchase. It was a wet, damp, nasty Place, not fit for a Christian to be in.

Mr. Ward. Do you know of any Application made to Acton concerning Captain Thompson?

Mr. Purchase. Wilson and I went to the Lodge to inquire for Acton, and told him, that Thompson said, the Confinement in that miserable Place, would be the Cause of his Death, and he desired to be removed to another Place; but Acton would not hear us, but bid us go about our Business.

Mr. Ward. When did you see him last, before he died?

Mr. Purchase. I saw him the Night before he died; and he then said, that the Confinement in that Place would be his Death.

Mr. Ward. Did you see him after he was dead?—Mr. Purchase. I saw his Body; he had on his Thigh something like a Mortification.

Mr. Ward. What was the Occasion of his Death?—Mr. Purchase. I believe, lying upon the bare Boards was the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Ward. Was there any Water in the Room?

Mr. Purchase. At some times there was; when it rained, the Water came in at Top; I have seen the Rain come in.

John Wilson was sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know Captain Thompson?

Mr. Wilson. Yes, he was committed a Prisoner the latter-end of May; he was a Fortnight or three Weeks in the Pump Ward.

Mr. Marsh. What Sort of a Man was he?

Mr. Wilson. He was a hearty, strong Man, of a merry Disposition, singing Songs, and Chorus's. He was in the Pump Ward, and after was put into the Strong Room; some People came to fetch him, and said it was by the Order of Nichols, Rogers, and others.

Mr. Marsh. How long did he remain there?

Mr. Wilson. He remained there a Week and better, in a bad Condition.

Mr. Marsh. Had he any thing to lie on?

Mr. Wilson. He had on a Banyan Camblet Night-gown, but lay upon the bare Floor, which was wet with the Water that came in.

Mr. Marsh. Where did the Water come from?

Mr. Wilson. It came from the Top of the Room; I saw it rain through.

Mr. Marsh. Could he come out?

Mr. Wilson. He had a Power of coming out of the Room in the Day-time, but he had no Power of coming to lie any where else on Nights; he lay two Days in the Pump Ward, and then was put into the Strong Room again; and then desired me to go to the Petitioning Room, to get him into another Place.

Mr. Marsh. Did you make any Application in his Behalf?

Mr. Wilson. I went with Purchase to Acton, but was not heard.

Mr. Marsh. What did Acton say to you?—Mr. Wilson. I began to tell the Story relating to the Man's Misery, and Acton said—

Mr. Marsh. What did you tell Acton?

Mr. Wilson. I said, he would perish if not removed; and Acton bid me go and trouble my Head with my own Business.

Mr. Marsh. Did he order him to be taken out of the Strong Room?

Mr. Wilson. No.—I then went to the Nurse of the Sick Ward, to desire her to entertain him in that Ward; and she would not do it, because she had not Orders; so he continued in the Strong Room very miserable. I took him out, and put him in the Chimney Corner to dry himself; and when he came to dry himself before the Fire, he smelt very ugly and nasty (this was after the second time of his going into the Strong Room); then he went back, and lay very miserably for three or four Days.

Mr. Ward. Did you ever see the Strong Room washed?

Mr. Wilson. I never saw it washed all the Time the Captain was there; within these twelve Months, or within these six Months, it has been washed.

Mr. Ward. Was it covered at Top?

Mr. Wilson. There was a Tarpaulin laid over it lately, since he was there.

Mr. Ward. What State and Condition was it in when Thompson was there?

Mr. Wilson. It is in a better State and Condition now; I have seen the Water pour in, and it was in as bad a State when he was there, as ever; and there was no Tarpaulin put upon it, till within these twelve Months.

Mr. Ward. How was the Floor?

Mr. Wilson. The Floor lies five Inches higher than the Ground, but the Boards not being thick, they were grown rotten, with the great deal of Water that settled there after a Rain, for the Room was worse the next Day.

Mr. Ward. What, in your Conscience, do you believe to be the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Wilson. I believe, in my Conscience, that he was seemingly of a strong Constitution, and continued the same till his going into that Place; and that the Severity of the Weather, and his hard lying, were the Cause of his Sickness, of which he languished and died.

Phillips was sworn.

Mr. Marsh. Did you know Captain Thompson?

Mr. Phillips. Very well; he was troubled with a Diabetes when he first came in; he was put in the Pump Ward, and there he continued three Weeks or a Month; he was then removed to the Strong Room; I saw Acton and his two Servants there.

Mr. Marsh. What Condition was he in?

Mr. Phillips. He was in a very miserable, deplorable Condition, for he had that Distemper when he went into the Strong Room; he was offensive to the rest of the People of the Ward.

Mr. Marsh. Did you visit him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Phillips. I frequently went to him.

Mr. Marsh. How long was he there before he died?

Mr. Phillips. Ten Days.

Mr. Marsh. Did you see him there in a good or bad Condition?

Mr. Phillips. He lay in a miserable, deplorable Condition.

Mr. Marsh. Did you make any Application to Acton in his Behalf?

Mr. Phillips. I had endeavoured to speak to him, but never could meet with him.

Mr. Marsh. How long before he died was it that you saw him?

Mr. Phillips. I saw him the Night before he died.

Mr. Marsh. Did he make any Complaint to you?

Mr. Phillips. He said, that lying in that Condition would be the Death of him; and said, that it was by Acton's Order that he was put there.

Mr. Marsh. When did he say this?

Mr. Phillips. Some Days before he died.

Mr. Marsh. Did you ever see the Strong Room washed?

Mr. Phillips. I was in the Gaol nine or ten Months, and never saw it washed.

Mr. Marsh. How long ago?—Mr. Phillips. Two or three Years.

Mr. Marsh. Did it rain in?—Mr. Phillips. The Rain did come in; I saw Puddles of Water in it several times.

Mr. Marsh. Was it fit to put any one into?

Mr. Phillips. It was a Terror to every body to go there.

Mr. Marsh. What do you believe was the Occasion of his Death?

Mr. Phillips. I believe the Diabetes, and lying in that Manner, were the Occasion of his Death.

Mr. Marsh. Was there any other Room empty, fit to put him in?

Mr. Phillips. There was a Room over against his own Ward that was empty. There was another Room empty, and proper for any body to be put in, called the Petitioning Room.

Mr. Marsh. Had he any Marks about him when dead?

Mr. Phillips. I saw a Wound, and put my Fift in, which looked as if the Flesh had been gnawed away.

Mr. Marsh. There was a Ward called the Sick Ward; was there Room there for Captain Thompson?—Mr. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Marsh. We shall call no more Witnesses. There is strong Evidence given as to the Fact, and the Strong Room.

Mr. Acton. With humble Submission to your Lordship, Captain Thompson was put into the Pump Ward, and a Complaint came from Captain Thompson; I will acquaint your Lordship what was the Manner of it. Captain Thompson had the Diabetes, and his Ward-mates said he stunk, and fined him, and took his Coat from him, and carried it away, and the Man had not Money to redeem it, or wherewithal to raise any, and desired he might go to some Place where he might be in Peace; I asked asked him, if there was any particular Person he desired to be with, or if he would go into the Sick Ward? He said, he had rather go into the Strong Room, for if he went into the Sick Ward, they would fine him there again.

Christopher Gosling was sworn.

Mr. Acton. I desire he may give an Account of what he knows about Captain Thompson.

Mr. Gosling. I was sitting at the Lodge Door, and Captain Thompson came up to Acton, and desired him to let him go into the Strong Room; Acton said, he might go into the Sick Ward; and Thompson said, the Men in the Ward had tormented him so, that he had rather lie in the Strong Room; and Acton made Answer, You may lie there.

Mr. Baron Carter. What did they torment him about?

Mr. Gosling. About Pissing; he pissed very much there.

Mr. Baron Carter. What Answer did Acton make him?

Mr. Gosling. He bid him do what he would.

Mr. Acton. When he was in the Strong Room, did they not use to torment him?—Mr. Gosling. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. How long did he lie there?

Mr. Gosling. Five or six Weeks.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask him, if Captain Thompson did not say he was much beholden to me.—Mr. Gosling. He said so.

Mr. Acton. Was there any Anger, or any thing between us?

Mr. Gosling. No.

Mr. Acton. Did not Captain Thompson say, he desired to go into the Strong Room?

Mr. Gosling. He expressly desired to be removed into the Strong Room.

Mr. Acton. Had he a Bed there?—Mr. Gosling. Yes.

Mr. Ward. What do you call a Bed?

Mr. Gosling. A Pillow and Blanket.

Mr. Richardson. Is it very usual for People to lie in such Beds?

Robert Holmes was sworn.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if he did not come to me from Captain Thompson, and what was his Request.

Mr. Baron Carter. What say you to that?

Mr. Holmes. He was so tormented by the Ward, that he desired me to go to Mr. Acton, to desire him to let him (Captain Thompson) go into the Strong Room; and I asked Mr. Acton, and he gave him leave, and offered him to go into the Sick Ward.

Mr. Acton. What was the Occasion of his desiring to go there?

Mr. Holmes. He was so nasty, that the Ward chid him, and he could lye sweet and clean in the Strong Room.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did Thompson come up along with you?

Mr. Holmes. He did; he was not sick at that Time, but some Time after he fell sick and died.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he make any Complaint?

Mr. Holmes. At last he did make Complaint, that he was ill, but did not then desire to be released.

Mr. Acton. Had he Liberty to go in and out of the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. He had, whenever he pleased, only some unlucky Fellows locked him in.

Mr. Ward. Had he Liberty to lye out?—Mr. Holmes. No.

Mr. Ward. I ask you whether Acton went with him to the Strong Room?

Mr. Holmes. I can't say he did; he gave him Leave to go into the Strong Room.

Elizabeth Gosling was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. How came Captain Thompson to be in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Gosling. By his own Desire, he was troubled with an Infirmary.

Mr. Baron Carter. How do you know it was by his own Desire?

Mrs. Gosling. I heard him say so.

Mr. Baron Carter. Had he Liberty to go out Night or Day?

Mrs. Gosling. He had the Liberty to come in and out.

Mr. Ward. What are you?

Mrs. Gosling. My Husband is a Prisoner.

Mr. Ward. I ask you whether he has any Office in the Gaol?

Mrs. Gosling. My Husband took a Room before of Mr. Burleigh, and continues under Mr. Acton.

Benjamin Brown was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you know about Thompson?

Mr. Brown. He said, God blefs Mr. Acton, for he had saved his Life by putting him in the Strong Room, for if he had continued in the Ward, he had died.

Mr. Richardson. Did he give any particular Reason why he should have died?

Mr. Brown. That if he made Water in the Room, he was to pay a Quarter of Gin.

Mr. Richardson. Did you visit him in the Strong Room?

Mr. Brown. I oftentimes visited him.

Mr. Richard. Had he a Bed?—Mr. Brown. He had a Gaol Bed.

Mr. Baron Carter. Had he the Liberty of going in and out?

Mr. Brown. Yes.

Mr. Richard. Was not the Strong Room a Place of Confinement?

Mr. Brown. Yes; but when I was a Prisoner, I had the Liberty of the Gate, having several Causes in my own Right.

Mary Barton was sworn.

Mr. Acton. What did you hear Captain Thompson say?

Mrs. Barton. I heard him say that he asked Leave to lie in the Strong Room, and that he was disturbed in his own Ward.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, if he did not say, that he had rather go to the Strong Room, than come to the Sick Ward.

Mr. Baron Carter. Answer that.

Mrs. Barton. He said, He might have gone, if he would, into the Sick Ward, but he had rather go to the Strong Room, because he could be there in Peace.

Mr. Acton. Had he a Bed in the Strong Room?

Mrs. Barton. Yes, such a Bed as poor People lye on, a Flock-bed; it was a broad Bolster, which he could lye at his whole length, and turn himself upon, such as they had in the Gaol.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was he locked up on Nights?—Mrs. Barton. No.

Mr. Ward. She is kept by Acton; she had Three-pence out of every Prisoner.

Mr. Baron Carter. She was put in by the Gentlemen.

Mrs. Barton. Yes, or else they would have tore the Gaoler to Pieces.

John Bowdler was sworn.

Mr. Bowdler. I was in the Ward when Captain Thompson went out; and the Ward being uneasy with him, he said he would make Interest to Mr. Acton to go into the Strong Room; and he took his Bed and Bedding, and went into the Strong Room.

Mr. Acton. Please to ask, whether Thompson told him he had made Interest.

Mr. Bowdler. Thompson said, that he had asked Leave of Acton, and he had granted it.

Davenish was sworn.

Mr. Davenish. In the Month of June 1726, I was sent into the Pump Ward to Captain Thompson, and his Ward-Mates swore at him, and called him Nasty Son of a Bitch.

That his Ward-Mates were very uncivil; that he was troubled with a Diabetes; and he said, he would desire Mr. Acton to let him go to the Strong Room; and the next Day I saw a Woman washing of it. When he was there, I asked him several Times if he wanted any thing; for Mr. Wittingham said, he would relieve him if he wanted for any thing; and he said, the Woman of the Sick Ward came to him, and he wanted for nothing.

Robert Walker was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you know about Captain Thompson?

Mr. Walker. He was carried to the Strong Room by his own Consent; and asking him the next Morning how he did, he said, extraordinary well.

Mr. Baron Carter. Had he a Bed there?—Mr. Walker. Yes.

Mr. Baron Carter. Did he complain of any Illness?

Mr. Walker. I saw the People making Game of him.

Mr. Baron Carter. Was he locked up on Nights?—Mr. Walker. No.

Mr. Acton. A Nurse sat up with him on Nights, Mrs. Conner; she had been Nurse of the Sick Ward.

Benjamin Johnson was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What have you to say to Thompson's consenting to go to the Strong Room?

Mr. Johnson. I spoke to him two Days before he went there; and he said, he should be glad if Acton would grant him the Favour of lying there.

Mr. Baron Carter. Had he a Bed there?

Mr. Johnson. I saw him carry his Bed there; and he thanked God that Mr. Acton was so good to let him lie there, for he hoped it would be the saving of his Life.

Ralph Malban was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you know of Captain Thompson?

Mr. Malban. I can say nothing, but that when I was in the Ward one Night I saw a great deal of Abuse offered him; and the next Day I asked him how he came to suffer such Abuses; and he said he had a noisome Distemper, and so they abused him; and in a Month or three Weeks I saw him again, and he then said, he had Leave to get into the Strong Room, and thanked God for it.

Thomas Fletcher was sworn.

Mr. Baron Carter. What do you know of Thompson?

Mr. Fletcher. I know Thompson had the Diabetes, and that his Fellow-Prisoners did often reflect upon him. I was out of Prison, and then came in again, and I asked Thompson how he did; he said, very well as to his Health, except as to the Diabetes; and Acton had given him Leave to lie in the Strong Room.

Here the Prisoner rested his Defence.

Mr. Baron Carter. Gentlemen of the Jury, the Prisoner at the Bar stands indicted for the Murder of one James Thompson. The Indictment sets forth, that the said James Thompson died by Durefs, so that the Prisoner was thereby Guilty of Murder.

There were several Witnesses called for the King. The first was Edmund Cummins; he says, that he knew Thompson very well; that he was in the Pump-Ward, and that he was put in the Strong Room, as Acton said for having the Diabetes, some of the Ward complaining of his being nasty; that he came out sometimes, and he saw him after he died; and he was very quickly buried; and he saw a Mark upon his Face. He says, that Acton did order his Burial, because he was carried by those that usually carry Corpses to be buried. He says, that he was resolved to stay in the Ward, and would not have gone out, but Acton would not let him stay.

Matthew Brandon says, he saw Thompson in the Strong Room, and he did hear the Prisoner order him to be put there. He says, that there was a Complaint of the Ward that he was nauseous: That two Days before his Death he could not stir at all; that he had a sore Place on his left Side, and he says, that he complained if he should go there again it would be the Death of him. He says, that Wilson and Cummins went to Acton, and they represented the Condition he was in, and desired he might go to the Sick Ward; and Acton said to Wilson, Go about your Business. He says, that there was a Mark upon his Nose and Ear, and the Wound was not so angry after his Death as it was before.

Jennings says, he was not so ill when he came there, but only had the Diabetes; and the Prisoner ordered him into the Strong Room where he continued eight or ten Days, and then came out for two Days; and then was ordered back by the Prisoner. He desired Acton to have Thompson removed; and Acton said, Let him die like a Son of a Bitch, and be damned. He said, he died the next Morning, and died in this Strong Room. That the Strong Room was seldom washed, it was rough-swept; but what he means by that I cannot see: He says, that it was not dry over Head.

Mary Seaband says, that he was removed into the Strong Room, and Acton gave no Orders concerning him; there was some Wet under him, but she does not explain from whence it came, therefore it might come from the Distemper. She says, that his Side mortified; that there was some Disfiguration on the Side of his Face, it was eat by the Rats. She thinks it a very strong Room, and it was not a proper Place to put any Person in; that it was never washed; that about Six in the Morning he died, and was buried about Ten.

Snape cannot say, whether Thompson went by his own Consent or not; but that he went from the Pump-Ward to the Strong Room, and staid nine or ten Days, and then staid two or three Days in the Pump-Ward, and went back again, and staid nine or ten Days both Times. He says, he came in and out when he pleased. He says, that he saw his Corpse, and one Side of his Thigh was black, he saw him three or four four Days before he died, and he never complained of his Thigh: It was very wonderful he should not complain of it.

Eleanor Ewer said nothing to the Purpose.

Bacon says, that he came in the latter End of May 1726, and Thompson and he were in the Pump-Ward; that Thompson remained there three Weeks, and was carried from thence into the Strong Room; that he has seen twenty Rats there at a Time; when he had been there ten Days he came back, and staid in the Pump Ward two Days, and then returned; that he had no Bed, or but a little Piece of one. He says, that Thompson complained of the severe Usage, and that it would be the Occasion of his Death; but not of the Sore. He says, the Room was made on purpose to punish People for great Crimes against the Government; and Thompson told him; that it would be the Occasion of his Death.

Purchase says, that he saw him removed, and said he walked there; that he visited him very frequently, and the Room was not washed all the Time he was there a Prisoner; that there was no Complaint of his Sore, but of his Usage; he says, that it was wet, and the Rain came in at Top.

Wilson says, Thompson was in the Pump Ward; that he was very hearty and merry, and gave some Instances of his Mirth; that he was put in the Strong Room, and was in a bad Condition. He gives you an Account of the Floor; that there was Water there; that some came down from above, and some was made by Thompson. He says, that he was locked up on Nights, but not on Days; he went to Atton to intreat him to remove him, and he bid him hold his Tongue; he told him he should die if he was not put in another Place; and thereupon he went to the Nurse of the Sick Ward, but she refused his coming there. He says, there was a Tarpaulin put on the Top of the Strong Room about a Year ago, and before that the Wet came in, and he believes that this was the Cause of his Illness and Death.

Phillips says, that Thompson was troubled with a Diabetes; that he was in a miserable Condition; that he was in the Room ten Days before he died; and that he laid upon the Ground all the Time, and he was put there by the Prisoner's Order; and that he never saw the Room washed. He says, that he might have been put in a better Place, for there was Room in the Sick Ward; and he might have been put in a Room against his own Ward, for it was empty.

Gentlemen of the Jury, you will consider the State of this Indictment; and that there are necessary to be taken Notice of two Things.

The first is, that Thompson was put in the Strong Room against his Consent.

The next is, that the Confinement there, was the Occasion of his Death.

The Prisoner says, that he was very far from putting him there, for he asked Leave to go; so that a Charge is laid upon him who never gave Thompson any Offence, or used any hard Words to him; therefore he cannot be so barbarous as represented.

There are eleven Witnesses that he has called, who give an Account of Thompson's having the Diabetes, that the Ward was very uneasy with him; and because he had done in the Ward, what they used not to have done there, they took all his Cloaths away.

Christopher Gossling says, that Thompson was offered by the Prisoner to go into the Sick Ward, and he refused, which confirms what the other Witnesses say, (and then Atton bid him go whither he would,) and he said he would go into the Strong Room; and Atton said, if you go into such a Room (the Witness naming the Room) won't that be as well. If he went into the Strong Room on his own Desire, Atton is not guilty.

He says, that Thompson had a Pillow and Blanket, which is explained afterwards, that he could lie upon it and turn.

Holmes says, that Thompson was so tormented by the Ward, that Thompson desired him to go to Atton, to desire he might go into the Strong Room, and upon that Atton gave leave; and says, that he was desired to go to the Sick Ward; and says, that he was not confined in the Day-time, unless he was bolted in by his Fellow-Prisoners, that had played the Rogue with him.

Elizabeth Gossling; she gives an Account as her Husband did; that Thompson owned how friendly the Prisoner had been to him, and that it was so far from being looked on as a Punishment, that it was a Matter of Favour thought by Thompson to be there.

Brown says, that he talked with Thompson, and Thompson said, God bless Atton, he had saved his Life, for if he had stayed any longer in the Ward, he should have died; and says, there was a Bed there.

Barton; she heard the Captain say, that he asked Leave to go into the Strong Room, being quiet and easy to be there; and that he had rather be there, because he was always at Ease.

Bourlier says, that the Ward was uneasy; upon which Thompson made Interest to go there, and took his Bed and Bedding, and asked Leave of Atton to go.

Davensh says, that the People of the Ward came for him, and he saw him carried quite through. He goes into the Strong Room, and asked Thompson, how he came to be there; and he owned, by the Civility of Atton, that he was there. He says, that Thompson had a Bed, and that he went out and in when he pleased.

Johnson says, that Thompson said, that he thanked God that Atton was so good to let him be there.

There were two other Witnesses, who spoke to his asking Leave.

Gentlemen, now you will consider how the two Evidences tally, and what Injury there was done to Thompson.

For the King, they say, that he was put there without, and against his Consent; and for the Prisoner, eleven Witnesses say, it was with his Consent. If you should be of an Opinion that it was without his Consent, then it deserves another Consideration; but if you should be of an Opinion that it was with his Consent, then there must be an End of this.

In the next Place, you will consider in relation to the Distemper. As to the Diabetes, some have said on one Side, that they looked upon it to be mortal, and that he never complained. It is very observable, that he never should complain.

In the next Place, they tell you, how he caught it, by lying upon the bare Boards. Some of the Witnesses for the King say, he had only a Sort of a Bed; and eleven Witnesses for the Prisoner say, he had a Bed; and if he had, he did not lie on the Ground, and could not have the Distemper from lying there; it was impossible.

The third Part is, whether he was a Prisoner in the Strong Room? You have heard, the Witnesses for the King all agreed that he went out on Days, though he was locked up on Nights.

The Witnesses for the Prisoner all agree, he went out on Days, and he was not locked up on Nights.

As to his going to the Sick Ward, the Witnesses say, that Atton ordered it, and he refused to go.

If this Place gave him the Distemper of which he died, and if he went without his Consent, you will find the Prisoner Guilty; but if he went out and in when he would, in consequence, he was not confined there; there is no Reason to find him guilty.

When he asked Leave to go to the Strong Room, the Prisoner gave it in a very humane Manner, and gave him his Choice, to go there, or into the Sick Ward.

Upon the whole, I must leave it to you.

The Jury agreed upon their Verdict immediately, without going out of Court.

Clerk of Arraignment. Gentlemen, are you all agreed in your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Clerk of Arraignment. Who shall say for you?—Omnes. Foreman.

Clerk of Arraignment. William Atton, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.)

Look upon the Prisoner, how say you; Is he Guilty of the Felony and Murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?—Fore. Not Guilty.

Mr. Strange. The Prisoner, my Lord, has been very much fatigued, and desires, upon paying his Fees, he may be now discharged.

Mr. Atton. My Lord, I desire you will discharge me now.

Mr. Bar. Car. I can't comply with your Request.

Mr. Strange. Mr. Paxton, speak to the Judge. Upon which Mr. Paxton went out of Court.

Mr. Strange. Mr. Oglesborpe, I desire you will interfere, and speak to the Judge, and that you'll give your Opinion. Pray speak, pray tell whether you consent.

Mr. Ogle. Were I Prosecutor, I should desire the Prisoner might be released; not that I think him innocent, but that every Englishman, let him be never so unjustly acquitted, hath, by the Habeas Corpus Act, on his Acquittal, a Right to be discharged; nor can any Subornation of Perjury, or any Management of a Jury, prevent it, for they are cognizable at another Time.

(There being then a great Noise in the Court, interrupted his speaking for some Time, and as soon as it ceased, he went on again.)

As I said before, I am not the Prosecutor; if I were, I knew what I should have done. The Attorney General was ordered to prosecute by the Crown; and it is he, or his Representative, that should answer this Question, and not me; and since I am speaking, I desire to be indulged a Word more, that I may tell the Reason of my coming here.

Having had the Honour of being one of those Gentlemen who were appointed to inquire into several Matters, some of which have been this Day under your Consideration; not knowing, therefore, what Questions might arise, for the clearing up of which I might be necessary, I thought it incumbent on me to attend.

I have had nothing to do in conducting the Prosecution here, which has appeared evidently; therefore I can't imagine why any Application should be made to me.

Dominus Rex versus Atton.

*Michaelmas Term. 3 Geo. II.

The Defendant was Deputy-Keeper of the Marshalsea Prison; and upon the Address of the House of Commons, was prosecuted for several Murders, supposed to have been committed by him on Prisoners in his Custody. He was tried on four several Indictments, whereon the only Question was, Whether a Place within the Prison, called the Strong Room, was a proper Place to confine disorderly Prisoners in? And the Jury upon all the four Trials acquitted him, to the Satisfaction of almost every Body; and in consequence of these Acquittals he was discharged. Presently after he was at Liberty, a single Justice of the Peace, upon Information of a fifth Person's having been put into the same Strong Room, and dying within a Year after, thought fit to commit the Defendant again for Murder; and upon a Habeas Corpus, Strange pro Def. moved he might be admitted to Bail, on producing Copies of the Informations, and Affidavits of the former Trials, and of the identical Nature of the Offences; but the Court refused to look into the Informations, though they were pressed with the Lord Mohun's Case, Salk. 124. where they looked into the Depositions taken by the Coroner, upon a Motion to bail: And, in the present Case, they remanded the Defendant; who lay in Prison till the next Assizes; when the Grand Jury did him the Justice to return the Bill Ignoramus, and he was discharged.

XVIII. Several Proceedings relating to the bailing Mr. BAMBRIDGE, both at the King's-Bench, and at the Session's-House, in the Old-Bailey, in 1729, previous to his Trial for Felony.

At the King's-Bench.

June 7, 1729.

THIS Morning Mr. Bambridge was brought by Habeas Corpus from Newgate to the Court of King's-Bench. The Habeas Corpus, and the Return, which contained the several Matters, wherewith he was charged, were read, viz. 1. A Commitment by the Honourable House of Commons, for many Barbarities, Cruelties, and Crimes, in the Execution of the Office of Warden of the Fleet. 2. An Indictment for the Murder of Mr. Castell. 3. A Charge of Felony for stealing Goods.

* Sir John Strange's Reports, Vol. II. p. 851.

The Prisoner's Counsel moved the Court, that he might be admitted to Bail; for that as to the first of the said Commitments it was ended by the Expiration of the Sessions of Parliament; as to the second, the Prisoner, upon a fair Trial, had been acquitted; and as to the third, it was a Charge brought in upon the Prisoner, on his being acquitted of the Murder, and no Bill of Indictment either found, or offered to the Grand Jury, though they continued sitting till the Day after the Trial; and more especially, was it reasonable to admit him to Bail, for that by a late Act of Parliament, he is obliged, on the Pains and Penalties of Felony, forthwith to make out true and perfect Lists of all the Prisoners in the Fleet, till June fourteen, and to give up all Securities, &c. which it was impossible for him to do, without having his Liberty to go to the Fleet, to inspect the Books, and examine the Officers there; and eight Persons being ready to become his Sureties, whereof Notice was given; therefore, it was hoped the Court would admit him to Bail. The King's Counsel alledged, that the Crime which the Prisoner stood charged with, on Oath, was Felony, without Benefit of Clergy: That, as to what was said of the Prisoner's being liable to the Pains of Death, in case he refuses or neglects forthwith to make out the said Lists, &c. the said Word forthwith, in this Case, imports a convenient Time, or as soon as is reasonable; and therefore, on behalf of the King, they hoped he should not be admitted to Bail. The Court were of Opinion, that as this Case is circumstanced, there were not sufficient Reasons to admit the Prisoner to Bail, the Crime he is charged with being Capital; and one of the King's Evidence being out of the way, the last Day of the Sessions at the Old Bailey, the Bill against him was not preferred, and the Court there having ordered the Prisoner's Detainer till next Sessions. The Court also declared their Opinion, that in case the Prisoner, to the utmost of his Power, complied with the Act of Parliament, in delivering such Lists, &c. he would be no way liable to the Penalties thereof; in the End he was remanded to Newgate.

Dns. Rex ver. } At the Sessions of Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery, held at Justice-Hall, at the Old Bailey, on the ninth Day of July, 1729, before Sir Robert Baylis, Knight, Lord Mayor, and others his Majesty's Justices.

The Solicitor for the Crown not being ready to try Thomas Bambridge, who stood indicted for Felony; the King's Counsel did not attend till the 9th of July, the 1st Day of the Sessions; when Lord Chief Baron Pengelly, being ill, was out of Town; and Mr. Justice Reynolds, being obliged to go the Circuit; there were only on the Bench, Sir William Thompson the Recorder, and Mr. Serjeant Raby the Deputy Recorder.

When Mr. Bambridge was brought from Newgate to the Old Bailey, he petitioned the Court, that he might be either tried, bailed, or discharged; and that in the mean time he might, under the Custody of the Keeper of Newgate, be permitted to go to the Judges Chambers, to inspect the Bail-books and Commitments, to enable him to perfect the Lists of all his Prisoners, which the present Warden had demanded; and which by a late Act of Parliament he is obliged to deliver, on the Pains of Felony without Benefit of Clergy; and the Judges going their Circuits on Monday next, his Petition set forth, that it might be too late for him, after the End of the Sessions, to inspect the said Books. The Court were pleased to Record the Petition, and to grant the first Part of it, viz. That he should either be tried, bailed, or discharged; and as to the other Part of his Petition, declared that he could not incur the Penalties in the said Act, if he did the utmost in his Power to perfect the said Lists.—And next Day, (July 10,) Mr. Bambridge, who had petitioned the Court to be tried, bailed, or discharged, was indicted, together with James Douglas, and William Pindar, (his Accomplices) for breaking open the Door, and feloniously stealing the Goods of Mrs. Berkley, a Prisoner in the Fleet; when the Grand Jury found the Bill against them all; whereupon Douglas and Pindar absconded.

And on 12th July 1729, being the last Day of the Sessions, Thomas Bambridge (being before arraigned) was brought to the Bar, to be tried for the Felony whereof he stood indicted; when Sir William Thompson spoke as follows:

Sir William Thompson. As I have the Honour to be a Member of the House of Commons, and as this Prosecution was ordered by Address from the House of Commons, it may be objected by the Prisoner, that I am both a Prosecutor and Judge.

Mr. Bambridge. I have no personal Objection to your trying me; but as you are a Member of the House of Commons, I have long had a Regard for you, and I beg I may not be understood as having any personal Objection to you; but I beg no Person belonging to the House of Commons may have any thing to do with it.

Sir William Thompson. Mr. Attorney, you see the Prisoner thinks me not a proper Judge to try him.

Mr. Att. Gen. I apprehend it is not a legal Objection; I believe it has frequently happened, that Members have sat as Judges, where Prosecutions have been ordered by the House of Commons.

Sir William Thompson. He may not think me divested of Partiality; it may be thought in me a remote Objection, but I would avoid lying under any Imputation of Partiality.

Mr. Att. Gen. I don't say it is not a legal Objection; as the Prisoner does insist upon it, it is not right in me to insist upon your trying him; but if you do not think proper to try him for the Sake of the Prosecution, and the Solemnity of it, I hope the Trial will go off till a Judge is here: But I am told there is Danger that some of the Witnesses may be gone out of the way; and as Witnesses are the most material in all Trials, I should be glad of its coming on as soon as possible.

Sir William Thompson. I will tell you how that Matter happens; there is not a Day next Week, that my Lord Mayor is not engaged in Business; suppose it should be put off till Monday Se'n-night, some of the Judges may be come home from their Circuits on Saturday Night; the Sessions shall be adjourned on purpose; there shall be all the Care in the World to support the Prosecution. As this Matter does happen, and the Prisoner still insists upon it, let it be Wednesday or Monday Se'n-night.

Mr. Att. Gen. I believe Monday will be the properest Day; Lord Chief Justice Byre, and Baron Carter, may be in Town then.

Sir William Thompson. He sees the Inconvenience; if he will wave the Objection, I am ready to try him, and he shall have all the Indulgence the Law will allow; I do it not to wave the Fatigue; and as for Mr. Serjeant Raby, he is not well, he has had an ill State of Health for some Time, and is not able to try him.

Mr. Attorney. If it goes off to Monday seven-night, it may be put off till next Sessions; therefore I should think it better for the Prisoner to be tried now: I don't desire him; it shall be voluntary in him.

Bambridge. I insist upon the Objection.

Mr. Attorney. Pray let it be on Monday seven-night.

Sir William Thompson. It is the Attorney's Desire, that it may be adjourned till Monday seven-night.

Bambridge. The Trial I went under last Sessions, for the Murder of Mr. Castell, met with false Representations in the Papers; therefore, rather than run any Hazard of a Misrepresentation, I desire it may be adjourned to the Time Mr. Attorney mentions.

Sir William Thompson. What was inserted in the Papers I have nothing to say to.

Bambridge. If Things were misrepresented then, they may again; and I have suffered so much in my Character under such Misrepresentations, that I ought to be cautious how I conduct myself.

Then the Court was adjourned to Monday seven-night.

Luna 21^o die Julii, 1729.

Proclamation was made for Information.

Clerk of Arraignment. Set up Thomas Bambridge. (Which was accordingly done, and the Indictment read in English.)

Sir William Thompson. This Matter was put off till To-day (the Prisoner having thought fit to object against me), in expectation that some of the Judges would come to Town.

My Lord Mayor has sent to those in Town, and they sent Word, that it would not be convenient for them, being fatigued with the Circuit.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. Serjeant Cheshire and myself are ready, and the King's Witnesses are ready.

Sir William Thompson. I have had the Objection in my Mind; and the more I consider of it, the more I think it will be very improper for me to try him. I know no Instance, no Parallel.

There was an Act passed last Sessions of Parliament, to which I was a Party; the Prosecution was ordered by Address from the House of Commons, to which I was a Party; and it does remain a Scruple with me, that it does not become me to try this Man.

The Trial must be put off till next Sessions.

Lord Mayor. The Judges sent Word, that they were so fatigued with the Affizes, that their Health would not permit them to attend.

Mr. Attorney. I have been here twice: Next Sessions is the 27th of August; I must be out of Town, and cannot be able to attend the Trial.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. I shall be one hundred and fifty Miles out of Town at that Time.

Sir William Thompson. The Sessions you don't usually attend; I wish it was otherwise: If you can tell me of any Case where a Judge acted as Prosecutor and Judge, I will try him.

Mr. Attorney. I can't recollect any Precedent; but the Court of King's Bench grants Informations, and try the Cause after.

Sir William Thompson. After the Court of King's Bench grants Informations, they hear both Parties. Whoever reads the Act passed last Sessions, if I had tried him, would say I was not impartial.

Mr. Attorney. If it is a Scruple the Prisoner makes, he cannot be discharged.

Sir William Thompson. The Trial must go over; it must take its Fate. Mr. Allen, take care of the Prisoner.

Dns. Rex ver. } At the Old Bailey.
Bambridge. }

Mercurii 27^o die Augusti, 1729.

MR. Conningsby attended on Behalf of the Crown, and made a Motion to put off the Trial of Thomas Bambridge till next Sessions; but the Court did not think fit to enter into the Argument then, and deferred it till the 29th of the same Instant.

Veneris 29^o die Augusti, 1729.

Mr. Conningsby. I am of Counsel for the King, my Lord. I have an humble Motion to make to the Court, that the Trial of Mr. Bambridge may be put off till the next Sessions; and when I ask this, it will be necessary to assign some Reason: The last Time I made the Motion to the Court, your Lordship was pleased to determine, that the Prisoner was not in the Meaning of the Habeas Corpus Act, as he waved being tried himself; and therefore it is discretionary in the Court what they will do in this Matter, as the Trial was before put off by the Prisoner's Concurrence. My Lord, the King's Counsel being out of Town, or upon the Circuits, is one Reason; but I don't barely insist upon that; for I have an Affidavit, that a material Witness for the King is absent, and can't be found; that he has absconded for Debt; but that we shall be able to have him by next Sessions, though not now; I submit it upon that.

Then the Affidavit was read, which was to the following Effect:

"Nicholas Comer maketh Oath, That he had sought after Gifford Lane, formerly Clerk to Mr. Gybbon, late Deputy Warden of the Fleet, to serve him with a Subpoena; but could not find him out, because he has absconded for Debt; but believes he shall find him by the next ensuing Sessions; and that it was not safe to proceed to Trial without his Testimony, &c."

Mr. Conningsby. I hope, upon this, my Lord, the Trial will be put off. Mr. Just. Probyn. While Mr. Wynn is speaking, I desire I may look over the Affidavit.

Mr. Wynn. (Counsel for the Prisoner.) My Lord, I hope the Reason given is not sufficient to put off the Trial: I will not mention now the long Time that he has been kept in Prison, it is so fresh in Memory.

As to the Absence of the King's Counsel, there is no Occasion for them, as that learned Gentleman is present; and I humbly apprehend, that can be no Foundation to put the Trial off.

The next Argument is founded upon the Affidavit of Nicholas Comer, That he had not been able to find Lane; and that Lane was a material Witness for the King: What Foundation he had to believe Lane a material Witness does not appear; and it is very easy to seek for a Man where he is not to be found. The other Day, my Lord, there was nothing then pretended but the first Part of the Motion; and Mr. Paxton himself will own, that he could assign no other Reason than the Absence of the King's Counsel; and, I presume, as your Lordship would not allow that as a sufficient Reason then, I hope you will not now. At the latter End of a Sessions no Affidavit, they themselves are conscious, can have any Weight.

They supposed that your Lordship would hardly enter into it now, and, for that Reason, have very artfully spun it out: I called upon them then to give a Reason for putting the Trial off. Why was there not a proper Application Yesterday? The Affidavit would have been filed, and the Prisoner would have had a proper Opportunity to give Evidence as to the Character of Comer; and if any Thing is to be presumed, your Lordship will presume it in Favour of the Prisoner.

I will not take up any more of your Lordship's Time; but humbly insist, that your Lordship will proceed upon the Trial, or admit him to Bail.

Mr. Conningsby. The learned Gentleman, my Lord, insinuates, that we searched for Lane where he was not to be found: The Affidavit sets forth, That Comer searched at his Place of Abode, and at other Places, where it was thought he was likely to be. We do take upon us to say, he is a material Witness: If we swear falsely, that lies upon us to answer; and, I apprehend, the Crown would be no more surpris'd than the Prisoner.

Mr. Bambridge. As to Lane's being a material Witness, if you look upon the Indictment, you'll not see him upon the Back of it.

Mr. Paxton. That's not to the Purpose; for we seldom put the most material Evidence on the Back of the Indictment.

Mr. Bambridge. I beg Leave, my Lord, to mention one Circumstance, which is notorious, and now publicly talked of: There was one Gentleman of the Grand Jury, who was very solicitous to the rest of his Brethren to find this Bill, has laid violent Hands upon himself for the Injury done to me.

Mr. Justice Probyn. That is not to the Purpose.

Mr. Bambridge. He has not sworn to Lane's Place of Abode.

Mr. Paxton. There is one remarkable Circumstance, that the Court was adjourned for several Days, that the Prisoner might have a legal Trial, and it went off upon the Prisoner's Account.

Mr. Bambridge. I am surpris'd Mr. Paxton should say that; I did not speak one Word that Day.—I have in Writing what was said, which there is one ready to swear to; which he read over.

Mr. Justice Probyn. That relates to the Prayer of the Habeas Corpus Act. When People are in Custody a considerable Time, without some particular Reason, they should be discharged.

One of the Reasons always admitted, is the want of Evidence for the Prosecutor: If Endeavours have been used, and they cannot be had, that always is a sufficient Reason. As to the Affidavit, it is not so strong as usually is made upon such Occasions: It says, that he was concerned for the Prosecutor; but it don't appear how he was concerned. He says, that he had made Enquiry at Mr. Gybbens's House, but don't say that he ever lodged there; but goes on and says, that he enquired at several other Places where it was likely to find him; but don't say he lodged at those Places. Why won't you consent that the Prisoner should be bailed?

Mr. Conningsby. I don't know what Service it will be to him.

Mr. Wynn (afterwards Serjeant). I am surpris'd that any thing should be mentioned about the Appeal, which is a private Cause.

Mr. Conningsby. I mentioned nothing of the Appeal now.

Mr. Wynn. You did the other Day.

Mr. Baron Comyns. As, on the one Hand, Care should be taken that the Prosecution should be so carried on, that the Person guilty should be punished; so, on the other Hand, it should be carried on with such Speed, that no Person should be longer confined than necessary. It does appear, by the Concessions on all Hands, that the Prisoner has continued in Prison ever since May last: Though, by the Waver of not being tried, he is not intitled to his Discharge, yet he ought to be considered as to the Length of Time he has continued in Prison; unless you can show any Disadvantage to the Crown, if he is admitted to Bail. If it secures the Liberty of the Subject, on the one Hand, we shall take care, on the other, that the Bail shall be so sufficient, that he may be amenable to Justice.

Mr. Paxton. The Trial was put off upon Mr. Bambridge's own Motion.

Mr. Justice Probyn. He ought to be admitted to Bail. Mr. Bambridge, have you Bail ready?

Mr. Bambridge. I can't say I have this Instant; but if it is your Lordship's Pleasure to order Bail, upon giving Notice to the Solicitor for the Crown, I'll get them ready.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Give the Names of the Bail as soon as conveniently you can; for it should be done in Court.

Mr. Wynn. Can you undertake to get them ready in two or three Hours.

Mr. Bambridge. I have two or three ready in Court now.

Mr. Wynn. What Sum, my Lord, shall they be bound in?

Mr. Paxton. I desire, my Lord, they may justify in a particular Sum.

Mr. Justice Probyn. He shall enter into a Recognizance himself of two thousand Pounds, and the Bail one thousand Pounds a-piece.

Mr. Paxton. I should have an Opportunity to enquire into their Circumstances.

Mr. Williams. You know me.

Mr. Paxton. I know you to be a Tradesman in Long-Acre; but don't know what you are worth.

Mr. Justice Probyn. You that are here now may justify: You say you know one of them, only want to be satisfied as to his Circumstances.

Mr. William Beatniff (Coachmaker in High-Holborn). I am ready, my Lord, to justify.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Is he sworn?—Mr. Tanner. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Mr. Beatniff, are you worth a Thousand Pounds when all your Debts are paid?—Mr. Beatniff. I am, my Lord.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Is Williams sworn?—Mr. Tanner. He is.

Mr. Williams. I cannot swear to a thousand Pounds; but I will swear to five hundred Pounds.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Are you worth five hundred Pounds, when all your Debts are paid?—Mr. Williams. I am, my Lord.

Mr. Bambridge. There is one of the Serjeants of the Compter has offered to be the other.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Let him be sworn.—Titus Parker, are you a House-keeper?—Mr. Parker. Yes.

Mr. Justice Probyn. Are you worth five hundred Pounds, when all your Debts are paid?—Mr. Parker. I am, with my Place.

Mr. Justice Probyn. I have nothing to say how you make it up; but I ask you, Whether you are worth five hundred Pounds, over and above what is necessary to pay your Debts?

Mr. Parker. I really believe I am.

Mr. Justice Probyn. That is not enough for you to say.

Upon which he would not swear otherwise, and withdrew; and Mr. Bambridge was directed to get another.

Sabbati, 30^o die Augusti, 1729.

The Calendar being called over, Mr. Bambridge was brought to the Bar.

Mr. Bambridge. The Person that I did propose for the third Man. I cannot have while the Court is sitting, for he is out of Town.

Serj. Raby. Then you can't comply with the whole.

Mr. Bambridge. I can't now; therefore I desire I may be referred to the Lord Mayor to take the Bail.

Mr. Harbing. The third Person was just now in Town; I saw him with an Agent of Mr. Bambridge at Fleet-Ditch.

Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, Harbing is one in the Conspiracy: I shall have you, and Comer too, by and bye.

Mr. Harbing. That audacious Front of your's will do you no Service.

Serj. Raby. You say you can't be able now to comply; you can't give Security now; and you desire it may be referred: Whoever takes that Authority upon them, will do it by the Order of the Court. Let it be referred to the Lord Mayor, and any two of the Aldermen upon the Roia. When do you propose to give in Bail?

Mr. Bambridge. I propose on Tuesday Morning.

Serj. Raby. Let it be Wednesday, and give three Days Notice: It will be better for you; for the Solicitor for the Crown may say that he had not sufficient Notice, and that may delay you.

Lord Mayor. You may attend me on Wednesday Morning at Ten o'Clock. Take care to give Mr. Paxton Notice.

On September 9th, he was bailed before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, at Guildhall, for the Felony of which he stood indicted; having given sufficient Sureties for his Appearance at the next Sessions at the Old Bailey; though he was continued a Prisoner in Newgate, being charged on an Appeal for the Murder of Mr. Gastell.

Dns Rex ver. Bambridge, At the Old Bailey, 20 October, 1729.

THE said Thomas Bambridge being brought to the Bar (the King's Counsel not being then in Court), Proclamation was made for Information.

Clerk of Arraigus. Thou the Prisoner at the Bar, these Men that thou shalt hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our Sovereign Lord the King and thee, upon the Trial of thy Life and Death; therefore, if you challenge them, or any of them, your Time to speak is as they come to the Book to be sworn, before they are sworn. [Then Part of the Pannel was called over, as follows:]

Clerk of Arraigus. Robert Johnson.

Johnson. Here.

Mr. Bambridge. I object to him. I am surpris'd he should be summoned: He was a Prisoner in the Fleet, and was cleared by the late Act of Insolvency; and so are half of the Persons that are now summoned.

Officer. I took the best Care I could.

Mr. Bambridge. These ought not to have been upon the Pannel: I am ready to be tried by any twelve honest and indifferent Men.

Lord Chief Justice Raymond. I don't know how this Matter is; if you have any just Cause, you may challenge any of them.

Clerk of Arraigus. John Lewis. (Who answered, and was sworn.)

Mr. Bambridge. Half of them were Prisoners.

Mr. Matthews. Have you any other Pannel?

Officer. There is another Pannel.

Clerk of Arraigus. William Berry (not here).

John Fowler (answered, and was sworn).

Clerk of Arraigus. Richard Evans.

Richard Evans. Here.

Clerk of Arraigus. Look upon the Prisoner.

Mr. Kettleby. Let the Prisoner look upon him, to see if he knows him.

[Then the King's Counsel came into Court.]

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. My Lord, there is a Witness, that is to go through the whole Cause, one Turner, who is very ill; and we shall have an Affidavit presently, that he can't, without Peril of his Life, come out. He was here on Friday, and this is the Act of God: Three or four Times the King's Counsel have attended, and hoped this would have been the last. It is our Duty to acquaint your Lordship, that he goes through the whole Cause: We are very sorry it has so happened; but we cannot try it, unless we are to try the Cause without this Witness.

Mr. Attorney General. It is impossible for us to go on without this Witness; this Accident is what we did not meet withal till the Court was sitting; there is a Messenger sent, and an Apothecary, to desire him, if possible, to come in any Manner, in a Chair, or otherwise; if not, we shall lay before your Lordships, by Affidavit, the Condition he is in when the Apothecary comes. This Witness is the most material in the Cause; it is impossible to charge the Prisoner, or try the Cause without him. The Witness was here on Friday, and there can be no Inconvenience to the Prisoner, for that in regard to this Indictment he is bailed; he is not in the same Case where he would be kept in Custody; but if that was the Case, it is a sufficient Cause to put off the Trial, supposing he was not upon Bail. I have attended here several Times, and should be glad to have done with this Attendance.

Lord Chief Justice Raymond. I can't say any thing to it till the Affidavit comes.

Mr. Bambridge. I did not hear one Word that that Gentleman said.

Lord Chief Justice. They have alledged, that a material Witness, that goes through the whole Cause, cannot with any Safety to his life attend.

There

There is no Affidavit come, so it cannot be taken Notice of till it does, and they say it cannot be any Inconvenience to you, because you are already bail'd. I wish you hear me, for I am hoarse.

Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, I do hear you, this Cause has been depending ever since May last.

Lord Chief Justice. You have no Occasion to take notice of that.

Mr. Bambridge. I don't know but this Witness is one of the People maintained in the Fleet, at Board-wages. It has been put off already several Times, and your Lordship knows, I surrendered on Friday to take my Trial.

Mr. Attorney-General. It was not our Fault it was not tried in July last, we had all our Witnesses then ready.

Mr. Strange. An Honourable Gentlemen made the Objection, then upon the Bench.

Mr. Attorney-General. I must observe, that the Prisoner insisted upon it himself.

Mr. Bambridge. I am very sorry, so weak a Stratagem as this is made use of to put it off.

Lord Chief Justice. Have a little Patience till the Affidavit comes, I cannot say any thing to it till then.

Mr. Bambridge. I have had a great deal of uncommon Sufferings in this Cause.

Lord Chief Justice. That is nothing to me, I can't say any thing to it; I am here only to try the Cause.

Mr. Bambridge. I have brought a Gentleman, Mr. Holder, one hundred Miles, and this Trial being put off from Time to Time, the Expence is so great, that it is enough to ruin any Man.

Lord Chief Justice. You must stay till the Affidavit comes.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. This Witness swears to the stealing the Goods. Then Mr. Bambridge went from the Bar, and the Court waiting some time,

Mr. Paxton produced an Affidavit, which the Parties swore to in Court.

Mr. Attorney-General. I believe you should bring the Prisoner to the Bar. (Which was done accordingly.)

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. Now the Affidavit is come, there are three Witnesses, though I mentioned but one. Now it appears, from the Evidence of three Persons, that there is another Person, a Prisoner in the Fleet, that cannot come; he has had a violent Fever, that fell into one of his Thighs, and caused a dangerous Wound to be made, six Inches in Length and three in Depth.

Mr. Attorney-General. My Lord, we pray the Affidavit may be read, (which was accordingly done,) and is to the following Effect:

James Current, Surgeon, — Goodacre, Apothecary, Nicholas Comer, severally make Oath, each for himself; and James Current saith, "That he hath attended Captain John Lillingston about fourteen Days last past, and that he was seized with a violent Fever, which fell into his Thigh, and occasioned a Tumor, which was forced to be laid open; and Lillingston now lies dangerously ill; that the Wound is six Inches long, and three deep, and he cannot be brought out without manifest Danger of his Life."

"Goodacre; he swears that he has been to visit John Turner, and that he found him violently ill of a Pleuretick Fever, and he cannot be brought out of his Lodging without Danger of his Life."

"Nicholas Comer; he says, he was employed by Mr. Paxton, and he is well acquainted with John Turner and John Lillingston, and is well acquainted with their Affidavits, and says, that they are very material Witnesses, and it is not safe to proceed to Trial, without the Benefit of their Testimony; and that Turner did attend on Friday, though he was then ill."

Mr. Attorney-General. We that are Counsel for the King, cannot oblige the Attendance of Witnesses; we cannot keep them in Health; I should have been very glad to have went on with the Trial; what has been one of the Means of putting it off, was the Prisoner's insisting upon an Objection, that was made by an honourable Person, then upon the Bench. The Affidavit is so full, that I need not trouble your Lordship with any Observations upon it. The Course of all Courts is upon such an Affidavit to put off the Cause, and it is not safe to go to Trial without this Witness. By my Brief we cannot safely proceed, for the Prisoner was committed upon the Affidavit of Turner.

Mr. Solicitor-General. I apprehend, that what we apply for, is so reasonable, it will be granted.

Lord Chief Justice. The Affidavit is sworn by three Witnesses.

Mr. Kettleby. I am Counsel for the Prisoner. In Cases of Felony, Counsel may be assigned for the Prisoner upon Motions, but not upon Trials.

Lord Chief Justice. I allow it to be so, you may go on.

Mr. Kettleby. I hope the Trial will not be put off at this Time; this is so small a Matter to object, to put off the Trial; they don't mention when they first came to the Knowledge of this: If they came to the Knowledge of it so soon, that the Defendant might have had an Opportunity to send People to view the Persons ill too, then this Affidavit is not sufficient.

Lord Chief Justice. He was here on Friday.

Mr. Strange. It is not said in the Affidavit, that he was subpoena'd, he might attend as a Hearer.

Mr. Attorney-General. None of us knew it till just now. He don't lye in Prison upon this; he is confined upon the Appeal.

Mr. Kettleby. He has an Iron knocked off one Leg, and ready to be put upon the other.

And if this holds him, he may be continued for ever. I submit to your Lordship, that they must give Notice to put off the Trial, if it is to be put off; they don't say whether they knew of this Cause before, or not; Mr. Attorney said, he did not know of Lillingston's being ill.

Mr. Attorney-General. I knew Lillingston's being a Witness, by my Brief.

Mr. Kettleby. They should have set forth in the Affidavit, that they did not know of the Illness till this Morning, and that they did not know it before: If that had been the Case, it had been some Excuse; besides, the Jury has been charged with the Prisoner; the Attorney did not come in so soon: he has made an Objection against the Pannel, before the King's Counsel came in; they said they were to have an Information, of the Disability of one Witness. Now there are two ill, without saying when they first knew of their Disability.

Comer says, that he was employed under Mr. Paxton, and he knows they are material Witnesses. If Mr. Paxton had given it upon Oath, that they were material Witnesses, I should have believed it; I don't know from whence Comer comes, I do not see it in the Information; he says, that he is acquainted with them; therefore concludes, they are material Witnesses. I must submit it, if they are material Witnesses or not; it is an easy Matter to get three or four People, may be Clerks Clerks, to swear, that they are material Witnesses, who I have no reason to believe had sufficient Reasons to ground their Belief upon that they were material Witnesses; should we not have had some Information before? Perhaps the Prisoner might have sent one to visit these People, who might have sworn, that they were as able to come, as these say they were unable; and I humbly beg leave to say, that the Affidavit is not sufficient. Besides, there is another Reason, why it should not be put off, he is surrendered by his Bail to take his Trial, and we do not know that they will stand again.

Mr. Attorney-General. They must stand till they are discharged by the Court.

Mr. Kettleby. They have not so much as given Notice to stand again, he has not had so much as an Opportunity of asking; I hope he may be tried, or else the Consequence must be, that he must lye by till December, and then Somebody else may have a broken Leg.

Mr. Wynne. I can't pass over this Affidavit, without making one Observation; I shall not call it an affected Delay, though it looks exceeding like it. The Affidavit last Sessions was not shewed the Beginning of the Sessions, that he might have had an Opportunity to answer it, but the last Day of the Sessions; I am sure then it looked like an affected Delay. The Affidavit was then not looked upon to be sufficient; the Objection then to Mr. Comer was, that he was no Solicitor. Is a Person sufficient to swear to Witnesses being material, that has only served a Subpoena? Mr. Paxton is the only Person that has appeared as a Solicitor. Another thing that is pretty extraordinary is, that the Bail is discharged; there may be no Render, but the Goaler will hardly part with him without fresh Bail.

I should be glad to know, if the Goaler will give Liberty for him or no; I would not add more to your Lordship's Trouble; but as this Case is, there is no Manner of Reason to put off the Trial.

Mr. Strange. I am Counsel of the same Side, and I must observe to your Lordship, that this Affidavit is not sufficient as to the Inability or Materialness of the Witnesses; as to the first it appears, that they must have had fourteen Days Time to have made this Inquiry; as to Lillingston, and though they pretend to say Turner was here on Friday, they do not say Lillingston was; they could have gone on without this Lillingston then, for it does not appear that he was here on Friday last.

That if it had suited the Convenience of the Court to have gone on on Friday, they must have gone on without Lillingston. There is a great Ambiguity in the Affidavit; it says, that the Tumor had been laid open, and that he had a Hole in his Leg, and lies in the Fleet, and that Lillingston positively cannot be brought out. Really, as to Lillingston, he has fallen in very particularly; the Objection arose as to him above fourteen Days ago, and they might have applied to the Court in time, so he ought to be laid out of the Case, and he is to be laid out of the Case.—It is sworn as to the other, that he was out on Friday; but whether he was subpoena'd or not, is not sworn. As to their Indisposition, the Apothecary only swears, that Turner was ill of a Pleuretick Fever; but I submit it, whether they must not swear positively, that he cannot come out. I dare say, there is no such Witness wanted. I take notice of this, to shew, that when they come to speak of Turner, they cannot speak so full as they do to Lillingston. Comer says, that it is not safe to go to Trial without this Witness, but he don't say whether it is safe to proceed to Trial with; I don't know whether the Trial is safe, if he was tried upon this Witness. Here is the Solicitor for the Crown, to be sure he knows the Secrets of the Cause, if this Man is so material a Witness, he ought to swear to it: We ought to have the best Account we can; and now we have not the best Account, because the Solicitor for the Crown does not take upon him to swear to the Fact. It is not made out that they are so material, that they can't go on without them; nor does it appear, that they are so bad not to be able to come out; though Mr. Attorney is pleased to say, that it cannot be any Injury to the Prisoner, for that his Bail must stand; I don't believe the Keeper of Newgate will venture to let him go out without fresh Bail, and whether that Bail will stand or not, I don't know.

Mr. Bambridge. On the 8th of this Instant, I served Notice on Mr. Paxton, that I would surrender myself on Friday, to take my Trial, and it is fourteen Days since Lillingston has been so ill: This is an Indictment for stealing the Goods of one Mrs. Berkley, who has lately declared that she is not concerned in the Trial. As to Comer, who has made the Affidavit, he is a common Ubiquitarian, and if I am to be confined upon his Affidavits and Harbing's, and the rest of the Conspirators, I shall be kept in Gaol to the Day of Judgment; and it is such an Expence, it will ruin any one. I am under a Necessity to importune the Court to be put upon my Trial, for there is a Person come out in a Chair, that is a material Witness for me, that is in danger of his Life, and cannot, in all Probability, live till next Sessions; it is Mr. John Bonham, the King's Jeweller.

Lord Chief Justice. You must make an Affidavit of it; I cannot mind any thing but upon Oath. You have mentioned, that there has been great Delays in this Affair: You should acquaint the Court that it has been put off irregularly: Has it not been done in this Place, that the same Sessions, that a Man has been brought to be tried, it has been put off? This is the Act of God.

Mr. Bambridge. They should have set forth the Time when they were taken ill.

Mr. Attorney-General. There is no Criticism in the Affidavit: I will ask any of those Gentlemen, whether they ever knew in the King's Bench, or Court of Exchequer, the Times mentioned?

Mr. Strange. In the last Instance (that they had been subpoena'd).

Lord Chief Justice. Subpoena'd is not the Question.

Mr. Attorney-General. Did you ever say they were subpoena'd in an Affidavit?

Lord Chief Justice. As to the Merits, I know nothing of that: This is nothing but a Motion to put off the Trial; I don't see any thing distinguishable in it. It would be very hard for him to lie in Gaol, if he was not admitted to Bail.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. They say, it don't appear that the Man was subpoena'd: I ask any of those Gentlemen, to shew, if ever they found it so in an Affidavit? I was surprised when either of them mentioned it: They insist so much upon it, that they will think there is something in it at last.

Lord Chief Justice. They must say what they can for their Clients.

Mr. Kettleby. We don't know who this Comer is: If Mr. Paxton will swear these People are material Witnesses, we will give it up.

L. C. J. Has not Comer been employed in the whole Prosecution, and been fully apprized of the Affidavits?

Mr. Att. Gen. This is the slightest of all their Objections; for they may as well desire the Attorney General to make an Affidavit: The Court expects no more than that a Person, acquainted with the Merits of the Cause, should swear that they are Material Witnesses. If it is done by a Person to show to the Court, that they have Reason to believe that they are material Witnesses, that is sufficient. He swears, that he had been employed to carry on the Prosecution for Felony against Bambridge, of which he is indicted, and acquainted with the Informations taken upon Oath. It is said, why did not Mr. Paxton swear it? May there not be two Solicitors in a Cause? Does it not often happen, that there is a Clerk in Court and Solicitor concerned in one Cause? Why don't they say a Clerk in Court should make it? We have done all that is requisite to show that they are material Witnesses. He could not swear it, unless he himself had seen the Informations.

L. C. J. He swears, that they cannot safely go to Trial without these Witnesses.

Mr. Att. Gen. He says, they both are material Witnesses, and it is not safe to proceed to Trial without them; and that is taking upon him to swear as much as ever was required. It is urged, that Mr. Bambridge's Bail has surrendered him: Supposing that he was quite out of Custody, and that he gave Notice that such a Day he would take his Trial, is that a Discharge of his Bail? No; his Bail is bound till he is discharged by the Judgment of the Court: Such Notice to take his Trial can be no Discharge. One of the Gentlemen says, that there was something like an affected Delay; we were ready to have tried him in July last.

L. C. J. That don't appear from you: Who has it arisen from?

Mr. Att. Gen. It might have been tried in July: There was then a Tenderness in the Judge, and a very laudable one; but he said, if Mr. Bambridge did not insist upon it, he would try him. When the Witnesses are here, then the Prisoner is for having it put off; when they are not here, then he is for having it tried.

Mr. Bambridge. That honourable Gentleman caused the Trial to be adjourned; and I must submit, whether it was known for a Judge, that was a Party, ever to try any Man. What the Attorney urged before was, that the Court of King's Bench ordered Informations, and then proceeded to the Trial of them. As to Comer, he is not a Clerk of Mr. Paxton's; he is only a Hic & Ubiquitarian.

Mr. Justice Denton. I am of the same Opinion as my Brother Raymond.

Mr. Bambridge. I will not take up the Time of the Court. If this Gentleman, who I before mentioned to be a material Witness for me, should die, it will be greatly detrimental to me; therefore, if your Lordship will let him be examined in Court, and leave the Ring in Court, I will consent to let the Trial be put off.

Mr. Kettleby. I should be very glad the Attorney General will take the Trouble to examine him.

Mr. Att. Gen. I can't take upon me to consent to any thing particular; but must submit it to your Lordship.

Mr. Justice Denton. Mr. Bambridge, why won't you bring your Witnesses into Court?

Mr. Bambridge. The High Sheriff, he not being well, was so good to let him be in his Room; he is there, and is coming in.

Mr. Att. Gen. I never knew it done in capital Cases.

L. C. J. I don't know that ever it was done.

Mr. Justice Denton. What do you say, that he may not live till next Sessions?

L. C. J. He is weak and aged; but, if I was upon my Oath, I don't see any Likelihood of his immediately dying.

Mr. Bambridge. He is seventy Years of Age.

L. C. J. He may live five Weeks.

Mr. Bambridge. If you will let him declare, that I bought the Ring of him —

L. C. J. If can't be done. In several Cases, where Witnesses have been going abroad in Civil Causes, it has been done.

Mr. Kettleby. If your Lordship don't consent to this, I hope the Court will indulge us in another Thing we pray —

Mr. Justice Denton. Mr. Attorney General says he won't consent.

Mr. Kettleby. Whether, if you put off the Trial, you won't admit this Gentleman to be examined?

Mr. Att. Gen. It never has been done without Consent; and I never knew it done in Capital Cases. I should be very tender to come to make a Precedent in a Capital Case: I have known it done in Civil Cases with Consent.

Mr. Kettleby. If this Affidavit won't do, I beg Leave further to desire there may be two Juries.

L. C. J. Let us make an End of one Thing first. We are all of Opinion the Affidavit is full.

Mr. Kettleby. I submit it entirely; and when I know your Lordship's Opinion, I am not only ready to give over, but am always convinced; and though Mr. Attorney is unwilling to make a bad Precedent in one Case, I hope he will be willing to make a good one in another. He was not here when the Prisoner made his Objections to the Jury, to have a disinterested Pannel to try him: It would be very odd to try the Warden of the Fleet by a Jury that came out of Domus Mansionalis; Prisoners that have been discharged by the late Act.

L. C. J. What would you have me do?

Mr. Kettleby. If it goes over to another Time, I hope the Sheriff will take care to have a good Jury: The first Pannel were most of them Prisoners; I am sure the Sheriff will do every thing that is right.

Sir John Williams (one of the Sheriffs). There is a new Pannel, where this Person, Johnson, is not one.

L. C. J. What do you think of the Sheriffs?

Mr. Kettleby. I have no ill Opinion of them; I would be bound Body for Body for them.

Mr. Att. Gen. This is the first time I heard of this Objection: I don't know any Foundation for it; for my Part, I never trouble my Head about Juries, nor ever will. I take it for granted, the Officer that summons them will do his Duty; if he don't, the Party has his legal Challenge.

Mr. Strange. If it is so understood, that he may be let out, according to the former Recognizance, we shall submit.

L. C. J. I don't see but he may be admitted to Bail upon that.

Mr. Bambridge. The Recognizance is here.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it not to appear upon the Party's surrendering him in Court?

Clerk of Arraignment. It was.

L. C. J. Let me see the Recognizance; don't let me do Things in the Dark.

Clerk of Arraignment. The Recognizance is not returned: All that he prayed was, that the Appearance might be entered.

Mr. Bambridge. The Recognizance was to appear here, and not to be discharged without Licence.

L. C. J. The Recognizance is continued; it can't be discharged, without all the Conditions are performed.

Mr. Bambridge. I did not hear your Lordship before.

Whereupon the Prisoner withdrew.

Then Proclamation was made for Information.

Clerk. Thomas Bambridge, hold up thy Hand. (Which he did.) You of the Jury look on the Prisoner, and hearken to his Charge: He stands indicted by the Name of Thomas Bambridge (prout in the Indictment, mutatis mutandis). And as the Clerk was reading the several Parcels, particularly when he came to the Rings, Mr. Bambridge spoke as follows:

Mr. Bambridge. I desire to know, how many Rings there are mentioned in the Indictment; whether one, two, or three, or four Score.

Then the Clerk did read the several Rings mentioned in the Indictment, and went on with reading the following Part of the Indictment.

H h

Mr.

Mr. Bambridge. I will not give your Lordship any unnecessary Trouble; but I desire the Clerk may read the Form of the Indictment in Latin.

L. C. J. Eyre. What do you desire?

Mr. Bambridge. The whole Indictment to be read, except the Parcels of the Goods.

L. C. J. Mr. Matthews, speak loud, when you read.

Mr. Bambridge. Is it vicesimo die?

Clerk. It is tricesimo primo Octobris. And then the Clerk of the Arraigns went on with reading the other Part of the Indictment.

Mr. Bambridge. That is not all the Indictment; I am informed, that several others are mentioned as Accomplices.

Mr. Kettleby. There are Pindar and Douglas.

L. C. J. Mr. Matthews, have you read all the Indictment? Are they mentioned?

Mr. Matthews. The latter Part of the Indictment is relating to Pindar and Douglas.

L. C. J. I have not that in my Paper: You should have put it in.

Mr. Matthews. My Lord, they are not here.

L. C. J. Read it.

Mr. Kettleby. You should have read it before.

Then Mr. Matthews read the remaining Part of the Indictment relating to them.

Mr. Holland. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King. This is an Indictment against Thomas Bambridge, for feloniously stealing and taking away several Goods, the Property of Elizabeth Berkley. The Indictment sets forth, That Thomas Bambridge, late of London, did on the 31st of October, 1727, in the first Year of his present Majesty, with Force and Arms, in London aforesaid, in the Parish of St. Bridget's, alias St. Bride's, in a felonious Manner, and with an evil Intent, steal and take away the Goods of Elizabeth Berkley in the Indictment particularly set forth, being in a certain Mansion-House, where the said Elizabeth Berkley and divers others did inhabit. This is laid against the Peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

Mr. Serj. Cheshire. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel for the King. Thomas Bambridge, the Prisoner at the Bar, stands indicted upon the Statute of the 12th of the late Queen: He is charged for feloniously stealing and taking away the Goods of Elizabeth Berkley, to the Value of 40s. and upwards, out of a Mansion-House, where she the said Elizabeth Berkley and several others dwelt. The Evidence, in support of the Indictment, will be this; that some Time before the 23d of October, in the Year 1727, the said Thomas Bambridge was Deputy Warden of the Fleet Prison, under Mr. Huggins; and at that Time the said Elizabeth Berkley was a Prisoner, and lodged in the second Gallery on the Master's Side; that some Time before the first Day of Michaelmas Term in that October, the said Thomas Bambridge, and some other Persons, viz. Pindar, Barnes, King, and Douglas, came in Company together, and entered the Room where the said Elizabeth Berkley was: The Room, Gentlemen, was furnished with very good Goods: They did, Gentlemen, pretend to rifle the Room, and take some Account of some of the Goods; and a Person in Company did write down, about twelve Lines, Part of the Effects; and the Man did not proceed any further then; but Bambridge, and the other Persons with him, hurried Mrs. Berkley away to the Common Side: There, Gentlemen, she was locked up; there she lay five or six Weeks, till he had turned her Senfes; and she has continued in that melancholy Condition ever since.

The first Time, Gentlemen, that they entered the Room, he wrote some Lines, and did take some Account of the Goods; but did not then proceed any further: But as he turned the Owner out of the Place, he put a Padlock on the Door, and she put her own Key in the Door, and locked the Door; and there was nothing done further at that Time.

Gentlemen, on the 23d of October, Bambridge and others, in Company with him, did come to this Place in the Gallery: He easily did remove the Padlock, but it was not so easy to force open the Door; and therefore, Gentlemen, he sent for one Greenway, a Carpenter, to bring Tools to force the Door open. He was sent for, Gentlemen; but they were impatient; and one of the People with the Defendant, in the mean Time with a Poker forced open the Door. When Greenway came, they did bid Greenway stay a little; then told him, they had no Occasion for him. When he came into the Room, the Prisoner himself did direct and assist in breaking open the Trunks and Boxes; and when they were all open, there were found several Rings, and some Jewels; and those Things that were light and portable Bambridge put in his Pocket: There were, Gentlemen, very good Apparel, all of them made up, Linnen and other Things of a considerable Value: For these, Gentlemen, Bambridge had provided a large Portmanteau, and put them up and carried them away. This, Gentlemen, was the second Time of his entering the said Room; and at this Time, I should tell you, Gentlemen, he did go on with the twelve Lines wrote before, and perfected the said Inventory, I suppose, by adding some more Goods. And then, upon this 23d of October, he was pleased Gentlemen to fix a Head to the Paper, and directed in what Words it should be wrote, which were these: An Inventory or Appraisement of Goods, of and belonging to Elizabeth Berkley, distrained the 23d of October, 1727, for 56l. of an Arrear of Rent due to John Huggins, Esq. Gentlemen, according to my Instructions, it will come from our Witnesses, that there was a Person who pretended to be, and was a Constable; and there was a Person there who pretended to appraise the Goods; but Nobody was sworn, as by Law they ought: In this Condition he did perfect the Paper before-mentioned.

In looking over the Things, Gentlemen, Bambridge did observe there was a Brush and a little Chalk, something usual among Persons that wear Jewels to clean them: He cried out, 'Look about, there are probably some Jewels; for there is something to clean them with;' and they looked and found some Rings, as Garnets, Emeralds, and Topazes; and when he had done he carried them away: But what he did with all of them afterwards, we cannot tell. Give me leave to say, my Brief informs me, that he did sell Part of them for fourteen Guineas to one West; some Gold Lace, near thirty Ounces, to one Mr. Harris; and some Silver Tea-spoons, gilt with Gold, he sold or presented to Corbett's Wife (who was one of his Tipstaffs): and her Bed and Bedding, which he was pleased to think was very good, he caused to be delivered to one Wilkins, to deliver to Jenkins a Waterman, to be carried to his Lodgings at Wandsworth: This, Gentlemen, made a great Noise, and Mr. Huggins came to hear of it, and expostulated with the Prisoner, and said to him, You have taken a good many Goods belonging to Mrs. Elizabeth Berkley, under Pretence of seizing for an Arrear of Rent owing to me; how could you do so? There is no Rent due to me. Gentlemen, in this Manner he expostulated, How came you to do it? There is no Rent due to me, for there is an Agreement with my Deputy, Mr. Gibbons, who was to have the Produce of that Time; to what Value did you take? To which the Prisoner replied, I have only taken to the Value of Ten Pounds; notwithstanding, Gentlemen, he had sold a Ring for fourteen Guineas, besides thirty Ounces of Gold Lace, and some Tea-Spoons, and sent the Bed and Bedding to his House in the Country; this was indeed very extraordinary.

It is plain, Gentlemen, through his whole Conduct, he never intended to use this as a Distress; for when he sold the Cloaths of Mrs Berkley, he did not sell them as Goods taken by Distress, but to conceal from whence he had them; he said, These are my Wife's Goods.

It is very remarkable, and worthy your Observation, that though all the Cloaths were made into Garments or Apparel, he ordered and directed the Person who took the Inventory, to put down only so many Yards, sufficient to make a Gown or Petticoat; there was, Gentlemen, a Dimity Gown, which he particularly ordered to be put down, Dimity sufficient to make a Wrapper; which, Gentlemen, you will easily guess, was only to conceal its being wearing Apparel, that it might not be followed; or otherwise, why were they not entered into the Inventory in the Form they were, as made into Apparel? It is very extraordinary, that he should say so much of such and such a thing, only sufficient to make a Gown, or whatever it was; this, I hope, he will give a good Account of; this, Gentlemen, he ought to explain to you: After he had got the other Part of the Goods into his Possession, as he had said the former were his Wife's, these he said, were left in his Hands to make Money of; not saying any of them were Mrs. Berkley's, taken by Distress; but he sold Part of them as his Wife's Apparel, and Part as left with him by a Friend, to make Money of. We are far from thinking, where a Man takes a Distress for Rent, where Rent is due, tho' he does not let a Constable, or an Appraiser attend, and demean as they ought, that this is Felony; though this is a great Offence, and an enormous Abuse, and the Law will punish it civilly and criminally, but not capitally. If Landlords send Servants to make a Distress, and they misconduct themselves, and do not behave themselves rightly, it would be very hard to have that turned into Felony: We, Gentlemen, aim at no such thing; but that is to be taken into your Consideration, with my Lord's Advice. When there is no Pretence of Rent due, no Authority for distraining; when he makes use of a Pretence of Distraining, to get Goods into his Possession, to dispose of them as his own, or as left with him to sell; that Pretence to get them into his Hands, and dispose of them as his own, or as left with him to sell, and not sell them as prescribed by Law, after due Appraisalment, and returning the Surplus to the Owner, will make it Capital. Gentlemen, I need not tell you what the Law is in this Case; but, my Lord, I will dare to say, that tho' a Man comes by Goods lawfully, by Consent of the Owner, if he disposes of them to his own Use, it is Felony. For if I deliver Goods to a Carrier, to carry them to Deal, and he carries them to Sea; and he should open the Packs, and sell the Goods, this is Felony: This has been adjudged so by all the Judges in England, assembled for that Purpose.

There is a particular Case of an Attorney, which I shall take Notice of to you: It was in the 18th Year of King Charles the Second: He had, Gentlemen, a Mind to get Abundance of Goods, belonging to a Woman out of her House, into his Power and Possession: He did, Gentlemen, take a Process against her, and laid the Woman in Newgate; upon which he gets Judgment in Ejectment, and got Possession of her House; and then, Gentlemen, he gets Judgment, and takes the Goods out of the House, and takes them into his own Possession: There was a Colour of a Process of Law; but this was a Trick, to get the Goods from the Woman, and done with a felonious Intent; and the Man was hanged for it. These Things are proper for your Consideration. Without any further Observations, we will call our Witnesses, and submit it to your Lordship, and the Jury, whether the Prisoner's Conduct did not shew a felonious Intent, and whether the Distress was not made use of to get the Goods into his Possession, for his own Use.

Mr. Att. Gen. I am of Counsel of the same Side, for the King. The Indictment against the Prisoner at the Bar, is founded upon an Act passed in the 12th Year of the Reign of the late Queen Anne, Chapter the 7th, for taking away, and seizing feloniously, Goods of the Value of forty Shillings, in a Dwelling-house. Gentlemen, this being the Statute upon which it is founded; the Question before you is, upon the Fact being given in Evidence. At the Time when the Fact was committed in October 1727, T. Bambridge was Deputy Warden of the Fleet Prison, under Mr. Huggins; an unhappy Woman, Mrs. Berkley, a Prisoner in his Custody, being committed there for Debt, had a Room in the Prison, where she had several Things of Value; she being a Prisoner, and there having Goods of Value, the Prisoner at the Bar, who was Gaoler, ought to have suffered and permitted her, according to Law, to have the Use of her own Goods brought there, and enjoy them quietly, without Disturbance from him; but, Gentlemen, probably the Value of these Goods was the Temptation to the Fact afterwards committed. There were, Gentlemen, two Times that will be mentioned by the Witnesses, that he entered the Room, both in the Month of October; one some Days before the other. I don't find that the first Day is particularly fixed, but the second was the 23d of October 1727; and the first Time the Prisoner came, was some Days before the 23d of October 1727: the Prisoner then, with three or four other Persons, Pindar, Barnes, and King, came to the Chamber of Mrs. Berkley, in a violent Manner, and caused her to be removed out of her Room; and as a preliminary Step to what was intended, caused her to be carried down on the Common Side, and there locked her down; after they had disposed of her, they put a Padlock on the Door, and she locked the Door. I don't find that the Goods at that Time were particularly taken away by the Prisoner, but they thought fit to secure them; but before they took away Mrs. Berkley, they made her put her Key into the Lock, and lock the Door, and they put a Padlock on it; this was the first Time of entering the Room; the second Time, after dark, the Prisoner, with Barnes, Douglas, Pindar, and a Person to whom they thought fit to give the Title of Constable, but whether he had any Authority or not to act as such, that don't appear to us, but it is incumbent on him to shew; then pulled off the Padlock; one should have thought, if any Thing fair had been intended, Mrs. Berkley should have been sent for to have opened, or at least, to have seen the Door opened. There was a Lock upon the Door, but the Prisoner ordered the Door to be opened; but he not having Strength enough himself, ordered another to break open the Door, which he accordingly did: The Door being opened by Force and Violence, without sending for Mrs. Berkley, they fell to rifling the Boxes; the Prisoner with his own Hands, broke open the Locks of three Boxes, and two Trunks; Things were taken out, and some of those of the most Value, the Prisoner thought fit himself to take, and put in his Pocket; those were two Cornelian Seals, Gold Rings, in Number five, which were of some Value; one a Garnet, another had a small Diamond in it, and another was an Amethyst Ring of some Value, which the Prisoner thought fit to put in his Pocket; a Silver-handle Knife and Fork, in a Shagreen Case, and other Things of Value, he put into a Portmanteau, which the Prisoner sent out of the Prison. After this was done, the rest of the Goods were taken away; and as Mr. Serjeant has mentioned to you, there was a Pretence of taking an Inventory of the Goods; if that shall appear only a Pretence and Colour, that will not vary the Case as to him. The Bed and Bedding (the Prisoner then wanted a Bed and Bedding) he thought fit to take away; and, if my Instructions are true, sent it down by Water to Wandsworth, to his Lodgings; and Mrs. Berkley, ever since that, has been kept on the Common Side, without Bed or Bedding, or at least was kept so for a Time: We apprehend the Witnesses will come up to this. This being the Nature of the Case, the Question to be submitted to my Lord, is, Gentlemen, what the Design of the Transactions, and Nature of it was? We apprehend the Design was to get these Goods wrongfully and feloniously into his own Custody, and take them to his own Use; if that was the Case, the Manner of taking them will not alter the Thing; for must observe to you, Gentlemen, if a Man designs to take Goods feloniously, let him put it in what Shape he will, if that is only the Pretence and Colour, it is Felony; nay, if by Colour of the Law, any Man possesses himself of Goods with a felonious Intent, in that case it is so far from being an Excuse, that it is an Aggravation of the Offence; for the Law will not admit, that under its Colour, a Man should be stripped of his Property; that instead of being a Defence against one Man, it should be an Injury to another; for if any Person should possess himself by Force of another Man's Goods, it is Felony. Besides the Case mentioned to you by Mr. Serjeant, I will take notice of one; that after Goods distrained, and the Goods carried away, there is got a Replevin of these Goods; if that Replevin was only colourably taken out, to get these Goods into his Possession, that Replevin will not excuse him from Felony. The Question is, whether if a Distress is taken, if that Distress is only colourably taken, it is not Felony? Therefore, though it can't be pretended, and none will have a Thought, I hope, that it is insisted on, if a Man intends fairly to make a Distress, and errs in the doing it, though he errs in a great many instances, that that should subject him to Felony; God forbid: Yet if he makes use of a Distress only as a Colour to get Goods into his Possession, when it is Felony, and Circumstances will come to be material, and his not observing the Method which the Law directs, will further shew with what Intent the Beginning was, and with what Intent he took the Goods, which, we apprehend, is material. But what, I apprehend, is most material for your Consideration, is to shew the concealed Manner of describing these Goods, the Method of disguising them, and the Manner of selling them. As to the first of these, it will appear, that the Wearing Apparel, instead of being described, as really they were, he ordered to be described, as so much Stuff and Silk sufficient for to make a Gown, Petticoat, or whatever it was. We apprehend there could be no other View in that, than to disguise it, that the Truth might not appear. And, Gentlemen, as to the Disposal of them, it will appear plainly, we think to you, such as shews that the Prisoner had no Intention to make use of his Distress; but that his original Design was, to convert them to his own Use. It is very truly said, by the learned Gentleman that has spoke before me, that where a Man possesses himself of Goods, though lawfully, supposing he disposes of those Goods for his own Use it will make it Felony. There have been Instances given you, where Persons came by Goods lawfully, but their Disposal of them to their own Use, made Felony. Now in the present Case, it will appear, the Goods, Gentlemen, were many: As to the Ring mentioned, particularly that in which the Amethyst was set, the Prisoner, after taking that Ring, sent it to one Mendoza Salas to inquire the Value, and disposed of it to him; as to the Garnet, with a Brilliant in the Middle, that was sent likewise to him to be disposed of, to inquire the Value of that also: As to the Wearing Apparel, that was sold to one West for fourteen Guineas; the Gold Lace was sold to one Harris; the gilt Tea Spoons were sold to Corbett's Wife; and as to the Bed and Bedding, he put it at first in another Place in the Prison, and after sent it to his own House, with the Portmanteau, wherein other Things of Value were put. If he had any Intent to dispose of these Goods, as taken by Distress, as a Satisfaction for any Demand, or Debt he might have, should not he have given an Account to Mrs. Berkley? And there was any Surplus, ought not he to have paid it over to her? It will be incumbent on the Prisoner, to shew that he accounted to her for the Surplus; but if there is no Colour of Right to make the Distress, no regular Method taken in the Disposal upon the Distress, no Account thereof given, we apprehend that it will appear a Pretence of Distress, and that only the Pretence of Distress was made use of to convert the Goods to his own Use; if so, this will amount to Felony. We will beg Leave to call our Witnesses, and then leave it to your Lordship's Directions.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Call John Turner. (Who was sworn.)
Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, Mr. Attorney General, in his Declaration that he has made, was pleased to admit, that if there was a legal Distress made, there could be no Attempt upon my Life,
Mr. At. Gen. My Declaration!

Mr. Bam. That Mr. Attorney, in his Declaration allowed, if it was a Distress—

Mr. At. Gen. My Declaration! I said, that it would appear as a Colour of Distress to commit a Fraud.

Mr. Bam. You meant in fraudem Legis.

Mr. At. Gen. I spoke in English, believing it to be more intelligible to you; you may make use of Latin Words if you will.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you know Mrs. Berkley, and when?

Mr. Turner. Yes; I knew her in October, 1727.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How came you to be acquainted with her?

Mr. Turner. By being a Prisoner in the Fleet Prison; she was a Prisoner at the same Time, and lodged in the second Gallery, within two or three Rooms of mine.

Mr. Sol. Gen. In what Part of the Gaol did you lodge?

Mr. Turner. I lodged on the Master's Side, in the second Gallery.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How long?

Mr. Turner. I had the Misfortune to be there two Years before this Seizure was made.

Mr. Sol. Gen. You mention a Seizure, give an Account how it was made.—Mr. Turner. I was called in by Pindar.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Day?

Mr. Turner. Between the 23^d and 27th of October, 1727.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What were you called in for? What to do?

Mr. Turner. I was called in by Pindar, and he told me, that a Distress was to be made; for being an Upholder, Mr. Bambridge called me frequently to make Distresses.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who was there?—Mr. Turner. Pindar, and I think King.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was Mrs. Berkley there then?

Mr. Turner. Yes, but not Bambridge.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did you do?

Mr. Turner. I took an Inventory of all that did appear; we did not then open any Boxes; we mentioned them in Grots, and took every Thing that appeared in the Room, as Earthen-ware, Bed and Bedding, and such like Things. In about fourteen Days afterwards, Mr. Bambridge came again, and I was called in.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Thing more done then?

Mr. Turner. Nothing more than taking an Inventory.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Constable there?

Mr. Turner. There was a Person there, who said he was a Constable.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who was there the second Time, about fourteen Days after the first? Was Mr. Bambridge there?

Mr. Turner. Yes, after they had broke the Door open, I was called in, and she said, they had committed Felony.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you hear it said, whilst Mr. Bambridge was there?

Mr. Turner. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did Mr. Bambridge say?

Mr. Turner. Mr. Bambridge wondered the Trunks were not opened before, and asked Mrs. Berkley for the Keys, and when she would not give him the Keys, Mr. Bambridge himself broke open the Trunks, and rifled them.

Juryman. Was it in the Presence of Mrs. Berkley.—Mr. Turner. Yes.

Juryman. Was she there all the Time?

Mr. Turner. She was there all the Time.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did you do then?

Mr. Turner. When the Boxes were opened, I made an Inventory of all that was in them; here are both Inventories.

Lord Chief Justice Eyre. Tell us who broke open the Boxes.

Mr. Turner. Mr. Bambridge himself.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Tell my Lord what was particularly mentioned in the Inventory, what the first, and what the second Time.

Mr. Turner. The Inventory was dated the 23^d of October, 1727, for fifty-six Pounds, for Rent due to John Huggins, Esq.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who wrote the Title?

Mr. Turner. Mr. Bambridge wrote it upon a loose Piece of Paper, and said, let the Title be so, and the Date be so.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When was the first Distress made? Distinguish the two Times.

Mr. Turner. I take it the former Distress was about the 27th of October, and the second, the 3^d or 4th of November.

L. C. J. Who made the first Distress? Who was there?

Mr. Turner. The first Distress was taken by Pindar, Mr. Bambridge was not there; then I took Inventory of the Boxes, and set down so many Ban Boxes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Afterwards, you say, a particular Inventory was made on the 4th or 5th of November?

Mr. Turner. Yes, I believe it might be about that Time, but I can't be positive, not thinking it would be called in Question.

Mr. Sol. Gen. In what Manner did you make the Inventory?

Mr. Turner. I made the Inventory as Mr. Bambridge directed.

L. C. J. Give an Account what you inserted the first Time of taking the Inventory.

Mr. Turner. A Bedstead and Sacking-bottom, with China Stuff Furniture, a Feather Bed and Bolster, a Down Pillow, two Blankets, a Callico Quilt, two Pair of Sheets, two Pillow-biers, two Cane and two Stuff Chairs, an Easy Chair and Cushion, two Tables, a Looking Glass, a Fire-shovel, Tongs, Poker, and Wooden Fender, a Gridiron, a Pair of Bellows, a Hearth Brush, a Brass Hand Candlestick, two Tin Tinder-boxes, a Kettle and two Drinking Pots ditto, four Boxes and two Trunks, three Pair of Dimitty Window Curtains and Vallins, one Curtain-rod, two Hair-brooms, a large India Hand Tea-board, eleven printed Books, a Pewter Standish, two Knives, three Forks, two Tin Coffee-pots, a Sauce-pan and Skimmer ditto, a Chocolate-Mill, one hundred Vessels of Stone and Earthen Ware; this was the first Inventory.

L. C. J. Was there any Valuation of the Goods in the Inventory?

Mr. Turner. Yes, Mr. Bambridge desired me to have a particular Valuation of each Thing, which I gave to Mr. Bambridge.

Juryman. Have you a Copy of that Valuation?

Mr. Turner. No, I gave it to Mr. Bambridge.

L. C. J. When did you give it to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr.

Mr. Turner. When I finished it; a Day or two after the Distress.

Lord Chief-Justice. That was after the 4th of November.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Give to my Lord, and the Jury, the Reason for giving the Inventory to Mr. Bambridge.

Mr. Turn. It was, that Mr. Bambridge might know how to dispose of them.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Go on to the second Inventory.

Mr. Turn. A large Silver Handle Knife and Fork, two Silver Spoons, two Tea Spoons, Strainer and Tongs, a Bowl, and Handle of a Spoon ditto, three Gilt Tea Spoons, a Strainer and Tongs ditto, twenty Ounces and a Half of Gold Lace, two Cornelian Seals set in Gold, and a Ring I took to be a Crystal.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know it when you see it?—Mr. Turn. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Who directed you to set down a Crystal?

Mr. Turn. I do not know particularly, every Body was of Opinion it was a Crystal.

Mr. At. Gen. How many Rings were there?

Mr. Turn. I saw but one Ring, the others were loose Stones.

Mr. Sol. Gen. You may go on with the Inventory.

Mr. Turn. One small Emerald, one small Garnet, a Seed Pearl, five Diaper Napkins, a stitched Top of a Toylet, with Lace Mullin Falls, a two Pinner Head of Mecklin Lace, a Pair of Ruffles, a Handkerchief and Apron ditto, one Flanders Laced Cap, worked Head, and a Pair of three double Ruffles, one Head of Half-breadth Lace, and a Pair of single Ruffles, ten odd Pieces of Flanders and Colberteen Lace, about four Yards of black Lace, a furbelowed Scarf and Hood, trimmed with black Lace, one Yard of blue Lustring, two Yards of white Sarfenet, blue Sattin sufficient for a Lining, strip'd Dimitty sufficient for a Gown and Petticoat, some old Persian for a Lining to ditto.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Before you go off from this Particular, I must ask you a Question or two; these mentioned in the Inventory, sufficient for a Gown and Petticoat, and sufficient for a Lining; were these Pieces of Silk, or were they made up into Cloaths?

Mr. Turn. These were Things that had been scowred and rolled up.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was the Dimitty?

Mr. Turn. Yes, it was rolled up as coming from the Scowrers.

L. C. J. Was it in the Shape of a Garment?

Mr. Turn. Yes, it had been a Garment, but was then rolled up.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was it in regard to the Lining the same.—Mr. Turn. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Be pleased to observe, the blue and white flowered Sattin, which is set down in the Inventory, to be sufficient for a Gown and Petticoat, was that made up?—Mr. Turn. That was made up.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How came you to put it down so much, sufficient for a Gown and Petticoat?

Mr. Turn. I observed at that very Time to Mr. Bambridge, and told him we usually did not distress wearing Apparel; upon which he then said, Put it down sufficient for wearing Apparel.

L. C. J. Give a direct Account of that Particular again.

Mr. Turn. I said to Mr. Bambridge,—Sir, we don't usually set down wearing Apparel; then Mr. Bambridge said, Put it down sufficient for such and such a Thing, particularly, Sarfenet sufficient for the Lining of a Gown, which was made up; if it was the Body of a Gown, he bid me put it down sufficient for a Body, and the rest of a Lining, sufficient for a Lining.

Mr. Sol. Gen. The Question is, Whether they were actually made up, and set down only sufficient?—Mr. Turn. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Mention them particularly.

Mr. Turn. There was Sarfenet sufficient for a Wrapping-gown, that was actually made up.

Mr. Sol. Gen. You just now said, that the Things you have mentioned you gave a Valuation of separately to Mr. Bambridge; was there any Valuation on the Inventory you kept?

Mr. Turn. The total Sum agrees with the same as Mr. Bambridge had, Twenty Seven Pounds, Sixteen Shillings and Nine-pence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you remember any Discourse you had as to the setting the Value?

Mr. Turn. Upon a cursory View of taking the Inventory, I brought it to Thirty Pounds, and Mr. Bambridge said, You have over-rated these Things; you must consider there is a Charge attending this Distress, and paying you besides, and that would lessen the Value of the Things; and bid me consider it again, and upon looking it over again, I brought it to Twenty Seven Pounds Sixteen Shillings and Nine-pence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was you upon Oath?

Mr. Turn. When I signed the Inventory, and finished it, there was a Constable, and I did take an Oath, and I told Mr. Bambridge there ought to be two Persons to make the Appraisement; to which Mr. Bambridge said, I might take Pindar; but Pindar refused, so only myself signed it.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray give an Account, if you know, what is become of the Goods in the Inventory?

Mr. Turn. I do not know any thing of them but by Rumour.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you see any of the Things carried away by Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Turn. Yes, the wearing Apparel and Seals; the Seals he put into his Pockets.

L. C. J. Tell what he put into his Pocket.

Mr. Turn. The gilt Silver Tea Spoons and Rings.

L. C. J. What did he put in the Portmanteau?

Mr. Turn. The Cloaths.

L. C. J. Were these in the Inventory?—Mr. Turn. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What became of the Portmanteau?

Mr. Turn. It was carried out of the Room by Mr. Bambridge's Servant.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Brush, such as was used to clean Jewels with?

Mr. Turn. Yes; Mr. Bambridge looked very narrowly, and at last a Brush appeared; and, upon seeing of that, he said, certainly there was some Diamonds: Upon which Mrs. Berkley was very much chagrined; and she said, if you find them, will you take them? And after that he searched, and found the Rings and other Stones.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Discourse about Papers?

Mr. Turn. There was a large Parchment in a Case, she said it was a Decree: It was in a great round Case, which Mr. Bambridge took; upon which Mrs. Berkley said, What, will you rummage my Papers? Yes, says he; and if I find any Bonds or Bills, I will make use of them.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What became of her after they entered the Room?

Mr. Turn. After the first Seizure, she was turned out of her Room, and put on the Common Side, and kept there till the second Seizure was made, and then she was put into a Room without a Bed.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was there any Furniture left?

Mr. Turn. There was Earthen Ware, and Stuff Curtains; but no Bed.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How has she lain since?—Mr. Turn. Without a Bed.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What Condition of Mind was she in?

Mr. Turn. Sometime; she talked very well, and much to the Purpose; at other Times she would talk wild, and would not believe that Lord Harcourt was dead; for she said, he would do her Justice upon them (meaning Mr. Bambridge and his Accomplice). I said he was dead: She made Answer, she would not believe me; for they would find him alive to their Costs.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How did the Woman behave herself?

Mr. Turn. The Woman was much reserved, and kept herself to herself very much. She talked much to the Purpose when she did talk; but it was difficult to get her into it.

Mr. At. Gen. In disposing of the Goods in the Manner you did, sufficient for such and such a Thing, what Reason had you to do it?

Mr. Turn. It was Mr. Bambridge's positive Directions: I should not have thought on it myself.

L. C. J. Who made the Difficulty first?

Mr. Turn. I did, and said it was not customary to put down Wearing Apparel in Inventories upon Seizures; upon which he bid me alter the Names: I said it was not proper to alter the Names, and they ought not to be mentioned at all.

L. C. J. What did Mr. Bambridge say?

Mr. Turn. Mr. Bambridge said, I must have you let them be set down; Stuff or Silk sufficient to make a Gown, or whatever it was.

L. C. J. Did you set them down according to the best of your Judgment?—Mr. Turn. I did.

L. C. J. Was that the real Value you set upon them?

Mr. Turn. The first Valuation was the Price I would have given for them; and when Mr. Bambridge said the Costs on the Distress would come to more, I reduced them three Pounds.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Would you have given the Value first set upon them?

Mr. Turn. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Had you any other Reason to alter the Value, than that Mr. Bambridge bid you?—Mr. Turn. No.

Mr. Bambridge. I desire, my Lord, he may be asked, Whether I did not insist upon having every Thing particularized in the Inventory.

Mr. Turn. Yes, you did.

Mr. Bam. You say, I did demand the Keys of Mrs. Berkley, and she refused to let me have them, and then the Boxes were opened.

Mr. Turn. Yes, I said so.

L. C. J. I thought you did.

Mr. Bam. My Lord, Turner said that there was some Gold Lace.—Whose was that?

Mr. Turn. It was the Trimming of the flowered Suit of Clothes; it was the Trimming of the Suit of Sattin Clothes; Part of the Lace was remaining on them.

Mr. Bam. Was there not several Things unmade?

Mr. Turn. I said, that called a striped Dimitty came from the Scowrer's.

L. C. J. As to the Dimitty, give an Account how that was set down.

Mr. Turn. That I set down, as it appeared to me coming from the Dyer's, as a Roll of Silk.

Mr. Bam. Were the Things taken away, Part mentioned in the Inventory, or the Whole?

Mr. Turn. All that I saw taken away was in the Inventory.

L. C. J. Is the Inventory the same you delivered to Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Turn. He had every Article here, with the Prices annexed. It is a Wonder I had any Copy; for I did not apprehend that any Person would call upon me about it.

Mr. Bam. I desire Mr. Turner may acquaint your Lordship, as to the Conversation that was between me, Mrs. Berkley, and him, at the Time of making the Distress.

Mr. Turn. Mr. Bambridge said, it was a Shame she should live so long and not to pay any Rent; for that it amounted to Fifty Pounds and upwards, and she had Money enough to pay it; and said, I am informed you have been abused, and I will enquire into your Affairs, and see if I can't extricate you out of your Difficulties.

L. C. J. I think there was a Demand of Fifty-six Pounds; was that not?

Mr. Turn. I did not hear of any Demand; he only talked of it.

L. C. J. What did Mrs. Berkley say?

Mr. Turn. She said, it was the House of the King's; and if she was there, the King should find her a House.

Mr. Bam. I desire he may be asked, Whether, when I was in the Room, he did conceive what was done was with a felonious Intent.

Mr. Turn. I did think your Power was sufficient to do it.

Mr. Bam. Have you made any other Appraisements?

Mr. Turn. Yes.

Mr. Bam. Did you make any Alteration in them?

Mr. Turn. No.

Mr. Bam. Was the Appraisement done in a private Manner, or every Body know it?

Mr. Turner. Every Body did know it.
 Mr. Bam. Were Appraisements usually made publickly or privately?
 Mr. Turner. Pindar used to come and say, there are Goods to be distrained; so I did it.
 L. C. J. So it was left to you then, to appraise as your Discretion should lead you?—Mr. Turner. Yes.
 L. C. J. Pindar came to you now, in this Affair?—Mr. Turner. Yes.
 Mr. Bam. Pindar, my Lord, was indicted, to take off his Evidence.
 Mr. Justice Reynolds. Was there a Constable the first time of taking the Distress?—Mr. Turner. Yes.
 Mr. At. Gen. You said, there was a Man called a Constable: Did you know him to be a Constable?—Mr. Tur. I believe he was a Constable.
 Mr. At. Gen. Did you believe the Man that came a second time, to be a real Constable?—Mr. Tur. Yes. It has been enquired into since.
 Mr. Bam. If it was a Felony, it was a Felony committed in Oct. 1727, and not complained of till February or March last.
 L. C. J. You are not come upon your Defence yet.
 Mr. Bam. Do you not know the Name of the Constable?
 Mr. Tur. I think he was a Currier.
 Mr. Bam. Was it the Constable that usually attended upon Seizures?
 Mr. Tur. Yes.
 Mr. Filmer. You say, that Pindar was desired by Mr. Bambridge to assist in the Appraisement; what Business was Pindar of?
 Mr. Tur. He was a Distiller.
 Mr. Fil. Did he not undertake the appraising of the Goods?
 Mr. Tur. No, he refused it.
 Mr. Fil. Did not Mr. Bambridge press him to it?—Mr. Tur. Yes.
 Mr. Fil. Was there a Constable a second time?—Mr. Tur. Yes, both times.
 Turner was going away; but was called back at the Request of Mr. Bambridge, he desiring to ask him a Question or two more.
 L. C. J. Propose your Questions to the Court first.
 Mr. Bam. I desire he may acquaint your Lordship, whether, at the time when he appraised the Goods, I did not recommend it to Mrs. Berkley to pay the Rent; and said, I would stay some time, and save the Goods from being disposed of.
 Mr. Tur. Mr. Bambridge did say she was imposed on; and said, he would give her any Assistance, and bid her send to her Friends to get Money to pay the Rent.
 L. C. J. He said he would stay?—Mr. Tur. I did not hear him say it.
 Mr. At. Gen. What did he say?
 Mr. Tur. He said he would assist her, she being imposed on; and did desire her to send for Money to pay the Rent; but I did not hear him say any Words as to his staying for the Rent.
 (Thomas Wilkinson was sworn.)
 Mr. Willes. Do you know Elizabeth Berkley?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Did you know her in Oct. 1727?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Bam. I desire, my Lord, before he is further examined, he may be asked, what Money he has received, and how long he has been kept to give Evidence against me?
 L. C. J. That is not a Question fit to be asked.
 Mr. Bam. It is true, I am sure.
 Mr. Justice Reynolds. You must prove that.
 L. C. J. You cannot ask a Man any thing that tends to accuse himself.
 Mr. Bam. I don't ask to the Corruption; but whether he received the Money.
 Mr. Justice Reynolds. It carries an Imputation with it.
 Mr. Willes. He may prove it, if he can.
 Mr. At. Gen. If Mr. Bambridge proves it, it will go only to the Credit of the Witness.
 Mr. Willes. If he don't, it will go as to his own Credit. You knew Mrs. Berkley in October, 1727?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Where did she lodge?
 Mr. Wilkin. In No. 8, near the Front of the Yard.
 Mr. Willes. Where did you lodge?
 Mr. Wilkin. On the Common Side.
 Mr. Willes. Did you see Mrs. Berkley at her Door, when it was broke open?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. What time of the Year was it?
 Mr. Wilkin. The latter End of October.
 Mr. Willes. What time of the Day?
 Mr. Wilkin. At six o'Clock at Night.
 Mr. Willes. Was the Door locked when she was there?
 Mr. Wilkin. It was locked with two Padlocks; one Pindar took off.
 Mr. Willes. Who was there?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge, a Constable, and Barnes.
 Mr. Willes. Did Pindar take off the Padlock of his own Accord?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge ordered him to take it off. There was another Padlock on, and Barnes went to fetch a Hammer to break it off.
 Mr. Willes. Who ordered him to fetch a Hammer?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge.
 Mr. Willes. Did they attempt to break off the Padlock with that Hammer?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Was Mr. Bambridge by all the time?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Was the Door broke open with the Hammer?
 Mr. Wilkin. Barnes, because the Hammer would not do, went and fetched a Poker.
 Mr. Willes. What did he do with the Poker?
 Mr. Wilkin. He broke open the Door with it.
 Mr. Willes. Who stood by at that time?
 Mr. Wilkin. Turner, myself, Barnes, Pindar, and Mr. Bambridge.
 Mr. Willes. What did Mr. Bambridge order, after the Poker was brought?—Mr. Wilkin. After the Poker was brought, he ordered him to break open the Door, and so he did.
 Mr. Willes. When the Door was broke open, who went in with the Constable?
 Mr. Wilkin. All went in; Mr. Bambridge, Barnes, Pindar, the Constable, and myself.
 Mr. Willes. You mention a Constable; do you know him to be a Constable?—Mr. Wilkin. Only by his having a Staff.

Mr. Willes. Was that all the Reason you had to believe him to be a Constable?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Have you seen him at any other time?
 Mr. Wilkin. I saw him only then, and never since.
 Mr. Willes. Was Mrs. Berkley there?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes; I went to fetch her up, and Mr. Bambridge insisted upon her opening the Door; but she would not open the Door herself; so Mr. Bambridge ordered the Door to be broke open.
 Mr. Willes. When he came up, and broke open the Door, and came into the Room, what did he do?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge desired Mr. Turner to take an Inventory.
 Mr. Willes. Of what?
 Mr. Wilkin. Of all the Goods in the Room.
 Mr. Willes. Was Mrs. Berkley come into the Room?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes, she was there.
 Mr. Willes. What did Mrs. Berkley say?
 Mr. Wilkin. She said, it was a Robbery, it was not Justice, it was Felony; and she did not doubt but he would be brought to account for it in time.
 L. C. J. Was she by?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes, and saw the Room broke open, and Mr. Bambridge order Mr. Turner to make an Inventory.
 L. C. J. What did Mr. Bambridge say then?
 Mr. Wilkin. Set down such and such Things.
 L. C. J. What did they take an Account of?
 Mr. Wilkin. They took an Account of some Things before they opened the Boxes.
 L. C. J. Were the Boxes locked?
 Mr. Wilkin. There were two Boxes locked, and one nailed.
 L. C. J. Was there any Trunk?
 Mr. Wilkin. I don't remember that there was a Trunk.
 Mr. Willes. Was she asked to open the Boxes?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes, but she refused.
 Mr. Willes. When she refused, who broke them open?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge broke open three with a Hammer.
 Mr. Willes. Was she in or out of the Room at the time?
 Mr. Wilkin. She was in the Room.
 Mr. Willes. What did she say?
 Mr. Wilkin. She said it was a Robbery.
 Mr. Willes. When the Boxes were broke open, what was taken out?
 Mr. Wilkin. Three Suits of Cloaths.
 Mr. Willes. Who took them out?
 Mr. Wilkin. Some were taken out by Mr. Bambridge, and some by Mr. Turner.
 Mr. Willes. By whose Order?—Mr. Wilkin. By Mr. Bambridge's.
 Mr. Willes. What was there taken out?
 Mr. Wilkin. China, flowered Curtains, two Gold Seals, and two Rings.
 Mr. Willes. Had they any Stones in them?
 Mr. Wilkin. One had a Stone, the other not.
 Mr. Willes. Were all the Things in the Boxes carried away?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. By whose Directions?
 Mr. Wilkin. By the Direction of Mr. Bambridge.
 Mr. Willes. Were all of them, or only some?
 Mr. Wilkin. Some of them; the Bed was carried away.
 Mr. Willes. Who carried it away?
 Mr. Wilkin. I carried it away into a Lumber Room in the Prison.
 Mr. Willes. What became of it afterwards?
 Mr. Wilkin. I saw it carried to Dorset-stairs after.
 Mr. Willes. By whose Order?
 Mr. Wilkin. By Mr. Bambridge's: I stood there while it was gone; he gave Directions to carry them to the Water-side.
 Mr. Willes. Did he only give Directions to carry them to the Water-side; or any where else?
 Mr. Wilkin. He gave Directions to carry them to Wandsworth.
 Mr. Willes. When did he give these Orders?
 Mr. Wilkin. When he carried them out.
 Mr. Willes. What became of the Rings?
 Mr. Wilkin. I saw them put in his Pocket, and he called Savage and Douglas to bear Witness.
 L. C. J. What was the Reason for calling them to witness?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge said, that he put them in his Pocket for fear of their being lost.
 Mr. Willes. What did he order to be put in the Portmanteau?
 Mr. Wilkin. Wearing Apparel, and such like Things.
 Mr. Willes. Where was it carried?
 Mr. Wilkin. Into the Lumber Room above Stairs.
 Mr. Willes. Why did he order them to be put into the Portmanteau?
 Mr. Wilkin. Because, he said, the Portmanteau would hold them all.
 Mr. Willes. The Cloaths, some of them, were very rich; were they not?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Were they put in the Portmanteau?—Mr. Wilkin. Yes.
 Mr. Willes. Was Mrs. Berkley by when the Rings were put in his Pocket?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes, and he called Mr. Douglas and other Persons as Witnesses?
 Mr. Willes. What did Mrs. Berkley say?
 Mr. Wilkin. It was Felony and Robbery.
 Mr. Willes. Did he say any thing to Mrs. Berkley, when he put them in his Pocket?
 Mr. Wilkin. Mr. Bambridge said, he did nothing but according to Law, and he would answer it.
 Mr. Willes. Was there an Emerald?
 Mr. Wilkin. Yes, I think there was an Emerald, and a Garnet, out of a Ring: He put them in his Pocket.
 L. C. J. What did he put in his Pocket?
 Mr. Wilkin. Two Gold Seals, two Gold Rings, an Emerald, and a Garnet.
 L. C. J. Were the Rings plain?

Mr. Wilkinson. One of them I did not see perfectly.
 L. C. J. What was the other?
 Mr. Wilkinson. A Stone Ring; but the middle Stone was wanting.
 L. C. J. Were there any Things besides?
 Mr. Wilkinson. There were two Silver-handled Knives and Forks.
 L. C. J. I only ask as to those Things he put in his Pocket; did you see any other Things put in his Pocket?
 Mr. Wilkinson. No.
 Mr. Willes. Did you never see a Stone called an Emerald afterwards?
 Mr. Wilkinson. No.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Recollect how many Rings there were.
 Mr. Wilkinson. There were two Rings, and two Seals.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Are you sure there were but two?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Had they Stones in them?
 Mr. Wilkinson. One of them had a Stone out in the Middle.
 Mr. Att. Gen. As to the Bed and Bedding; why did you say they were to go to Wandsworth? Do you remember the particular Hands he sent them by; to be put into the Boat?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Tom King was one; as to the others, I did not know.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What did Mr. Bambridge say in your Hearing?
 Mr. Wilkinson. First, he said, they were going to be sold at a Sale.
 Mr. Willes. Who directed you to go to Dorset-stairs?
 Mr. Wilkinson. He sent me down to the Stairs to the Waterman, and bid me tell him to go away, and not stay.
 Mr. Willes. Who did he bid you ask for?
 Mr. Wilkinson. He bid me ask for the Wandsworth Waterman.
 Mr. Willes. Where were the rest of the Goods carried?
 Mr. Wilkinson. To Will's Coffee-House in Bell-Savage-Yard.
 Mr. Willes. How came they to be carried there?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Mr. Bambridge lodged at Will's Coffee-House.
 Mr. Willes. What were the Things that were carried to Will's Coffee-House?
 Mr. Wilkinson. An Easy Chair was carried there; I carried it myself.
 Mr. Willes. How long was this after the Goods were taken from Mrs. Berkley?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Some Days: It was left with Mr. Turner to clean; and then it was carried to Will's Coffee-House.
 Mr. Willes. By whose Order was it carried?
 Mr. Wilkinson. It was carried by Mr. Bambridge's Order.
 Mr. Willes. Who was it delivered to?
 Mr. Wilkinson. It was delivered to the Man's Wife at Will's Coffee-House by Mr. Bambridge's Directions: I carried it up one Pair of Stairs.
 Mr. Bambridge. I desire he may acquaint your Lordship, if he did not fetch Mrs. Berkley to be present at the opening the Door.
 Mr. Wilkinson. I did.
 L. C. J. He said so, and that Barnes was ordered to fetch a Poker to open the Door.—I ask you, whether he talked with Mrs. Berkley for the Payment of Rent, for which the Goods were distrained?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Mr. Bambridge did say something to her about seizing for Rent, and he would stand by it: She said, he could not seize Wearing Apparel for Rent, and told him it was Felony, and downright Robbery.
 Mr. Bambridge. I must desire him to acquaint you, whether it was not some Days before the Goods were removed, after the last Distress.
 L. C. J. Answer that.
 Mr. Wilkinson. Five or six Days.
 Mr. Bambridge. Were they carried out publicly?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes.
 Mr. Bambridge. Were they carried out in the Day-time?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes.
 Mr. Bambridge. Were they not carried out of the Lumber Room publicly in the Day-time?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes.
 Mr. Bambridge. Was it a publick Room to put Lumber in?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes; but it was always locked.
 Mr. Bambridge. I think he has acquainted the Jury, that she was present all the time.
 Mr. Wilkinson. I think she was.
 L. C. J. Was Mrs. Berkley there during the time Mr. Turner made the Inventory?
 Mr. Wilkinson. I think she was.
 Mr. Bambridge. He said, that I called Mr. Savage and Mr. Douglas to see that I put the Things in my Pocket: Mr. Douglas, my Lord, has the Unhappiness to be charged in the Indictment as an Accessary, though he only came into the Room by chance, and so I am deprived of his Evidence: He was put in the Indictment to take off his Evidence.
 L. C. J. He is a Principal in the Indictment.
 Mr. Bambridge. He is a Gentleman of a very good Family; he is the younger Son of a Man of Quality. I desire Mr. Wilkinson may acquaint your Lordship, whether Mrs. Berkley was not present when I said to Mr. Douglas, Pray take notice that I put the Rings in my Pocket.
 L. C. J. Was she?
 Mr. Wilkinson. I can't say positively, because it was just at last: At the latter End, she would not stay in the Room.
 Mr. Bambridge. Was there not a Bed ordered for her to lie on?
 Mr. Wilkinson. There was a Bed brought out of the Lumber Room, a nasty Bed; and she said, that if she could not lie on a Bed of her own, she would not lie on that; but went away.
 L. C. J. You say she went away; you can't say she was there then?
 Mr. Wilkinson. I can't.
 Mr. Bambridge. I desire to know, if, when he carried that Bed up, he did not bring another down.
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes; I said so before, that you did order another Bed; but I said it was a nasty one.
 L. C. J. Tell us, whether that was a good Bed or not?
 Mr. Wilkinson. I can't say it was, my Lord: She had Reason enough to complain of it; for I lay upon a better Bed myself, and that was not fit for her, who was a Gentlewoman.

Mr. Bambridge. Was it any other than what was usual for the People in the House?
 Mr. Wilkinson. I have known some lie on Sacks; but because they could get no better.
 Mr. Bambridge. Were there any better Beds there?
 Mr. Wilkinson. Yes; there were three, and you sent them away with her's: Ever since she has lain without a Bed, unless she has had one within these ten Days.
 Mr. Bambridge. I desire to know, whether Mrs. Berkley was turned out of her Room, or went out of herself, at that time?
 Mr. Wilkinson. She went out of it herself, when her Bed was taken away.
 Ambrose Burgefs was sworn.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember any Goods taken away in the Fleet Prison, and from whom?
 Mr. Burgefs. I was present, not at the breaking open the Door, but after.
 Mr. Att. Gen. When was it?
 Mr. Burgefs. About fourteen Days after the 23^d of October.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Go on.
 Mr. Burgefs. I heard, that Mr. Bambridge was going in to look on some Affairs of Mrs. Berkley's, and I went into the Room a little after the Door was broke open.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Who was there?
 Mr. Burgefs. There were Mr. Bambridge, Turner, Savage, Pindar, Barnes, and Wilkinson, and one or two more that were Strangers.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What did you see done there?
 Mr. Burgefs. I saw the Boxes broke open.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Who broke them open?
 Mr. Burgefs. Mr. Turner and Mr. Bambridge together.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What was there in them?
 Mr. Burgefs. Twenty Ounces of Orrice Lace, a great many good Cloaths, and a great many good Things.
 Mr. Bambridge. I desire he may raise his Voice; I cannot hear him.
 L. C. J. Raise your Voice.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Did you see the Boxes broke open?
 Mr. Burgefs. I was there present, and saw the Boxes broke open by Mr. Bambridge and Mr. Turner; and saw the China put into the Window, and some Orrice Lace; and saw an Emerald, or Ruby, which he put in his Pocket.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What did you see at that Time?
 Mr. Burgefs. I saw the Rings taken out.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What did you see put in his Pocket?
 Mr. Burgefs. One was a Pearl, the other an Emerald.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Were they set in Rings?
 Mr. Burgefs. They were both separate.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What is the Colour of an Emerald?
 Mr. Burgefs. It is of a greenish Colour.
 Mr. Att. Gen. These then were separate Stones?
 Mr. Burgefs. Yes.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Were there any Rings?
 Mr. Burgefs. I can't say.
 Mr. Att. Gen. What did he do with these Stones?
 Mr. Burgefs. Mr. Bambridge put them into his Pocket, and said they might be lost if put in the Portmanteau; and afterwards, as he was drinking Punch, he took them out of his Pocket.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Had she any Gold Lace there?
 Mr. Burgefs. There was Gold Lace: Mr. Turner went and weighed the Lace, and brought it back again; and said, it weighed twenty Ounces and an half.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Who took it away?
 Mr. Burgefs. I don't remember.
 Mr. Att. Gen. You were in Company; did you not observe who took it, or whether Turner carried it away?
 Mr. Burgefs. I did not, upon my Word, observe it.
 Mr. Att. Gen. Were you present at the Time of breaking open the Boxes, and taking out the Goods?
 Mr. Burgefs. I was present when three Boxes were broke open.
 Mr. Att. Gen. How long did Mrs. Berkley stay in the Room?
 Mr. Burgefs. To the best of my Remembrance, the whole Time.
 Mr. Att. Gen. You say you was present when the Boxes were broke open; was Mrs. Berkley there the whole Time?
 Mr. Burgefs. I do not know whether she went away before or not.
 Mr. Att. Gen. I think you said, you did not come till after the Door was opened?
 Mr. Burgefs. Yes.
 Mr. Bambridge. I think you have acquainted my Lord and the Jury, that there were some Stones; I desire you will inform him, and as to the Size of them, if they were small.
 Mr. Burgefs. Yes, they were.
 Mr. Bambridge. Was Mrs. Berkley there all the Time?
 Mr. Burgefs. I think she was.
 L. C. J. What did you ask him?
 Mr. Bambridge. What Size the Stones were of; whether they were small?
 Mr. Burgefs. Yes, they were.
 Burgefs was going away, and at Bambridge's Desire called back again.
 Mr. Bambridge. Mr. Burgefs declared, that he heard me declare, that I desired them to take notice, that I put them in my Pocket: Please to tell my Lord, and the Jury, what I said when I put the Stones in my Pocket.
 Mr. Burgefs. Mr. Bambridge shewed them in his Hand, and said, for fear they should be lost, they should be put in his Pocket.
 L. C. J. Did he desire Savage and Douglas to remember that he put them in his Pocket?
 Mr. Burgefs. I believe he said so to all.
 Savage was sworn.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Was you present at the time when the Goods were seized?
 Mr. Savage. I was going by the End of the Gallery, and, hearing a Bustle, went up.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. Mention the time.
 Mr. Savage. At the time when the last Inventory was taken.
 Mr. Sol. Gen. What time of the Year?
 Mr. Savage. The latter End of October, 1727.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Give an Account of what you know of this Matter.

Mr. Savage. I was going by the End of the Gallery, and observed a Number of People at Mrs. Berkley's Door, and I went out of Curiosity, to see what was the matter, where I found Bambridge, Mrs. Berkley, Pin-dar, Baylis, Douglas, and Wilkinson, and after I had been there a very little Time, Bambridge asked Mrs. Berkley for Trunks and Boxes; I went into the Room to them, and Bambridge asked her for the Keys of her Trunks and Boxes; she said, I will give you none; to which he made Answer, If you won't, I have sufficient Authority of my own to open them, and I will do it; and ordered the Trunks and Boxes, upon her Refusal to deliver the Keys, to be broke open; and Bambridge broke open some of them himself.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What was there found there?

Mr. Savage. On Examination of the Trunks and Boxes, there were found Wearing Apparel, Gold Seals, Thread, and Gold Lace, Cloaths very good of the kind, fit for any Gentlewoman to wear.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were there any other Things?

Mr. Savage. Yes, there were; for Bambridge found, in a Drawer of a Table, a Box, where there were Rings and Seals, and loose Stones.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How many Rings were there?

Mr. Savage. I think there were four; one was red, it was either a Garnet or a Ruby; one of them was whitish, with a cast of yellow, they called it a Crystal, I took it to be a Topaz.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were there any other Stones?

Mr. Savage. Yes, I think there were; one was a blue or green, another was a Ring, where the Middle Stone was out, and two Diamonds on the Side, two Seals set in Gold, which I took to be Cornelian, one white and the other red; there was also a loose Stone, and a Pearl.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What was the loose Stone?

Mr. Savage. I can't say whether a Garnet or not.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did he do with them?

Mr. Savage. After he had shewn them, he put them in his Pocket.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were there any other Things?

Mr. Savage. There was a Silver Spoon, Knife, and Fork.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did he do with that?

Mr. Savage. That was put in his Pocket, to the best of my Remembrance.

Lord Chief Justice. What became of the Seals and Rings?

Mr. Savage. He put them into his Pocket.

L. C. J. Did he bid you at that Time take Notice that he put them in his Pocket?—Mr. Savage. I do not remember that he said so.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What became of them after he put them in his Pocket?

Mr. Savage. I do not know.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did he take them out of his Pocket there?

Mr. Savage. No, but he did in the Coffee-Room afterwards.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What became of the other Goods?

Mr. Savage. The most valuable Part of the Goods was packed up, and put into a Portmanteau Trunk.

Mr. Sol. Gen. You do not know what became of the other Goods?

Mr. Savage. I do not know of their being carried away, but there was some white China carried out of the Room.

Mr. Willes. Had not Bambridge a House at Wandsworth?

Mr. Savage. He had Lodgings there.

Mr. Willes. Were the Goods carried there?

Mr. Savage. I don't know otherwise than by Hearsay.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was you by when Mr. Turner made the Inventory?

Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know of Cloaths being put down sufficient for a Gown, or whatever it was.

Mr. Savage. Yes, all the Cloaths were put down so.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know how they came to be put down so?

Mr. Savage. Bambridge ordered it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it arise from Mr. Bambridge or Turner?

Mr. Savage. Turner did object to it, and said it was not usual to put down Wearing Apparel.

L. C. J. Pray give an Account whether Bambridge gave any Reason for putting the Things in his Pocket?—Mr. Savage. I do not know he did.

L. C. J. Were they inventoried?

Mr. Savage. I was not privy to the Inventory.

Mr. Bambridge. How long was you in the Room?

Mr. Savage. I believe I was there soon after you.

Mr. Bambridge. Did you continue there all the time?

Mr. Savage. I believe I was there most of the time.

Mr. Bambridge. Did you see any of the Goods appraised?

Mr. Savage. I saw Turner write; but I do not know what he wrote.

Mr. Bambridge. Was it done in a clandestine Manner?

Mr. Savage. I cannot say.

Mr. Bambridge. What Conversation was there between Mrs. Berkley and me?—Mr. Savage. What passed was in relation to the Chamber Rent.

Mr. Bambridge. Did not I say for what I seized them?

Mr. Savage. You pretended to seize them for Chamber Rent.

Mr. Bambridge. Did I shew the Rings, or put them in my Pocket secretly?

Mr. Savage. They were shewn to every body in the Room.

Mr. Bambridge. Were the Rings shewn in the Coffee-Room?

Mr. Savage. Yes.

Mr. Bambridge. Where is the Coffee-Room?

Mr. Savage. In the Fleet Prison.

Mr. Bambridge. Was it a publick Place?

Mr. Savage. Yes, but it was in a private Room where you shewed the Rings, in which was only your own Company.

Jacob Mendez Solas was set up to be examined.

Mr. Filmer. Mr. Matthews, let him be sworn upon the Old Testament, he is a Jew.

Mr. Kettleby. I must object as such, to his being sworn at all.

Mr. Just. Reynolds. I remember a great Cause upon an Indictment, for the Stealing of Snuff from some Jews, and I remember they were admitted to give Evidence.

Mr. Solas. I am a Christian.

Mr. Att. Gen. The Objection is at an End, he is a Christian.

L. C. J. Are you a Jew or a Christian?

Mr. Solas. I am by Extract a Portuguese Jew, but am a Christian now.

L. C. J. Have you been baptized?

Mr. Solas. Yes, my Lord.

Then he was sworn.

Mr. Filmer. What do you know as to any Diamonds or Jewels that were brought to you?

Mr. Solas. One Captain Douglas brought a Ring to me, to have the Stone pulled out, that I might see how much the Gold weighed.

Mr. Filmer. What sort of a Stone was it?

Mr. Solas. It was an Amethyst, but Douglas said it was a Crystal.

L. C. J. Who did he tell you he had it from?

Mr. Solas. From Bambridge. Douglas, after I told him it was an Amethyst, and the Value of it, went and told Mr. Bambridge the Value; then Bambridge came to me.

L. C. J. What did Mr. Bambridge say?

Mr. Solas. He asked, whether I was sure it was an Amethyst; I told him yes, I was sure, though it was paler and appeared clumsy; and then Bambridge said he was glad of it, and asked me whether it was not worth while to put it in a Ring.

L. C. J. Did you tell Mr. Bambridge of the Value of it?

Mr. Solas. I cannot be certain of that.

Mr. Filmer. Did he say any thing of the Ring; whose Ring did he say it was?

Mr. Solas. Captain Douglas said it was sent from a Merchant.

Mr. Filmer. But did Bambridge?

Mr. Solas. Not at that Time.

Mr. Filmer. Did he any Time after say whose Ring it was?

Mr. Solas. Yes, he said it was a Ring of Mrs. Berkley's.

Mr. Sol. Gen. You say you took the Stone out?

Mr. Solas. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you set it in again, after you had taken it out?

Mr. Solas. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Should you know your own setting, if you should see it?

Mr. Solas. Yes.

Then the Ring being produced, and shewn to him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Look upon it, is that your own setting?

Mr. Solas. I am positive it is my setting.

Then another Ring was produced, and shewn to him.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you take that to be the same Stone you then set?

Mr. Solas. It is one I set for Mr. Bambridge in this Ring, but not the same Stone he then brought, or I suppose it might be new polished.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How many Rings did you set for Mr. Bambridge?

Mr. Solas. Two.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What were the Value of them?

Mr. Solas. I set one for Mr. Bambridge worth fifty Shillings, and another worth twenty Shillings.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What might be the Price of that you set for him, he told you he had from Mrs. Berkley?

Mr. Solas. About twenty Shillings.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Had you no other Ring brought you?

Mr. Solas. I had one brought from Mr. Bambridge by Doctor Coltheart.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What was it?

Mr. Solas. It was a Garnet, with a Brilliant in the Middle.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Who did you say it was brought from?

Mr. Solas. From Bambridge, by Doctor Coltheart.

Mr. Sol. Gen. How do you know that?

Mr. Solas. He sent his Service. Doctor Coltheart and one Will that keeps a Coffee-House came to me, and desired to know the Value of a Ring with a Garnet, and a Brilliant in the Middle. I sent him Word it was worth fourteen Pounds; then Bambridge sent for me to the Coffee-Room, and desired to know the Value of it; I said it was worth fourteen Pounds.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What did he say?

Mr. Solas. He said, he thought I had valued it for more than it was worth.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did he tell you who he had the Ring of?

Mr. Solas. No.

Mr. Bambridge. My Lord, I am so unhappy, though so much concerned in this Affair, as to be at so great a Distance, that I don't know one Word the Witness has said, so don't know what Questions to ask him.

Mr. Solas. If you have any Questions to ask me, I am ready to answer.

Mr. Kettleby. You need not ask any.

Mr. Bambridge. Do you know the Ring that was brought to you by Doctor Coltheart, when you see it?

Mr. Solas. Yes, I am sure I should know it; I have had it three Times in my Hand; one Time you shewed it me, with Mr. Burgeff, and asked me the Value.

L. C. J. You say that Bambridge had the Ring, what use do you make of inquiring into the Value of the Ring, as to the one of them being worth fourteen Pounds, and the other twenty Shillings?

Mr. Att. Gen. The Statute requires a particular Value; besides, we make use of it to shew that Bambridge was endeavouring to sell them by a private Sale.

Mr. Just. Reynolds. Were these offered on the Behalf of Bambridge to be sold, or to know the Value only?

Mr. Solas. Only to know the Value; he sent to know the Value, afterwards he came to me himself to value them, having sent them before by Coltheart and Will at the Coffee-House.

Mr. Willes. The Use that we make of this is, to shew that the Ring with the Brilliant in the Middle was worth fourteen Pounds, and only valued as a Crystal, and not mentioned in the Inventory at all.

L. C. J. I thought it was give me up the Inventory, (Which was done;) and looking upon the Inventory, there are two Cornelian Seals set in Gold, a Crystal Stone, a Gold Ring with one small Emerald, and another with a small Garnet.

Mr.

Mr. Justice Reynolds. This is the Ring called a Crystal Ring, which Solas says, when brought to him, he thought to be a Garnet.

Turner being set up again.

L. C. J. Was that small Garnet mentioned in the Inventory as a Ring?

Mr. Turn. No, my Lord; it was a loose Stone, otherwise, after mentioning that Crystal Stone Ring, if the Garnet had been a Ring, I should have said Ditto.

Jacob Mendez Solas being set up again.

L. C. J. This Garnet was brought to you, Mr. Solas, set in a Ring, with a Brilliant in the Middle; Was it not?

Mr. Solas. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Was there any other Garnet with a Diamond in the Middle?

Mr. Turn. My Lord, I saw no such Ring.

Mr. Howard was sworn.

Mr. Sol. Gen. We must submit it to your Lordship here.

L. C. J. The King's Counsel have now done, what have you to say?

Mr. Bam. I did not hear what the last Witness said.

L. C. J. She says, you sold a Gown of blue Sattin, flowered, to one West, as your Wife's; she says, that one Harris bought the Silver Lace; that the Tea Spoons were offered to be sold, but she does not know whose they were. Now they have done, what have you to say?

Mr. Bam. As to my Defence, I shall give your Lordship but little Trouble. After the general Accusation brought against me, and the Clamour it has made in the World, I don't find that there is any Thing answerable to it, or any Thing brought to the Point; the Gentlemen have not proved any felonious Act against me, any Thing fraudulent, or any Misbehaviour whatsoever. If there was any Thing necessary to justify myself in, by giving an Account of my Conduct in my Office, I might do it fully, I have the proper Officer here ready to do it; but as I see no Necessity for it, I will not Trouble your Lordship, but submit it to your Lordship and the Jury.

L. C. J. Then you will rest it here.—Gentlemen of the Jury,—

Mr. Bam. I must desire one Favour of your Lordship, that if any Matter of Law should arise, you will let that be reserved.

L. C. J.

L. C. J. What the King's Counsel say is very right, whether it was a fair Distress, or whether it was only the Colour of a Distress, with any felonious Intent: The Attorney-General has stated that very clearly, that a Man may do a lawful Act feloniously. If this was done with a felonious Intent, then this will be Felony; yet if it was not done with a felonious Intent, this will not be Felony. This was the grand Point laid down by the Gentlemen, that the Jury are to judge with what Design these Things were taken away.

Gentlemen, the first Witness for the King, who was John Turner, says, that the Time of taking those Goods was whilst Bambridge was Warden, and that Pindar was Chamberlain; and that Bambridge ordered this Pindar to distrain the Goods of Mrs. Berkley; and that the Time of distraining these Goods was between the 23d and 27th of October, 1727. He says, Gentlemen, that Bambridge was not then there present; and that she, Mrs. Berkley, was put out of her Room. After this, Bambridge came to enquire into this Affair, to see what was done, Mrs. Berkley being then on the Common Side; and he sent down Somebody to call her up, she having locked the Door. The Goods, Gentlemen, were as much under her Key as Bambridge's: Bambridge, I must tell you, put on one Padlock, and she locked the Door, and put on another; and when she refused to open the Door, he caused it to be broke open, and entered the Room. There was, Gentlemen, an Inventory made by one Turner, who had formerly inventoried Goods, and was usually sent to for such Purposes: He says, Gentlemen, he had no Orders to undervalue the Goods: Turner was sent for by Pindar: He valued all the Goods, as the Bed, Bedding, &c. and as to the Boxes, they were not then opened: He did not see what there were in them; but put them in gross in the Inventory. Bambridge, Gentlemen, coming to look after this Affair, on the 3d or 4th of November, sent for Mrs. Berkley to come up; and Mrs. Berkley came up accordingly; and he desired to have the use of her Key, which she refused, and said, I think you are going to rob me. Upon that, Bambridge, before her, sent Barnes for the Hammer, to have it to open the Door; but it would not do; and then he sent down for the Poker, and Barnes forced open the Door, and in they went, Mrs. Berkley along with them. Bambridge asked her for the Keys of her Boxes: She said, he should have no Keys; and asked him, by what Authority he did it: He said, by Authority of Warden; and Bambridge then ordered the Boxes to be broke open. When he had opened the Boxes, Turner was sent for; he was to perfect the Inventory, that was in part before made. It was opened by the Counsel for the King, that it was a fraudulent Inventory; and they, to make this appear clearly to be fraudulent, told you the Goods were set down otherwise than they really were. There was put down, they said, Dimity or Silk sufficient for a Gown, or what it was: They said, there was a flowered blue and white Satin, that was actually made up, put down only as sufficient: As to the Dimity and Silk, that had been dyed, and Turner said, that it was rolled up, for these had been at the Dyer's, and were not put down as a Gown; but that he had set them down properly, as he thought: But when he came to the flowered Gown, which was made up, he made some Difficulty in putting that in the Inventory, and said, that it was not usual to put them in Distresses; for this was Wearing Apparel. And it was proved, Gentlemen, by one of the Witnesses, that Mrs. Berkley said, it was Felony: This, Gentlemen, might caution Turner; he said it was not usual to put such Things into an Inventory for a Distress. Then Bambridge said, if he would not put it in so, he must put it down so many Yards of flowered Silk, sufficient to make a Gown and Petticoat. The Difficulty arose from himself, and not from the Defendant. He should not have mentioned it Silk sufficient for a Gown; he was asked two or three Times, and Mr. Bambridge said, it must all be in the Inventory; so accordingly it was put in, in this Manner. This is offered to you as Evidence of the Affair: You will consider whether it is so or not. Then these Things were all looked over; and Turner says, they were all put into the Inventory, and the greatest Part put into a Portmanteau; but there were some few Things, as Tea-Spoons, Seals, and Rings, that were put into Bambridge's Pocket; but though he put them into his Pocket, they were in the Inventory; and this Inventory, in the Whole, came to 30*l.* and at last were brought down to 27*l.* He says, Gentlemen, that there was a Brush that was discovered; and Bambridge, upon seeing it, said, Surely there must be some Diamonds; and so he searched for them, and, in making such Search, he found a Piece of Paper: The Witness says, Gentlemen, it was some Decree, which Bambridge took in his Hand. She said to Bambridge, You won't take the Papers too? Yes, said he, I will; and if I find any Bonds or Bills, I will make bold with them. He says, Gentlemen, that Bambridge took the Bed and Bedding away, and offered her another Bed; but she said, she would not lie on it; then she went down to the Common Side. He says, that she talked very much; that she was disordered in her Mind, and talked of Lord Harcourt. This is the Account given of her. He says, Gentlemen, that Bambridge sent for her when the Inventory was taken; and he says, that she was there during all the Time: Though he took these little Things, yet she could not be defrauded in that Manner, because they were put in that Inventory. I must give you an Account of the Evidence of the People, as they are examined. Turner, Gentlemen, says, that Bambridge expostulated with her about the Chamber Rent that was due, which was 56*l.* and said, Why do you not pay it? I am informed that you are very capable: The Woman said, the House was the King's, and the King should find her a House; and Bambridge said, he would do her what Service he could. Gentlemen, it was said by Turner, that he did appraise these Goods; that he did appraise them fairly; and that he was employed by Pindar, who was used to employ him. He said, Gentlemen, that the first Time a real Constable was there; and the second Time the Constable was a real Constable, and he swore him: Now there was, indeed, Pindar pressed by Bambridge to assist in the Appraisement, who did not at all understand it: He was a Distiller, of a quite different Trade. He says, Gentlemen, that Bambridge did desire Mrs. Berkley to send to her Friends to pay the Rent. This, Gentlemen, is the Evidence given by this Man. Another Witness, Gentlemen, is one Wilkinson: He gives an Account that he knew Mrs. Berkley, and where she lodged, and that he was a Prisoner there himself: He spoke of Pindar and Barnes, who were there the last Time of his coming. He says, that the Door was broke open, and that the Padlock was forced off by Bam- bridge's Order: He says, that Pindar fetched the Poker, and Bambridge ordered Barnes to break open the Door. He says, Gentlemen, he was sent to call Mrs. Berkley from the Common Side before this was done: When she came up, she was asked to part with her Keys; but she refused; and then the Door was broken open. He says, Gentlemen, there were two Boxes locked, and one nailed; and Bambridge asked her for the Keys of her Boxes; but she refused to deliver them to him; upon which Bambridge broke them open; and that Mrs. Berkley was all the Time there, and called it a Robbery. He says, that the Things were taken away by Bambridge's Directions; and that she, Mrs. Berkley, said, that the taking away her Wearing Apparel was Felony. He says, Gentlemen, he was ordered to take the Bed and Bedding, and carry it into the Lumber-Room; that afterwards it was taken from thence, and carried to the Water-side, to be sent to Wandsworth. There were several small Things, as an Emerald and Garnet, and some other Rings, one of them a Stone Ring; all these Mr. Bambridge put in his Pocket, he said for fear of losing them; and at the same Time he called to Savage and Douglas, to see that he put them into his Pocket, for fear they should be lost. Now, Gentlemen, he says further, the Wearing Apparel (which was rich), and such Things, the Prisoner put into the Portmanteau, and ordered it to be carried into the Lumber-Room; and other Things were carried to Will's Coffee-House; and the Prisoner said, he seized for Rent, and would stand by it. What he says farther, in relation to Mrs. Berkley, was, that she was there all the Time, and frequently complained it was Felony, and a Robbery; and says, that the Goods were removed, some at one time, and some at another, in the Day-time, not concealedly. This, Gentlemen, is the Substance of his Evidence: But he says something further, that her Bed being gone, she would not continue in the Room.

Burgess, he says, they had called her up: He spoke to the last Time of their being in the Room, about fourteen Days after the 23d of October. He says, he went up soon after the Door was broke open, and gives much the same Account as the former Witnesses have done; and that Bambridge put some small Stones in his Pocket: He says, that the putting these Things in his Pocket, was for fear they should be lost, and that he told Douglas so.

Savage says, that, hearing a Noise, he went to the Room, and found Mrs. Berkley there. He says, that Bambridge asked her for the Key; Mrs. Berkley said, he should have none, for that he came to rob her; upon which he broke the Boxes open: He says, that there were several good Things in them; there was a Garnet, and a little Stone Ring, two Cornelian Seals, and a loose Stone: These Things Bambridge put in his Pocket; but he does not remember that Bambridge said, he put them in his Pocket for fear of their being lost; nor did he say, that Bambridge bid Douglas, or any one else, take notice, he put them there for fear of being lost. He says, that the Bed was sent down to Wandsworth. He spoke to the Matter of the Fraud, as to the having the Wearing Apparel set down for so much Silk as would be sufficient for such a Purpose; and he was asked, Gentlemen, by Mr. Bambridge, whether any thing clandestine was done in breaking open the Boxes, and he said not. He says, that Bambridge pretended he seized the Goods for Rent, and that the Rings were shewn in the Coffee-House.

Solas, he said, the Rings were shewed to him, not to be sold, but to know the Value of them. He spoke as to that Ring that was brought to him by Coltheart, with a Diamond in the Middle of it, worth 14*l.* Gentlemen, there does not appear to be any such Ring in the Inventory, or the Lady's Boxes; but let that be as it will, it was only sent for him to value it.

The next Witnesses are Howard and his Wife: He says, there were several Things disposed of by Mr. Bambridge: It seems he lodged at their House. She says, this flowered Satin Gown was carried to their House, and there disposed of: He swapt it for a Gold Watch. There was some Gold and Silver Lace mentioned in the Inventory, which, she says, was sold to one Mr. Harris, who brought the Money, which was not quite Ten Pounds. She says, that he did not say, that it was Mrs. Berkley's, but his Wife's. This, Gentlemen, is all the Evidence given by the Witnesses, from the one Side, or the other. If there is any thing else, that I have omitted, I hope you will put me in mind of it. Now, Gentlemen, what you have to consider is, whether Bambridge did feloniously steal these Goods.

This, Gentlemen, is an Indictment founded upon the Statute of the 12th of the late Queen, the Words are, If any Person shall feloniously steal any Goods worth Forty Shillings out of a Dwelling-House, he shall suffer Death, without the Benefit of his Clergy. Now the Question is, Gentlemen, whether he did steal, or take them away with a felonious Intent, to make it Felony; or whether he took them as a Distress for Rent? Whether the Distress was regular or not, is not the Matter; if the Distress was irregular, he is liable to an Action; if he took them with any View of committing any Theft or Felony, you will find him guilty of Felony; but if that was his real Intention, to levy Rent by Distress, and that he had no Intention to steal the Goods, then he is not guilty of this Felony; but if he made use of this Intent of distraining, with a View of stealing these Goods, and to make them his own, and this was only a Colour, or mere Pretence of his wicked Intention, and that he had it in his View to steal these Goods, though this is a legal Remedy, yet it will not excuse it; for if a Man make use of a legal Process with a felonious Intent, it will be Felony in him; for if a Man gets a Horse that was not his own by Replevin, it is Theft; if a Man gets another's Property into his Possession with a felonious Intent, it is Felony, but if not with a felonious Intent, it is not Felony; if he makes it only a Pretence to get Goods, and then dispose of them, and does this with a felonious Intention, and an Intention to steal them, then he will be guilty of Felony. Gentlemen, you will consider what was his Intention, and consider the Circumstances that have happened, which are fresh in your Memories. If these Goods were taken with a felonious Intent, then you will find him Guilty; but if he only took them as a Distress for Rent, and with no felonious Intent, then you will Acquit him.

Mr. Matthews. (Speaking to the Officer.) Will the Jury withdraw?

Mr. Kettleby. What have you to do with their withdrawing? Let them give their Verdict in Court, if they will.

K k

Mr. Matthews,

Mr. Matthews. They are at a Distance now, they must either withdraw to consult, or consult together in Court.

Mr. Kettleby. You and the Prosecution are of a Piece; you just now read Part of the Indictment, and left out the other Part.

Mr. Matthews. Officer, clear the Court.

L. C. J. If you please to withdraw, and consider of the Verdict. Then an Officer was sworn to keep the Jury, and they withdrew, and returned in a very short Time.

L. C. J. (The Jury being returned.) Call over the Jury. Answer to your Names. (Which they did.)

Mr. Matthews. (After he had called them over.) Are you all agreed in your Verdict?—Omnes. Yes.

Mr. Matthews. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Mr. Matthews. Thomas Bambridge, hold up your Hand. (Which he did.) Then, speaking to the Jury, Look upon the Prisoner at the Bar, how say you, Is he Guilty of the Felony whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

It is remarkable, that though the Prosecutions against Mr. Huggins, Mr. Bambridge, &c. were ordered by his Majesty, on an Address from the House of Commons, and conducted by some of the greatest Men at the Bar, yet they got off—all being acquitted.

XX. Minutes of the Proceedings of the Committee, appointed to inquire into the State of the Gaols of this Kingdom, touching a Charge against Sir Robert Eyre, Knight, Lord Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, for personally visiting Thomas Bambridge, late Warden of the Fleet, whilst he was a Prisoner in Newgate, under a Commitment of the House of Commons, &c. &c.

At the Speaker's Chamber at the House of Commons, at the Committee appointed to inquire into the State of the Gaols of this Kingdom.

Edward Hughes, Esq. in the Chair.

Sabbati, 25 die Aprilis, 1730.

THE Committee having received several Letters and Informations relating to the foregoing Charge, proceeded to examine a great Number of Witnesses in the most solemn Manner relating thereto; when the several following Letters (except No. 1. directed to Francis Harbin) were sent under Cover to Edward Hughes, Esq. and being produced by him to the Committee, were read; which Letters, as they seem intended for an Introduction to the Charge, and as they relate to some of the foregoing Trials, are here inserted.

The several following Letters (except that directed to Francis Harbin) were sent under Cover to Edward Hughes, Esq. and produced by him to the Committee.

S I R,

My supposed Attachment to the Interest of Mr. Bambridge, cannot, am sensible, but have prejudiced me in the Opinion of all good Men, and therefore, before, Sir, I offer my Service to you, and to my Country, it may not be amiss to say something of the Motives that at first induced me to fall in with his Party, and also of those which have since determined me to quit it.

After the Report of the late Committee, I will not presume to say, I thought Mr. Bambridge innocent; but, I confess, I looked upon him to be far less guilty, than since, by examining his own Side only of the Question, I find he is; the Atrociousness of his Crimes took off to me much of the Probability of his committing them; and it was hard for a Man who had any Virtue himself, to believe there was another so perfectly abandoned.

Mr. Bambridge took all the Opportunities he could, of gaining those he thought might be of use to his Party; amongst the rest, he applied himself to me. I confess, at first, the Art with which he palliated his Offences, deceived me; I went heartily into his Concerns, and did all for him in my Power, as for a Man struggling against the Current of the Times; but as I grew into his Confidence, the Mask was taken off, and I found the Use he intended to make of me, was not to assist an oppressed Man in his Defence, but to screen a guilty Person from his just Punishment. As to the personal Injuries I have received, (and surely Nobody has received more) I forbear to mention them, since my private Pique shall never add an Edge to any Informations I may hereafter give you. I am weary of the Part, Sir, which hitherto I have acted in this Affair; 'tis with Pleasure I quit the Side of Artifice and Dissimulation, and with Joy I enter into the Service of Truth, and of my Country. I heartily beg pardon for any Faults I may already have committed, and assure you, Sir, it shall always be my Study for the future, to testify by my Actions, as well as Words, how much

I am, Sir,

Your faithful and

Devoted Humble Servant.

S I R,

The last Time I did myself the Honour of writing to you, I promised to give you all the Informations in my Power, that might any ways tend towards carrying on, with Effect, that generous Inquiry made by the late Committee of the House of Commons. In pursuance of which Promise, give me Leave, Sir, to lay before you certain Observations, which, though at present little more than Conjecture, yet are such as I despair not, by Time and Application, to produce the strongest Evidence of their Truth.

The late Warden, Mr. Bambridge, notwithstanding all his Vanity and Rashness, could never have been capable of so much Folly, as to have committed so many notorious Offences in his Office, if he had not presumed on the Interest of some superior Power, which (at least as he fancied,) might be able to prevent any Inquiry into his Conduct; or if that by no Arts were to be evaded, would at last screen him from Punishment. That this Presumption of his was but too well founded, I am apt to believe is pretty apparent; the Behaviour of a certain Court, when Complaints were made against him; the Difficulties there were in procuring Rules, on the plainest Proofs of the most flagrant Oppressions; the ambiguous Terms in which such Rules were generally drawn up; the little Regard he paid those Orders, when served upon him; and his Impunity, notwithstanding such Disrespect, are Arguments which amount almost to a Demonstration of his being in Confederacy with a certain Person, who, no doubt, took care to receive from him an adequate Satisfaction for such Favours.

But as a Correspondence of this Nature was equally criminal in the Receiver and Giver, it cannot but be supposed, that the utmost Caution was used, in order to the carrying it on with impenetrable Secrecy. But when the House of Commons thought fit to imprison Bambridge, a third Hand became absolutely necessary towards that Purpose; and from thence so much Light has been let into that dark Affair, that by degrees I no way doubt, but that a perfect Discovery may be effected. I will only beg Leave to add one thing to this long Letter, and that is, that although Vice be contagious in its Nature, and that I have long conversed in Intimacy with Mr. Bambridge, yet, if I know my own Heart, I will venture, Sir, to assure you, there is nothing I so much hate as Dis- ingenuity; and that for the future, I shall let slip no Opportunity of shewing with how much sincerity

I am, Sir,

Your faithful, and

Devoted Humble Servant.

No. III.

S I R,

Having, in my former, laid before you those Reasons which induced me to believe a Correspondence between Bambridge and a certain great Man, at whom I have already pointed; I now beg Leave to add such Facts, as have at any time come to my Knowledge, and which seem to confirm it. First, Sir, give me Leave to observe, that Bambridge, in regard to his Expences in private Life, has, since his Imprisonment, been very much straitened; but where Counsel, or any thing else that was necessary towards his Defence, was wanting, Money has not only been expended, but lavished. I lay the more Stress on this, because in some respect, it falls within the Circle of your own Observance. When Mr. Bambridge attended last at the House of Commons, his Counsel was pleased to say for him, that the present Narrowness of his Circumstances obliged him to appear with but one Counsel; but since that fruitless Negotiation, in which through his Arts I was so unlucky to become an Agent, we have seen a very different Turn. The Courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Old Bailey, have all in their Turns been crowded with Orators in his Favour.

The Lowness of his Fortune at the Time of his coming to his Office at the Fleet, is notorious to the World; and though I believe, as to getting of Money, he can by no means be charged with being idle; yet (if even the most extravagant Calculation should be admitted) the Shortness of his Stay there could not but prevent his acquiring half that Sum of Money, which has been already expended in defence of these Prosecutions; add to this, that his own Creatures have Imprudence enough to mention this, as the strongest Part of what they call a formidable Interest, and that I myself have seen his Clerk deliver a Letter to that great Man, in Westminster-Hall; to which his Lordship said, I thank you, Sir, I am obliged to you, Sir, or Words to that purpose.

But that which has given me the strongest Assurances, and such as I hope, will one Day terminate in the clearest Evidence, is the Conversation I have had with one Mr. B. who is himself perfectly intimate with Bambridge, and whose Wife has given very extraordinary Instances of her Attachment to his Interest. This Gentleman, though he still owns the greatest Friendship to him, yet has confessed to me, that to his own Knowledge, Bambridge had it in his Power to—that great Man, (that was his Expression,) not only in respect to things done as the Office of the Fleet, but in other Respects also; and that he was formerly Bambridge was not to be persuaded to give him up to Justice, which might be a means, not only of saving himself, but would also make some Atonement for his Faults. He promised me also to make so strict an Inquiry into this Affair, as to furnish me with a Clue, by which might be unravelled this whole Work of Darkness. For this purpose I was to have met on Friday, but something having intervened, he has put it off till Tuesday next, till when I should have delayed this Letter, but that was impatient of giving you some further Proof of that Sincerity with which which I am, Sir,

* These Letters, &c. are taken from the Proceedings, &c. in this Affair, as drawn up by Mr. Luke Kenn, to be laid before the House of Commons. The whole Proceedings are long, being about 143 Folio Pages, wrote close, in a small Round Hand; so we have taken only so much, as may give some Light into the Charge relating to the foregoing Trial, &c.

Your faithful and

Devoted Humble Servant.

S I R,

Mr. Harbin having acquainted me, that he intended to make you a Visit, I was unwilling he should go without carrying with him this, as a Mark of my Duty and Respect, especially so remarkable an Event (I speak with regard to the Prosecution) as the Acquittal of Mr. Bambridge having happened since your going down into the Country. I do not pretend, Sir, to give you an exact Detail of that extraordinary Affair, the public Prints having doubtless, and probably a Manuscript Copy of his Trial, may long ere now have reached your Hands; all I shall endeavour, will be by a short Observation or two upon it, to give you some Light into the Means by which that unexpected Event was brought about.

It is agreed, on all hands, that a legal Distress for Rent is a very innocent as well as a lawful Action; but if, under colour of such Distress, a Person comes, and, with a felonious Intent, steals and carries away Goods, the Pretence of a Distress will be so far from extenuating, that it will heighten the Offence, since it is done in fraudem legis; and the Law, which is intended to preserve and to protect the Property of the Subject, is thereby made a Means to destroy it.

A felonious Intent is only to be proved from the Actions of him who commits the Fact; and that such an Intention actuated Mr. Bambridge in this extraordinary Seizure, is pretty apparent, from the two following Circumstances which attend it.

Turner, the Person employed by Mr. Bambridge as an Appraiser (though a Prisoner and a Creature of his own), yet thought fit humbly to represent to him, that he had never seen necessary Wearing Apparel distrained before (as indeed by Law it cannot); upon which Mr. Bambridge ordered him, in taking the Inventory, instead of setting down a Gown and Petticoat, as the Thing really was, to set down Silk sufficient for a Gown and Petticoat; and made use, in several Instances, of the same Artifice: A thing in itself so plain and flagrant, that even Mr. Bambridge could not find out an Evasion; but in that he was kindly helped out by the Bench; from whence, in summing up the Evidence, it was declared, that the Appraiser's was only an idle Objection, to which Mr. Bambridge gave way, merely because he would have nothing left out of the Inventory.

The other was this: It was fully proved, that Mr. Bambridge carried away four Rings in his Pocket, though but one is mentioned in the Inventory, and that too is called a Crystal, tho' it was indeed an Amethyst. To us, who were Spectators, this appeared to have a very great Weight; but it seems it appeared in a very different Light to the Gentleman who tried him, since it escaped both his Memory and his Notes.

Having twice mentioned that Gentleman, I cannot help doing him Justice, on this Occasion, by observing, that (however in other Respects his Enemies may asperse his Character) there is one Part of the Judge, in which I believe no Man ever came up to him; I mean, in being Counsel for the Prisoner. I am afraid I have been already too prolix, and will therefore lengthen this Letter no further, than to assure you, Sir, of my being,

With the utmost Deference and Respect,

Your Obedient and Devoted

Humble Servant.

Dear Frank,

I find that Mr. Bambridge, however unlikely he is in succeeding, will undoubtedly move the Court of King's-Bench for Judgment and Damages upon the Writ of Appeal; and hopes great Advantages from the Favour of the Gentleman who tried him, on the first Indictment, for the Murder. I do not find, from Codnor, that he has any Affidavits to support this Motion; or, at least, if he has any, he has not trusted him with them: However, am to see Codnor this Evening; and if any Thing material should occur, shall leave a Line, so that you may have it very early in the Morning. I find he and all his Party are very alert at present; and are so far from being apprehensive, from the present Temper of the House of Commons, that they, on all Occasions, treat the late Committee with the utmost Insolence and Contempt. However, as there is little Likelihood that his Assurance will be able to defeat the united Endeavours of those Gentlemen for the Relief of the Unhappy, I please myself with hoping that all will at last go right. I am,

Feb. 2, 1729-30.

To Mr. Harbin.

Yours, &c.

No. VI.

S I R,

Mr. Harbin having informed me, that you have been so good as to enquire after me, I thought it necessary for me to excuse myself for not attending you, by acquainting you with the Reason; which is, that my being seen at the Horse-Guards, as Things stand at present, might be some Hindrance to my entering into the Knowledge of some Things, about which it is at present my Duty to enquire.

There is another Motive which induced me to give you this Trouble; and that is, that you would be so good as to mention it to the Chairman, that as my Time (the only Thing valuable that is left me in my Misfortunes) is almost wholly taken up in endeavouring to do Service to the present Enquiry; and as it has involved me in the Hatred of a Party of the worst of Men, who let slip no Opportunity of making me uneasy; I hope it may not be thought unreasonable to give some Directions for my receiving a moderate Subsistence.

I confess Mr. Harbin has been, in this Respect, very kind; but as I have been hitherto unused to ask any body for every Shilling and Sixpence that is necessary to be laid out, I conceive it would be for both our Advantages to have it put into another Channel.

Before my engaging in this Affair, I confess, I used sometimes to prepare some little Labours for the Press; but as these are the Employments of a Mind at ease, in my present Circumstances, it is no way in my Power to compose them. As this is a Subject on which I should never have prevailed on myself to speak, and on which I write with the greatest Reluctancy, I hope you will forgive this Trouble from

Your obliged and

Obedient Servant.

Thursday Morning.

The Committee thought it their Duty to examine strictly into an Affair of so extraordinary a Nature, when several Persons appeared before them, and endeavoured to make good their several Informations.

Which Persons, having been examined before the Committee in the most solemn manner, relating to the foregoing Charge, grossly prevaricated in their Examinations, contradicted one another in several material Circumstances, and, as to the Facts, were falsified by Persons to whom they referred for the Truth of what they had declared.

It likewise appeared to the Committee, that divers of the said Persons were Prisoners in Newgate, or the Fleet; some of them of vile and infamous Characters; others actuated by a Spirit of Resentment, on account of Causes determined against them before the said Lord Chief Justice; and all of them tampered with, and influenced. It further appeared to the Committee, that several of the said Persons had Meetings and Consultations amongst themselves; and had been guilty of divers evil Practices, in order to set on foot and support the said Charge against the said Lord Chief Justice, and the Matters contained in their said Informations.

After the Committee had spent several Days upon the said Enquiry, and had examined all the Witnesses that appeared before them, the principal Persons concerned in the Conspiracy having Reason to apprehend, that the Evidence given by them to support the said Charge, would not be sufficient to impose upon the Committee, and to obtain Credit to the said Informations, did consult with a Person to fix a new Charge upon the said Lord Chief Justice, not mentioned before in any of their Examinations, by giving Evidence of certain Circumstances, to induce a Belief, that about three Days before the Time appointed for the Trial of the said Thomas Bambridge for Felony, in the last long Vacation, the said Thomas Bambridge did send a Letter to the said Lord Chief Justice for Money; and that, in consequence thereof, he received one hundred Guineas.

Whereupon the Committee thought fit to re-examine the said principal Persons, who before had been examined as to the former Charge, who were not able to give the least Colour of Evidence to support the said new Charge, and were flatly contradicted by the Evidence to whom they referred; and on their Examinations, the Committee being convinced that the said new Charge was only a Continuation of the former Conspiracy, on considering the whole Matter, came to the following Resolutions.

Resolved,

That it appears to the Committee, That there hath been a wicked Conspiracy carried on by certain infamous and profligate Persons, to vilify and asperse the Character of the Right Honourable Sir Robert Eyre, Knight, Lord Chief Justice of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas;

Resolved,

That it appears to this Committee, That the Informations given to this Committee against the said Lord Chief Justice Eyre, are false, malicious, scandalous, and utterly groundless.

Then Resolved, That Roger Johnson, and a great Number of low, ordinary People (there named), were the Persons concerned in the said Conspiracy.

To which the House agreed.

Thus this great Man had Justice done him, in as honourable a Manner as possibly could be, and cleared of so scandalous and infamous a Charge.

The Trial of Mr. RICHARD FRANCKLIN *, for printing and publishing A Letter from the Hague, in the Country-Journal, or Craftsman, of Saturday, the 2d of January, 1730, at the Sittings of the Court of King's-Bench, Westminster, on Friday, December the 3d, 1731, before the Right Honourable the Lord Chief-Justice Raymond.

Mr. Parker.

MY Lord, in this Cause, his Majesty is Plaintiff, and Richard Francklin, Defendant. The Information sets forth, That before the Demise of the late King, divers Differences and Controversies arose between his said late Majesty and divers Princes and foreign States, being his Allies, and the King of Spain, concerning the public Safety and Commerce of this Kingdom, and the Peace and Tranquillity of Europe; and that, pending such Differences, to wit, the 30th September, 1725, a certain Treaty, betwixt the said late King, Lewis the French King, and the King of Prussia, was concluded and made at Hanover; and that afterwards, to wit, the 9th of November, 1729, in order to compromise such Differences, and to establish Peace in Europe, a certain Treaty of Peace, Union, Amity, and mutual Defence, was concluded and made, betwixt his Majesty King George the II^d. and the said Lewis the French King, and Philip King of Spain, at the City of Seville, in the said Kingdom of Spain. The Information also sets forth, That Richard Francklin, well-knowing the Premises, but being a malicious, seditious, and ill-disposed Person, and a perpetual and diligent Publisher and Seller of seditious and scandalous Libels, and disaffected to his present Majesty and his Government; and wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously contriving and intending to disturb and disquiet the happy State of the Public Peace and Tranquillity of this Kingdom; and to bring his present Majesty's Treaty of Peace (which, with great Affection towards his Subjects, and for the Advantage of this Kingdom, was concluded) into Contempt and Disgrace among all his liege Subjects of this Kingdom; and also to detract, scandalize, traduce, and vilify the Administration of his present Majesty's Government of this Kingdom, and his principal Officers and Ministers of State; and to represent his said Officers and Ministers of State as Persons of no Integrity and Ability, and as Enemies to the public Good of this Kingdom; and to cause it to be believed, that his said present Majesty, by the Advice of his said principal Officers and Ministers, intended to break and violate the said Treaty last mentioned; and thereby to raise and sow Differences and Disorders betwixt his said present Majesty and the said French King, and King of Spain; and also to spread false News and Rumours concerning the State of the public Affairs of this Kingdom; and to bring his said present Majesty, and his Administration of the Government of this Kingdom, into Suspicion and ill Opinion of his said liege Subjects, on the 2d of January, in the 4th Year of his present Majesty's Reign, at the Parish of St. Paul's, Covent-Garden, in the County of Middlesex, a certain false, scandalous, and seditious Libel, [intituled, No. 235, The Country-Journal, or, the Craftsman. By Caleb D'Anvers, of Gray's-Inn, Esq. Saturday, January 2d, 1730,] wickedly and maliciously did print and publish, and caused to be printed and published. In which Libel, of and concerning his said present Majesty King George the II^d. now King of Great-Britain, &c. and his Administration of the Government of this Kingdom, and State of the public Affairs of this Kingdom; and of and concerning his said principal Officers and Ministers of State; and of and concerning the said Treaty, made betwixt his said present Majesty and the said French King, and the said King of Spain; and also of and concerning the said French King, the said King of Spain, and the most Serene Prince Charles, Emperor of Germany, are contained (among other Things) divers false, feigned, scandalous, seditious, and malicious Matters, according to the Tenor following, to wit; [Extract of a private Letter from the Hague, "A Rumour hath been for some Time privately spread about, and begins to gain Credit here, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville;" (meaning his said present Majesty, the said French King, and the said King of Spain) "and that certain Ministers" (meaning the said principal Officers and Ministers of his said Majesty, employed and intrusted in the difficult Affairs of State) "having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the Foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People, are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor, and to undo every Thing they have been doing for these five Years past. If this should prove true, it will certainly redound very much to the Honour of those Gentlemen, who have so vigorously opposed the late Measures; and the Ministers, who have not only concerted and pursued these Measures, but loaded all Opposition to them with the foulest Imputations, will be obliged to take a great deal of Shame to themselves; for what can be a stronger Condemnation of their own past Conduct, or the Conduct of those whom they have employed to write in their Cause, than to see them wheel about all on a sudden, and pursue Measures directly opposite, which have been pointed out to them, for several Years together, by their Adversaries; and for which they have represented those Gentlemen, in the most opprobrious Colours, as factious Incendiaries, Germanized Patriots, and Enemies to their Country? What can be more ridiculous than to see them desert one Ally, whose good Faith, Sincerity, and even Cordiality of Friendship, they have so often extolled, and at last run into the Arms of another, whom they have so industriously set forth as the most dishonourable, ungrateful, and perfidious Prince? They must have altered their Opinion of this Prince very much (if this Report is true), and seem to rely upon his Good-nature, putting themselves thus absolutely in his Power; for if he should refuse to deal with them, after the Usage he hath received, they will be broke with all the Courts of Europe; and he cannot be insensible of their Perfidy to others, at the same Time that he is treating with them. How will they be able to justify those vast Expences which they have already brought upon their Country, by an obstinate Perseverance in other Measures, till the last Extremity, as well as those farther Expences and Hazards, in which such a precipitate Alteration of Counsels, in the present Circumstances of Europe, will certainly involve it? For though the Measure, which is now said to be secretly carrying on, was certainly the most eligible, whilst they remained unembarrassed with Engagements of another Kind; and though it must be confessed to be very desirable at present; yet it seems to be attended with very fatal Consequences, and almost insuperable Difficulties. The People, of whom I am speaking, had their Hands at Liberty five Years ago, and might have entered into what Measures they pleased with the Emperor, without giving Umbrage, or any just Reason of Complaint, to other Courts; but at present they cannot do it, without an Infraction of solemn Treaties, and drawing upon their Country the Resentments which usually attend Violations of Faith. One immediate Effect of this Resentment may be the Interruption of Trade, and the Seizure of that vast Pledge, which Spain hath at this Time in her Hands; so that the only pretended good Effect of their former Conduct, may be absolutely defeated by their present Scheme. Another necessary Effect (for so I think I may call it) of such a Measure, at present, will be a Conjunction of France and Spain; and a certain Court may have the Mortification to see those two Crowns united against them more strongly than ever, by their extraordinary Management, after they have spent so many Millions to prevent it. I am far from designing to insinuate from hence, that an Accommodation with the Emperor is a wrong Measure: On the contrary, I wish it had been thought a right Measure long ago. My only Intention is to shew how difficult, in my Apprehension, the Conduct of some Ministers hath rendered it to their Country, as well as dishonourable to themselves, by carrying along with it the severest Censure of their own Conduct, and the strongest Justification of their Adversaries, against all the Aspersions which have been cast upon them." In Contempt of his said present Majesty, and his Laws; and to the great Disgrace, Scandal, and Infamy of his said present Majesty, and his Administration of the Government of this Kingdom; to the Disturbance of the public Peace and Tranquillity of this Kingdom; to the evil Example of all others, offending in the like Case; and against the Peace of our said Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

Sir Philip York, Attorney-General. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel for the King. This is a Prosecution against the Defendant, Mr. Francklin, for printing and publishing a scandalous and seditious Libel; an Offence (however it hath been treated of late Days) which the Law considers as a very heinous Crime, as it tends to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, and to bring into Contempt the King's Administration of the Government; and as it tends to create great Jealousy and Dissatisfaction in the Minds of his Majesty's Subjects against his Government; and, indeed, this is the Use you find made of it. The present Libel, for and upon which the Defendant is to be tried, will appear to be a Libel of that Nature, and attended with the most aggravating Circumstances of any ever yet published.

To explain the Nature of this Prosecution and Libel, and to shew the Connection and Tendency thereof, it is necessary to open a little to you the several Parts of it, in order to apply it to the Description of the Persons and Things spoken of. It is described to be a Libel concerning his present Majesty, and his Majesty's Government of the Kingdom, and concerning the public Affairs thereof, and concerning his Ministers; and it is expressed to relate to a Treaty concluded betwixt his present Majesty, and the French King, and the King of Spain, at Seville, in November, 1729. The Liberty that the Defendant, Mr. Francklin, has taken, is from Things done by the Princes in that Treaty, upon a Pretension, that it is an Extract of a private Letter from the Hague. He says, ["A Rumour hath been for some Time privately spread about, and begins to gain Credit here, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville."] Now the Allies of Seville are well known to be his present Majesty, the King of France, and the King of Spain. Again, the Writer goes on to say, ["That certain Ministers" (whom the Information explains to be the Ministers of his present Majesty) "having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the Foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People, are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor, and to undo every Thing they have been doing for these five Years past,"] which will carry the Calculation back to the 30th Sept. 1725, when the Treaty of Hanover was made. And then afterwards he says, ["If this should prove true, it will certainly redound very much to the Honour of those Gentlemen, who have so vigorously opposed the late Measures; and the Ministers who have not only concerted and pursued these Measures, but loaded all Opposition to them with the foulest Imputations, will be obliged to take a great deal of Shame to themselves." And then he asks the Question, ["For what can be a stronger Condemnation of their own past Conduct, than to see them wheel about all on a sudden, and pursue Measures directly opposite? And what can be more ridiculous than to see them desert one Ally, whose good Faith, Sincerity, and even Cordiality of Friendship, they have so often extolled?"] Here is a plain Charge of Perfidy, or breaking of Faith. Again, the Ministers are represented as running into the Arms of another Ally, whom those Ministers have set forth as the most dishonourable, ungrateful, and perfidious Prince. Next, these Ministers are represented as putting themselves in the Power of that Prince; and says, ["If this Prince should refuse to deal with them, after the Usage he hath received, they will be broke with all the Courts of Europe; and he cannot be insensible of their Perfidy to others," (that is to say, the former Allies) "at the same time that he is treating with them.""] Gentlemen, you may plainly observe here, that this is a positive Charge of Perfidy and Breach of Faith on these Ministers. Again, the Libel, or pretended Letter, charges them with bringing on their Country vast Expences, not to be justified, and a further Expence and Hazard, which their precipitate Alteration of Counsels will certainly involve it in. And then he proceeds to represent, that they cannot, at present, treat with the Emperor, without Infraction of solemn Treaties, and Violation of Faith. Gentlemen, this is a direct Charge of Perfidy, in the strongest Terms. In the next place, he represents the Effects of the Resentment that they will draw on their Country by their Violation of Faith: One immediate Effect, he says ["may be the Interruption of Trade, and the Seizure of that vast Pledge which Spain hath at this time in her Hands.""] Another necessary Effect (for so he thinks he may call it) will be a Conjunction of France and Spain; and a certain Court (these are his Words) may have the Mortification to see those two Crowns united against them more strongly than ever, by their extraordinary Management, after they have spent so many Millions to prevent it. Gentlemen, this the Nature and Import of the Libel; and whoever it is that is charged with these Things, it is plain, that there cannot be a more evident Charge of Perfidiousness, and pursuing Measures destructive to their Country. The Reason of my opening thus, is to shew and make way for the Application of the Libel to the Persons and Things mentioned in it. And in order to shew that the Libel is applied to his present Majesty and his Ministers, and the Administration of the Government of this Kingdom, and cannot be applied to any other, it will be necessary for you, Gentlemen, to consider who are the Ministers thus charged. The Description is, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville; and that certain Ministers having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and so on. Gentlemen, who are the Allies of Seville? They are the King of Great Britain, the French King, and the King of Spain. Now, the Ministers here spoken of are charged with Perfidiousness in breaking that Treaty, who, to be sure, must be meant of those Ministers that were empowered to make that Treaty; for no other could be guilty of breaking it: And, indeed, the Author himself hath, in this very pretended Hague Letter, fully explained his Meaning; and that it is not France or Spain, or their Ministers, that he thus charges with Perfidy; for he tells us, that one necessary Effect of such Violation of Faith, will be the Conjunction of France and Spain; and that a certain Court would have the Mortification to see those two Crowns united against them more strongly than ever. This amounts to a Demonstration, that neither France nor Spain, nor their Ministers are charged with breaking this Treaty; for they are plainly excluded: If so, then there is but one Party left, to wit, the King of Great Britain and his Ministers; and it is plain, as if the Ministers of Great Britain had been in express Words. I am almost ashamed to explain what is so plain; though I thought it proper to set forth thus at first. And, Gentlemen, if more Circumstances are wanting to confirm this further, they may be added afterwards; such as these, to wit, the Persons who opposed them were stiled Germanized Patriots: Another Expression is, the Seizure of that vast Pledge, which Spain hath at this time in her Hands. Besides, it is incumbent on them to shew what other Court or Ministers these Things can be applied to. There is another Observation, which I hinted at before, which is, that these Ministers are endeavouring to undo every Thing they have been doing for these five Years past; which carries it back to the Time of completing the Treaty of Hanover, which was in September, 1725. Gentlemen, it is far from our Desire, that a forced Construction should be made or drawn from this Paper; but such a one only, as every understanding Person, that takes it up and reads it, would put upon it: But I would not be thought to mean, that every Reader understands it as a Libel, or a scandalous Libel, as Courts and Juries do: No, the Law is not so absurd to suppose such a thing. Besides, it is very well known, that there have been several Cases of this Nature, that have been understood by the Court and Jury as such, I mean as a Libel, before this Time; and it is necessary to mention to you, that a Picture may be drawn very lively, and construed so; and that a Libel may be written under feigned Names, and yet plainly understood; as in the Case of Mr. Mif's Journal in 1728, wherein the fictitious Names of Esreffe and Sophy of Persia were inserted; yet, notwithstanding these assumed Names, when it came to be tried by a Jury, they understood it, as every honest Man would, to be a scandalous Libel. I shall not take up now any more Time upon this Head. The next Thing is, whether the Defendant, Mr. Franchlin, is guilty or not of the Facts charged in the Information? And now, Gentlemen, we shall give you the strongest and clearest Proof in the world: We shall prove, by a Witness who bought six of these Journals, wherein the pretended Hague Letter is inserted, of the Defendant himself, at his Shop; and that the Defendant ordered his Servant to give him them; and it will appear to you, that the Person who bought them, sold them also himself; and, if that wants further Confirmation, we can prove, that the Defendant publishes seditious Papers or Journals every Week. These Things being laid before you, we expect you will do Justice betwixt the King and the Defendant; and that is all which is desired of you.

* Taken down in Short-Hand, and transcribed into Long-Hand, by Mr. J. Weston.

Charles Talbot, Esq. Solicitor General. My Lord and Gentlemen, I am on the same Side; and as the Case is so plain, I would not take up much of your Time. The Libel is against his Majesty, and his principal Officers and Ministers of State, under the Colour of An Extract of a private Letter from the Hague; and though it is said so, yet whoever considers it, and attends to the Frame and Style of it, and Tendency of the Whole, will plainly be convinced, that it is of an English Breed: But let it be real or fictitious, it is the same thing, if it is a Libel, and the Subject-Matter thereof is against the Government; nor is it material, whether the Matters or Things published therein are either true or false, if the Publication thereof is detrimental to the Government, and of a malicious, injurious, and seditious Design, to create a Misunderstanding and Discord between his Majesty and his Allies; and to raise Jealousies in the Minds of his Subjects: And, indeed, for what other Purposes can it be supposed to have been published, but for these very Things, of sowing Sedition and Jealousy, and disturbing the publick Peace? Again, the Libel is not only against his present Majesty, but also against his Ministers; that they were about to make a Treaty with the Emperor, which would be undoing every Thing that they had been doing for these five Years past, which would occasion them to take a great deal of Shame to themselves. The next Thing he charges the Ministers with is the deserting of one Ally, and, in consequence of that, the flying into the Arms of another; and that, if he thought fit not to deal with them, then they would be broke with all the Courts of Europe; and that he could not be insensible of their Perfidy to others, at the same time that he was treating with them. In the next Part of the Libel, he accuses them of having brought a vast Expence on their Country by their former Measures; and that their present Measures will certainly involve it in a further Expence and Hazard. In the next place, he points out to the People the Consequences and Difficulties attending these Measures; the first of which, he says, in his Apprehension, are very fatal; and the second, almost insuperable: He says, that one of the Consequences will be the Infraction of solemn Treaties, and drawing on their Country the Resentments which usually attend Violation of Faith: Another Consequence, he says, will be the Interruption of Trade; and that another Consequence will be the Seizure of that vast Pledge which Spain hath in her Hands; and the last Consequence, which he mentions, of such Measures, (and which he thinks he may call a necessary Consequence) is the Conjunction of France and Spain; and that a certain Court (which, as hath been already mentioned, can only be applied to Great Britain) may have the Mortification to see these two Crowns united against them more strongly than ever, after they have spent so many Millions to prevent it. Gentlemen, I hope it now plainly appears to you, that this pretended Hague Letter is a Libel, and, I may say, a very malicious and seditious one too. If any thing may be called a Libel, surely Ministers of State undoing what they have been doing for five Years past, and deserting Allies, perfidiously exposing their Country to Hazards and vast Expences, seizing their Effects, and occasioning other Courts to be united against their own Country, may well be called a Libel; especially when the Libel also carries in it the highest Charge against his Majesty's Government, and tending to sow Sedition, and Jealousy, and Discords, between his Majesty and his Allies, as well as between his own Subjects, and thereby disturbing the publick Peace. That which remains is, of whom are these defamatory Things said, and what Court and Ministers are meant, or to whom these Expressions are applicable? The Expressions are, ["certain Ministers are endeavouring, and a certain Court may have the Mortification to see," &c.] I think every common Reader will presently understand them to be the Court and Ministers of Great Britain: And I believe I may venture to say, that the Gentlemen on the other Side cannot point out what Court and Ministers are meant by these Expressions, if it is not the Court and Ministers of Great Britain. Gentlemen, the whole Connection of the pretended Hague Letter, taking it all together, plainly points out to be meant of his present Majesty and his Ministers; and there is no Part thereof that can be applied, with any Propriety, to any other Court or Person whatsoever. In the Beginning of the Libel, we are told, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville; and then immediately follows the Charge on certain Ministers, that they were undoing every Thing that they had been doing five Years past. These Words ["Certain Ministers,"] must have a Reference either to the Ministers of Spain, France, or Great-Britain. With regard to Spain, you have been already told, that it cannot have any Reference to them, because one Effect of this Alteration of Affairs or Measures, is, that Spain would seize that vast Pledge which she hath at this time in her Hands: Is this a Libel on the Ministers of Spain, and can this give an Occasion to Spain to lay hold on their own Effects, and seize their own Treasure? No, it is Nonsense; so that the Ministers of Spain cannot be meant; besides, it is notorious to every body that knows any thing of the South-Sea Company, that that Company always have, and will have, while it is a Company, Effects and Treasures in their Hands liable to be laid hold on and seized; so that as the Ministers of Spain are not the Ministers here meant, so likewise it shews that it cannot be meant of the Ministers of France; for they are plainly excluded as well as the Ministers of Spain: The Words are, ["That certain Ministers having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People.""] Is this applicable to Ministers of France? No; It is not Sense to apply it to the Ministers of any other Court than Great-Britain; but applying it so, it is good Sense, and very proper: So that as the Ministers of Spain and France are both excluded, it is plain to a Demonstration, that it must be meant of the Ministers of Great-Britain: And seeing every Part of the Libel is applicable thereto, and cannot agree with any other Court than the Court of Great-Britain, I apprehend, it will appear plain to you to be a Libel, and that the Expressions are meant of his Majesty and his Ministers; and if so, then there remains only one thing, and that is, to fix it on the Defendant; and this we will make appear beyond all Contradiction, not only as being the Printer of that Weekly Paper, but as having sold them himself. And, Gentlemen, when this appears plain to you, after the Attorney General hath done his Duty, by laying a full Proof before you, it is hoped you will do yours.

Mr. Attorney General. I do not know whether they will deny the Defendant to be the Author or Publisher of the Paper; if they do, I shall prove it.

Mr. Fazakerley. We do deny it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Mr. Jenkins.

Mr. Jenkins appeared.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Jenkins, look out the Copies of his Majesty's Speech the 20th of January, 1725.

(Here it was produced.)

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you examine it?—Mr. Jenkins. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where?—Mr. Jenkins. At the Parliament Office.

(Mr. Jenkins cross-examined.)

Mr. Fazak. Hath it been in your Custody ever since?

Mr. Jenkins. No.

Mr. Fazak. How know you that to be the very same that you examin'd?

Mr. Jenkins. Because I marked it.

Mr. Fazak. When, before or after you first parted with it?

Mr. Jenkins. Before.

Mr. Fazak. What Mark? Did you put your Name to it?

Mr. Jenkins. I put the two Initial Letters of my Name, which I will shew you.

Mr. Fazak. Are you sure that it hath not been altered since?

Mr. Jenkins. Yes, I am very sure.

Here his Majesty's Speech to the House of Lords was read, beginning thus: ["My Lords and Gentlemen, I have had such frequent Experience, &c."] Also his Majesty's Speech to the House of Commons.

Mr. Att. Gen. This Speech of the King is general; but I shall be more particular, and shall shew you a Copy of the Address of the House of Lords, when the Treaty of Hanover was laid before them, wherein they express their Satisfaction, and mention the King of Spain particularly.

Mr. Fazak. Though I have all the Honour imaginable for the House of Lords, yet I question whether their Addresses are to be taken as Evidence.

Mr. Att. Gen. We shall read a Copy of the Journal of the House of Lords.

Mr. Fazak. Originals are the best Evidence of Fact; and whatever Addresses or Proceedings might have been made in the House of Lords, I think they cannot be proper Evidence here.

Mr. Att. Gen. What I produce is a Copy of the Lords Journal concerning the Treaty of Vienna, that the Secretaries of State laid before them.

Mr. Fazak. I own it is a Journal of the House of Lords, but it is not a proper Evidence of the Facts therein mentioned.

Mr. Boodle. My Lord, I apprehend, that the Evidence Mr. Attorney General is now pursuing, in the Course of Evidence is irregular, and on that the Objection doth arise. He says, he will prove the Facts by the Journal of the House of Lords: Suppose the Secretaries of State have failed in the Copy laid before them: I offer this to your Lordship's Consideration.

Lord Chief Justice. I find, Mr. Boodle, that all Manner of Objections will be raised to serve your Client; but I shall not pass away the Time, because you have Redress another Way; you shall have my Opinion about it.

Mr. Strange. Will you produce that Copy?

Mr. Att. Gen. We will do it. Mr. Jenkins, produce the Orders of the House of Lords, the 10th of February, 1725. (Here it was produced.)

Mr. Strange. Is it a true Copy?—Mr. Jenkins. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Have you had it ever since it was given in?

Mr. Jenkins. Yes.

(Here the Copy of the Journal was read; the Purport was a Copy of the Treaty of Peace made at Vienna, 3d April, 1725, a Copy of the Treaty of Commerce made at Vienna, 1st of May, 1725, and a Copy of the Treaty of Hanover, 30th September, 1725.)

Mr. Att. Gen. It is proper to see these Copies.

Mr. Strange. Mr. Jenkins, What is this?

Mr. Jenkins. The Treaty of Peace.

Mr. Strange. Where had you it?

Mr. Jenkins. From the Parliament Office.

Mr. Strange. Have you the Treaty of Commerce made at Vienna?

Mr. Jenkins. Yes, (Here the Title of it was read thus: Treaty between Charles Emperor of Germany, &c. and Philip the Vth, &c. dated 1st May, 1725.)

Mr. Att. Gen. Read the 2d and 3d Articles thereof. (Here they were read.)

Read the 36th Article. (Here it was read.)

Read the 47th Article. (Here it was read.)

The Purport of these Articles was, (as I thought) that they were of great Prejudice to his Majesty's Subjects, and consequently was an Occasion of Difference.

I beg that the Address of the House of Lords to his Majesty may be read, and his Majesty's Answer on the 17th of February, 1725.

Mr. Fazak. For what Purpose would you read them?

Mr. Att. Gen. You will understand that immediately.

[Here the Address was first read, and then his Majesty's Answer;] the Purport was to shew, that there were Differences between his late Majesty and the King of Spain, &c.

Mr. Fazak. Mr. Jenkins, by what did you examine these?

Mr. Jenkins. By the original Journal.

Mr. Att. Gen. I shall prove in the next Place, that the King of Spain, 13th July, 1725, (which was about two Months before the Treaty of Hanover) made an express Demand of Gibraltar.

Mr. Fazak. I do not rightly see through, or understand this Evidence; I suppose it is to make up some Defects.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Mr. Tilson. Mr. Tilson, have you any Papers with you?—Mr. Tilson. Yes, a Letter.

Mr. Att. Gen. Be pleased to give my Lord and Jury an Account how you received that Letter.

Mr. Tilson. My Lord, this is a Letter from the Marquis of Gramelée, Secretary to the King of Spain.

Lord Chief Justice. Where received you this Letter?

Mr. Tilson. I received it at Hanover.

Lord Chief Justice. When received you it?

Mr. Tilson. On the 1st of August New Style, 1725.

Mr. Attorney General. From whom received you it, and in what Manner?

Mr. Tilson. By a Messenger that came from Syow from Mr. Stanhope.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the Messenger's Name?

Mr. Tilson. One Wagon, the King's Messenger.

Mr. Att. Gen. How received you it?

Mr. Tilson. In a Packet made up with his Dispatches.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where hath the Letter been kept ever since?

Mr. Tilson. In the Secretary of State's Office of the Lord Townshend.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where took you it from?

Mr. Tilson. From the Book.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was you?

Mr. Tilson. Under-Secretary to my Lord Townshend.

Mr. Att. Gen. Can you interpret it immediately?

[No Answer was given.]

Mr. Taylor. I object against this Evidence, by reason it is not the best Evidence, because my Lord Harrington is here in England himself.

Mr. Att. Gen. I apprehend it is sufficient, and it is impossible to prove it otherwise; the Lord Harrington transmits it to his Master.

Mr. Taylor. If my Lord Harrington were here, he could give Evidence himself.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we have found an Interpreter, and he will interpret the Spanish. Call Mr. Bocking.

Lord Chief Justice. What read you it for?

Mr. Att. Gen. For a Proof of the Demand of Gibraltar, by Virtue of the Treaty at Vienna. [Here Mr. Bocking was called.]

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Bocking, Do you understand the Spanish Tongue?

Mr. Bocking. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you compared it with the original Letter?

Mr. Bocking. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is it truly translated?—Mr. Bocking. Yes.

[Here the Letter was read subscribed Grameldo.] The Purport of it was demanding up Gibraltar.

Mr. Att. Gen. The next Thing is the Treaty of Hanover, which we have upon Record.

Mr. Fazakerley. I do not think this Evidence full; for the Allegation is, that there were certain Differences and Controversies between his late Majesty and divers Princes and Foreign States, being his Allies, and the King of Spain. I do not find that this Evidence shews any thing of it; the Difference that the Evidence shews, is only between the late King and the King of Spain. I apprehend they ought to make the Evidence agree with the Information; if it varies from that, it is as no Evidence at all.

Mr. Att. Gen. I apprehend this is no Objection at all.

Mr. Fazakerley. The Information is, that before the Demise of the late King, divers Differences and Controversies arose between his said late Majesty and divers Princes and Foreign States, being his Allies, and the King of Spain. Now, the Objection is, that the Evidence they have produced, shews that there were only Differences between Spain and Great-Britain.

Mr. Att. Gen. There is no Weight in that Objection; for if it were so, as they suppose, I apprehend this is not material to the Information; for it is well known, that there is a Distinction between an Action and an Indictment. Every Thing in an Action, in Case of Contradiction, ought to be proved; but if there be an Allegation in an Indictment, and that the Crime may remain without it, it is well known that that Allegation is not necessary to be proved; and it is sufficient enough to prove him guilty of the Crime that he is indicted for. But what I have proved, shews the Difference and Disputes between his late Majesty and his Allies, and the King of Spain, for the Supplication relating to the Offend Company; particularly, by the 36th Article, is, that all the Subjects of the Emperor shall enjoy the same Privileges as the United Provinces, &c. so likewise by the 47th Article, which expressly refers to Spain and Great-Britain; and that is the express Declaration made to the House of Lords, and was the Foundation of the Troubles in Europe, which obliged the late King, without Loss of Time, to enter into the Treaty of Hanover; namely, with the Consideration to the Trade and Commerce of Vienna. And now, all these taken together, I submit it to your Lordship, whether there is not a sufficient Proof, that there were Differences subsisting between his Majesty and his Allies, and the King of Spain.

Mr. Solicitor General. This Allegation is not material; for whether there were Differences or not subsisting, we shall fix it by Evidence that Mr. Franklin is equally guilty, and that it will not alter the Nature of the Offence: Besides, it is admitted by the Gentleman that made the Objection, that the Evidence amounted so far as to prove that there were Differences between the late King and the King of Spain; and we have pointed out two Things which shews there were Differences; the one relating to the Offend Company, and the other to the Demand of Gibraltar. I agree with that Gentleman, that Great-Britain was concerned in it; but to say that they were alone concerned in it, and that by the Address of the House of Lords the Dutch were not concerned, is a plain Mistake, for they claimed a Right to Trade also; yea, they were more immediately concerned than Great-Britain; and therefore it is rightly stated by the House of Lords Address; though, as I said before, it is not material whether there were Differences subsisting or not.

Mr. Fazakerley. I thought, while the Thing was fresh in Memory, it would have been explained; but since they have gone so far, it will be better to make an End. I shall only say, that as to what they say is immaterial, if they are willing to have that Matter immaterial, I am willing it should be struck out; and if there is a Crime described in the indictment or Information, I agree it is not necessary to prove every Allegation, if the Crime remains without it; so that, if they will wave it, I am satisfied: Let me get rid of one Thing at a Time. I say, if there is enough left, properly charged on the Defendant, then, my Lord, it ought to be dropt; for they have produced nothing that proves the Allegation: And whatever Differences there might be between the late King and Spain, or any Powers whatsoever, not properly described in this Information, I apprehend, they are not to be taken a Part of the Charge in this Information. Now the main thing is, whether they have laid it so, and made out these Differences. They say, that the Differences were between the late King, and several Princes and Foreign States, being his Allies, and the King of Spain. I think the Letter produced from the Marquis of Grameldo, or take what Way you please, it only refers to Differences between the King of Great Britain and Spain. I own there were Grants of Commerce to the Emperor, which might be of Injury to other States; but though they think that there is a Foundation for Differences, yet, if there is none, there is no Reason to say that there was an actual Difference: They have laid it so, my Lord; and as for that other Part of the Evidence of the Abuse of Lords, that is not sufficient, for it is mentioned there as an Infraction of their Treaty; but whatever Infraction it is, yet, I humbly apprehend, that is not a Reason that there were Differences on that Account, for if other States think otherwise, or acquiesce to it, then it cannot be called a Difference; besides, that Address of the House of Lords was only the Sentiments of that great Body; and though a Regard ought to be had to them, yet it is not any Evidence of the Fact, unless transacted in a judicial Way. They made a Collection or Construction from it; but think, in my Opinion, it is possible they might make a Mistake: We are now upon Evidence, and it ought to be established by a proper legal Evidence; for that (as I said before) is only an Evidence that thereby their Treaty was broken, but no Evidence that there was a Difference arising from it.

Mr. Botle. Mr. Attorney is pleased to make that a criminal Information, of which a Part may be evidenced, and a Part overlooked.

Lord Chief Justice. Is this essential or not?

Mr. Attorney General. No.

Lord Chief Justice. Why hath there been then almost two Hours spent about it?

Mr. Att. Gen. This is not between Great Britain and Spain, but other States; and it is to shew, that by the Articles of the Treaty of Vienna, there were some of them inconsistent with those relating to the foreign Powers.

Mr. Noel. As they cannot prove this Allegation an Offence, or Part of the Crime, it is proper to strike it out.

Mr. Botle. Our Objection is on what is alledged; we are not entering into the Consideration of the Fact, or how far it is capable of being proved: No; but sure I am they have not proved the Allegation.

Lord Chief Justice. This is not indeed a positive Proof, I think.

Mr. Att. Gen. The next Thing is the Treaty of Hanover, I have a Copy of it translated.

Mr. Botle. It is admitted that there were Differences.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Mr. Snow. [Who appears.] What Officer are you?

Mr. Snow. Prothonotary of the Chancery.

Mr. Att. Gen. What have you in your Hand?

Mr. Snow. The Treaty of Hanover, dated the 30th of September, 1725.

Mr. Att. Gen. Read it.

Mr. Snow. It is in French.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you a Translation of it?—Mr. Snow. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Let it be read. Mr. Buck [or Bocking] what is that Paper?

Mr. Snow. It is the Translation of the Treaty of Hanover.

[Here the Treaty was read.] It is between the late King of Great Britain, the King of France, and the King of Prussia.

Mr. Att. Gen. The next Thing is the Treaty of Seville. Mr. Snow, what is that?

Mr. Snow. The Treaty of Seville.

Mr. Att. Gen. In what Language?

Mr. Snow. In the Spanish. I have a Translation of it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Buck, Did you translate it?—Mr. Buck. Yes.

[Here they read a Part of it.] It is between the present King of Great Britain, the French King, and the King of Spain, dated at Seville, 9th of November, 1729.

Mr. Att. Gen. I shall now go on to prove that Part of the Libel which relates to Mr. Franklin's publishing the Craftsman, the 2d of January last.

Call John Smith. [Who appears.] Look on that Paper, is that your Hand-writing?

[Here was shown one of the Craftsman, 2d of January marked by Smith.]

Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where had you it?

Mr. Smith. In Mr. Franklin's own House.

Mr. Att. Gen. In what Part of it?

Mr. Smith. In his Shop.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember the Time?

Mr. Smith. Yes, it was on Saturday the 2d of January last.

Mr. Att. Gen. How came you to have that Paper?

Mr. Smith. On the 9th of January, I went into his Shop, where Mr. Franklin himself was standing by the Counter, and I asked him for half a Dozen of his Journals of that Day, and two of the Saturday before; he led me whom they were for; I told him for myself; then he asked me I sold them; I said, Yes; then he pointed to his Man to look them out.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who delivered them to you?

Mr. Smith. His Man.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whom paid you for them?

Mr. Smith. His Man.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was he present himself then?

Mr. Smith. No.

Mr. Att. Gen. But did not he order his Servant to give you them?

Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. Smith cross-examined.

Mr. Fazakerley. What asked you for?

Mr. Smith. I asked for half a Dozen of his Journals of that Day, and two of the Saturday before.

Mr. Fazakerley. Do you sell them?—Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. Fazakerley. How came you by this when you had sold it?

Mr. Smith. I sold it to a Person that desired me to get it for him.

Mr. Fazakerley. To whom sold you it?—Mr. Smith. To Mr. Ibbot.

Mr. Fazakerley. How soon after you bought it did you sell it him?

Mr. Smith. As soon as I could drink two Quarts of Beer, at the Six Gun Alehouse in Holbourn.

Mr. Fazakerley. Are you sure that this is one of the 2d of January, that you had at Mr. Franklin's?

Mr. Smith. Yes, because I mark'd it.

Mr. Fazak. Are you sure that he had it not in his Custody before you mark'd it?—Mr. Smith. He had it not.

Lord Chief Justice. Who gave you them?—Mr. Smith. His Man.

Lord Ch. J. What said he to his Man?

Mr. Smith. Look out these Journals.

Lord Ch. J. You asked for two of the Saturday before?

Mr. Smith. Yes.

Lord Ch. J. What was Mr. Franklin doing?

Mr. Smith. There was a Man with him, who was paying him ten or a dozen Guineas; while I was speaking he had told Part of them: When I came and asked for the Journals, he asked me what I wanted; I said, Six of his Journals of that Day, and two of the Week before.

Lord Ch. J. To whom paid you the Money?

Mr. Smith. To his Man; I gave him Half-a-Crown, and he return'd me what was over, as my Change.

[Here the Title of it was read, "No. 235; The Country Journal; or, the Craftsman, by Caleb Danvers, of Gray's Inn, Esq; Saturday, January 2d, 1730;" then the Hague Letter was read thus, "Extract of a private Letter from the Hague: A Rumour hath been for some Time privately, &c." as in the Information.]

Mr. Att. Gen. I shall call a Witness or two to support his Evidence, to shew that a great many of them came from the Defendant's Shop. Call John Ibbot. [John Ibbot appears.]

Mr. Att. Gen. Look on that Paper, where bought you that?

Mr. Ibbot. I bought it at Mrs. Dodd's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where lives she?

Mr. Ibbot. At the Sign of the Peacock, without Temple-bar.

Mr. Att. Gen. When bought you it?

Mr. Ibbot. On the 2d of January last.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you buy it of her, or her Servant?

Mr. Ibbot. Of her Servant.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is the Servant's Name?

Mr. Ibbot. Mary Dewy.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Mrs. Ann Dodd. [Who appears.] Had you at any Time, from Mr. Franklin's, the Paper called the Craftsman, or Country Journal?—Mrs. Dodd. I never had any myself.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you ever disposed of any of them?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who had them for you?—Mrs. Dodd. My Man.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is his Name?

Mrs. Dodd. Henry Goram (or Boram).

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any more of them in your Shop, beside what Henry Goram fetched for you?

Mrs. Dodd. None, that I know of.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any of the Craftsman the 2d of January last?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whom sent you for them?

Mrs. Dodd. Henry Goram.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any other Craftsman besides these?

Mrs. Dodd. No.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whom paid you for them?

Mrs. Dodd. I did not pay him myself; but they were paid for by another of my Servants, Mary Dewy.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did not you order it to be paid to Mr. Franklin?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes.

Mrs. Dodd cross-examined.

Mr. Fazak. Can you take upon you to swear, that all the Country Journals you had came from Mr. Franklin's?

Mrs. Dodd. No: They might fetch them from other Places.

Mr. Fazak. Where sent you for them?

Mrs. Dodd. To Covent-Garden, to Mr. Franklin's House.

Mr. Fazak. Will you venture to say, on your Oath, that you sent your Servant to Mr. Franklin's for the Craftsman of the 2d of January last?

Mrs. Dodd. I think so.

Mr. Fazak. Can you be positive, or not, that you sent for this particular Journal of Saturday the 2d of January last?

Mrs. Dodd. I cannot be positive as to that; but I used to give Orders to fetch in these Journals every Week.

Mr. Fazak. What were the Orders you gave them; were they general Orders every Week? Do not they sometimes fetch them without Orders?

Mrs. Dodd. Yes.

Mr. Fazak. You do not know from whence they fetch those without Orders?—Mrs. Dodd. No.

Mr. Fazak. Did you ever send for any of them to any other Place than to Mr. Franklin's?

Mrs. Dodd. No.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Henry Goram. [Who appears.] Whom live you with?—Mr. Goram. With Mrs. Dodd.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you fetch News-papers for her?

Mr. Goram. I have lately fetched for her the Country Journal, or Craftsman.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where?

Mr. Goram. From Russell-street, in Covent-Garden, from Mr. Franklin's.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you continued to do it?

Mr. Goram. Above a Year and a half.

Mr. Att. Gen. How often in the Week?

Mr. Goram. Once every Friday Evening, when it is late.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you gone every Friday Evening to fetch them, all that Time?

Mr. Goram. No, I cannot say, for I have sometimes missed.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember going the first Day of January, being New Year's Day, for the Craftsman, the 2d of January last?

Mr. Goram. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. From what Place?

Mr.

Mr. Goram. From Mr. Francklin's in Covent-Garden.
 Mr. At. Gen. What Day did you fetch them on?
 Mr. Gor. I told you on the Friday Night before, which was New Year's Day.
 Mr. At. Gen. To what Place did you bring them?
 Mr. Gor. To Mrs. Dodd's.
 Mr. At. Gen. Were they put into her Shop?—Mr. Gor. Yes.
 Mr. At. Gen. Did you fetch any Country Journals of that Day, from any other Place?—Mr. Gor. No.
 Mr. At. Gen. What Quantity, think you, you had at Mr. Francklin's?
 Mr. Gor. About threescore Quires a-Week.

[Cross-examined.]

Mr. Fazakerley. You said, you cannot say that you fetched every Week the Craftsman from Mr. Francklin's; how comes it that you can be particular as to this Craftsman of the 2d of January last? Have you any thing particular to make you remember that Day?

Mr. Gor. Yes; for a Day or two after I heard that Paper had given Offence, my Mistress desired me to recollect when I had them; which I did.

Mr. Faz. Here your Mistress knows nothing about that of the 2d of January; probably it might have been something else that your Mistress desired you to recollect; Do you know of never another Paper that gave Offence, besides that? Therefore, I say, can you be positive that you fetched all the Craftsman of that Day on Friday Evening?

Mr. Gor. Yes.

Mr. Faz. Did you know of any other Craftsman besides Mr. Francklin's? Or did you ever know that your Mistress bought any Craftsman, but from Mr. Francklin?—Mr. Gor. No.

Mr. Faz. Is Mary Dewy Servant to Mrs. Dodd?—Mr. Gor. Yes.

Mr. Faz. Did not she send her for the Craftsman?—Mr. Gor. No.

Mr. At. Gen. Call John Smith (aforesaid) who appears. Look on that Paper. [Here another of the Craftsman, of the 2d of January, was produced.] Where bought you that Paper?

Mr. Smith. At Mrs. Smith's under the Piazza's, at the Royal Exchange.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you remember when?

Mr. Smith. The 9th of January, the same Morning that I bought at Mr. Francklin's.

Mr. At. Gen. Of whom bought you it?—Mr. Smith. Of her Servant.

Mr. At. Gen. What is her Name?—Mr. Smith. I know not.

Mr. At. Gen. Are you sure that is the same Paper?—Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you mark it?—Mr. Smith. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Call Mrs. Ann Pierce. (Who appears.) Did you keep a Shop formerly?

Mrs. Pierce. Yes, though not now.

Mr. At. Gen. How long ago is it since you kept it?

Mrs. Pierce. About three or four Months.

Mr. At. Gen. During the Time of your keeping a Shop, did you sell the Country Journal?—Mrs. Pierce. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Where bought you them?

Mrs. Pierce. I never went myself.

Mr. At. Gen. Whom sent you?—Mrs. Pierce. One David Davies.

Mr. At. Gen. To whom sent you for them?

Mrs. Pierce. To Mr. Francklin.

Mr. At. Gen. Can you remember you had any Craftsman of the 2d of January last?

Mrs. Pierce. To be sure I had.

Mr. At. Gen. Who went for them?—Mrs. Pierce. My Man.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you ever send any body else?

Mrs. Pierce. I cannot tell.

Mr. At. Gen. I would desire you to recollect who fetched those of the 2d of January.—Mrs. Pierce. He always fetched them.

Mr. At. Gen. What Number had you the 2d of January?

Mrs. Pierce. I cannot tell exactly the Number; but I have generally about 7l. a Week to pay for the Craftsman.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you pay for them of the 2d of January?

Mrs. Pierce. He had always about 7l. a Week, or upwards.

Mr. At. Gen. But do you remember that you paid for them of the 2d of January?

Mrs. Pierce. I do not remember that in particular; for it was about that Time I was married.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you pay for them yourself?

Mrs. Pierce. No; but my Servant, David Davies, did.

[Cross-examined.]

Mr. Bottle. You said, you did not always send your Man, David Davies, for them?

Mrs. Pierce. You are mistaken; for I said I did.

Mr. Bottle. Can you say, on your Oath, Mistress, that you paid for these Craftsman the second of January in particular?

Mrs. Pierce. I shall not answer you.

Mr. Bottle. Who bid you not to answer me? You shall do it.

Mrs. Pierce. I don't know you. [Here the Judge reprimanded her, and desired her to give an Answer, which she did thus.] I believe I paid him the Money for the Craftsman of that Day, as well as for those of other Days.

Mr. Bottle. Don't these Papers pay Duty?

Mrs. Pierce. I do not know.

Mr. Willes. Call David Davies. (Who appears.) Was you employed by Mrs. Pierce, before January the 2d, to fetch in her Journals?

Mr. Davies. Yes.

Mr. Willes. Did you fetch in the Craftsman among the rest?

Mr. Dav. Yes.

Mr. Willes. Where did you go for these Craftsman?

Mr. Dav. To Mr. Francklin's.

Mr. Willes. Did you go any where else for them?

Mr. Dav. No.

Mr. Willes. Can you remember that you fetched the Craftsman the 2d of January last?

Mr. Dav. Yes.

Mr. Willes. You did buy all the Craftsman of that Month at Mr. Francklin's—I mean, all that you bought?

Mr. Davies. Yes.

Mr. Willes. When you carried the Money for them, to whom paid you it?

Mr. Dav. Sometimes to Mr. Francklin, and sometimes to his Servants.

Mr. Willes. Can you say, particularly for the Month of January last, that you paid the Money to his Servants?

Mr. Dav. Yes.

Mr. Willes. Did you continue to pay weekly, all the Month of January last, for what you bought of these Papers?

Mr. Dav. Yes.

Mr. Willes. Had you any of these Craftsman any where else that Month?

Mr. Dav. No.

Mr. Willes. Can you remember how many you bought of the 2d of January last?

Mr. Dav. No.

Mr. Willes. How much paid you a Week?

Mr. Dav. About 7l. a Week; because I fetched between 40 and 50 Quires weekly.

[Cross-examined.]

Mr. Strange. Can you recollect so exactly, as to tell that you fetched and paid for the Craftsman the 2d of January, and for all that Month?

Mr. Dav. Yes.

Mr. Strange. How can you be so particular as to that Month?

Mr. Dav. Because I did it weekly before that Time.

Mr. At. Gen. There is another Thing, which I shall name, which will likewise prove, that the Defendant published the Craftsman of that Day; and that is the Stamp-Duty, which is one Shilling, paid for every Advertisement; and here I shall shew to your Lordship, that he paid for the Duties of that Day, and for 38 Advertisements of the same Day, which is exactly the Number contained in that Day's Craftsman. Call Mr. Lunnis. (Who appears.) What Officer are you?

Mr. Lun. An Assistant to the Register of the Stamp-Office.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know any Thing of the Account of the Stamp-Duties at the Office?—Mr. Lun. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Have you the Book?—Mr. Lun. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Produce it. [Here it was produced.] What is that Book?

Mr. Lun. An Account of the Advertisements in every Paper.

Mr. At. Gen. Is that the Original of the Stamp-Office Book?

Mr. Lun. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. You know what Entries there are in it concerning Mr. Francklin?

Mr. Lun. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. What are these Entries?

Mr. Lun. They are from about 13th of May, 1727, to this Time, weekly and monthly.

Mr. At. Gen. Who paid for them?

Mr. Lun. Sometimes Mr. Francklin, and sometimes his Servants.

Mr. At. Gen. Was the Payment made in his own Name always?

Mr. Lun. Yes, in his own Name.

Mr. At. Gen. Are there any Advertisements that relate to the 2d of January last?

Mr. Lun. Yes, 38.

Mr. At. Gen. Were they paid for?

Mr. Lun. Yes, in Mr. Francklin's Name.

Mr. At. Gen. Read the Entry. [Here it was read. The Purport was Received the 29th of July, for the Duty of 38 Advertisements, &c. for the 2d of January last.]

Mr. At. Gen. That is the exact Number in the Craftsman of that Day.

[Cross-examined.]

Mr. Strange. Do you receive the Money?—Mr. Lun. No.

Mr. Strange. How can you tell that he pays it then?

Mr. Lun. Because I make it up to his Account.

Mr. Strange. Do you know it yourself?

Mr. Lun. No.

Mr. Strange. Are the Papers brought to the Office, and are you the Person that receives them?

Mr. Lun. I am the Person that takes in and registers the Number of the Advertisements, and gives a Note, or an Account thereof, to himself, or the Person that brings the Papers.

Mr. Strange. What Time does the Act relate to the Advertisement being paid?

Mr. Lun. I don't know.

Mr. Strange. As you make out the Warrants, and keep Account of the Advertisements, explain it; what is its Nature? Does your Warrant express the Number of the Advertisements, and the Sum to be paid for them?—Mr. Lun. Yes.

Mr. Strange. For what Purpose do you make it out?

Mr. Lun. After I have made it out, I give it into the Receiver's Office, and then into the Comptroller's, which is a Check on the Receiver's Office; and then Mr. Francklin hath a Receipt for it.

Mr. Strange. Who receives the Money for these Advertisements, while you make out the Warrant for?

Mr. Lun. They at the Receiver's Office.

Mr. At. Gen. Call Mr. Webb. (Who appears.) What Place are you in in the Stamp-Office?

Mr. Webb. A Clerk in the Receiver's Office.

Mr. At. Gen. Are you a sworn Clerk?

Mr. Webb. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Can you give an Account of any Receipts had of Mr. Francklin, on Account of his Advertisements the 2d of January last?

Mr. Webb. He had one in July last.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know if the Advertisements of the 2d of January was included in the Money?

Mr. Webb. I cannot tell.

Mr. At. Gen. In whose Name received you it?

Mr. Webb. In the Name of Mr. Francklin.

Mr. At. Gen. Whether or not did you receive any Money, on the account of his Advertisements, before that Time?

Mr. Webb. Yes, I received something on that Account.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it a long time before July?

Mr. Webb. I cannot justly remember.

Mr. Att. Gen. How much was it you received the 29th July?

Mr. Webb. About 10*l.* 18*s.*

Mr. Att. Gen. Whence goes that Receipt?

Mr. Webb. To the Comptroller's Office.

Mr. Att. Gen. Call Mr. Scot. (Who appears.) What is your Office?

Mr. Scot. I am in the Comptroller's Office.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you an Account of any Money paid on account of Advertisements in the Craftsman the 2d January last?

Mr. Scot. I have them for the whole Month; but not the Day.

Mr. Att. Gen. What come they to?

Mr. Scot. Ten Pounds eighteen Shillings.

Mr. Att. Gen. In whose Name was it paid?

Mr. Scot. In the Name of Mr. Franklin.

Mr. Att. Gen. Were there any more Payments before?—Mr. Scot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who paid them?—Mr. Scot. I cannot tell.

Mr. Att. Gen. On whose Account were they paid?

Mr. Scot. On Mr. Franklin's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you got any Warrants?—Mr. Scot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you got a particular Warrant for every Month?

Mr. Scot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Look out the Warrant for the Month of January.

[*Here it was read. The Purport was, That there was received 10*l.* 18*s.* on Mr. Franklin's Account.*]

L. C. J. What is the Nature of that Warrant?

Mr. Scot. It is a Warrant given from one Office to another, containing the Number of the Advertisements, and Sum for the Duty.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, the other Side have owned, that there were Differences between his late Majesty and the King of Spain, because we have fully proved it; but they say we have shewn no Evidence of any Difference between his late Majesty and his Allies, and the King of Spain, which I apprehend we have; though, as I said before, it is not material: But, if they please, I shall call other Witnesses to prove it further; particularly Differences relating to the Dutch, who claimed the sole Trade to the East Indies, exclusive of all the Subjects of the Emperor, &c. and yet, my Lord, by the 36th Article, Spain stipulates to let all the Subjects of the Emperor enjoy the same Privileges as the United Provinces; which is an Infraction of the Treaty of Munster, 1648. (Call Mr. Payant.)

[Mr. Payant appears.]

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Payant, give an Account of these Papers.

Mr. Payant. I brought them from my Lord Harrington's Office.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is their Import?

Mr. Payant. They contain the Accession of the States General to the Treaty of Hanover.

Mr. Att. Gen. Are they kept there?—Mr. Payant. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is the Act of Accession enrolled?

Mr. Payant. Yes; but this is the original one.

Mr. Fazakerley. My Lord, I apprehend the Enrolment is a proper Evidence.

[Here that Part of it was read and interpreted, (it being in French) which complained of the Infraction of the Treaty of Munster, made in 1648.]

Mr. Att. Gen. By this Act of Accession, which was about a few Months after the Treaty, the Dutch insist, that it is wholly their Right to enjoy the sole Privileges of trading to the East Indies, exclusive of all the Subjects of the Emperor, &c. and accordingly they enter into, or accede to the Treaty of Hanover; which, I think, is a sufficient Evidence of Differences subsisting between his late Majesty and his Allies, and the King of Spain. We shall not take up any more Time in examining other Witnesses, for a further Proof of the Information against the Defendant; having, as we apprehend, sufficiently proved it already.

Mr. Fazakerley. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I am Counsel for the Defendant. As the King's Counsel have been very long, and thought nothing unnecessary; and, indeed, I cannot help saying, that I think a great deal of Labour and Pains have been made use of, to shew that the Defendant is guilty of the Fact of Publication; and I believe it was only to give a reasonable Suspicion thereof, because it was not sufficiently proved by the first Witness, and they have spent about one Hour and a half since, to support that: So, Gentlemen, I hope that you will not think that they have sufficiently proved the Information; and that you will not rest on what the first Witness says as a full Proof, who is as liable to a Prosecution as the Defendant. But I apprehend, that of a Printer is different from a Publisher; and that a Printer's Business relates to all the Subjects of the Kingdom, and he may easily be imposed upon. As to their Evidence, you will find that they intirely seem to rely on the first Witness, who says, he went to Mr. Franklin's Shop, and that he was busy, and that he interrupted him by asking him for some of the Journals of that Day, and that he did not deliver them himself. Now, as he asked for Journals in general, and did not tell whose; and that he was busy, and did not deliver any to that Witness, nor receive any Money from him; and how he came by these Journals, it is not known; he might have some in his Pocket that he got elsewhere, and by Mistake put his Mark to them: Besides, there were only two of these Journals produced. As to the rest of the Witnesses, they are only brought in, in order to endeavour to support this first Witness's Evidence, and to prove that they received Journals from the Defendant's Servants only, and paid the Money to them. As to the Stamp-Office Accounts or Books, I suppose they only shew what Money is raised to the Crown: So, Gentlemen, I believe it will depend chiefly on the Evidence of this Witness; and the Defendant is punishable for none but these two Journals produced (if he is guilty of that); for if he had sold a Thousand more, it signifies nothing to this Information. I shall not trouble you with other Observations on it; but only take notice of the great Convenience of publishing Letters of this Kind, and other News. Gentlemen, it is well known that News-Papers are allowed not only in this, but in other Nations; and, indeed, it is reasonable that private People should know these News as well as others: And therefore, when we are under a Case of this Kind, we ought not to be strict in scanning Things that come from foreign Parts; for to do so, may put many under great Difficulties; and, indeed, if Men were to be punished therefore, it would be a great Means to have no News at all published; for it is an easy thing to scan them amiss: And therefore, Gentlemen, when you are in a Case of this Kind, consider how many Witnesses they have produced against the Defendant, and that none of them proves any thing but the first, on whom (as I said before) they seem intirely to rely: I hope they are Persons of Veracity, or else they would not have produced them. Next, do you think that the Defendant did it out of a criminal Design? And I think it is pretty hard, unless this seem extremely plain, and unless he was offending in his Mind, as the Counsel on the other Side have alledged, and endeavoured to make out (though, I think, they have not proved it). Next, I would have you take notice of this Information in the general: He is indicted of two Offences; the one is only to support the other: The second he is not guilty of, because they have produced no Evidence. Again, the next Thing they have proved is only, that he is guilty of the Publication (let me get free of as much as I can), though I think he is innocent. Gentlemen, you cannot but consider the Evidence that hath been given you; and therefore I hope you will not think that he is guilty of any thing further, I mean the Act of Publication. Next, take notice, that there are a great many Aggravations in the Information; so that if you find the Verdict general; then these Aggravations must be published on Record, and he punished for them. For, first, in the Information it is laid, "That there were several Differences and Controversies between his late Majesty and divers Princes and foreign States, being his Allies, and the King of Spain." I shall not trouble you with any thing concerning this; but only name the last, to wit, the Accession of the Dutch, which leaves it where we found it; for the Time laid in the Information was, that the Differences were antecedent to the Treaty of Hanover, which was made the 30th of September, 1725. But the Evidence they have produced is about a Year after that, to wit, about August 1726; and probably there might have been no Difference at all then. I shall go on to make a few Observations on the rest of the Matter charged; to wit, "That he intirely tended to disturb and disquiet the happy State of the publick Peace and Tranquillity of this Kingdom, and likewise to traduce and vilify the Administration, and his present Majesty's principal Officers and Ministers of State; and to represent them as Persons of no Integrity and Ability, and as Enemies to the publick Good of this Kingdom; and likewise to reflect on the King:" Far be it from me to think that his Majesty ought, in any wise, to be reflected on; and I think my Client is of the same Opinion, and that he would abhor any thing to the contrary; and therefore I apprehend, that there is nothing in this Paper (take it in the strongest Sense) that shews any Design of reflecting on his Majesty; and suppose it does on his Ministers, yet not one of his Ministers have been yet mentioned, on whom the Reflection is said to be made. Sometimes it is said, that a Reflection against the Ministers is one against the King: But, with Submission, I think it is not; for Princes may sometimes have the Misfortune of bad Ministers, as well as private Persons have the Misfortune of bad Servants; but I believe that Nobody can imagine, that his Majesty hath any such Ministers. And then observe, What have the King's Counsel opened, with respect to the present Ministers of his Majesty? What Evidence have they given of the Defendant's reflecting on these Ministers in the Hague Letter? I apprehend, there hath none at all been given, but what intirely depends upon the Construction of that Paper itself; and therefore, in Cases of this Kind, the Question is, How you are to construe that Paper, especially when there is an Information thereon against any Person supposed to be the Publisher thereof? The Gentlemen of the other Side have told you, that you are to understand it in the same Sense as any other Person does; but I apprehend you are not to judge so, because here is a Prosecution against a Person, wherein Facts are undertaken to be proved, which, if done, will subject the Person to Punishment; and that you are to find a Verdict according to the Evidence laid before you; for there is a great Difference between one Person's reading, understanding, and judging of it, for his own Information, and another's doing it, on a Prosecution, in order to convict or acquit the Person charged: So that the Question here is, Whether you think that the Defendant is guilty of reflecting upon the present Ministers of Great Britain, or not, upon the Construction of that Paper, and upon due Consideration of what follows? though I think he is not: For you have heard mentioned to you, from the several Treaties opened, as well as from the Hague Letter itself, that there are several Courts mentioned as well as Great Britain; to wit, Prussia, France, Spain, and Germany; and that the Words [certain Ministers] may have a Reference to the Ministers of one of those Courts, and not to the Court of Great Britain: And I hope you have a better Opinion of his Majesty's present Ministers of State, than to think that the Expressions are applicable to them; and, indeed, when you are to make a Construction on that Paper, you must consider, and judge for yourselves, Whether these Ministers deserve such Things to be said of them, or not? And I hope you will be of the same Opinion as I am of; which is, that they deserve them not. In the Beginning of that Hague Letter the Words are, ["A Rumour hath been for some time privately spread about, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville; and that certain Ministers are endeavouring, &c."] The Gentlemen on the other Side are pleased to say, that these Words [certain Ministers] must be understood of the Ministers either of Great Britain, or France, or Spain; but I beg Leave to say, that no such Inference can be naturally drawn, or that no other Ministers of any other Court can be intended but one of these three. Then the Letter goes on, and says, ["that certain Ministers have at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the Foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People, are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor."] The Gentlemen say, that this must be applied to the Ministers of Great Britain only. Gentlemen, I believe any Minister of any Court whatsoever must be of that Opinion, and that it is not fitting that there should be a War on the Foot of any Treaty; and I hope that all the Ministers of these three Courts are of the same Opinion; though the Gentlemen would fix it only upon the Ministers of Great-Britain: Nor can I see how it can be said or applied to our Ministers, when the following Words are mentioned, to wit, ["that certain Ministers having at length found out, that too close an Union with France."] Why should this be mentioned as a Reason of its being applicable to the Ministers of Great-Britain? Have not we had all this time an Alliance, a close Alliance, with France? And can it be strengthened by a further or closer Alliance? So that, I think, it is more applicable to the Ministers of other Courts. Gentlemen, I will take a little Notice of what the King's Counsel said, with respect to these Words [certain Ministers]. They told you, that they could not be understood to refer to the Ministers of France, because that these Words ["certain Ministers having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War, &c."] excluded the Ministers of France; tho' I apprehend, as I have said already, that, from thence, they are more applicable to the Ministers of other Courts than our's. Then they told you, that these Words [certain Ministers] could not refer to the Ministers of Spain, because of the ill Effects which, the Letter mentions, would follow, on endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor, one of which is called a necessary Effect: ["Another necessary Effect (for so I think I may call it) of such a Measure, at present, will be a Conjunction of France and Spain; and a certain Court may have the Mortification to see those two Courts united against them more strongly than ever, by their extraordinary Management, &c."] Gentlemen, how is it possible to apply this to the Court of Great-Britain, or its Ministers, when we were, at the same time, in Amity and Alliance with France; and likewise when there was an Alliance or Treaty entered into between Great-Britain, France, and Spain? Was there any Likelihood for us to see such a Conjunction? Again, the King's Counsel said, that it would be hard for us to tell what Ministers were meant by these Expressions: To this I must answer, that I think it will be very hard, indeed, to make a Publisher liable to be punished, because he cannot explain or make out a Piece of foreign News sent him; especially when the other Side hath got all the Treaties of the publick Affairs in their own Custody: For my Part, I know nothing about them, and I am sure that my Client knows as little; and therefore I don't think that this Piece of News is any Reflection on our present Ministers, especially if you compare it with their Actions and Merits; and consequently you would not, I hope, make a Person guilty of that, when you cannot say, that that Charge is the least applicable to them; and I hope that you, and every Person here, have a better Opinion of our present Ministers; and therefore hope, that you will put such a Construction on it, as that it is not a Reflection on them, and consequently that you will not find the Defendant guilty of publishing any Libel against them, though he cannot explain that Piece of foreign News. The Gentlemen of the other Side say, that there are other Parts or Expressions in the Paper that give a Light to it, such as Germanized Patriots: I don't pretend to understand the Meaning thereof, and I hope you will as little pretend thereto: They said, they who were Enemies to the Ministry were called so; but as they have given no Evidence thereof, you are not to take notice of it. Again, they say, that these Words ["one immediate Effect may be the Seizure of that vast Pledge which Spain hath at this time in her Hands"] serve to explain and refer to the Court of Great-Britain, though they have given no Evidence thereof; nor do I see why this should be applied to Great-Britain only, because there are other Courts or States that have considerable Stocks and Effects, that may be applicable thereto. And then they mentioned another Thing, which they wanted to make the Expression refer to Great-Britain, [which is, "that the Ministers had been undoing what they had been doing for five Years past;"] which they say carries it back to the Treaty of Hanover, entered into in September, 1725: But I think it proper to remark to you, that the Gentlemen themselves have acquainted you, that, about that time, the Dutch were as much dissatisfied as we were; and therefore I think it is hard to conjecture whose Ministers are meant by that Expression. Gentlemen, I shall not trouble you with further Observations on that Paper; but leave it to your own Consideration: Only observe, though the King's Counsel were pleased to say, that the Hague Letter was of an English Growth, yet they have not proved it to be so, nor have they told you who is the Author of it; though I think, from the Import of it, it plainly appears to be of a foreign Growth, and is placed under the Article of foreign News: And we can prove, that (if we had not been deprived of the Means of doing it) the Letter came from abroad as a Piece of foreign News: for you are to consider, that when the Defendant was seized upon that Account, the Persons employed therein broke open his Scrutore, and searched his Pockets, and took away, in a most unwarrantable Manner, his Papers and Letters, and other Things, which they still retain; and, amongst the rest, this Hague Letter, which has deprived him of some Part of his Defence, by disabling him to produce that Letter, though he is expected to produce that original Letter still, which is impossible to be done now; therefore we expect, when you consider these Circumstances, that you will, in point of Evidence, expect less from us, and more from them. I shall not trouble you, at present, any further. My Lord, I apprehend they have failed in the Description of their pretended Libel: They have stiled it a certain false, scandalous, and seditious Libel, (intituled, N^o. 235, The Country Journal; or, the Craftsmen, by Caleb D'Anvers, &c.) I apprehend that this Number 235, being at the End of the Paper, cannot be the Title, or any Part of it; I believe there have been some Precedents to the contrary.

Lord Chief Justice. I don't know how you, or any other Person, can distinguish one Journal from another after a better Manner: I shall not go contrary to my own Conscience, nor overturn the Opinion of those before me: If you think otherwise, you know where to apply to.

Mr. Boodle. My Lord, and Gentlemen, I am also Counsel for the Defendant: And though he is the Person that is now more immediately standing before you, and concerned in this Prosecution; yet I think it is not confined to him only, but will extend to Things of a more publick Nature, and consequently to the Publick in general; I mean the Suppression of the Liberty of the Press, which Liberty hath been always esteemed as a great Privilege, and of great Advantage to this Nation: That this Prosecution is of such Extent, will appear from the Paper itself complained of, and the Evidence relating thereto. The Case hath been fully opened by the Gentlemen on the other Side, with many Aggravations pretended to be attending it; and these Aggravations are not confined to this Paper only, but extend to all the other News-papers in general: And should I have the Liberty to mention the common Opinion of Mankind, with relation to this Weekly Journal, I believe that Assertion of its being a false, scandalous, and seditious Paper, would be thought groundless; but that it hath tended very much to their Satisfaction, in foreign and home Affairs. But we are now confined to this Paper, which is dated the 2d of January, 1730. Gentlemen, this Paper contains a Paragraph of foreign News, or Intelligence; for such are oftentimes of Use to those who deal in foreign Trade: Now, this foreign Intelligence complained of, and for which the Defendant is prosecuted, is not positively asserted as a Truth, but only as a Saying; ["A Rumour hath been for some time spread about privately, &c."] Besides, it is added in the Conclusion thereof, ["I cannot take upon me to justify the Truth of this Report; but, as it hath been pretty confidently buzzed about, I thought proper to let you know what is said upon it; and if it should appear to have any Foundation, you may expect to hear further from me on the Subject."] Gentlemen, the Information contains two Charges, with regard to this Paper: The first is, for spreading false News; and the second is, for publishing a false, scandalous, and seditious Libel against his Majesty's Administration of the Government, and against his principal Officers and Ministers of State, and also against the Treaty of Seville. Gentlemen, as these Things are only asserted and averred in the Information, by Innuendoes, it is incumbent on them to prove them: And, in order to this, they have produced this News-paper, which is published for the Entertainment and Use of the Publick, containing foreign and home News, or Affairs; among which there is a Paragraph which says, (as from the Hague) ["A Rumour hath been for some time privately spread about, and begins to gain Credit here, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville; and that certain Ministers are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor."] This is all that is asserted; for all the rest of the Letter are only as an Induction, or Inference drawn from the Supposition that such a Piece of Intelligence is true; and if so, then it says, that the Conduct of these certain Ministers hath been wrong before, and hath occasioned unnecessary Expences to be laid out, and will occasion further Expences to be laid out; and adds, ["I am far from designing to insinuate from hence, that an Accommodation with the Emperor is a wrong Measure; on the contrary, I wish it had been thought a right Measure long ago."] And in another Part of it he says, ["and though it must be confessed to be very desirable at present; yet it seems to be attended with very fatal Consequences, and almost insuperable Difficulties."] And then he mentions the Consequences; as the Interruption of Trade, and the Conjunction of France and Spain against a certain Court, in general, without naming it; and adds some other Effects or Consequences; but then these Effects or Consequences are all upon this Supposition, that these certain Ministers do bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor; though he adds, at the Conclusion of the Letter (as I said before) ["that I cannot take upon me to justify the Truth of this Report; but as it hath been pretty confidently buzzed about, I thought proper to let you know what is said upon it; and if it should appear to have any Foundation, you may expect to hear further from me on the Subject."] Now, Gentlemen, the Question is, Who is meant by these Words [certain Ministers]? And by the way, though it is said in the Information, that this Piece of foreign News was a high Reflection on his present Majesty, yet I cannot see any Thing therein that hath the least Tendency to such a Reflection; nor is there indeed so much as the Word [Majesty], or [King of Great-Britain], or even the Word [Britain] itself, in any Part of that Letter; nor hath there been the least Evidence offered to you, that it does any ways reflect on his Majesty; so that this does not fall under your Consideration: And this being laid aside, the next Thing to be known is, what Ministers these are that are meant by these Words, ["and that certain Ministers having at length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the Foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People, are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor."]? The Information hath averred, that by these Words [certain Ministers] are implied and meant the principal Officers and Ministers employed and intrusted by his present Majesty; but who are they then? To be sure it will not be said, that the Paper does in the least mention them to be our present Ministers; or that any of you, I hope, hath such Thoughts concerning them, as to believe that they are guilty of that which is charged on them by the Information: Nor do I think that they are meant by other Parts of the Paper; because you have heard already, that these Things may be applied to the Ministers of other Courts and Countries, as well as England or Great-Britain. The Paper hath left the Meaning very much in the Dark, and to a Conjecture only; for it may refer to one Set of Ministers as well as another. I say, Gentlemen, that the pretending to ascertain or determine whose Ministers are meant by these general and indefinite Words, is at the best only a Conjecture. And with Submission to my Lord's Directions and Judgment, I must tell you, that with relation to Scandal or Slander, the Law lays it down as a Rule to be observed, that there are two Things necessary: The first is, that the Person, of whom the Slander is used or spoken, ought to be certain, and ought not to be left to People's Imagination or Conjecture: And the next Thing is, that the Slander shall be evident and plain from the Words themselves, and not supported by any Innuendo; I say they must be plain, positive, and direct. You have been told, that you are to understand this Paper, as every common Reader in a Coffee-house; I beg Leave to say that you are not; for when you are in a Coffee-house, you have the Liberty to conjecture and guess at the Meaning of a Piece of News, as well as any other Person there; and Nobody can be subjected to any Punishment, if you are mistaken therein: But when you are here, in a Court of Judicature, you must consider that you are upon your Oath, and that you are not to take that Liberty to conjecture or guess at the Meaning of Things; because, if you happen to be mistaken in your Conjecture, you will make him guilty of the criminal Charge which he is accused of, and subject him to the Punishment inflicted thereon; and you are like wife to consider, as I hinted before, that, in Scandal, the Law requires that both the Person slandered, and the scandalous Words themselves, ought to be certain, and not want Innuendos to make them out; and that an Innuendo ought neither to alter, enlarge, or supply the Sense of the Words, when doubtful or defective, because it would be unjust: And, indeed, whenever an Innuendo is allowed, in other Cases, to explain a doubtful Matter, it should be rather in Favour of the Person accused than against him, especially where the Words spoken may be applied and referred more Ways than one: So here, in fixing a Meaning on the Words [certain Ministers], which the Information, by an Innuendo, explains to be the principal Officers and Ministers employed by his present Majesty, you are to consider whether these Words may not be applied to the Ministers of other Courts and Countries; and likewise to consider, whether these Words [certain Ministers] (so understood by the Information to be his Majesty's) are to be understood or meant by those Officers or Ministers employed by his Majesty at Sea or Land? Or are they his Ministers at Home or Abroad; or whether they are his Officers civil or military? Now, I say, suppose you should find this Paragraph of foreign News to be a Libel, or a Scandal thrown upon his Majesty's Officers and Ministers (as I hope you will not), can you say or declare on Oath, who are the particular Persons thus slandered or defamed? Have you any certain Rule, by this Paper, to guide your Judgments? Can you say, on your Oath, with any Certainty, whether these Officers or Ministers, so defamed, are those at Home or Abroad, or civil or military? Again, I suppose, for Argument's Sake, that though you should be of Opinion, that this Piece of foreign News is a Libel or Scandal upon his Majesty's Officers or Ministers; yet I submit it to you, whether you can say, on your Oaths, that that Piece of News, contained in this Journal, does amount to a false, scandalous, and seditious Libel, as it is asserted and averred, by an Innuendo, in the Information? And I submit it to you, with all Deference to my Lord's Judgment and Directions, whether it is not incumbent on them to prove, that that Piece of foreign News is false, scandalous, and seditious, before you can find it, by your Verdict, to be so? And, indeed, the chief Thing in this Paper, or Letter, that the Defendant is charged with in the Information, is, ["That a Rumour hath been for some Time privately spread about, that certain Ministers are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor."] I say, this is the chief Thing that is mentioned in the Hague Letter; though, in the Conclusion of it, it is said, ["I cannot take upon me to justify the Truth of this Report."] For all the rest of that Letter (as I said before) are mentioned, or set down, only by way of Conclusion or Inference, that such and such Things will be the Effect or Consequence, if these [certain Ministers] can bring about that Accommodation with the Emperor. Now, let us take it either Way; suppose that, at the Time of the Publication of this Hague Letter, that this Accommodation or Treaty with the Emperor had not been brought about; how can it be said to be false, and so on, when the Letter does not affirm it for a Truth; but only says, that ["a Rumour hath been for some Time privately spread about, that certain Ministers are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor;"] and adds, in the Conclusion of it, ["that he cannot take upon him to justify the Truth of this Report."] And then let us suppose, that they were endeavouring to bring about that Accommodation or Treaty with the Emperor; and that it was actually brought about and concluded about the Time of the Publication of that Letter, which was in the Year 1730; then, to be sure, the Allegation was true, and therefore could not be false and scandalous, or seditious. As to that Accommodation or Treaty with the Emperor's being true, I hope we shall give you full Satisfaction, notwithstanding the great Difficulties that the Defendant at present labours under: We shall give you the best Evidence that the Nature of Things will admit of, and which is always allowed to be sufficient; for there are some Things which are self-evident, and there are some Things that carry in them what every body knows.

Lord Chief-Justice. I don't altogether know what you aim at: I should be glad to know how you would really understand these Expressions. And as for your saying, that you can prove what is charged on the Defendant to be true, it is my Opinion, that it is not material whether the Facts charged in a Libel be true or false, if the Prosecution is by Indictment or Information; and that Writing or Printing may be libellous, though the Scandal is not charged in direct Terms, but only ironically; or although there be only the initial Letters of the Name, or even a fictitious Name, if the Jury plainly perceives it to point at a particular Person; and that not only the Contriver and Procurer, but even the Publisher of a Libel, are punishable; and that even a private Man's Character is not to be scandalized, either directly or indirectly; because there are Remedies appointed by the Law, in case he has injured any Person, without maliciously scandalizing him in his Character: And much less is a Magistrate's, Minister of State, or other public Person's Character to be stained, either directly or indirectly; because the Law hath pointed out another Remedy than publishing Libels, if they have injured any Person, either in a public or private Capacity; and the Law always punishes Libels, even among private Persons, because they flow from Malice, and tend to create Disturbance, Quarrels, and Revenge between them, their Families and Kindred, and disturb the public Peace: And the Law reckons it a greater Offence when the Libel is pointed at Persons in a public Capacity, as it is a Reproach to the Government to have corrupt Magistrates, &c. substituted by his Majesty, and tends to sow Sedition, and disturb the Peace of the Kingdom: Therefore, I shall not here allow of any Evidence to prove that the Matters charged in the Libel are true; for I am only abiding by what have been formerly done, in other Cases of the like Nature. If you think it wrong, apply to the Court, and they will do you Justice.

Mr. Botle. My Lord, then I must submit it to your Lordship, whether this will not tend to the utter Suppression of the Liberty of the Press, which hath been so beneficial to the Nation in general: And, my Lord, I humbly apprehend, tho' a Publisher of News happens to be mistaken in what he publishes, it cannot be called malicious nor seditious, especially when no particular Person is mentioned; but only an Error, committed thro' Ignorance, or Misrepresentation of his Correspondents. Again, my Lord, if the Defendant is not allowed to bring in his Evidence that some Parts of his News are true; then, if he is found guilty, he is found guilty of all that is charged on him in the Information, though he is only guilty of Part thereof. I think this Evidence will be allowed between particular Persons, with relation to their private Affairs; for they will not be found guilty of the Whole, when they are only guilty of a Part; and why should not the same be allowed with respect to public Affairs? As the Star-Chamber is now abolished, I don't know how far that Doctrine may be adhered to. I should be glad to have one Instance or Authority of this, and of there being no need to prove News to be true; and also where a Publisher of News is not allowed to say that this Piece of News is true, because it relates to the public Affairs of the Nation. Is there no Distinction to be made between false News and true News; and cannot we now animadvert, or take notice of public Affairs, and insert them in the Papers, as well as formerly? If this is the Case, it will be of dangerous and fatal Consequence indeed, if Matters of State, or public Affairs, are not to be meddled with, or inserted in the News-papers, notwithstanding they are true, but at the Peril of him that does it? They may as well, at once, take away the Liberty of the Press; and then we shall all live in Darkness and Ignorance, which may occasion Disorders enough in the Nation. Therefore, I submit it to your Lordship, whether this will not be of dangerous Consequence, to punish a Person for publishing true News as well as false; and whether it can be justly said in the Information, that the Defendant intended to publish false News?

Mr. Strange. My Lord, I beg Leave to call a Witness or two. It was insinuated, by the Gentlemen on the other Side, that the Extract of the Hague Letter was of the Growth of our own Country; and put it upon us to prove that it came from the Hague, by producing the Letter itself. My Lord, in order to take off that Imputation, it will be necessary to shew, that they have put it out of our Power to do so; therefore our Evidence will be, in the first Place, to shew, that when the Defendant, Mr. Francklin, was taken into Custody by the Messengers, they broke open the Defendant's Scrutoire: and, I think, they also searched his Pockets, and took away his Papers, and among which were Letters, and this amongst the rest. The next Part of our Evidence shall be to prove, as have been opened, that we have published true News, and not false, as is charged in the Information; and, indeed, the Information ought rather to have been for forestalling true News, and not for publishing false News; for the endeavouring to bring about that Accommodation with the Emperor took Effect: For, my Lord, we will shew, that we applied in a public Manner, that the Defendant might be at Liberty to take Copies of the Treaties of Hanover, Seville, and Vienna, in order to make use of them at his Trial; and when we had taken all proper Methods to have Copies of them, we were told, that the Treaty of Vienna was a secret one, and not yet made public, and consequently not inrolled in any of the public Offices; and that no Copy could be given of it, to produce in Court: When we have proved this, we hope it will be sufficient to shew, that we have not published false News, as charged in the Information; especially as we have done all that can be done, in order to produce a Copy thereof.

Call William Ayers. (Who appears.)

Mr. Strange. Do you know the Defendant, Mr. Francklin?

Mr. Ayers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Was you present when he was taken into Custody, for publishing the Craftsman the 2d of January, 1730?

Mr. Ayers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Will you give an Account of what happened?

Mr. Ayers. The Messengers came to my House, for I was a Constable, and desired my Assistance, to go with them to Mr. Francklin's, which I did; and they searched for Papers in his House and Shop, and they broke open his Scrutoire, and took away what Papers they could find; and Mr. Francklin desired them to leave some of the Papers, because they would be of Service to him, but not to them; but they would not, but took them away.

Mr. Strange. Did he endeavour to save his Papers as much as he could?

Mr. Ayers. He did not; but his Wife endeavoured to do it, by snatching at them, though to no Purpose.

Mr. Strange. Did they search his Pockets?

Mr. Ayers. I did not observe them do that.

Mr. Strange. Did they suffer him to take an Account of these Papers, in order to know what they were?—Mr. Ayers. No.

Mr. Strange. Do you know what they did with these Papers?

Mr. Ayers. No.

Mr. Strange. Did you go along with them?—Mr. Ayers. Yes.

Mr. Strange. Did you know they were Messengers?

Mr. Ayers. Yes; he shewed me his Authority, and told me that he was the King's Messenger.

Mr. Strange. Hath Mr. Francklin had them again?

Mr. Ayers. I believe not.

Mr. Strange. Hath he asked for them?—Mr. Ayers. I know not.

Mr. Strange. Were they sealed up or not?

Mr. Ayers. I cannot remember that.

Mr. Strange. Was Mr. Francklin desired to set his Seal to them?

Mr. Ayers. I cannot be sure; but I believe he was not desired to do so.

Mr. Strange. Where were these Papers found?

Mr. Ayers. I think they were in the one End of the Shop; they were wrapped up in a Bundle.

Mr. Strange. Was the Inside of them printed?—Mr. Ayers. I know not.

Mr. Strange. Call Thomas Rawlins. (Who appears.)

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, I find that they are to call this Witness to prove that they desired Copies of the Treaties; which is to no Purpose, and cannot be allowed.

Lord Chief Justice. I am very well satisfied, that I cannot admit it.

Mr. Strange. My Lord, it is only to shew, that the Hague Letter was not a Piece of false News.

Mr. Attorney General. My Lord, did ever any Man think it necessary to prove every Part of the Libel, when it is not material whether the Matter, or scandalous Words, or News in the Libel, be true or false, or charged in direct Terms or not; or whether the Persons be named, or only pointed at, as have been already hinted; though Mr. Botle has called on me to shew some Authority or Precedent for some of these Things?

Things? I do say, that on the Cases mentioned in the 5th of Coke's Reports, p. 125. and also in Hobart's Reports, p. 215. and 5th of Madox's Reports, p. 167. and 9th of Coke's Reports, p. 59. The first says, That every Libel is made either against a private Man, or against a Magistrate or publick Person: If it be made against a private Person, it deserves a severe Punishment; and if it be made against a Magistrate, or other publick Person, that is still a greater Offence, and deserves a greater Punishment; because this concerns not only the Breach of the Peace, but is a Scandal to the Government. The other Reports take Notice of the other Points which I have mentioned: And I must say, that it would be the most absurd Thing in the World to imagine, that the Law had taken a better Care of the Character of a private Person, than of a Magistrate, or publick Person, employed and intrusted by his Majesty in the Affairs of State. Therefore, I submit it to your Lordship, whether such an Evidence, to prove that the News published is true, ought to be admitted.

Lord Chief Justice. I have given Mr. Boyle my Opinion already about it; and if it is not according to their Liking, they know where to apply to have it rectified.

Mr. Boyle. My Lord, in effect, it hath been called an Absurdity to think, that speaking the Truth of any Magistrate, or other publick Person, in the News, can go unpunished; because if that Magistrate or publick Person have done any Injury, then it was said; that there is a Remedy provided another Way than by publicly exposing him, and defaming his Character; as well as there is a Remedy provided for having Satisfaction of a private Person, for any Injury done by him, without scandalizing him, directly or indirectly, in any publick Paper. But I should be glad to know how it must be gone about: For Example, here is a principal Minister of State, that hath injured a Person that is a Publisher of a Paper; where can he have Redress, supposing the Parliament not sitting?

Lord Chief Justice. I am of the same Opinion as before.

Mr. Solicitor General. I thought, that really such a Thing as that would not have been taken Notice of; because it is plain to every Person, that we have a Remedy against a Minister of State, as well as against any other Man, without defaming him publicly; and likewise any Author, Printer, or Publisher, or other Person, may apply to a proper Place for a Remedy against him, if they think that any Court, or Jury, have not done them Justice.

Mr. Noel. My Lord, I beg Leave to say a few Words on the Defendant's Behalf. It is well known, that the Design of this Paper of the Craftsman, which is published weekly, is to entertain and benefit the Publick, and I believe it has answered these Ends: And I hope the Jury will consider the Intention thereof, with the Circumstances and Inconveniences that the Printer or Publisher of News-papers lie under; and I hope you will consider the Defendant only as a Collector of News from all Parts of the Country, and likewise from foreign Parts, for the Advantage of those People here that trade to and from those Parts; and that it is possible for the Defendant's Correspondents, after all the Care they have taken, sometimes to be a little mistaken in their Intelligence, or not so correct in wording them as they ought or might be, without any Intention or malicious Design of Injury to any Person; and therefore, if such Things were to be always punctually and precisely scanned, and the Printers and Publishers thereof prosecuted, and subjected to Punishment, it will be of very dangerous Consequence; because we should not have any Intelligence or News-papers at all, and consequently be ignorant of what happens daily at home or abroad, and thereby occasion an Interruption in Trade, so beneficial to this Nation. Besides, it is hoped that you will consider, that this Piece of News, in the Hague Letter, is not laid down as a Truth to be depended upon, but only as a Rumour that had been spread about in that Place: And the Writer of the Letter adds, in the Conclusion thereof, that he does not take upon him to justify this Report; and that if it should appear to have any Foundation, he should hear further from him. Again you will consider, as have been already mentioned to you, that the Parts of the same are applicable to other Courts, and that it cannot be applicable to Great-Britain, or its Ministers, without Innuendos, which are not to be used in Prosecutions for Slander or scandalous Words. Also consider, that they could not draw an Innuendo in the Information to include his present Majesty; nor have his Counsel pretended to shew any Evidence, that the Hague Letter had any Tendency to reflect that Way; and, indeed, the Innuendo to include his Ministers is very far fetched, and very much forced. Besides, the Writer of that Letter does seem to approve of these certain Ministers Measures of endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor, by sayings, ["That it must be confessed, that these Measures are very desirable at present."] So that, upon the whole, I cannot see that the Letter is applicable to our Ministers, or that it contains a Libel upon them, or that it in any ways answers their Character; and I hope, Gentlemen, that you will be of the same Opinion in your Verdict.

Mr. Taylor. My Lord, I hope your Lordship will likewise indulge me with a very few Words on the Behalf of the Defendant: As the Government is concerned in this Cause, so the Liberty of the Subject is also greatly concerned therein. The Facts which you, Gentlemen, are to try, are, whether the Defendant, Mr. Francklin, printed and published this Paper; and whether you can, upon your Oath, say, that it is a false, scandalous, and seditious Libel; and, for that End, it will be necessary that you take the Paper into your serious Consideration, not as it is inserted in the Information, with a great Number of Innuendos, but as it was originally; and see if it contains any scandalous Reflections on our present Ministers particularly. Gentlemen, it is not sufficient to say, that the Information is a Libel; but you are to judge of its being one by the Words themselves, and as they stand in the Paper abstracted from the Innuendos; and I do say, that it will be impossible to find it a Libel on our present Ministers, if you judge of it so; for there are no such Words therein as the Ministers of Great-Britain; I believe there are no less than thirty-seven Innuendos in this Information, and you cannot find it a Libel when stuffed with these Innuendos. Gentlemen, in the former Part of it, you will be pleased to observe, that they say, that the Defendant is a constant Publisher of these Libels; and yet they have not proved that so much as one of them was ever told by the Defendant himself. And, Gentlemen, with respect to the Innuendos, it is to be observed, that there was a famous Cause in in King Charles the Second's Time. In the 14th May, 1669, there was a Writ of Error, and the Judgment or Sentence reversed; and their Lordships declared, that Innuendos ought not to be allowed. Nor are you to understand it here, on Oath, as you may do in a Coffee-house by Conjectures; therefore I hope, upon Consideration of these Things, that you will not find this Piece of News a Libel.

Mr. Attorney General. My Lord, I beg Leave to make a short Reply not for what they have said, nor for our want of Proof; but I think some Things very strange which they have insisted on. One of them is, that there is not sufficient Proof of the Publication of this Paper. As to that, I beg Leave to say, that I never saw the Publication of a Paper more clearly proved; and I believe they never saw it themselves in any Instance whatsoever; for your Lordship may remember, that Mr. Smith, the first Witness, swears, that he applied to the Defendant, Mr. Francklin himself, when he was in his Shop, and asked for six Journals of that Day, the 9th of January, 1730, and two of the Saturday before; and that the Defendant ordered his Servant, then in the Shop, to deliver them to Mr. Smith, which he did; and the Servant received the Money for them; and therefore his ordering his Servant to deliver them, is the same as if he had delivered them himself; there cannot be a clearer Proof. They make a Scruple, because he did not ask particularly by Name for such a Journal, though I think he asked to the same Effect, by asking for six of his Journals of that Day; for the Word [his] may take in the Words [Country Journal, or Craftsman] because that is the Journal which he prints and sells; besides, have they done any thing on their Part to prove that other Persons sold other Journals of that Name or otherwise? or have they offered any thing to contradict or weaken his Evidence? Therefore I think that our Witness is the strongest for the King that can be. It was said that great Inconveniences and Dangers might happen to Publishers, if News were so scanned or sifted. As to that, I think every Publisher ought to be careful of what he publishes; for it is no Part of the Printer or Publisher's Trade to scandalize whom they please, for that would be turning Printing and Book-selling into libelling; nor is the Liberty of the Press, which they so much cry up, and say is in Danger of being utterly suppressed, to be turned into a licentious and disorderly Abuse of the Press. Again, it hath appeared before your Lordship, with respect to the Proof of the Defendant's being the Publisher, that there is not only this Witness's Evidence thereof, (against the Credit of which no Evidence hath been offered) but there are other Witnesses who confirm his Evidence, such as Mrs. Dod and her Servants, and Mrs. Pierce and her's, who had great Numbers at his Shop weekly, and paid for them; and that Mrs. Pierce used to have about 7 l. worth weekly; it is likewise confirmed by the Collectors and Servants at the Stamp-Office. After all this, can it be doubted that the Defendant is guilty of the Publication of this Paper, especially when the Defendant's Counsel have not contradicted them, or offered any thing to invalidate or weaken their Evidence? I take the Publication to be undeniably proved; and it would be but mispending of Time to say any more on that Head. The next Thing is, whether we have sufficiently proved that the pretended Hague Letter inserted in that Paper, is a Libel as charged in the Information; as to that, I may say that there hath not been so much as one single Objection offered against the Construction we put upon it, I mean of its being all applicable to his present Majesty, and his principal Officers and Ministers of State; I mean not one of any Weight, or which has the least Colour of being applicable to any other Court, Country, or Person whatsoever. The Words are [certain Ministers.] These are the Persons that the pretended Hague Letter charges with Perfidy, ruining their Country, &c. and want to have a Meaning put upon them; that is to say, to what Court or Country are they applicable. Now, consider what is said of these certain Ministers: The Letter says, ["A Rumour hath been for some time spread abroad, that a Misunderstanding will soon discover itself between the Allies of Seville; and that certain Ministers having at Length found out, that too close an Union with France, and a War upon the Foot of the Treaty of Seville, is quite against the Grain of the People, are endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with the Emperor."] Now, Gentlemen, you know that the Allies of Seville are the King of Great-Britain and the French King, and the King of Spain. And then consider, that these certain Ministers are charged with Perfidy in breaking that Treaty, who, to be sure, must be one of these three Courts, Great-Britain, France, or Spain, who were empowered to make it; for no other could be guilty of breaking it, but one of these three who made it: Now the Letter-writer tells us plainly, that it is neither the Ministers of France, nor the Ministers of Spain, that he thus charged with Perfidy in breaking that Treaty; for he tells us, that one necessary Effect of such Perfidy will be the Conjunction of France and Spain; and that a certain Court would have the Mortification to see these two Crowns united against them more strongly than ever: This, as I said before, amounts to a Demonstration, that neither the Ministers of France nor Spain are charged with that Perfidy, in breaking that Treaty: If so, then there is but the Ministers of one Party left, to wit, of Great-Britain; and I must say, that it is as plain as if the Ministers of Great Britain had been in express Words. Gentlemen, this is no forced nor strained Innuendo; but an Innuendo that naturally and necessarily flows of itself, and which you all cannot but presently draw. Gentlemen, there are other Parts of the Letter, which serve to support and confirm this Construction, which I mentioned in the Opening; such as these, to wit, that another Effect of that Perfidy would be the Seizure of that vast Pledge, which Spain hath at this Time in her Hands; and that these Ministers were undoing every Thing they had been doing for five Years past; which carries it back to September, 1725, when the Treaty of Hanover was concluded. It was said, that you must not understand it as you would do in a Coffee-house, because of its dangerous Consequences. To which I answer, That there is no more Danger in understanding Things here than there, if they are plain (as this is), and do but exercise their Sense and Reason in both Places. Gentlemen, if you acquit the Defendant, you must say on your Oath, that the Letter-writer did not mean the Ministers of Great-Britain; and can you say that he did not, and that it is not applicable to them? I told you in the Opening, to this or the like Effect: That Writing or Printing may be a Libel, though the Persons are not particularly named therein; and that it is no hard Matter to scandalize any Person

* This of Mirecourt was so termed in On Feb. or printing present To suppress said Journal where it published by Mr. and Eyre Defendant nor could the Jury Robert as he was which the being exact as there which The Defendant Joseph May 19 ment as John Crofts to Robert Bridewell Joseph C his Head. by Circumlocution, fictitious Names, &c. as plainly to be understood as if their Names were particularly mentioned; and that the Law construes them accordingly, by Innuendos, because they cannot be otherwise construed; and this hath been the Practice of the Law for some Hundreds of Years; and therefore the Defendant's Counsel telling you that it is doing People Harm to bring Things in by Innuendos, is only amusing you with Words; for it is a plain and a just Law, and the Law would be defective, if it were otherwise, and People would be always defaming one another by the like Methods. I told you of the Case of Mr. Mist's Journal, in 1728: it was a scandalous Libel, under the fictitious Names of Esseff and Sepbi; which the Jury understood plainly to be so, and brought in their Verdict accordingly against the Printer and Publisher thereof*. I shall mention another Case, of Mr. Matthews the Printer, for High-Treason: This was a very notorious and publick Case, relating to a certain Person called the Chevalier de St. George: There are a thousand Chevaliers in the World, and yet the Meaning was plainly understood to be the Pretender; no less a Crime than High-Treason. There were eleven Judges, I think, that sat on the Bench, and the present Lord Chancellor (King) presided; and they understood the Queries published as every common Reader would; and the Jury, being convinced in their own Conscience, understood it in the same Manner; I mean, no less a Crime than High-Treason, and he was executed for the same. And, indeed, any Man may write Treason at his Pleasure, after that Manner, if there was not this Way of construing it. Again, it is said, that this cannot be a Libel, though the Words were understood to be applicable to the Persons mentioned in the Information; because what is affirmed in the Letter, about the Accommodation or Treaty with the Emperor, can be proved to be true: As to that, I must say, that it is no matter whether the Words be true or false, if it is published as a Libel, and the Prosecution be by Indictment or Information. Then it hath been said, that the Defendant is a Publisher of News, and that this Letter was sent to him from the Hague, and that he inserted it as such in his Journal: As to that, I do say, that if this Letter had been really sent to him from the Hague, it would be still a Libel; because it is not in his Power to publish what he pleases, or what may be construed defamatory, let it come from what Quarter it will, whether from abroad or at home; for, as I said before, it is no Part of his Trade to scandalize whom he pleases. But they have not even proved, that that Letter was sent to him from the Hague: All that they have done it, that they have called a Constable, who says, that the Messengers searched for Papers, and took away some; but does not say that they were written Papers, or that this Hague Letter was among them; no, the Papers he means were only some criminal Craftsman. Besides, if any other Thing had been seized, such as that pretended Hague Letter, upon Application made to his Majesty, or the Secretaries, he might have had them returned; but the Gentlemen do not pretend that they made any such Application. Then they say, if this Piece of News is deemed as a Libel, it will have a bad Consequence; for no Person will print any News at all, and then the People will not know how Things or Affairs go: This is very extraordinary, indeed; for the Defendant is not charged in the Information for publishing the Piece of pretended News, to wit, "That a Rumour hath for some Time privately been spread about, &c." No; but he is charged for making an Application, and saying, that the Ministers are guilty of Perfidy, and ruining their Country, &c. Next, Gentlemen, I would have you to observe, that it is no Part of your Office to consider or determine, whether this Hague Letter is a Libel or not (though the Defendant's Counsel insinuated that it was a Part thereof): You are only to consider, whether the Expressions therein are meant to refer to the present King and his Ministers, and are properly applicable to them. But whether this amounts to a Libel or Crime, is only the Office of the Court to determine: For, suppose a Man was accused of Felony, the Court will determine whether it amounts to it, or not. It is so in High-Treason, and all Misdemeanours, in which the Jury is to determine the Facts, and the Judges are to determine the Crime and Punishment, as being Matters of Law: And it is confounding the Office of the Court, and of the Jury, to pretend to do otherwise; and it is likewise a perverting of the Law: This I say, with great Submission to your Lordship. Then it was said, that there was nothing in that Hague Letter, that did relate to or imply any Reflection upon his present Majesty: But, Gentlemen, that you may not be led into any Error by such an Assertion, and Distinction between the King and his Ministers, I would have you to consider, that here is a Charge on the King's Ministers for Mal-administration, and for carrying on a Treaty, which occasions Perfidy, &c. Now, I would ask you, can Treaties be carried on without his Majesty's Direction? And therefore I say, that such a Charge as that is a Libel on the King himself, as well as on his Ministers, who are impowered and directed by him. The same may be said with respect to Magistrates and Judges; for they are originally of his Appointment, and the Courts are the King's, and he makes them, and is at the Head of them, and without him they cannot subsist: So that I say, that a Reflection on the King's Ministers, Officers, Magistrates, &c. is a high Reflection on the King himself. There have been several other Things mentioned, which I shall not touch at, because I think they are not material. There was another thing mentioned, which was, that if this Hague Letter was construed a Libel, it would tend to the utter Destruction of the Liberty of the Press. My Lord, I am really at a Loss to know what Sort of Liberty they mean by it; I hope they don't mean a licentious and an unbounded Liberty, to libel and scandalize his Majesty, or his principal Officers and Ministers of State, or his Magistrates, or even any of the meanest of his Subjects, whenever they think fit; for that would be a dangerous Liberty indeed, and be of a very pernicious Consequence. Gentlemen, I would have you to consider, that even the Prerogatives of the King are founded on the Law and limited by it, and so are all other Things relating to his Subjects; and it cannot be supposed, that a Printer only is exempted, and at Liberty to use his Press for what Purposes he pleases; if he is, I desire now, that the Defendant's Counsel would point out that Law: No, the Law is not so absurd as to allow such a Liberty of the Press. The Liberty meant, is to be understood of a legal one: He may lawfully print and publish what belongs to his own Trade; but he is not to publish any Thing reflecting on the Character, and Reputation, and Administration of his Majesty, or his Ministers; nor yet to stain the Character or Reputation of any of his Subjects; for, as I said before, that to scandalize and libel People is no Part of his Trade, so I say, that it is only that Liberty of the Press, which he is to use, that is regulated by Law and subjected to it; and if he breaks that Law, or exceeds that Liberty of the Press, he is to be punished for it, as well as for breaking other Laws or Liberties. And, Gentlemen, though it has been insinuated to you, by the other Side, that the making of such Things a Libel came from the Star-Chamber; yet I must tell you, that printing such defamatory Expressions, or slanderous News, was deemed a Libel, and punished accordingly, long before the Star-Chamber. It is a Law made in 1275, in the third of King Edward I. intitled, An Act that none shall report slanderous News, whereby Discord may arise. The Words of that Law are, "[Forasmuch as there have been oftentimes found, in the Country, Devisors of Tales, whereby Discord, or Occasion of Discord, hath many Times arisen between the King and his People, or great Men of this Realm; for the Damage that hath and may thereof ensue, it is commanded, that from henceforth none be so hardy to tell or publish any false News or Tales, whereby Discord, or Occasion of Discord, or Slander, may grow between the King and his People, or the great Men of the Realm; and he that do so, shall be taken and kept in Prison," &c.] So, Gentlemen, you see that this of Libels is not a new Law, or one that came from the Star-Chamber; but one that has been almost of 500 Years standing; therefore I hope you will not suffer yourselves to be amused by such Things. That Court of the Star-Chamber punished without Juries; but though Juries were taken away, yet the Law remained the same as to Libels and Crimes: So I hope it appears to you to be very plain, that the Liberty of the Press is limited and governed by Law; and that the Law sets Limits both to the King and his Subjects. Lastly, I think it was said to this Effect, that it would be making Mr. Francklin a great Politician in the World, to suppose that he knew any Thing of the Meaning of that pretended Hague Letter which he printed and published: As to that, I think I may venture to say, that he could not nor cannot be ignorant of the Meaning thereof, because it is plain to any common Reader, that by the Words [certain Ministers], are and must be meant the Ministers of Great-Britain: And I believe that the Treaties of Hanover and Seville have been heard of, and known by you all; and that you likewise have heard, and know, that there have been Differences between Great-Britain and Spain. So, Gentlemen, I submit it to you, whether you are not convinced in your Consciences, that Mr. Francklin, the Defendant, is the Publisher of that Craftsman, the 2d of January last, wherein the pretended Hague Letter is inserted; and secondly, Whether you are not likewise convinced, that these Expressions in that Letter, to wit, [certain Court], and [certain Ministers], and what is spoken against them, are to be understood of the Court and Ministers of Great Britain? These are the two Things now under your Consideration; for as to the Question, Whether these Words amount to a Libel or not, you have nothing to do with that, it being the Office of the Court to determine whether they do, or do not. So we doubt not but you will give

* This Letter, dated August 24, 1728, signed Amos Dodge, was supposed to be written by the late Philip Duke of Wharton; wherein were contained, under the Characters of Mirreveis, Esseff, and Sepbi, many scandalous Reflections, and odious Comparisons between his late Majesty King George II. of glorious Memory, and the Pretender. It was so virulent a Letter, that it was presented by the Grand Juries of Middlesex, Westminster, and the City of Bristol; and the Printers, Publishers, Press-men, &c. concerned in printing it were all taken into Custody by Messengers.

On Feb. 25, 1729, at the Sittings of the Court of King's Bench at Guildhall, John Clarke, the Pressman, was tried upon an Information filed against him by the Attorney-General, for printing and publishing a Libel, intitled, Mist's Weekly Journal, No. 175, dated August 24, 1728, "containing false, scandalous, and seditious Reflections on his late and present Majesty, by drawing odious Parallels, and thereby maliciously and falsely insinuating our Government to be tyrannical, and our Ministry corrupt and abominable." To support the Charge, there were called James Ford and Thomas Randal, two Boys concerned in the Printing-Office, who proved that the said Clarke worked upon the said Journal, and assisted in printing 9000 at Mr. Wolfe's in Carter-Lane; that from thence (for fear of Messengers) the Forms were carried to Mr. Burton's, a Printer, where the said Clarke assisted in working off 1750 more; and that the said Clarke ordered, that Nobody should see or have any of them, till all were printed off, and published together. It appeared also, that Clarke owned, in his Examination before Mr. Delafay, that he assisted in working off the said Journal. His publishing it was proved by Mr. Makrall, who bought half a Quire, which was delivered out to him by Clarke himself. The Counsel for the Defendant alledged, that the Characters of Mirreveis and Esseff did not in the least correspond with his late or present Majesty: Upon which the Court said, the Crime was the greater in making the Parallel. The Defendant's Counsel further alledged, that Clarke being a poor ignorant Workman, he could not be supposed to understand the Comparisons, or to know the Characters; nor could he have any malicious Intention against the Government: To which the Court answered, it was the Facts of Printing and Publishing only that lay in Issue; which the Jury considering, they brought him in Guilty of both.

Robert Knell was also tried upon an Information filed against him, for printing and publishing the same Libel. It was proved, that he assisted in composing it; and said, as he was about it, Mr. Wolfe and I, and the rest of us, will all be taken up for this Journal. The Defendant's Counsel insisted, that composing was not printing; to which the Attorney-General answered, that though, abstractly considered, it was not the very Act, yet it was an Act preparatory to it; and Mr. Roberts, a Printer, being examined, declared, it was not only Part, but the principal Part of printing; upon which the Objection was over-ruled. Another Point was also objected to; that as there were two Compositors, each having a separate Form allotted to compose, one of them could not be charged with the whole Libel, as laid in the Information: To which the Court answered, that when a Crime is perpetrated by more than one, and by joint Consent, any one of them, being guilty of Part, is guilty of the Whole. The Defendant was therefore found Guilty of printing the said Libel; but not of publishing it.

Joseph Carter (Wolfe's Apprentice) was also tried on the said Information; and the Evidence against him being the same as before, he was found guilty of printing only.

May 19 following, being the last Day of the Term, the following Persons, for being concerned in printing and publishing Mist's Journal of August 24, received Judgment as follows:

John Clarke, the Pressman, for printing and publishing the said Libel, to stand thrice in the Pillory; once at the Royal Exchange, once at Temple-Bar, and once at Charing-Cross; to be committed to Bridewell for six Months, and there kept to hard Labour.

Robert Knell, the Compositor, for printing the said Libel, to stand twice in the Pillory, once at the Royal Exchange, and once at Charing-Cross; and to be committed to Bridewell for six Months, and there to be kept to hard Labour.

Joseph Carter, the Apprentice, for printing the said Libel, to go round the four Courts in Westminster-Hall, on the first Day of next Term, with a Paper fixed upon his Head, denoting his Offence; to be sent to Bridewell for one Month, and kept to hard Labour." Monthly Chronicle for 1728, 1729.

your Verdict according to your Conscience; and do Justice between the King and the Defendant, which is all that is required of you. My Lord, the Importance of the Cause hath occasioned me to take up much of your Time, which I hope your Lordship will excuse.

Lord Chief Justice. Gentlemen of the Jury, This is an Information, wherein the King is Plaintiff, and Mr. Francklin Defendant, for printing and publishing the Country Journal or Craftsman, the 2d of January 1730, wherein is inserted an Extract of a private Letter from the Hague, reflecting on his Majesty and his principal Officers and Ministers of State. In this Information or Libel, there are three Things to be considered, whereof two by you the Jury, and one by the Court. The first Thing under your Consideration is, whether the Defendant, Mr. Francklin, is guilty of the Publication of this Craftsman or not? The second is, Whether the Expressions in that Letter refer to his present Majesty and his principal Officers and Ministers of State, and are applicable to them or not? This is the chief Thing in the Information; for if you think that these defamatory Expressions are not applicable to them, then the Defendant is not guilty of what is charged upon him; but if you think that they are applicable to them, then the Defendant is guilty thereof; upon this Supposition, that you find him to be the Publisher of that Paper. These are the two Matters of Fact that come under your Consideration; and of which you are proper Judges. But then there is a third Thing, to wit, Whether these defamatory Expressions amount to a Libel or not? This does not belong to the Office of the Jury, but to the Office of the Court; because it is a Matter of Law, and not of Fact; and of which the Court are the only proper Judges; and there is Redress to be had at another Place, if either of the Parties are not satisfied; for we are not to invade one another's Province, as is now of late a Notion among some People who ought to know better; for Matters of Law and Matters of Fact are never to be confounded. As to the first Thing, whether the Defendant is guilty of the Publication of that Craftsman which is under your Consideration. And here in this and the second Head I shall not be long, because Things have been so often repeated, and all Sorts of Observations made on both Sides that is possible to be made on this Occasion; and my Endeavours shall be to hinder you from running away with Notions which are not right. As to the Evidence offered to prove the Defendant the Publisher of that Craftsman, the Plaintiff's Counsel called one Mr. Smith, against whom the Defendant's Counsel could not say any Thing material. This Mr. Smith gives an Account, that on the 9th of January last, he went to Mr. Francklin's Shop to buy some Craftsman or Journals; he said he wanted half a Dozen of that Day, and two of the Week before; he says, when he came he found Mr. Francklin in his Shop, and asked him for half a Dozen of his Journals of that Day, and two of the Saturday before; and that Mr. Francklin asked him whom they were for; who answered that they were for himself; and that Mr. Francklin asked him if he sold them again; who answered, Yes; and that afterwards Mr. Francklin pointed to his Servant, and told him to look out these Journals for him; which he accordingly did; and that he sold one of the Journals of the 2d of January again to another Person; but before he sold it he marked it; and that Mr. Smith paid his Servant for these 8 Journals. I think he said, that the two Journals were those of the second of January. This Evidence is very positive and full; for he bought them in the Defendant's Shop; and the Defendant's Servant delivered them to him by his Master's Direction, and paid the Servant for them; which is an undeniable Proof of the Defendant's being the Publisher thereof; and unless Mr. Smith is wilfully forsworn, his Evidence alone is sufficient. Then the King's Counsel went on, and called other Witnesses to prove the Defendant the Publisher, though I thought there was no Occasion for more; but they produced other Witnesses (I shall not be long, or name every one). They produced Mrs. Dodd, who says, that she used to send her Servant, Goram, to Mr. Francklin's weekly for his Craftsman, or Country Journal; and he brought them from thence; and these of the 2d of January among the rest; and gave the Money to another Servant, in order to pay Mr. Francklin for them. Goram tells you, that he went about a Year and a half together, weekly, to Mr. Francklin's, for these Craftsman or Country Journals, and brought them into his Mistress's Shop; and that he brought some of the 2d of January, and brought no Country Journals of that Day from any other Place; and that he had great Quantities of these Country Journals weekly. Mrs. Pierce says, that she sent her Man, David Davies, to Mr. Francklin's weekly, for some Time, for his Country Journals, and for that of the 2d of January among the rest; and had such a Quantity of them as came to about £7. weekly. David Davies says, that he was employed by Mrs. Pierce to fetch her Journals, the Craftsman, from Mr. Francklin's; and that of the 2d of January among the rest; and paid the Money for them to the Amount of about £7. weekly. Then they called an Officer of the Stamp-Office, who says, that he registered thirty-eight Advertisements that were in the Craftsman of the 2d of January last; and that the Account of the Advertisements for that Month of January came to 10 £ 18 s. So, Gentlemen, you are to consider whether or not you are satisfied with the Evidence produced to prove the Defendant to be the Publisher of that Craftsman of the 2d of January last. The next Thing which you are to consider is, whether the Expressions in that Hague Letter, refer to his present Majesty and his principal Officers and Ministers of State; and are applicable to them as in the Information or not; for when People's Names are not set down at length, but pointed at by Circumlocution, or Pieces of Words, or by initial Letters, &c. the Law always allows Innuendos in Informations, which explain and tell what the Defendant meant by them; and the Law likewise allows Juries to give their Verdict on Oath, whether they think that these dark, defamatory Speeches have the same Meaning as mentioned in the Information or not. The Counsel for the King have gone on and explained and applied these defamatory Expressions exactly as in the Information; and they have given their Arguments and Reasons for so doing; drawn from the several Parts of that Letter, which I shall not trouble you with, because they have been so often repeated in your hearing; I say, they have explained them as mentioned in the Information; that is to say, that by these defamatory Expressions, are meant his present Majesty and his principal Officers and Ministers of State; and indeed they must be applicable, and refer to them or to somebody else; and if they do mean them, then I must say that they are very scandalous and reflecting Expressions; because they charge them with Perfidy in breaking of Treaties, ruining in a manner their Country, &c. as you may see at large in the Letter; and it is very evident that these Treaties could not be made without the Knowledge and Direction of his Majesty. The Counsel for the Defendant said, that these scandalous Expressions could not be understood to refer to his Majesty or his Ministers; but they did not tell to whom they referred; I should have been glad to have heard them do so; so that you are to consider of whom these defamatory Expressions are meant, or to whom they are applicable; and as to the Rule and Manner of understanding them, you are to do it, on Oath, after the same Manner and Way as you do privately by yourselves, taking all the Parts of the Letter together. I shall not repeat the several Parts of it now which the King's Counsel did use, to shew that they were meant of his Majesty and his Ministers, because you are to have the Letter along with you; for it is plain, that the Construction of it depends on the Words themselves and their Connection. Gentlemen, I have been very short in summing up the Evidence; and laid aside the Points of the Law; I mean, whether these defamatory Expressions amount to a Libel or not; because the Court can only determine that: And if not satisfactory to either of the Parties, there is a proper Redress to be had at another Place, as I said before. There was one Thing more mentioned by the Defendant's Counsel, which was, that there is no Room to think that Letter libellous; because there could be no Malice supposed by inserting it in the Craftsman, being only designed as a Piece of foreign News; and that the latter Part of the Letter qualifies it, by saying that the Letter-Writer does not take upon him to justify the Truth of that Report; but that will not do; for the Injury is the same to the Persons scandalized, whether the Letter was inserted out of Malice or not; besides, there is no knowing or proving particular Malice, otherwise than from the Act itself; and therefore if the Act imports as much, it is sufficient; nor is he to take the Liberty to print what he pleases; for the Liberty of the Press is only a legal Liberty, such as the Law allows; and not a licentious Liberty. Gentlemen, I tell you again, that I have designedly shortened Things, because it hath been so fully again and again laid before you. But if there is any Thing afterwards that you want to know, after you have considered these Things, I desire you would acquaint me. So, Gentlemen, if you are sensible, and convinced that the Defendant published that Craftsman of the 2d of January last; and that the defamatory Expressions in the Letter * refer to the Ministers of Great Britain; then you ought to find the Defendant guilty; but if you think otherwise, then you ought not to find him guilty.

The Jury found the Defendant guilty of publishing the said Libel.

The Term following, Mr. Richard Francklin received Sentence to pay a Fine of One Hundred Pounds, to be imprisoned for one Year, and to find Security for his good Behaviour for seven Years; himself in One Thousand Pounds Penalty, and his two Sureties in Five Hundred Pounds each.

* This Hague Letter was said to be written by the late Henry Lord Viscount Bolingbroke. Ex Infor. Mr. R. Francklin.

XXII. The Trial of Mr. JOHN PETER ZENGER, of New-York, Printer, for printing and publishing a Libel against the Government; before the Honourable James de Lancey, Esq; Chief Justice of the Province of New-York; and the Honourable Frederick Phillipse, Esq; second Judge; at New-York, on August 4th, 1735 †.

AS there was but one Printer in the Province of New-York, that printed a public News-Paper, I was in hopes, if I undertook to publish another, I might make it worth my while; and I soon found my Hopes were not groundless. My first Paper was printed, Nov. 5th, 1733, and I continued printing and publishing of them, I thought to the Satisfaction of every Body, 'till the January following; when the Chief Justice was pleased to animadvert upon the Doctrine of Libels, in a long Charge given in that Term to the Grand Jury, and afterwards on the third Tuesday of October, 1734, was again pleased to charge the Grand Jury in the following Words:

Gentlemen, I shall conclude with reading a Paragraph or two out of the same Book, concerning Libels; they are arrived to that Height that they call loudly for your Animadversion; it is high Time to put a Stop to them; for at the rate Things are now carried on, when all Order and Government is endeavoured to be trampled on, Reflections are cast upon Persons of all Degrees. Must not these Things end in Sedition, if not timely prevented? Lenity, you have seen, will not avail; it becomes you then to enquire after the Offenders, that we may, in due Course of Law, be enabled to punish them. If you, Gentlemen, do not interpose, consider whether the ill Consequences that may from any Disturbances of the publick Peace, may not in part lie at your Door!"

Hawkins, in his Chapter of Libels, considers three Points: 1st. What shall be said to be a Libel. 2^{dly}. Who are liable to be punished for it. 3^{dly}. In what Manner they are to be punished. Under the 1st, he says, §. 7. "Nor can there be any Doubt, but that a Writing, which defames a private Person only, is as much a Libel as that which defames Persons intrusted in a publick Capacity, in as much as it manifestly tends to create ill Blood, and to cause a Disturbance of the publick Peace; however it is certain, that it is a very high Aggravation of a Libel, that it tends to scandalize the Government, by reflecting on those who are entrusted with the Administration of publick Affairs, which does not only endanger the publick Peace, as all other Libels do, by stirring up the Parties immediately concerned in it, to Acts of Revenge, but also has a direct Tendency to breed in the People a Dislike of their Governors, and incline them to Faction and Sedition." As to the 2^d Point he says, §. 10. "It is certain, not only he who composes or procures another to compose it, but also that he who publishes, or procures another to publish it, are in Danger of being punished for it; and it is said not to be material, whether he who disperses a Libel, knew any Thing of the Contents or Effects of it or not; for nothing could be more easy than to publish the most virulent Papers with the greatest Security, if the concealing the Purport of them from an illiterate Publisher would make him safe in the Dispersing them. Also, it has been said, that if he who hath either read a Libel himself, or hath heard it read by another, do afterwards maliciously read or report any Part of it in the Presence of others, or lend or shew it to another, he is guilty of an unlawful Publication of it. Also, it hath been holden, that the copying of a Libel shall be a conclusive Evidence of the Publication of it, unless the Party can prove, that he delivered it to a Magistrate to examine it, in which Case the Act subsequent is said to explain the Intention precedent. But it seems to be the better Opinion, that he who first writes a Libel, dictated by another, is thereby guilty of making of it, and consequently punishable for the bare Writing; for it was no Libel till it was reduced to Writing."

These, Gentlemen, are some of the Offences which are to make Part of your Enquiries; and if any other should arise in the Course of your Proceedings, in which you are at a Loss, or conceive any Doubts, upon your Application here, We will assist and direct you.

The Grand Jury not indicting me as was expected, the Gentlemen of the Council proceeded to take my Journals into Consideration, and sent the following Message to the General Assembly.

Die Jovis, 3^{ho}. P. M. 17th of October, 1734.

A Message from the Council by Philip Cortlandt, in these Words, to wit,

That Board having had several of Zenger's New-York Weekly Journals laid before them, and other scurrilous Papers, tending to alienate the Affections of the People of this Province from his Majesty's Government, to raise Seditions and Tumults among the People of this Province, and to fill their Minds with a Contempt of his Majesty's Government: And considering the pernicious Consequences that may attend such growing Evils, if not speedily and effectually put a Stop to: And conceiving that the most likely Method to put a Stop to such bold and seditious Practices, to maintain the Dignity of his Majesty's Government, and to preserve the Peace thereof, would be by a Conference between a Committee of this Board, and a Committee of the Assembly; It is therefore ordered, That the Gentlemen of this Board, now assembled, or any seven of them, be a Committee, to join a Committee of the House of Representatives, in order to confer together, and to examine and enquire into the said Papers, and the Authors and Writers thereof.

Which Message being read,

Ordered, That the Members of this House, or any fourteen of them, do meet a Committee of the Council, at the Time and Place therein mentioned.

Die Veneris, 9^{ho}. A. M. 18 October, 1734.

Mr. Garretson, from the Committee of this House, reported, That they last Night met the Committee of the Council, on the subject Matter of their Message of Yesterday to this House; and that after several Preliminaries between the said Committees, the Gentlemen of the Council reduced to Writing, what they requested of this House, and delivered the same to the Chairman, who delivered it in at the Table, and being read, is in the Words following:

At a Committee of the Council held the 17th of October, 1734.

P R E S E N T,

Mr. Clarke. Mr. Harrison. Dr. Colden.
Mr. Livingston. Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Chief-Justice.
Mr. Cortlandt. Mr. Lane. Mr. Horsmanden.

Gentlemen,

The Matters we request your Concurrence in are, That Zenger's Papers, No. 7. 47, 48, 49. which were read, and which we now deliver, be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman, as containing in them many Things derogatory of the Dignity of his Majesty's Government, reflecting upon the Legislature, upon the most considerable Persons in the most distinguished Stations in the Province, and tending to raise Seditions and Tumults among the People thereof.

That you concur with us in the addressing the Governor, to issue his Proclamation, with a Promise of Reward for the Discovery of the Authors or Writers of these seditious Libels.

That you concur with us in an Order for prosecuting the Printer thereof.

That you concur with us in an Order to the Magistrates, to exert themselves in the Execution of their Offices, in order to preserve the publick Peace of the Province.

By Order of the Committee,

FRED. MORRIS, Cl. Con.

Mr. Garretson delivered likewise to the House the several Papers referred to in the said Request.

Ordered, That the said Papers be lodged with the Clerk of this House; and that the Consideration thereof, and the said Request, be referred till Tuesday next.

Die Martis, 9^{ho}. A. M. 22 October, 1734.

The House according to Order proceeded to take into Consideration the Request of a Committee of Council, delivered to a Committee of this House, on the 16th Instant, as likewise of the several Papers therein referred to. And after several Debates upon the subject Matters, it was ORDERED, That the said Papers and Requests lie on the Table.

The Council finding the General Assembly would not do any Thing about it, they sent the following Message to the House.

Die Sabbati, 9^{ho}. A. M. 2 November, 1734.

A Message from the Council by Mr. Livingston, desiring this House to return by him to that Board the several seditious Journals of Zenger's, No. 7. 47, 48, 49. which were delivered by a Committee of that Board to a Committee of this House the 17th of October last, together with the Proposals of the Committee of that Board, delivered therewith to a Committee of this House; and then withdrew.

On Tuesday the 5th of November, 1734, the Quarter-Sessions for the City of New-York began, when the Sheriff delivered to the Court an Order, which was read in these Words:

At a Council held at Fort George, in New-York, the 2^d of November, 1734.

P R E S E N T,

His Excellency William Cosby, Captain General and Governor in Chief, &c.

Mr. Clarke. Mr. Harrison. * Dr. Colden.
Mr. Livingston. Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Chief-Justice.
Mr. Cortlandt. Mr. Lane. Mr. Horsmanden.

Whereas by an Order of this Board, of this Day, some of John Peter Zenger's Journals, entitled, The New-York Weekly Journal, containing the freshest Advices, foreign and domestic, No. 7. 47, 48, 49. were ordered to be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman, or Whiper, near the Pillory in this City, on Wednesday the 6th Instant, between the Hours of Eleven and Twelve in the Forenoon, as containing in them many Things tending to Sedition and Faction, to bring his Majesty's Government into Contempt, and to disturb the Peace thereof, and containing in them likewise not only Reflections upon his Excellency the Governor in particular, the Legislature in general, but also upon the most considerable Persons in the most distinguished Stations in this Province: It is therefore ordered, That the Mayor and Magistrates of this City do attend at the Burning of the several Papers or Journals aforesaid, numbered as above mentioned.

FRED. MORRIS, D. Cl. Con.

To Robert Lutting, Esq. Mayor of the City of New-York, and the rest of the Magistrates for the said City and County.

Upon reading of which Order, the Court forbade the Entering thereof in their Books at that Time; and many of them declared, that if it should be entered, they would have their Protest entered against it.

On Wednesday the 6th of November, the Sheriff of New-York moved the Court of Quarter-Sessions to comply with the said Order; upon which one of the Aldermen offered a Protest, which was read by the Clerk, and approved of by all the Aldermen, either expressly, or by not objecting to it, and is as followeth:

Whereas an Order has been served on this Court, in these Words.

[The Order as above inserted.]

And whereas this Court conceives, they are only to be commanded by the King's mandatory Writs, authorized by Law, to which they conceive they have the Right of shewing Cause why they don't obey them, if they believe them improper to be obeyed; or by Orders, which have some known Laws to authorize them; and whereas this Court conceives this Order to be no mandatory Writ warranted by Law, nor knows of no Law that authorizes the making the Order aforesaid; so they think themselves under no Obligation to obey it: Which Obedience, they think would be in them, an opening a Door for arbitrary Commands, which, when once opened, they know not what dangerous Consequences may attend it. Wherefore this Court conceives itself bound in Duty (for the Preservation of the Rights of this Corporation, and, as much as they can, the Liberty of the Press, and the People of the Province, since an Assembly of the Province, and several Grand Juries, have refused to meddle with the Papers, when applied to by the Council) to protest against the Order aforesaid, and to forbid all the Members of this Corporation to pay any Obedience to it, until it be shewn to this Court, that the same is authorized by some known Law, which they neither know, nor believe that it is.

Upon reading of which, it was required of the Honourable Francis Harrison, Recorder of this Corporation, and one of the Members of the Council, (present at making the said Order) to shew by what Law or Authority the said Order was made; upon which he spoke in Support of it, and cited the Case of Doctor Sacheverel's Sermon, which was by the House of Lords ordered to be burnt by the Hands of the Hangman, and that the Mayor and Aldermen of London should attend the doing of it. To which one of the Aldermen answered to this Purpose: That he conceived the Case was no ways parallel, because Dr. Sacheverel and his Sermon were impeached by the House of Commons of England, which is the Grand Jury of the Nation, and Representative of the whole People of England: That this their Impeachment they prosecuted before the House of Lords, the greatest Court of Justice of Britain, and which, beyond Memory of Man, has had Cognizance of Things of that Nature: That there Sacheverel had a fair Hearing in Defence of himself and of his Sermon; and after that fair Hearing, he and his Sermon were justly, fairly, and legally condemned: That he had read the Case of Dr. Sacheverel, and thought he could charge his Memory, that the Judgment of the House of Lords in that Case was, That the Mayor and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex only should attend the Burning of the Sermon, and not the Aldermen; and farther he remembered, that the Order upon that Judgment was only directed to the Sheriffs of London, and not even to the Mayor, who did not attend the doing it: And farther said, that would Mr. Recorder shew, that the Governor and Council had such Authority as the House of Lords, and that the Papers ordered to be burnt were in like manner legally prosecuted and condemned, there the Case of Dr. Sacheverel might be to the Purpose; but without shewing that, it rather proved that a Censure ought not to be pronounced, till a fair Trial by a competent and legal Authority were first had. Mr. Recorder was desired to produce the Books from whence he cited his Authorities, that the Court might judge of them themselves, and was told, that if he could produce sufficient Authorities to warrant this Order, they would readily obey it, but otherwise not. Upon which he said, he did not carry his Books about with him. To which it was answered, he might send for them, or order a Constable to fetch them. Upon which he arose, and at the lower End of the Table he mentioned, that Bishop Burnet's Pastoral Letter was ordered, by the House of Lords, to be burnt by the High Bailiff of Westminster; upon which he abruptly went away, without waiting for an Answer, or promising to bring his Books, and did not return sitting the Court.

* N. B. Dr. Colden was that Day at Esopus, 90 Miles from New-York, though mentioned as present in Council.

After Mr. Recorder's Departure, it was moved, that the Protest should be entered; to which it was answered, that the Protest could not be entered, without entering also the Order, that it was not fit to take any Notice of it; and therefore it was proposed that no Notice should be taken in their Books of either, which was unanimously agreed to by the Court.

The Sheriff then moved, that the Court would direct their Whipper to perform the said Order; to which it was answered, That as he was the Officer of the Corporation, they would give no such Order. Soon after which the Court adjourned, and did not attend the Burning of the Papers. Afterwards about Noon, the Sheriff, after reading the Numbers of the several Papers which were ordered to be burnt, delivered them unto the Hands of his own Negroe, and ordered him to put them into the Fire, which he did; at which Mr. Recorder, Jeremiah Dunbar, Esq. and several of the Officers of the Garrison, attended.]

On the Lord's Day, the 17th of November, 1734, I was taken and imprisoned by virtue of a Warrant in these Words.

At a Council held at Fort George in New York, the 2d Day of November, 1734.

P R E S E N T,

His Excellency William Cosby, Capt. General and Governor in Chief, &c.

Mr. Clarke. Mr. Harrison. Mr. Livingston.
Mr. Kennedy. Chief-Justice. Mr. Cortlandt.
Mr. Lane. Mr. Herfmanden.

It is ordered, that the Sheriff for the City of New York do forthwith take and apprehend John Peter Zenger, for printing and publishing several seditious Libels, dispersed throughout his Journals or News-papers, intituled, The New York Weekly Journal, containing the freshest Advices, foreign and domestick; as having in them many Things tending to raise Factions and Tumults among the People of this Province, inflaming their Minds with Contempt of his Majesty's Government, and greatly disturbing the Peace thereof; and upon his taking the said John Peter Zenger, to commit him to the Prison or common Jail of the said City and County.

FRED. MORRIS, D. Cl. Con.

And being, by virtue of that Warrant, so imprisoned in the Jail, I was for several Days denied the Use of Pen, Ink, and Paper, and the Liberty of Speech with any Persons.—Upon my Commitment, some Friends soon got a Habeas Corpus to bring me before the Chief-Justice, in order to my Discharge, or being bailed; on the Return whereof, on Wednesday the 20th of November, my Counsel delivered Exceptions to the Return, and the Chief-Justice ordered them to be argued publicly at the City Hall, on the Saturday following.

On Saturday the 23d of November, the said Exceptions came to be argued; by James Alexander and William Smith, of Counsel for me, and by Mr. Attorney General and Mr. Warrel, of Counsel against me, in Presence of some Hundreds of the Inhabitants; where my Counsel (saving the Benefit of Exception to the Illegality of the Warrant) insisted that I might be admitted to reasonable Bail. And to shew that it was my Right to be so, they offered Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, 3 Car. the Habeas Corpus Act of 31 Car. II. which directs the Sum, in which Bail is to be taken, to be, according to the Quality of the Prisoner, and Nature of the Offence. Allo 2. Hawkins, cap. 15. §. 5. in these Words, 'But Justices must take care, that, under Pretence of demanding sufficient Security, they do not make so excessive a Demand as, in effect, amounts to a Denial of Bail; for this is looked on as a great Grievance, and is complained of as such, by 1 W. & M. Sess. 2. by which it is declared, That excessive Bail ought not to be required.' It was also shewn, that the seven Bishops, who, in King James the 1st's Time, were charged with the like Crime that I stood charged with, were admitted to Bail on their own Recognizances, the Archbishop in 200*l.* and each of the other six in 100*l.* a-piece only. Sundry other Authorities and Arguments were produced and insisted on by my Counsel, to prove my Right to be admitted to moderate Bail, and to such Bail as was in my Power to give; and sundry Parts of History they produced, to shew how much the requiring excessive Bail had been resented by Parliament. And, in order to enable the Court to judge what Surety was in my Power to give, I made Affidavit, That (my Debts paid) I was not worth forty Pounds, (the Tools of my Trade, and Weaving-Apparel excepted.)

Some warm Expressions (to say no worse of them) were dropt on this

Bp. Kennet says, that this Letter seemed to be sacrificed to a poor Jest on the Author's Name [Burnet]. Complete Hist. of Eng. Vol. III. P. 387. 2 Ed. in Lond. 1719.

Occasion, sufficiently known and resented by the Auditory; which, on my part, I desire may be buried in Oblivion: Upon the Whole, it was ordered, that I might be admitted to Bail, myself in 400*l.* with two Sureties, and in 200*l.* and that I should be remanded till I gave it. And as this was times more than was in my Power to counter-secure any Person in giving Bail for me, I conceived I could not ask any to become my Bail on these Terms; and therefore I returned to Jail, where I lay until Tuesday the 28th of January, 1734-5, being the last Day of that Term; and the Grand Jury having found nothing against me, I expected to have been discharged from my Imprisonment: But my Hopes proved vain; for the Attorney General then charged me, by Information, for printing and publishing Parts of my Journals N^o. 13 and 23, as being false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious.

To this Information my Counsel appeared, and offered Exceptions, leaving a Blank for inserting the Judges Commissions, which the Court were of Opinion not to receive till those Blanks were filled up. In the succeeding Vacation the Judges gave Copies of their Commissions; and on Tuesday the 15th of April last, the first Day of the succeeding Term, my Counsel offered these Exceptions; which were as follow.

The Attorney General,

John Peter Zenger.

On Information for a Misdemeanour.

Exceptions humbly offered by John Peter Zenger, to the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. to judge in this Cause.

The Defendant comes and prays Hearing of the Commission, by virtue of which the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. claims the Power and Authority to judge in this Cause, and it is read to him in these Words:

George the Second, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our trusty and well beloved James De Lancey, Esq. We, reposing special Trust and Confidence in your Integrity, Ability and Learning, have assigned, constituted and appointed, and We do by these Presents assign, constitute, and appoint you, the said James De Lancey, to be Chief-Justice in and over our Province of New York, in America, in the room of Levon Morris, Esq. giving and by these Presents granting unto you full Power and lawful Authority to hear, try, and determine all Pleas whatsoever, civil, criminal, and mixt, according to the Laws, Statutes, and Customs of our Kingdom of England, and the Laws and Usages of our said Province of New York, not being repugnant thereto, and Executions of all Judgments of the said Court to award, and to make such Rules and Orders in the said Court, as may be found convenient and useful, and, as near as may be, agreeable to the Rules and Orders of our Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer in England. To have, hold, and enjoy the said Office or Place of Chief-Justice in and over our said Province, with all and singular the Rights, Privileges, Profits and Advantages, Salaries, Fees and Perquisites unto the said Place belonging, or in any ways appertaining, in as full and ample Manner as any Person heretofore Chief-Justice of our said Province hath held and enjoyed, or of Right ought to have held and enjoyed the same, To you the said James De Lancey, Esq. for and during our Will and Pleasure. In Testimony whereof We have caused these our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of our Province of New York to be hereunto affixed. Witness our trusty and well-beloved William Cosby, Esq. our Captain-General and Governor in Chief of our Provinces of New York, New Jersey, and the Territories thereon depending in America, Vice-Admiral of the same, and Colonel in our Army, at Fort George in New York, the twenty-first Day of August, in the twentieth Year of our Reign, Annoq; Domini, 1733.

Which being read and heard, the said John Peter Zenger, by Protestation not confessing nor submitting to the Power of any other Person to judge in this Cause, doth except to the Power of the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. aforesaid, to judge in this Cause, by virtue of the Commission aforesaid, for these Reasons, viz.

1st. For that the Authority of a Judge of the King's Bench, in that Part of Great Britain called England, by which the Cognizance of this Cause is claimed, is by the said Commission granted to the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. aforesaid, only during Pleasure; whereas that Authority (by a Statute in that Case made and provided) ought to be granted during good Behaviour.

2d. For that, by the said Commission, the Jurisdiction and Authority of a Justice of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, in that Part of Great Britain called England, is granted to the said James De Lancey, Esq. which Jurisdiction and Authority cannot be granted to, and exercised by, any one of the Justices of the King's Bench.

3d. For that the Form of the said Commission is not founded on, nor warranted by the Common Law, nor any Statute of England, nor of Great Britain, nor any Act of Assembly of this Colony.

4th. For that it appears, by the Commission aforesaid, that the same is granted under the Seal of this Colony by his Excellency William Cosby, Esq. Governor thereof; and it appears not, that the same was granted, neither was the same granted, by and with the Advice and Consent of his Majesty's Council of this Colony; without which Advice and Consent, his Excellency could not grant the same.

Wherefore, and for many other Defects in the said Commission, this Defendant humbly hopes, that the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. will not take Cognizance of this Cause, by virtue of the Commission aforesaid.

Was signed, James Alexander,
William Smith.

The Exceptions to the Commission of the Honourable Frederick Philipse, Esq. were the same with the foregoing, including therein his Commission, which is in these Words.

George the Second, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our trusty and well-beloved Frederick Philipse, Esq. Greeting: Whereas it is our Care, that Justice be duly administered to our Subjects within our Province of New York, and Territories thereon depending in America; and We, having assigned, constituted and appointed, and We do by these Presents assign, constitute and appoint you, the said Frederick Phillips, to be second Justice of our Supreme Court of Judicature for our Province of New York, in the room of James De Lancey, Esq. giving and granting to you, the said Frederick Phillips, full Power and Authority, with our other Justices of our said Supreme Court, to hear, try, and determine all Pleas whatsoever, civil, criminal, and mixed, according to the Laws, Statutes, and Customs of our Kingdom of England, and the Laws and Usages of our said Province of New York, not being repugnant thereto; and Executions of all Judgments of the said Court to award, and to act and do all Things, which any of our Justices of either Bench, or Barons of the Exchequer, in our said Kingdom of England, may or ought to do; and also to assist in the making such Rules and Orders in our said Court, as shall be for the Good and Benefit of our said Province; and, as near as conveniently may be, to the Rules and Orders of our said Courts in our said Kingdom of England: To have, hold, and enjoy the said Office or Place of second Justice of our said Province of New York, together with all and singular the Rights, Privileges, Salaries, Fees, Perquisites, Profits and Advantages thereto, now or at any Time heretofore belonging, or in any wise of Right appertaining, unto you, the said Frederick Phillips, for and during our Pleasure. In Testimony whereof, We have caused these our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of our said Province of New York to be hereunto affixed. Witness our trusty and well-beloved William Cosby, Esq. our Captain General and Governor in Chief of our Provinces of New York, New Jersey, and Territories thereon depending in America, Vice-Admiral of the same, and Colonel in our Army, &c. at Fort George in New York, the twenty-first Day of August, in the seventh Year of our Reign, Anno; Domini, 1735.

FRED. MORRIS, D. Secy.

Tuesday the 15th of April, 1735.

Mr. Alexander offered the above Exceptions to the Court, and prayed that they might be filed. Upon this the Chief Justice said to Mr. Alexander and Mr. Smith, That they ought well to consider the Consequences of what they offered. To which both answered, That they had well considered what they offered, and all the Consequences. And Mr. Smith added, That he was so well satisfied of the Right of the Subject to take an Exception to the Commission of a Judge, if he thought such Commission illegal, that he durst venture his Life upon that Point. As to the Validity of the Exceptions then offered, he said, he took that to be a second Point; but was ready to argue them both, if their Honours were pleased to hear him. To which the Chief Justice replied, That he would consider the Exceptions in the Morning; and ordered the Clerk to bring them to him.

Wednesday the 16th of April, 1735.

The Chief Justice delivered one of the Exceptions to the Clerk, and Justice Phillips the other; upon which Mr. Smith arose, and asked the Judges, whether their Honours would hear him upon these two Points. 1st. That the Subject has a Right to take such Exceptions, if they judged the Commission illegal. 2dly. That the Exceptions tendered were legal and valid. To which the Chief Justice said, That they would neither hear nor allow the Exceptions; for (said he) you thought to have gained a great deal of Applause and Popularity by opposing this Court, as you did the Court of Exchequer; but you have brought it to that Point, That either we must go from the Bench, or you from the Bar: Therefore we exclude you and Mr. Alexander from the Bar; and delivered a Paper to the Clerk, and ordered it to be entered; which the Clerk entered accordingly, and returned the Paper to the Chief Justice; after which the Chief Justice ordered the Clerk to read publicly what he had written; an attested Copy whereof follows.

At a Supreme Court of Judicature held for the Province of New York, at the City-Hall of the City of New York, on Wednesday the 16th Day of April, 1735.

PRESENT,

The Hon. James De Lancey, Esq. Chief Justice.

The Hon. Frederick Phillips, Esq. Second Justice.

James Alexander, Esq. and William Smith, Attornies of this Court, having presumed, (notwithstanding they were forewarned by the Court of their Displeasure, if they should do it) to sign, and having actually signed, and put into Court, Exceptions, in the Name of John Peter Zenger; thereby denying the Legality of the Judges their Commissions; though in the usual Form, and the Being of this Supreme Court. It is therefore ordered, That, for the said Contempt, the said James Alexander, and William Smith, be excluded from any farther Practice in this Court; and that their Names be struck out of the Roll of Attornies of this Court.

per Cur'.

JAMES LYNE, Cl.

After the Order of the Court was read, Mr. Alexander asked, whether it was the Order of Mr. Justice Phillips as well as of the Chief-Justice? To which both answered, that it was their Order; upon which Mr. Alexander added, That it was proper to ask that Question, that they might know how to have their Relief: He farther observed to the Court, upon reading of the Order, That they were mistaken in their wording of it, because the Exceptions were only to their Commissions, and not to the Being of the Court, as is therein alledged; and prayed that the Order might be altered accordingly. The Chief-Justice said, they conceived the Exceptions were against the Being of the Court. Both Mr. Alexander and Mr. Smith denied that they were, and prayed the Chief-Justice to point to the Place that contained such Exceptions; and further added, That the Court might well exist, though the Commissions of all the Judges were void; which the Chief-Justice confessed to be true: And therefore they prayed again, that the Order in that Point might be altered; but it was denied.

Then Mr. Alexander desired to know, whether they over-ruled or rejected the Exceptions? The Chief-Justice said, He did not understand the Dis-ference; to which said Alexander replied, that if he rejected the Exceptions, then they could not appear upon the Proceedings, and in that Case the Defendant was intitled to have them made Part of the Proceedings by Bills of Exceptions: But if they over-ruled them; then, by so doing, they only declared them not sufficient, to hinder them from proceeding by virtue of those Commissions; and the Exceptions would remain as Records of the Court, and ought to be entered on the Record of the Cause, as Part of the Proceedings. The Chief-Justice said, they must remain upon the File, to warrant what we have done: As to being Part of the Record of the Proceedings in that Cause, he said, you may speak to that Point To-morrow.

Friday, April 18th, 1735.

Mr. Alexander signified to the Court, That on Wednesday last their Honours had said, That the Counsel for Mr. Zenger might speak to the Point, concerning the rejecting or over-ruling of Mr. Zenger's Exceptions, on the Morrow: To which the Chief-Justice answered, That he said, You may get some Person to speak to that Point on the Morrow, not meaning that the said Alexander should speak to it, that being contrary to the Order: Both Mr. Alexander and Mr. Smith said, they understood it otherwise.

They both also mentioned, that it was a Doubt, whether, by the Words of the Order, they were debarred of their Practice as Counsel, as well as Attornies, whereas they practised in both Capacities. To which the Chief Justice answered, That the Order was plain, That James Alexander, Esq. and William Smith, were debarred and excluded from their whole Practice at this Bar; and that the Order was intended to bar their acting both as Counsel and as Attornies, and that it could not be construed otherwise. And it being asked Mr. Phillips, whether he understood the Order so? He answered, That he did.

Upon this Exclusion of my Counsel, I petitioned the Court to order Counsel for my Defence; who thereon appointed John Chambers, Esq. who pleaded Not Guilty for me to the Information. But as to the Point, whether my Exceptions should be Part of the Record, as was moved by my former Counsel, Mr. Chambers thought not proper to speak to it. Mr. Chambers also moved, that a certain Day in the next Term might be appointed for my Trial, and for a Struck Jury; whereupon my Trial was ordered to be on Monday the 4th of August, and the Court would consider till the first Day of next Term, whether I should have a Struck Jury or not; and ordered, that the Sheriff should, in the mean Time, at my Charge, return the Freeholders Book.

At a Supreme Court of Judicature held for the Province of New York, before the Honourable James De Lancey, Esq. Chief-Justice of the said Province; and the Honourable Frederick Phillips, Esq. Second Justice of the said Province.

On Tuesday the 29th of July, 1735, the Court opened; and on Motion of Mr. Chambers for a Struck Jury, pursuant to the Rule of the preceding Term, the Court were of Opinion, that I was intitled to have a Struck Jury; and that Evening, at five of the Clock, some of my Friends attended the Clerk, for striking the Jury; when, to their Surprize, the Clerk, instead of producing the Freeholders Book, to strike the Jury out of it in their Presence, as usual, he produced a List of 48 Persons, who, he said, he had taken out of the Freeholders Book: My Friends told him, that a great Number of these Persons were not Freeholders; that others were Persons holding Commissions and Offices at the Governor's Pleasure; that others were of the late displaced Magistrates of this City, who must be supposed to have Resentment against me, for what I had printed concerning them; that others were the Governor's Baker, Taylor, Shoe-maker, Candle-maker, Joiner, &c. that as to the few indifferent Men that were upon that List, they had Reason to believe (as they had heard) that Mr. Attorney had a List of them, to strike them out; and therefore requested, that he would either bring the Freeholders Book, and chuse out of it 48 unexceptionable Men in their Presence, as usual; or else, that he would hear their Objections, particularly to the List he offered; and that he would put impartial Men in the Place of those against whom they could shew just Objections. Notwithstanding this, the Clerk refused to strike the Jury out of the Freeholders Book, and refused to hear any Objections to the Persons on his List; but told my Friends, if any Objections they had to any Persons, they might strike those Persons out; to which they answered, There would not remain a Jury, if they struck out all the exceptionable Men; and, according to the Custom, they had only a Right to strike out 12.

But finding no Arguments could prevail with the Clerk to hear their Objections to his List, nor to strike the Jury as usual, Mr. Chambers told him, he must apply to the Court, which the next Morning he did; and the Court, upon his Motion, ordered, That the 48 should be struck out of the Freeholders Book, as usual, in the Presence of the Parties; and that the Clerk should hear Objections to Persons proposed to be of the 48, and allow of such Exceptions as were just. In pursuance of that Order, a Jury was that Evening struck, to the Satisfaction of both Parties, though my Friends and Counsel insisted on no Objections but want of Freeholders; and though they did not insist, that Mr. Attorney General (who was assisted by Mr. Blagge) should shew any particular Cause, against any Persons he disliked, but acquiesced that any Person he disliked should be out of the 48.

Before James De Lancey, Esq. Chief-Justice of the Province of New York, and Frederick Phillips, second Judge, came on my Trial, on the fourth Day of August, 1735, upon an Information for printing and publishing two News-papers, which were called Libels against our Governor and his Administration.

The Defendant John Peter Zenger, being called, appeared.

And the Sheriff returned his Venire for the Trial of this said Cause.

Mr. Chambers, of Counsel for the Defendant. I humbly move your Honours, that we may have Justice done by the Sheriff, and that he may return the Names of the Jurors in the same Order as they were struck.

Mr. Chief Justice. How is that? Are they not so returned?

Mr. Chambers. No, they are not; for some of the Names that were last set down in the Pannel, are now placed first.

Mr. Chief Justice. Make out that, and you shall be righted.

O o

Mr.

Mr. Chambers. I have the Copy of the Pannel in my Hand, as the Jurors were struck; and if the Clerk will produce the Original, signed by Mr. Attorney and myself, your Honour will see our Complaint is just.

Mr. Chief-Justice. Clerk, is it so? Look upon that Copy; is it a true Copy of the Pannel as it was struck?

Clerk. Yes, I believe it is.

Mr. Chief-Justice. How came the Names of the Jurors to be misplaced in the Pannel annexed to the Verdict?

Mr. Sheriff. I have returned the Jurors in the same Order in which the Clerk gave them to me.

Mr. Chief-Justice. Let the Names of the Jurors be ranged in the Order they were struck, agreeable to the Copy here in Court.

Which was done accordingly. And the Jury, whose Names were as follow, were called and sworn:

Hermanus Rutgers,
Stanley Holmes,
Edward Man,
John Bell,
Samuel Weaver,
Andries Marschalk,

Egbert Van Borson,
Thomas Hunt, Foreman,
Benjamin Hildreth,
Abraham Keteltas,
John Golet,
Hercules Wandover.

Mr. Attorney General opened the Information, which was as follows:

Mr. Attorney General. May it please your Honours, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; the Information now before the Court, and to which the Defendant, Zenger, has pleaded Not Guilty, is an Information for printing and publishing a false, scandalous, and seditious Libel, in which his Excellency, the Governor of this Province, who is the King's immediate Representative here, is greatly and unjustly scandalized, as a Person that has no Regard to Law nor Justice; with much more, as will appear upon reading the Informations. This of Libelling is what has always been discouraged, as a Thing that tends to create Differences among Men, ill Blood among the People, and oftentimes great Bloodshed between the Party libelling and the Party libelled. There can be no doubt but you, Gentlemen of the Jury, will have the same ill Opinion of such Practices, as the Judges have always shewn upon such Occasions: But I shall say no more at this Time, until you hear the Information, which is as follows.

New-York, Supreme Court.

Of the Term of January, in the eight Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord King George the Second, &c.

New York, ss. BE it remembered, That Richard Bradley, Esq. Attorney General of our Sovereign Lord the King for the Province of New-York, who for our said Lord the King in this Part prosecutes, in his own proper Person comes here into the Court of our said Lord the King, and for our said Lord the King gives the Court here to understand, and be informed, That John Peter Zenger, late of the City of New-York, Printer, (being a seditious Person, and a frequent Printer and Publisher of false News and seditious Libels, and wickedly and maliciously devising the Government of our said Lord the King of this his Majesty's Province of New-York, under the Administration of his Excellency William Cosby, Esq. Captain-General and Governor in Chief of the said Province, to traduce, scandalize and vilify, and his Excellency the said Governor, and the Ministers and Officers of our said Lord the King, of and for the said Province, to bring into Suspicion, and the ill Opinion of the Subjects of our said Lord the King residing within the said Province) the twenty-eighth Day of January, in the seventh Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord George the Second, by the Grace of God, of Great-Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. at the City of New-York, did falsely, seditiously and scandalously print and publish, and cause to be printed and published a certain false, malicious, seditious, scandalous Libel, intituled, The New-York Weekly Journal, containing the freshest Advices, foreign and domestic; in which Libel (of and concerning his Excellency the said Governor, and the Ministers and Officers of our said Lord the King, of and for the said Province) among other Things therein contained are the Words, "Your Appearance in Print, at last, gives a Pleasure to many, though most with you had come fairly into the open Field, and not appeared behind Retrenchments made of the supposed Laws against Libelling, and of what other Men have said and done before: These Retrenchments, Gentlemen, may soon be shewn to you, and all Men, to be weak, and to have neither Law nor Reason for their Foundation, so cannot long stand you in stead: Therefore, you had much better as yet leave them, and come to what the People of this City and Province [the City and Province of New-York meaning] think are the Points in Question; (to wit) They [the People of the City and Province of New-York meaning] think, as Matters now stand, that their Liberties and Properties are precarious, and that Slavery is like to be intailed on them and their Posterity, if some past Things be not amended; and this they collect from many past Proceedings." [Meaning many the past Proceedings of his Excellency the said Governor, and of the Ministers and Officers of our said Lord the King, of and for the said Province.] And the said Attorney-General of our said Lord the King, for our said Lord the King, likewise gives the Court here to understand, and be informed, that the said John Peter Zenger afterwards, (to wit) the eighth Day of April, in the seventh Year of the Reign of our said Lord the King, at the City of New-York aforesaid, did falsely, seditiously, and scandalously print and publish, and cause to be printed and published, another false, malicious, seditious, and scandalous Libel, intituled, The New-York Weekly Journal, containing the freshest Advices foreign and domestic. In which Libel, [of and concerning the Government of the said Province of New-York, and of and concerning his Excellency the said Governor, and the Ministers and Officers of our said Lord the King, of and for the said Province] among other Things therein contained are these Words, "One of our Neighbours [one of the Inhabitants of New-Jersey meaning] being in Company, observing the Strangers [some of the Inhabitants of New-York meaning] full of Complaints, endeavoured to persuade them to remove into Jersey; to which it was replied, That would be leaping out of the Frying-pan into the Fire: for, says he, we both are under the same Governor [his Excellency the said Governor meaning], and your Assembly have sworn with a Witness what is to be expected from them; one that was then moving to Pennsylvania, [meaning one that was then removing from New-York with intent to reside at Pennsylvania] to which Place it is reported several considerable Men are removing [from New-York meaning], expressed in Terms very moving, much Concern for the Circumstances of New-York [the bad Circumstances of the Province and the People of New-York meaning], seemed to think them very much owing to the Influence that some Men [whom he called Tools] had in the Administration [meaning the Administration of Government of the said Province of New-York], said he was now going from them, and was not to be hurt by any Measures they should take, but could not help having some Concern for the Welfare of his Countrymen, and should be glad to hear that the Assembly [meaning the General Assembly of the Province of New-York] would exert themselves as became them, by shewing that they have the Interest of their Country more at Heart, than the Gratification of any private View of any of their Members, or being at all affected by the Smiles or Frowns of a Governor, [His Excellency, the said Governor, meaning] both which ought equally to be despised, when the Interest of their Country is at Stake. You, says he, complain of the Lawyers, but I think the Law itself is at an End. We [the People of the Province of New-York meaning] see Men's Deeds destroyed, Judges arbitrarily displaced, new Courts erected, without Consent of the Legislature [within the Province of New-York meaning], by which it seems to me, Trials by Juries are taken away when a Governor pleases, [His Excellency the said Governor meaning] Men of known Estates denied their Vote, contrary to the received Practice, the best Expofitor of any Law: Who is then in that Province [meaning the Province of New-York], that call [can call meaning] any Thing his own, or enjoy any Liberty, [Liberty meaning] longer than those in the Administration [meaning the Administration of Government of the said Province of New-York] will condescend to let them do it, for which Reason I have left it [the Province of New-York meaning] as I believe more will; to the great Disturbance of the Peace of the said Province of New-York, to the great Scandal of our said Lord the King, of His Excellency the said Governor, and of all others concerned in the Administration of the Government of the said Province, and against the Peace of our Sovereign Lord the King his Crown and Dignity, &c." Whereupon the said Attorney-General of our said Lord the King, for our said Lord the King, prays the Advancement of the Court here, in the Premises, and the due Process of the Law, against him the said John Peter Zenger; in this Part to be done, to answer to our said Lord the King of and in the Premises, &c.

R. Bradley, Attorney-General.

To this Information the Defendant has pleaded Not Guilty and we are ready to prove it.

Mr. Chambers has not been pleased to favour me with his Notes, so I cannot, for fear of doing him Injustice pretend to set down his Argument; but here Mr. Chambers set forth very clearly, the Nature of a Libel, the great Allowances that ought to be made for what Men speak or write; that in all Libels there must be some particular Persons so clearly pointed out that no Doubt must remain about who is meant; that he was in hopes Mr. Attorney would fail in his Proof, as to this Point; and therefore desired that he would go on to examine his Witnesses.

Then Mr. Hamilton, who at the Request of some of my Friends, was so kind as to come from Philadelphia to assist me on the Trial, spoke.

Mr. Hamilton. May it please your Honour: I am concerned in this Cause on the Part of Mr. Zenger, the Defendant. The Information against my Client was sent me, a few Days before I left Home, with some Instructions to let me know how far I might rely upon the Truth of those Parts of the Papers set forth in the Information, and which are said to be libellous. And though I am perfectly of the Opinion with the Gentleman who has just now spoke, on the same Side with me, as to the common Course of Proceedings, I mean in putting Mr. Attorney upon proving, that my Client printed and published those Papers mentioned in the Information; yet I cannot think it proper for me (without doing Violence to my own Principles) to deny the Publication of a Complaint, which, I think, is the Right of every free-born Subject to make, when the Matters so published can be supported with Truth; and therefore I'll save Mr. Attorney the Trouble of examining his Witnesses to that Point; and I do (for my Client) confess, that he both printed and published the two News Papers set forth in the Information, and I hope in so doing he has committed no Crime.

Mr. Attorney. Then, if Your Honour pleases, since Mr. Hamilton has confessed the Fact, I think our Witnesses may be discharged; we have no further Occasion for them.

Mr. Hamilton. If you brought them here only to prove the printing and publishing of these News-Papers, we have acknowledged that, and shall abide by it.

Here my Journeyman and two Sons (with several others subpoena'd by Mr. Attorney, to give Evidence against me) were discharged, and there was Silence in the Court for some Time.

Mr. Chief-Justice. Well, Mr. Attorney, will you proceed?

Mr. Attorney. Indeed, Sir, as Mr. Hamilton has confessed the printing and publishing these Libels, I think the Jury must find a Verdict for the King; for supposing they were true, the Law says that they are not the less libellous for that; nay indeed the Law says, their being true is an Aggravation of the Crime.

Mr. Hamilton. Not so neither, Mr. Attorney, there are two Words to that Bargain: I hope it is not our bare printing and publishing a Paper, that will make it a Libel: You will have something more to do, before you make my Client a Libeller; for the Words themselves must be libellous, that is false, scandalous, and seditious, or else they are not guilty.

As Mr. Attorney has not been pleased to favour us with his Argument which he read, or with the Notes of it, we cannot take upon us to set down his Words, but only to shew the Book Cases he cited, and the general Scope of his Argument, which he drew from those Authorities. He observed upon the Excellency, as well as Use of Government, and the great Regard and Reverence which had been constantly paid to it, both under the Law and the Gospel. That by Government we were protected in our Lives, Religion and Properties; and that, for these Reasons, great Care had always been taken to prevent every thing that might tend to scandalize Magistrates, and others concerned in the Administration of the Government, especially the supreme Magistrate. And that there were many Instances of very severe Judgments, and of Punishments inflicted upon such as had attempted to bring the Government into Contempt; by publishing false and scurrilous Libels against it, or by speaking evil and scandalous Words of Men in Authority; to the great Disturbance of the publick Peace. And to support this, he cited, 5 Coke 121. (I suppose it should be 125.) Wood's Instit. 430. 2 Lilly 168. 1 Hawkins 73. 11. 6. From these Books he insisted, 'That a Libel was a malicious Defamation of any Person, expressed either in Printing or Writing, Signs or Pictures, to asperse the Reputation of one that is alive, or the Memory of one that is dead; if he is a private Man, the Libeller deserves a severe Punishment, but if it is against a Magistrate, or other publick Person, it is a greater Offence; for this concerns not only the Breach of the Peace, but the Scandal of the Government; for what greater Scandal of Government can there be, than to have corrupt or wicked Magistrates to be appointed by the King, to govern his Subjects under him? And a greater Imputation to the State cannot be, than to suffer such corrupt Men to sit in the sacred Seat of Justice, or to have any meddling in, or concerning the Administration of Justice.' And from the same Books Mr. Attorney insisted, that whether the Person defamed is a private Man or a Magistrate, whether living or dead, whether the Libel is true or false, or if the Party against whom it is made is of good or evil Fame, it is nevertheless a Libel. For in a settled State of Government, the Party grieved ought to complain for every Injury done him, in the ordinary Courie of the Law. And as to its Publication, the Law had taken so great Care of Men's Reputations, that if one maliciously repeats it, or sings it in the Presence of another, or delivers the Libel or a Copy of it over, to scandalize the Party, he is to be punished as a Publisher of a Libel. He said it was likewise evident, that Libelling was an Offence against the Law of God. Acts xxiii. 5. Then, said Paul, I wist not, Brethren, that he was the High-Priest: For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the Ruler of the People. 2 Pet. ii. 10. Despise Government, presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of Dignities, &c. He then insisted that it was clear, both by the Law of God and Man, that it was a very great Offence to speak evil of, or to revile those in Authority over us; and that Mr. Zenger had offended in a most notorious and gross Manner, in scandalizing His Excellency our Governor, who is the King's immediate Representative, and the supreme Magistrate of this Province: For can there be any thing more scandalous said of a Governor than what is published in those Papers? Nay, not only the Governor, but both the Council and Assembly are scandalized; for there it is plainly said, That 'as Matters now stand, their Liberties and Properties are precarious, and that Slavery is like to be entailed on them and their Posterity. And then again Mr. Zenger says, The Assembly ought to despise the Smiles or Frowns of a Governor; that he thinks the Law is at an End; that we see Men's Deeds destroyed, Judges arbitrarily displaced, new Courts erected, without Consent of the Legislature; And, that it seems Trials by juries are taken away when a Governor pleases; that none can call any thing their own, longer than those in the Administration will condescend to let them do it. - - - - -' And Mr. Attorney added, 'That he did not know what could be said in Defence of a Man, that had so notoriously scandalized the Governor and principal Magistrates and Officers of the Government, by charging them with depriving the People of their Rights and Liberties, and taking away Trials by Juries; and in short, putting an End to the Law itself.——If this was not a Libel, he said, he did not know what was one. Such Persons as will take those Liberties with Governors and Magistrates, he thought, ought to suffer for stirring up Sedition and Discontent among the People. And concluded, by saying, that the Government had been very much traduced and exposed by Mr. Zenger, before he was taken Notice of; that at last it was the Opinion of the Governor and Council, that he ought not to be suffered to go on, to disturb the Peace of the Government, by publishing such Libels against the Governor, and the chief Persons in the Government; and therefore they had directed this Prosecution, to put a Stop to this scandalous and wicked Practice, of libelling and defaming his Majesty's Government, and disturbing his Majesty's Peace.'

Lives

Mr. Chambers then summed up to the Jury, observing with great Strength of Reason on Mr. Attorney's Defect of Proof, that the Papers in the Information were false, malicious or seditious, which was incumbent on him to prove to the Jury, and without which they could not on their Oaths say, that they were so charged.

Mr. Hamilton. "May it please your Honour: I agree with Mr. Attorney, that Government is a sacred Thing; but I differ very widely from him, when he would insinuate, that the just Complaints of a Number of Men, who suffer under a bad Administration, is libelling that Administration. Had I believed that to be Law, I should not have given the Court the Trouble of hearing any thing that I could say in this Cause. Now, when I read the Information, I had not the Art to find out (without the Help of Mr. Attorney's Innuendoes) that the Governor was the Person meant in every Period of that News Paper; and I was inclined to believe, that they were wrote by some, who from an extraordinary Zeal for Liberty, had misconstrued the Conduct of some Persons in Authority into Crimes; and that Mr. Attorney, out of his too great Zeal for Power, had exhibited this Information, to correct the Indiscretion of my Client; and at the same Time, to shew his Superiors the great Concern he had, lest they should be treated with any undue Freedom. But from what Mr. Attorney has just now said, to wit, That this Prosecution was directed by the Governor and Council, and from the extraordinary Appearance of the People of all Conditions, which I observe in Court upon this Occasion, I have Reason to think, that those in the Administration have by this Prosecution something more in View, and that the People believe they have a good deal more at Stake than I apprehended: And, therefore, as it is become my Duty, to be both plain and particular in this Cause, I beg leave to bespeak the Patience of the Court.

I was in hopes, as that terrible Court, where those dreadful Judgments were given, and that Law established, which Mr. Attorney has produced for Authorities to support this Cause, was long ago laid aside, as the most dangerous Court to the Liberties of the People of England that ever was known in that Kingdom; that Mr. Attorney knowing this, would not have attempted to set up a Star-Chamber here, nor to make their Judgments a Precedent to us: For it is well known, that what would have been judged Treason in those Days for a Man to speak, I think, has since not only been practised as lawful, but the contrary Doctrine has been held to be Law.

In Brewster's Case, for Printing, That the Subjects might defend their Rights and Liberties by Arms, in case the King should go about to destroy them, he was told, by the Chief-Justice, that it was a great Mercy he was not proceeded against for his Life; for that to say the King could be resisted by Arms in any Case whatsoever, was express Treason. And yet we see, since that Time, Dr. Sacheverell was sentenced in the highest Court in Great-Britain, for saying, That such a Resistance was not lawful. Besides, as Times have made very great Changes in the Laws of England, so in my Opinion, there is good Reason that Places should do so too:

Is it not surprising to see a Subject, upon his receiving a Commission from the King to be a Governor of a Colony in America, immediately imagining himself to be vested with all the Prerogatives belonging to the sacred Person of his Prince? And which is yet more astonishing, to see that a People can be so wild as to allow of and acknowledge those Prerogatives and Exemptions, even to their own Destruction? Is it so hard a Matter to distinguish between the Majesty of our Sovereign, and the Power of a Governor of the Plantations? Is not this making very free with our Prince, to apply that Regard, Obedience and Allegiance to a Subject which is due only to our Sovereign? And yet in all the Cases which Mr. Attorney has cited, to shew the Duty and Obedience we owe to the Supreme Magistrate, it is the King that is there meant and understood, tho' Mr. Attorney is pleased to urge them as Authorities to prove the Heinousness of Mr. Zenger's Offence against the Governor of New-York. The several Plantations are compared to so many large Corporations, and perhaps not improperly; and can any one give an instance, that the Mayor or Head of a Corporation ever put in a Claim to the sacred Rights of Majesty? Let us not (while we are pretending to pay a great Regard to our Prince and his Peace) make bold to transfer that Allegiance to a Subject, which we owe to our King only. What strange Doctrine is it, to preis every Thing for Law here which is so in England? I believe we should not think it a Favour, at present at least, to establish this Practice. In England so great a Regard and Reverence is had to the Judges, (C. 3. Inst. 140.) that if any Man strikes another in Westminster-Hall, while the Judges are sitting, he shall lose his Right-Hand, and forfeit his Land and Goods for so doing. And though the Judges here claim all the Powers and Authorities within this Government, that a Court of King's-Bench has in England, yet I believe Mr. Attorney will scarcely say, that such a Punishment could be legally inflicted on a Man for committing such an Offence, in the Presence of the Judges sitting in any Court within the Province of New-York. The Reason is obvious; a Quarrel or Riot in New-York cannot possibly be attended with those dangerous Consequences that it might in Westminster-Hall; nor (I hope) will it be alledged, that any Misbehaviour to a Governor in the Plantations will, or ought to be judged of or punished, as a like Undutifulness would be to our Sovereign. From all which, I hope Mr. Attorney will not think it proper to apply his Law-Cases (to support the Cause of his Governor), which have only been judged, where the King's Safety or Honour was concerned. It will not be denied but that a Freeholder, in the Province of New-York, has as good a Right to the sole and separate Use of his Lands, as a Freeholder in England, who has a Right to bring an Action of Trespass against his Neighbour, for suffering his Horse or Cow to come and feed upon his Lands, or eat his Corn, whether inclosed or not inclosed; and yet I believe it would be looked upon as a strange Attempt for one Man here to bring an Action against another, whose Cattle and Horses feed upon his Grounds not inclosed, or indeed for eating and treading down his Corn, if that were not inclosed. Numberless are the Instances of this Kind that might be given, to shew, that what is good Law at one Time, and in one Place, is not so at another Time, and in another Place; so that I think the Law seems to expect, that in these Parts of the World, Men should take Care, by a good Fence, to preserve their Property from the Injury of unruly Beasts. And perhaps there may be as good a Reason why Men should take the same Care, to make an honest and upright Conduct a Fence and Security against the Injury of unruly Tongues.

Mr. Attorney. I don't know what the Gentleman means, by comparing Cases of Freeholders in England with the Freeholders here. What has this Case to do with Actions of Trespass, or Men's fencing their Ground? The Case before the Court is, Whether Mr. Zenger is guilty of libelling his Excellency the Governor of New-York, and indeed the whole Administration of the Government? Mr. Hamilton has confessed the printing and publishing, and I think nothing is plainer, than that the Words in the Information are scandalous, and tend to Sedition, and to disquiet the Minds of the People of this Province. And if such Papers are not Libels, I think it may be said, there can be no such Thing as a Libel.

Mr. Hamilton. May it please your Honour, I cannot agree with Mr. Attorney; for though I freely acknowledge that there are such Things as Libels, yet I must insist at the same Time, that what my Client is charged with, is not a Libel; and I observed just now, that Mr. Attorney, in defining a Libel, made use of the Words, scandalous, seditious, and tend to disquiet the People; but (whether with Design, or not, I will not say) he omitted the Word false.

Mr. Attorney. I think I did not omit the Word false: But it has been said already, that it may be a Libel, notwithstanding it may be true.

Mr. Hamilton. In this I must still differ with Mr. Attorney; for I depend upon it, we are to be tried upon this Information now before the Court and Jury, and to which we have pleaded Not Guilty, and by it we are charged with printing and publishing a certain false, malicious, seditious and scandalous Libel. This Word false must have some Meaning, or else how came it there? I hope Mr. Attorney will not say he put it there by Chance, and I am of Opinion his Information would not be good without it. But to shew that it is the principal Thing, which, in my Opinion, makes a Libel, I put the Case, the Information had been for printing and publishing a certain true Libel, would that be the same Thing? Or could Mr. Attorney support such an Information by any Precedent in the the English Law? No, the Falshood makes the Scandal, and both make the Libel. And to shew the Court that I am in good earnest, and to save the Court's Time, and Mr. Attorney's Trouble, I will agree, that if he can prove the Facts charged upon us to be false, I'll own them to be scandalous, seditious, and a Libel. So the Work seems now to be pretty much shortened, and Mr. Attorney has now only to prove the Word false, in order to make us Guilty.

Mr. Attorney. We have nothing to prove; you have confessed the printing and publishing; but if it was necessary (as I insist it is not), how can we prove a Negative? but I hope some Regard will be had to the Authorities that have been produced; and that supposing all the Words to be true, yet that will not help them; that Chief Justice Holt, in his Charge to the Jury, in the Case of Tutchin, made no Distinction, whether Tutchin's Papers were true or false; and as Chief Justice Holt has made no Distinction in that Case, so none ought to be made here; nor can it be shewn in all that Case, there was any Question made about their being false or true.

Mr. Hamilton. I did expect to hear, that a Negative cannot be proved; but every body knows there are many Exceptions to that general Rule; For if a Man is charged with killing another, or stealing his Neighbour's Horse; if he is innocent in the one Case, he may prove the Man said to be killed to be really alive; and the Horse said to be stolen, never to have been out of his Master's Stable, &c. and this I think is proving a Negative. But we will save Mr. Attorney the Trouble of proving a Negative, and take the Onus Probandi upon ourselves, and prove those very Papers that are called Libels to be true.

Mr. Chief Justice. You cannot be admitted, Mr. Hamilton, to give the Truth of a Libel in Evidence. A Libel is not to be justified; for it is nevertheless a Libel that it is true.

Mr. Hamilton. I am sorry the Court has so soon resolved upon that Piece of Law; I expected first to have been heard to that Point. I have not in all my Reading met with an Authority that says, we cannot be admitted to give the Truth in Evidence, upon an Information for a Libel.

Mr. Chief Justice. The Law is clear, that you cannot justify a Libel.

Mr. Hamilton. I own that, may it please your Honour, to be so; but with Submission I understand the Word, justified there, to be a Justification by Plea, as it is in the Case upon an Indictment for Murder, or an Assault and Battery; there the Prisoner cannot justify, but plead Not Guilty: Yet it will not be denied but he may, and always is admitted to give the Truth of the Fact, or any other Matter in Evidence, which goes to his Acquittal; as in Murder he may prove it was in Defence of his Life, his House, &c. and in Assault and Battery, he may give in Evidence, that the other Party struck first, and in both Cases he will be acquitted. And in this Sense I understand the Word justify, when applied to the Case before the Court.

Mr. Chief Justice. I pray shew that you can give the Truth of a Libel in Evidence.

Mr. Hamilton. I am ready, both from what I understand to be the Authorities in the Case, and from the Reason of the Thing, to shew that we may lawfully do so. But here I beg leave to observe, That Informations for Libels is a Child, if not born, yet nursed up, and brought to full Maturity, in the Court of the Star-Chamber.

Mr. Chief Justice. Mr. Hamilton, you'll find yourself mistaken; for in Coke's Institutes you'll find Informations for Libels, long before the Court of Star-Chamber.

Mr. Hamilton. I thank Your Honour; that is an Authority I did propose to speak to by and bye: But as you have mentioned it, I'll read that Authority now. I think it is in the 3 Co. Inst. under Title Libel; it is the Case of John de Northampton for a Letter wrote to Robert de Ferrers, one of the King's Privy-Council, (Coke 3. Inst. 174.) concerning Sir William Scot, Chief Justice, and his Fellows; but it does not appear to have been upon Information; and I have good Grounds to say it was upon Indictment, as was the Case of Adam de Ravensworth, just mentioned before by Lord Coke under the same Title; and I think there cannot be a greater, at least a plainer Authority for us, than the Judgment in the Case of John de Northampton, which my Lord has set down at large. Et quia prædictus Johannes cognovit dictam Literam per se scriptam Roberto de Ferrers, qui est de Concilio Regis, quæ litera continet in se nullam veritatem, &c. Now Sir, by this Judgment it appears the libellous Words were utterly false, and there the Falseness was the Crime, and is the Ground of that Judgment: And is not that what we contend for? Do not we insist that the Falseness makes the Scandal, and both make the Libel? And how shall it be known whether the Words are libellous, that is, true or false, but by admitting us to prove them true, since Mr. Attorney will not undertake to prove them false? Besides, is it not against Common Sense, that a Man should be punished in the same Degree for a true Libel (if any such Thing could be) as for a false one? I know it is said, That Truth makes a Libel the more provoking, and therefore the Offence is the greater, and consequently the Judgment should be the heavier. Well, suppose it were so, and let us agree for once, That Truth is a greater Sin than Falseness: Yet as the Offences are not equal, and as the Punishment is arbitrary, that is, according as the Judges in their Discretion shall direct to be inflicted; is it not absolutely necessary that they should know whether the Libel is true or false, that they may by that Means be able to proportion the Punishment? For would it not be a sad Case, if the Judges, for want of a due Information, should chance to give as severe a Judgment against a Man for writing or publishing a Lie, as for writing or publishing a Truth? And yet this (with Submission), as monstrous and ridiculous as it may seem to be, is the natural Consequence of Mr. Attorney's Doctrine, That Truth makes a worse Libel than Falseness, and must follow from his not proving our Papers to be false, or not suffering us to prove them to be true. But this is only reasoning upon the Case, and I will now proceed to shew, what in my Opinion will be sufficient to induce the Court to allow us to prove the Truth of the Words, which in the Information are called libellous. And first I think there cannot be a greater Authority for us, than the Judgment I just now mentioned in the Case of John de Northampton, and that was in early Times, and before the Star-Chamber came to its Fulness of Power and Wickedness. In that Judgment, as I observed, the Falseness of the Letter which was wrote, is assigned as the very Ground of the Sentence. And agree-

Mr. Chief Justice. Use the Court with Good-Manners, and you shall be allowed all the Liberty you can reasonably desire.

Mr. Hamilton. I thank your Honour. Then, Gentlemen of the Jury, it is to you we must now appeal, for Witnesses to the Truth of the Facts we have offered, and are denied the Liberty to prove; and let it not seem strange, that I apply myself to you in this manner; I am warranted so to do, both by Law and Reason. The Law supposes you to be summoned out of the Neighbourhood where the Fact is alleged to be committed; and the Reason of your being taken out of the Neighbourhood is, because you are supposed to have the best Knowledge of the Fact that is to be tried. And were you to find a Verdict against my Client, you must take upon you to say, the Papers referred to in the Information, and which we acknowledge we printed and published, are false, scandalous, and seditious; but of this I can have no Apprehension. You are Citizens of New York; you are really, what the Law supposes you to be, honest and lawful Men; and, according to my Brief, the Facts which we offer to prove were not committed in a Corner; they are notoriously known to be true; and therefore in your Justice lies our Safety. And as we are denied the Liberty of giving Evidence, to prove the Truth of what we have published, I will beg Leave to lay it down as a standing Rule in such Cases, That the suppressing of Evidence ought always to be taken for the strongest Evidence; and I hope it will have that Weight with you. But since we are not admitted to examine our Witnesses, I will endeavour to shorten the Dispute with Mr. Attorney; and to that End, I desire he would favour us with some standard Definition of a Libel, by which it may be certainly known, whether a Writing be a Libel, yea or not.

Mr. Att. Gen. The Books, I think, have given a very full Definition of a Libel: They say (1 Hawk. chap. 73. §. 1. & seq.) it is, 'in a strict Sense, taken for a malicious Defamation, expressed either in Writing or Printing, and tending either to blacken the Memory of one who is dead, or the Reputation of one who is alive, and to expose him to publick Hatred, Contempt, or Ridicule. §. 2. But it is said, That, in a larger Sense, the Notion of a Libel may be applied to any Defamation whatsoever, expressed either by Signs or Pictures, as by fixing up a Gallows against a Man's Door, or by painting him in a shameful and ignominious Manner. §. 3. And since the chief Cause for which the Law so severely punishes all Offences of this Nature, is the direct Tendency of them to a Breach of publick Peace, by provoking the Parties injured, their Friends and Families, to Acts of Revenge, which it would be impossible to restrain by the severest Laws, were there no Redress from publick Justice for Injuries of this Kind, which, of all others, are most sensibly felt; and since the plain Meaning of such Scandal, as is expressed by Signs, or Pictures, is as obvious to common Sense, and as easily understood by every common Capacity, and altogether as provoking as that which is expressed by Writing or Printing, why should it not be equally criminal? §. 4. And from the same Ground it seemeth also clearly to follow, That such Scandal, as is expressed in a scoffing and ironical Manner, makes a Writing as properly a Libel, as that which is expressed in direct Terms; as where a Writing, in a taunting manner reckoning up several Acts of publick Charity done by one, says, You will not play the Jew, nor the Hypocrite, and so goes on in a Strain of Ridicule to insinuate, that what he did was owing to his Vain-Glory; or where a Writing, pretending to recommend to one the Characters of several great Men for his Imitation, instead of taking notice of what they are generally esteemed famous for, pitched on such Qualities only which their Enemies charge them with the want of; as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his Courage, who is known to be a great Statesman, but no Soldier; and another to be imitated for his Learning, who is known to be a great General, but no Scholar, &c. which Kind of Writing is as well understood to mean only to upbraid the Parties with the want of these Qualities, as if it had directly and expressly done so.'

Mr. Hamilton. Ay, Mr. Attorney; but what certain standard Rule have the Books laid down, by which we can certainly know, whether the Words or the Signs are malicious? Whether they are defamatory? Whether they tend to the Breach of the Peace, and are a sufficient Ground to provoke a Man, his Family, or Friends, to Acts of Revenge, especially those of the ironical Sort of Words? And what Rule have you to know when I write ironically? I think it would be hard, when I say, Such a Man is a very worthy, honest Gentleman, and of fine Understanding, that therefore I meant he was a Knave or a Fool.

Mr. Att. Gen. I think the Books are very full: It is said in 1 Hawk. p. 193. just now read, 'That such Scandal as is expressed in a scoffing and ironical Manner, makes a Writing as properly a Libel, as that which is expressed in direct Terms; as where a Writing, in a taunting manner says, reckoning up several Acts of Charity done by one, You will not play the Jew or the Hypocrite; and so goes on to insinuate, that what he did was owing to his Vain-Glory, &c. which Kind of Writing is as well understood to mean only to upbraid the Parties with the want of these Qualities, as if it had directly and expressly done so.' I think nothing can be plainer or more full than these Words.

Mr. Hamilton. I agree the Words are very plain; and I shall not scruple to allow (when we are agreed that the Words are false and scandalous, and were spoken in an ironical and scoffing Manner, &c.) that they are really libellous; but here still occurs the Uncertainty, which makes the Difficulty to know what Words are scandalous, and what not; for you say, they may be scandalous, true or false: Besides, how shall we know whether the Words were spoke in a scoffing and ironical Manner, or seriously? Or how can you know, whether the Man did not think as he wrote? For, by your Rule, if he did, it is no Irony, and consequently no Libel. But, under Favour, Mr. Attorney, I think the same Book, and the same Section, will shew us the only Rule by which all these Things are to be known. The Words are these; 'which Kind of Writing is as well understood to mean only to upbraid the Parties with the want of these Qualities, as if they had directly and expressly done so.' Here, it is plain, the Words are scandalous, scoffing, and ironical, only as they are understood; I know no Rule laid down in the Books but this; I mean, as the Words are under-

Mr. Chief Justice. Mr. Hamilton, do you think it so hard to know when Words are ironical, or spoke in a scoffing Manner?

Mr. Hamilton. I own it may be known; but I insist, the only Rule to know is, as I do or can understand them: I have no other Rule to go by, but as I understand them.

Mr. Chief Justice. That is certain. All Words are libellous, or not, as they are understood. Those who are to judge of the Words, must judge whether they are scandalous or ironical, tend to the Breach of the Peace, or are seditious: There can be no Doubt of it.

Mr. Hamilton. I thank your Honour; I am glad to find the Court of this Opinion. Then it follows, that those twelve Men must understand the Words in the Information to be scandalous, that is to say, false; for I think it is not pretended they are of the ironical Sort; and when they understand the Words to be so, they will say we are guilty of publishing a false Libel, and not otherwise.

Mr. Chief Justice. No, Mr. Hamilton; the Jury may find that Mr. Zenger printed and published those Papers, and leave it to the Court to judge whether they are libellous: You know this is very common; it is in the Nature of a Special Verdict, where the Jury leave the Matter of Law to the Court.

Mr. Hamilton. I know, may it please your Honour, the Jury may do so; but I do likewise know they may do otherwise. I know they have the Right, beyond all Dispute, to determine both the Law and the Fact; and where they do not doubt of the Law, they ought to do so. This of leaving it to the Judgment of the Court, whether the Words are libellous or not, in effect, renders Juries useless (to say no worse) in many Cases; but this I shall have Occasion to speak to by-and-bye: And I will, with the Court's Leave, proceed to examine the Inconveniencies that must inevitably arise from the Doctrines Mr. Attorney has laid down; and I observe, in support of this Prosecution, he has frequently repeated the Words taken from the Case of Libel, Famous, in 5 Co. This is indeed the leading Case, and to which almost all the other Cases upon the Subject of Libels do refer; and I must insist upon saying, that, according as this Case seems to be understood by the Court and Mr. Attorney, it is not Law at this Day: For though I own it to be base and unworthy to scandalize any Man, yea, I think it is even villainous to scandalize a Person of publick Character; and I will go so far into Mr. Attorney's Doctrine as to agree, that if the Faults, Mistakes, nay even the Vices, of such a Person be private and personal, and don't affect the Peace of the Publick, or the Liberty or Property of our Neighbour, it is unmanly and unmannerly to expose them, either by Word or Writing. But when a Ruler of the People brings his Personal Failings, but much more his Vices, into his Administration, and the People find themselves affected by them, either in their Liberties or Properties, that will alter the Case mightily; and all the high Things that are said in favour of Rulers, and of Dignities, and upon the Side of Power, will not be able to stop People's Mouths when they feel themselves oppressed, I mean in a free Government. It is true, in Times past, it was a Crime to speak Truth; and in that terrible Court of Star-Chamber, many worthy and brave Men suffered for so doing; and yet, even in that Court, and in those bad Times, a great and good Man durst say, what I hope will not be taken amiss of me to say in this Place, to wit, 'The Practice of Informations for Libels is a sword in the Hands of a wicked King, and an arrant Coward, to cut down and destroy the Innocent; the one cannot, because of his high Station, and the other dares not, because of his Want of Courage, revenge himself in another manner.'

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Hamilton, have a care what you say; don't go too far neither: I don't like those Liberties.

Mr. Hamilton. Sure, Mr. Attorney, you won't make any Applications: All Men agree, that we are governed by the best of Kings; and I cannot see the Meaning of Mr. Attorney's Caution: My well-known Principles, and the Sense I have of the Blessings we enjoy under his present Majesty, makes it impossible for me to err, and, I hope, even to be suspected, in that Point of Duty to my King. May it please your Honour, I was saying, that notwithstanding all the Duty and Reverence claimed by Mr. Attorney to Men in Authority, they are not exempt from observing the Rules of common Justice, either in their private or publick Capacities; the Laws of our Mother-Country know no Exception. It is true, Men in Power are harder to be come at; for Wrongs they do, either to a private Person, or to the Publick; especially a Governor in the Plantations, where they insist upon an Exemption from answering Complaints of any Kind in their own Government. We are indeed told, and it is true, they are obliged to answer a Suit in the King's Courts at Westminster, for a Wrong done to any Person here: But do we not know how impracticable this is to most Men among us, to leave their Families, (who depend upon their Labour and Care for their Livelihood) and carry Evidences to Britain, and at a great, nay, a far greater Expence, than almost any of us are able to bear, only to prosecute a Governor for an Injury done here? But when the Oppression is general, there is no Remedy even that Way: No, our Constitution has (blessed be God) given us an Opportunity, if not to have such Wrongs redressed, yet, by our Prudence and Resolution, we may in a great measure prevent the committing of such Wrongs, by making a Governor sensible, that it is his Interest to be just to those under his Care; for such is the Sense that Men in general (I mean Freemen) have of common Justice, that when they come to know that a chief Magistrate abuses the Power with which he is intrusted for the Good of the People, and is attempting to turn that very Power against the Innocent, whether of high or low Degree, I say, Mankind in general seldom fail to interpose, and, as far as they can, prevent the Destruction of their Fellow Subjects. And has it not often been seen (and, I hope, it will always be seen) that when the Representatives of a free People are, by just Representations or Remonstrances, made sensible of the Sufferings of their Fellow Subjects, by the Abuse of Power in the Hands of a Governor, they have declared (and loudly too) that they were not obliged by any Law to support a Governor who goes about to destroy a Province or Colony, or their Privileges, which by his Majesty he was appointed, and by the Law he is bound, to protect and encourage. But I pray it may be considered, of what Use is this mighty Privilege, if every Man that suffers must be silent?

And if a Man must be taken up as a Libeller, for telling his Sufferings to his Neighbour, I know it may be answered, Have you not a Legislature? Have you not a House of Representatives, to whom you may complain? And to this I answer, We have: But what then? Is an Assembly to be troubled with every Injury done by a Governor? Or are they to hear of nothing but what those in the Administration will please to tell them? Or what Sort of a Trial must a Man have? And how is he to be remedied; especially if the Case were, as I have known it to happen in America in my Time, that a Governor who has Places (I will not say Pensions, for, I believe, they seldom give that to another which they can take to themselves) to bestow, and can or will keep the same Assembly (after he has modelled them so as to get a Majority of the House in his Interest) for near twice Seven Years together? I pray, what Redress is to be expected for an honest Man, who makes his Complaint against a Governor to an Assembly, who may properly enough be said to be made by the same Governor against whom the Complaint is made? The Thing answers itself. No, it is natural, it is a Privilege—I will go farther, it is a Right which all Freemen claim, and are intitled to, to complain when they are hurt; they have a Right publicly to remonstrate the Abuses of Power, in the strongest Terms, to put their Neighbours upon their Guard, against the Craft or open Violence of Men in Authority, and to assert with Courage the Sense they have of the Blessings of Liberty, the Value they put upon it, and their Resolution at all Hazards to preserve it, as one of the greatest Blessings Heaven can bestow. And when a House of Assembly, composed of honest Freemen, sees the general Bent of the People's Inclinations, that is it which must and will (I'm sure it ought to) weigh with a Legislature, in spite of all the Craft, Caressing, and Cajoling, made use of by a Governor, to divert them from hearkening to the Voice of their Country. As we all very well understand the true Reason, why Gentlemen take so much Pains, and make such great Interest, to be appointed Governors, so the Design of their Appointment is not less manifest. We know his Majesty's gracious Intentions to his Subjects; he desires no more than that his People in the Plantations should be kept up to their Duty and Allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain; that Peace may be preserved amongst them, and Justice impartially administered; that we may be governed so as to render us useful to our Mother-Country, by encouraging us to make and raise such Commodities as may be useful to Great Britain. But will any one say, that all or any of these good Ends are to be effected by a Governor's setting his People together by the Ears, and by the Assistance of one Part of the People to plague and plunder the other? The Commission which Governors bear, while they execute the Powers given them, according to the Intent of the Royal Grantor, expressed in their Commissions, requires and deserves very great Reverence and Submission; but when a Governor departs from the Duty enjoined him by his Sovereign, and acts as if he was less accountable than the Royal Hand that gave him all that Power and Honour which he is possessed of, this sets People upon examining and inquiring into the Power, Authority, and Duty of such a Magistrate, and to compare those with his Conduct; and just as far as they find he exceeds the Bounds of his Authority, or falls short in doing impartial Justice to the People under his Administration, so far they very often, in return, come short in their Duty to such a Governor. For Power alone will not make a Man beloved; and I have heard it observed, that the Man who was neither good nor wise before his being made a Governor, never mended upon his Preferment, but has been generally observed to be worse: For Men who are not endued with Wisdom and Virtue, can only be kept in Bounds by the Law; and by how much the further they think themselves out of the Reach of the Law, by so much the more wicked and cruel they are. I wish there were no Instances of the Kind at this Day. And wherever this happens to be the Case of a Governor, unhappy are the People under his Administration, and in the end he will find himself so too; for the People will neither love him nor support him. I make no doubt but there are those here, who are zealously concerned for the Success of this Prosecution, and yet I hope they are not many; and even some of those, I am persuaded (when they consider to what Lengths such Prosecutions may be carried, and how deeply the Liberties of the People may be affected by such Means) will not all abide by their present Sentiments; I say, not all: For the Man who, from an Intimacy and Acquaintance with a Governor, has conceived a personal Regard for him; the Man who has felt none of the Strokes of his Power; the Man who believes that a Governor has a Regard for him, and confides in him; it is natural for such Men to wish well to the Affairs of such a Governor; and as they may be Men of Honour and Generosity, may, and no doubt will, wish him Success, so far as the Rights and Privileges of their Fellow-Citizens are not affected. But as Men of Honour, I can apprehend nothing from them; they will never exceed that Point. There are others that are under stronger Obligations, and those are such as are in some Sort engaged in Support of a Governor's Cause, by their own or their Relations Dependence on his Favour for some Post or Preferment: Such Men have, what is commonly called, Duty and Gratitude to influence their Inclinations, and oblige them to go his Lengths. I know Men's Interests are very near to them, and they will do much, rather than forego the Favour of a Governor, and a Livelihood at the same Time; but I can with very just Grounds hope, even from those Men, whom I will suppose to be Men of Honour, and Conscience too, that when they see the Liberty of their Country is in Danger, either by their Concurrence, or even by their Silence, they will, like Englishmen, and like themselves, freely make a Sacrifice of any Preferment or Favour, rather than be accessory to destroying the Liberties of their Country, and entailing Slavery upon their Posterity. There are indeed another Set of Men, of whom I have no Hopes; I mean, such who lay aside all other Considerations, and are ready to join with Power in any Shape, and with many or any Sort of Men, by whose Means or Interest they may be assisted to gratify their Malice and Envy, against those whom they have been pleased to hate; and that for no other Reason, but because they are Men of Abilities and Integrity, or at least are possessed of some valuable Qualities far superior to their own. But as Envy is the Sin of the Devil, and therefore very hard, if at all, to be repented of, I will believe there are but few of this detestable and worthless Sort of Men, nor will their Opinions or Inclinations have any Influence upon this Trial. But to proceed: I beg Leave to insist, that the Right of complaining or remonstrating is natural; and the Restraint upon this natural Right is the Law only, and that those Restraints can only extend to what is false: For as it is Truth alone which can excuse or justify any Man for complaining of a bad Administration, I as frankly agree, that nothing ought to excuse a Man who raises a false Charge or Accusation, even against a private Person, and that no Manner of Allowance ought to be made to him who does so against a public Magistrate. Truth ought to govern the whole Affair of Libels, and yet the Party accused runs Risk enough even then; for if he fails of proving every Title of what he has wrote, and to the Satisfaction of the Court and Jury too, he may find to his Cost, that when the Prosecution is set on foot by Men in Power, it seldom wants Friends to favour it. And from thence (it is said) has arisen the great Diversity of Opinions among Judges, about what Words were or were not scandalous or libellous. I believe it will be granted, that there is not greater Uncertainty in any Part of the Law, than about Words of Scandal: It would be mispending of the Court's Time to mention the Cases; they may be said to be numberless; and therefore the utmost Care ought to be taken in following Precedents; and the Times when the Judgments were given, which are quoted for Authorities in the Case of Libels, are much to be regarded. I think it will be agreed, that ever since the Time of the Star-Chamber, where the most arbitrary and destructive Judgments and Opinions were given, that ever an Englishman heard of, at least in his own Country: I say, Prosecutions for Libels since the Time of that arbitrary Court, and until the glorious Revolution, have generally been set on foot at the Instance of the Crown, or its Ministers; and it is no small Reproach to the Law, that these Prosecutions were too often and too much countenanced by the Judges, who held their Places at Pleasure (a disagreeable Tenure to any Officer, but a dangerous one in the Case of a Judge). To say more to this Point may not be proper. And yet I cannot think it unwarrantable, to shew the unhappy Influence that a Sovereign has sometimes had, not only upon Judges, but even upon Parliaments themselves.

It has already been shewn, how the Judges differed in their Opinions about the Nature of a Libel, in the Case of the seven Bishops. There you see three Judges of one Opinion, that is, of a wrong Opinion, in the Judgment of the best Men in England, and one Judge of a right Opinion. How unhappy might it have been for all of us at this Day, if that Jury had understood the Words in that Information as the Court did? Or if they had left it to the Court to judge, whether the Petition of the Bishops was or was not a Libel? No! they took upon them, to their immortal Honour, to determine both Law and Fact, and to understand the Petition of the Bishops to be no Libel, that is, to contain no Falshood nor Sedition, and therefore found them Not Guilty. And remarkable is the Case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, who was fined 10,000 l. for writing a Letter, in which, it may be said, none saw any Scandal or Falshood but the Court and Jury; for that Judgment was afterwards looked upon as a cruel and detestable Judgment, and therefore was reversed by Parliament. Many more Instances might be given of the Complaisance of Court-Judges about those Times, and before; but I will mention only one Case more, and that is the Case of Sir Edward Hales, who, though a Roman Catholic, was by King James II. preferred to be a Colonel of his Army, notwithstanding the Statute of 25 Cha. II. Chap. 2. by which it is provided, That every one that accepts of an Office, Civil or Military, &c. shall take the Oaths, subscribe the Declaration, and take the Sacrament, within three Months, &c. otherwise he is disabled to hold such Office, and the Grant for the same to be null and void, and the Party to forfeit 500 l. Sir Edward Hales did not take the Oaths or Sacrament, and was prosecuted for the 500 l. for exercising the Office of a Colonel by the Space of three Months, without conforming as in the Act is directed. Sir Edward pleads, That the King, by his Letters Patent, did dispense with his taking the Oaths and Sacrament, and subscribing the Declaration, and had pardoned the Forfeiture of 500 l. And whether the King's Dispensation was good, against the said Act of Parliament? was the Question. I shall mention no more of this Case, than to shew how in the Reign of an arbitrary Prince, where Judges hold their Seats at Pleasure, their Determinations have not always been such as to make Precedents of, but the contrary; and so it happened in this Case, where it was solemnly judged, That, notwithstanding this Act of Parliament, made in the strongest Terms, for Preservation of the Protestant Religion, that yet the King had, by his Royal Prerogative, a Power to dispense with that Law; and Sir Edward Hales was acquitted by the Judges accordingly. (State Trials, Vol. VII. p. 612.) So the King's dispensing Power being by the Judges set up above the Act of Parliament, this Law, which the People looked upon as their chief Security against Popery and arbitrary Power, was, by this Judgment rendered altogether ineffectual. But this Judgment is sufficiently exposed by Sir Edward Atkins, late one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in his Enquiry into the King's Power of dispensing with penal Statutes; wherein it is shewn, who it was that first invented Dispensations; how they came into England; what ill Use has been made of them there; and all this principally owing to the Countenance given them by the Judges. He says of the dispensing Power, The Pope was the Inventor of it; our Kings have borrowed it from them; and the Judges have, from Time to Time, nursed and dressed it up, and given it Countenance; and it is still upon the Growth, and encroaching, till it has almost subverted all Law, and made the Regal Power absolute, not dissoluble. This seems not only to shew how far Judges have been influenced by Power, and how little Cases of this Sort, where the Prerogative has been in question in former Reigns, are to be relied upon for Law. But I think it plainly shews too, that a Man may use a greater Freedom with the Power of his Sovereign, and the Judges in Great Britain, than seems he may with the Power of a Governor in the Plantations, who is but a Fellow-Subject. Are the Words with which we are charged, these? Do Mr. Zenger's Papers contain any such Freedoms with his Governor, or his Council, as Sir Edward Atkins has taken with the Regal Power and the Judges in England? And yet I never heard of any Information brought against him for these Freedoms.

If then, upon the Whole, there is so great an Uncertainty among Judges (learned and great Men) in Matters of this Kind; if Power had so great an Influence on Judges, how cautious ought we to be in determining by their Judgments, especially in the Plantations, and in the Case of Libels? There is Heresy in Law as well as in Religion, and have changed very much; and we well know that it is not two Centuries ago that a Man would have been burnt as an Heretick, for owning such Opinions in Matters of Religion as are publicly wrote and printed at this Day. They were fallible Men, it seems, and we take the Liberty not only to differ from them in religious Opinions, but to condemn them and their Opinions too; and I must presume, that in taking these Freedoms in thinking and speaking about Matters of Faith or Religion, we are in the right: For, tho' it is said there are very great Liberties of this Kind taken in New-York, yet I have heard of no Information preferred by Mr. Attorney for any Offences of this Sort. From which I think it is pretty clear, that in New-York a Man may make very free with his God, but he must take special Care what he says of his Governor. It is agreed upon by all Men, that this is a Reign of Liberty; and while Men keep within the Bounds of Truth, I hope they may with Safety both speak and write their Sentiments of the Conduct of Men in Power, I mean of that Part of their Conduct only, which affects the Liberty or Property of the People under their Administration; were this to be denied, then the next Step may make them Slaves. For what Notions can be entertained of Slavery, beyond that of suffering the greatest Injuries and Oppressions, without the Liberty of complaining; or if they do, to be destroyed, Body and Estate, for so doing.

It is said, and insisted upon by Mr. Attorney: That Government is a sacred Thing; that it is to be supported and revered; it is Government that protects our Persons and Estates; that prevents Treasons, Murders, Robberies, Riots, and all the Train of Evils that overturns Kingdoms and States, and ruins particular Persons; and if these in the Administration, especially the supreme Magistrates, must have all their Conduct censured by private Men, Government cannot subsist. This is called a Licentiousness not to be tolerated. It is said, That it brings the Rulers of the People into Contempt, and their Authority not to be regarded, and so in the End the Laws cannot be put in Execution. These, I say, and such as these, are the general Topics insisted upon by Men in Power, and their Advocates. But I wish it might be considered at the same Time, how often it has happened, that the Abuse of Power has been the primary Cause of these Evils, and that it was the Injustice and Oppression of these great Men, which has commonly brought them into Contempt with the People. The Craft and Art of such Men is great, and who, that is the least acquainted with History or Law, can be ignorant of the specious Pretences, which have often been made use of by Men in Power, to introduce arbitrary Rule, and destroy the Liberties of a free People. I will give two Instances, and as they are Authorities not to be denied, nor can be misunderstood, I presume they will be sufficient.

The first is the Statute of 3d of Hen. VII. Cap. 1. The Preamble of the Statute will prove all, and more than I have alledged. It begins: The King Our Sovereign Lord remembereth, how by unlawful Maintinances, giving of Liveries, Signs and Tokens, &c. untrue Demeanings of Sheriffs in making of Pannels, and other untrue Returns, by taking of Money, by Injuries, by great Riots and unlawful Assemblies; the Policy and good Rule of this Realm is almost subverted; and for the not punishing these Inconveniencies, and by Occasion of the Premises, little or nothing may be found by Inquiry, &c. to the Increase of Murders, &c. and Unsureties of all Men living, and Losses of their Lands and Goods. Here is a fine and specious Pretence for introducing the Remedy, as it is called, which is provided by this Act; that is, instead of being lawfully accused by twenty-four good and lawful Men of the Neighbourhood, and afterwards tried by twelve like lawful Men, here is a Power given to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, the Keeper of the King's Privy Seal, or two of them, calling to them a Bishop, a temporal Lord, and other great Men mentioned in the Act, (who, it is to be observed, were all to be Dependants on the Court) to receive Information against any Person for any of the Misbehaviours recited in that Act, and by their Discretion to examine, and to punish them according to their Demerit.

The second Statute I proposed to mention, is the 11th of the same King, Chap. 3d, the Preamble of which Act has the like fair Pretences as the former; for the King calling to his Remembrance the good Laws made against the receiving of Liveries, &c. unlawful Extortions, Maintinances, Embracery, &c. unlawful Games, &c. and many other Great Encroachments, and Offences committed against many good Statutes, to the Displeasure of Almighty God, which, the Act says, could not, nor yet can, be conveniently punished by the due Order of the Law, except it were first found by Twelve Men, &c. which, for the Causes aforesaid, will not find nor yet present the Truth. And therefore the same Statute directs, that the Justices of Assize, and Justices of the Peace, shall upon Information for the King before them made, have full Power, by their Discretion, to hear and determine all such Offences. Here are two Statutes that are allowed to have given the deepest Wound to the Liberties of the People of England of any that I remember to have been made, unless it may be said that the Statute made in the Time of Henry VIIIth, by which his Proclamations were to have the Effect of Laws, might in its Consequence be worse. And yet we see the plausible Pretences found out by the great Men to procure these Acts. And it may justly be said, that by those Pretences the People of England were cheated or awed into the delivering up their ancient and sacred Right of Trials by Grand and Petit Juries. I hope to be excused for this Expression, seeing my Lord Coke calls it (4 Inst.) unjust and strange Act, that tended in its Execution to the great Displeasure of Almighty God, and the utter Subversion of the Common Law.

These, I think, make out what I alledged, and are flagrant Instances of the Influence of Men in Power, even upon the Representatives of a whole Kingdom. From all which, I hope, it will be agreed, that it is a Duty which all good Men owe to their Country, to guard against the unhappy Influence of ill Men when intrusted with Power, and especially against their Creatures and Dependents, who, as they are generally more necessitous, are surely more covetous and cruel. But it is worthy of Observation, that though the Spirit of Liberty was borne down and oppressed in England that Time, yet it was not lost; for the Parliament laid hold of the first Opportunity to free the Subject from the many insufferable Oppressions and Outrages committed upon their Persons and Estates by Colour of these Acts, the last of which being deemed the most grievous, was repealed in the first Year of Hen. VIIIth. Tho' it is to be observed, that Hen. VIIth, and his Creatures, reaped such great Advantages by the grievous Oppressions and Exactions, grinding the Faces of the poor Subjects, as my Lord Coke says, by Colour of this Statute by Information only, that a Repeal of this Act could never be obtained during the Life of that Prince. The other Statute being the favourite Law for supporting arbitrary Power, was continued much longer. The Execution of it was by the great Men of the Realm; and how they executed it, the Sense of the Kingdom, expressed in the 7th of Charles I. (by which the Court of Star-Chamber, the Soil where Informations grew rankest) will best declare. In that Statute Magna Charta, and the other Statutes made in the Time of Edw. III. which, I think, are no less than five, are particularly enumerated as Acts, by which the Liberties and Privileges of the People of England were secured to them, against such oppressive Courts as the Star-Chamber, and others of the like Jurisdiction. And the Reason assigned for their pulling down the Star-Chamber, is, That the Proceedings, Censures and Decrees of the Court of Star Chamber, even though the great Men of the Realm, nay, and a Bishop too (holy Man) were Judges, had by Experience been found to be an intolerable Burthen to the Subject, and the Means to introduce an arbitrary Power and Government. And therefore that Court was taken away, with all the other Courts in that Statute mentioned, having like Jurisdiction.

I do not mention this Statute, as if by the taking away the Court of Star-Chamber, the Remedy for many of the Abuses or Offences censured there, was likewise taken away; no, I only intend by it to shew, that the People of England saw clearly the Danger of trusting their Liberties and Properties to be tried, even by the greatest Men in the Kingdom, without the Judgment of a Jury of their Equals. They had felt the terrible Effects of leaving it to the Judgment of these great Men to say what was scandalous and seditious, false or ironical. And if the Parliament of England thought this Power of judging was too great to be trusted with Men of the first Rank in the Kingdom, without the Aid of a Jury, how sacred soever their Characters might be, and therefore restored to the People their original Right of Trial by Juries, I hope to be excused for insisting, that by the Judgment of a Parliament, from whence no Appeal lies, the Jury are the proper Judges of what is false at least, if not of what is scandalous and seditious. This is an Authority not to be denied, it is as plain as it is great, and to say, that this Act indeed did restore to the People Trials by Juries, which was not the Practice of the Star-Chamber, but that it did not give the Jurors any new Authority, or any Right to try Matters of Law, I say this Objection will not avail; for I must insist, that where Matter of Law is complicated with Matter of Fact, the Jury have a Right to determine both. As for Instance; upon Indictment for Murder, the Jury may, and almost constantly do, take upon them to judge whether the Evidence will amount to Murder or Manslaughter, and find accordingly; and I must say, I cannot see, why in our Case the Jury have not at least as good a Right to say, whether our News Papers are a Libel or no Libel, as another Jury has to say, whether killing of a Man is Murder or Manslaughter. The Right of the Jury to find such a Verdict as they in their Conscience do think is agreeable to their Evidence, is supported by the Authority of Bushe's Case, in Vaughan's Reports, pag. 135, beyond any doubt. For, in the Argument of that Case, the Chief-Justice who delivered the Opinion of the Court, lays it down for Law: (Vaughan's Rep. p. 150.) That in all General Issues, as upon Non. Cul. in Trespass, Non Tort. Nul Disseizin in Assize, &c. though it is Matter of Law, whether the Defendant is a Trespasser, a Disseizer, &c. in the particular Cases in Issue, yet the Jury find not (as in a special Verdict) the Fact of every Case, leaving the Law to the Court; but find for the Plaintiff or Defendant upon the Issue to be tried, wherein they resolve both Law and Fact complicitely. It appears by the same Case, that though the discreet and lawful Assistance of the Judge, by way of Advice to the Jury, may be useful, yet that Advice or Direction ought always to be upon Supposition, and not positive and upon Coercion. The Reason given in the same Book is, page 144, 147. Because the Judge (as Judge) cannot know what the Evidence is which the Jury have, that is, he can only know the Evidence given in Court; but the Evidence which the Jury have, may be of their own Knowledge, as they are returned of the Neighbourhood. They may also know from their own Knowledge, that what is sworn in Court is not true; and they may know the Witnesses to be stigmatized, to which the Court may be Strangers. But what is to my Purpose, is, that suppose that the Court did really know all the Evidence which the Jury know, yet in that Case it is agreed, That the Judge and Jury may differ in the Result of their Evidence, as well as two Judges may, which often happens. And in page 148. the Judge subjoins the Reason, why it is no Crime for a Jury to differ in Opinion from the Court, where he says, That a Man cannot see with another's Eye, nor hear by another's Ear; no more can a Man conclude or infer the Thing by another's Understanding or Reasoning. From all which (I insist) it is very plain, That the Jury are by Law at Liberty (without any Affront to the Judgment of the Court) to find both the Law and the Fact, in our Case, as they did in the Case I am speaking to, which I will beg leave just to mention, and it was this: Mr. Penn and Mead being Quakers, and having met in a peaceable Manner, after being shut out of their Meeting-House, preached in Grace-Church-Street, in London, to the People of their own Persuasion, and for this they were indicted; and it was said, That they with other Persons, to the Number of 300, unlawfully and tumultuously assembled, to the Disturbance of the Peace, &c. To which they pleaded, Not Guilty. And the Petit Jury being sworn to try the Issue between the King and the Prisoners, that is, whether they were Guilty, according to the Form of the Indictment? Here there was no Dispute but they were assembled together, to the Number mentioned in the Indictment; but, whether that Meeting together was riotously, tumultuously, and to the Disturbance of the Peace? was the Question. And the Court told the Jury it was, and ordered the Jury to find it so; For (said the Court) the Meeting was the Matter of Fact, and that is confessed, and we tell you it is unlawful, for it is against the Statute; and the Meeting being unlawful, it follows of course that it was tumultuous, and to the Disturbance of the Peace. But the Jury did not think fit to take the Court's Word for it, for they could neither find Riot, Tumult, or any Thing tending to the Breach of the Peace committed at that Meeting; and they acquitted Mr. Penn and Mead. In doing of which they took upon them to judge both the Law and the Fact; at which the Court (being themselves true Courtiers) were so much offended, that they fined the Jury 40 Marks a-piece, and committed them 'till paid. But Mr. Bushe, who valued the Right of a Juryman and the Liberty of his Country more than his own, refused to pay the Fine, and was resolved (though at a great Expence and Trouble too) to bring, and did bring, his Habeas Corpus, to be relieved from his Fine and Imprisonment, and he was released accordingly; and this being the Judgment in his Case, it is established for Law, That the Judges, how great soever they be, have no Right to fine, imprison, or punish a Jury, for not finding a Verdict according to the Direction of the Court. And this, I hope, is sufficient to prove, that Jurymen are to see with their own Eyes, to hear with their own Ears, and to make use of their own Consciences and Understandings in judging of the Lives, Liberties, or Estates of their Fellow-Subjects. And so I have done with this Point.

This is the second Information, for libelling of a Governor, that I have known in America. And the first, though it may look like a Romance, yet, as it is true, I will beg Leave to mention it. Governor Nicholson, who happened to be offended with one of his Clergy, met him one Day upon the Road; and as it was usual with him (under the Protection of his Commission) used the poor Parson with the worst of Language, threatened to cut off his Ears, slit his Nose, and at last to shoot him through the Head. The Parson, being a reverend Man, continued all this Time uncovered in the Heat of the Sun, until he found an Opportunity to fly for it; and coming to a Neighbour's House, felt himself very ill of a Fever, and immediately writes for a Doctor; and that his Physician might the better judge of his Distemper, he acquainted him with the Usage he had received; concluding, that the Governor was certainly mad; for that no Man in his Senses would have behaved in that Manner. The Doctor unhappily shews the Parson's Letter: The Governor came to hear of it, and so an Information was preferred against the poor Man for saying, He believed the Governor was mad; and it was laid in the Information to be false, scandalous, and wicked, and wrote with Intent to move Sedition among the People, and bring his Excellency into Contempt. But by an Order from the late Queen Anne, there was a Stop put to the Prosecution, with sundry others set on Foot by the same Governor, against Gentlemen of the greatest Worth and Honour in that Government.

And may not I be allowed, after all this, to say, that, by a little Countenance, almost any Thing which a Man writes, may, with the Help of that useful Term of Art called an Innuendo, be construed to be a Libel, according to Mr. Attorney's Definition of it, That whether the Words are spoke of a Person of a publick Character, or of a private Man, whether dead or living, good or bad, true or false, all make a Libel; for, according to Mr. Attorney, after a Man hears a Writing read, or reads and repeats it, or laughs at it, they are all punishable. It is true, Mr. Attorney is so good as to allow, after the Party knows it to be a Libel; but he is not so kind as to take the Man's Word for it.

Here were several Cases put to shew, that though what a Man writes of a Governor was true, proper, and necessary, yet, according to the foregoing Doctrine, it might be construed to be a Libel. But Mr. Hamilton, after the Trial was over, being informed, that some of the Cases he had put had really happened in this Government, he declared he had never heard of any such; and as he meant no personal Reflections, he was sorry he had mentioned them, and therefore they are omitted here.

Mr. Hamilton. If a Libel is understood in the large and unlimited Sense urged by Mr. Attorney, there is scarce a Writing I know that may not be called a Libel, or scarce any Person safe from being called to Account as a Libeller: For Moses, meek as he was, libelled Cain; and who is it that has not libelled the Devil? For, according to Mr. Attorney, it is no Justification to say one has a bad Name. Echard has libelled our good King William; Burnet has libelled, among many others, King Charles and King James; and Ropin has libelled them all. How must a Man speak or write, or what must he hear, read, or sing? Or when must he laugh, so as to be secure from being taken up as a Libeller? I sincerely believe, that were some Persons to go through the Streets of New York now-a-days, and read a Part of the Bible, if it was not known to be such, Mr. Attorney, with the Help of his Innuendos, would easily turn it into a Libel. As for Instance, Jf. xi. 16. The Leaders of the People cause them to err, and they that are led by them are destroyed. But should Mr. Attorney go about to make this a Libel, he would read it thus: The Leaders of the People [Innuendo, the Governor and Council of New-York] cause them [Innuendo, the People of this Province] to err, and they [the Governor and Council meaning] are destroyed [Innuendo, are deceived into the Loss of their Liberty]; which is the worst Kind of Destruction. Or if some Persons should publicly repeat, in a Manner not pleasing to his Betters, the 10th and the 11th Verses of the 14th Chap. of the same Book, there Mr. Attorney would have a large Field to display his Skill, in the artful Application of his Innuendos. The Words are; His Watchmen are blind, they are ignorant, &c. Yea, they are greedy Dogs, that can never have enough. But to make them a Libel, there is, according to Mr. Attorney's Doctrine, no more wanting but the Aid of his Skill, in the right adapting his Innuendos. As for Instance; His Watchmen [Innuendo, the Governor's Council and Assembly] are blind, they are ignorant, [Innuendo, will not see the dangerous Designs of his Excellency.] Yea, they [the Governor and Council meaning] are greedy Dogs, which can never have enough [Innuendo, enough of Riches and Power.] Such an Instance as this seems only fit to be laughed at; but I may appeal to Mr. Attorney himself, whether these are not at least equally proper to be applied to his Excellency, and his Ministers, as some of the Inferences and Innuendos in his Information against my Client. Then if Mr. Attorney is at Liberty to come into Court, and file an Information in the King's Name, without Leave, who is secure, whom he is pleased to prosecute as a Libeller? And as the Crown Law is contended for in bad Times, there is no Remedy for the greatest Oppression of this Sort, even though the Party prosecuted is acquitted with Honour. And give me Leave to say, as great Men as any in Britain have boldly asserted, that the Mode of prosecuting by Information (when a Grand Jury will not find Billa vera) is a national Grievance, and greatly inconsistent with that Freedom which the Subjects of England enjoy in most other Cases. But if we are so unhappy as not to be able to ward off this Stroke of Power directly, let us take care not to be cheated out of our Liberties by Forms and Appearances; let us always be sure that the Charge in the Information is made out clearly, even beyond a Doubt; for though Matters in the Information may be called Firm upon Trial, yet they may be, and often have been found to be, Matters of Substance upon giving Judgment.

Gentlemen, the Danger is great, in Proportion to the Mischief that may happen through our too great Credulity. A proper Confidence in a Court is commendable; but as the Verdict (whatever it is) will be yours, you ought to refer no Part of your Duty to the Discretion of other Persons. If you should be of Opinion, that there is no Falseness in Mr. Zenger's Papers, you will, nay, (pardon me for the Expression) you ought to say so; because you don't know whether others (I mean the Court) may be of that Opinion. It is your Right to do so, and there is much depending upon your Resolution, as well as upon your Integrity.

The Loss of Liberty, to a generous Mind, is worse than Death; and yet we know there have been those in all Ages, who, for the Sake of Preference, or some imaginary Honour, have freely lent a helping Hand to oppress, nay, to destroy their Country. This brings to my Mind that Saying of the immortal Brutus, when he looked upon the Creatures of Cæsar, who were very great Men, but by no Means good Men: "Yai Romans, said Brutus, if yet I may call you so, consider what you are doing; remember that you are assisting Cæsar to forge those very Chains, which one Day he will make yourselves wear." This is what every Man (that values Freedom) ought to consider: He should act by Judgment, and not by Affection or Self-interest; for where those prevail, no Ties of either Country or Kindred are regarded; as, upon the other Hand, the Man who loves his Country, prefers its Liberty to all other Considerations, well knowing that without Liberty Life is a Misery.

A famous Instance of this you will find in the History of another brave Roman, of the same Name; I mean Lucius Junius Brutus, whose Story is well known; and therefore I shall mention no more of it, than only to shew the Value he put upon the Freedom of his Country. After this great Man, with his Fellow-Citizens, whom he had engaged in the Cause, had banished Tarquius the Proud, the last King of Rome, from a Throne which he ascended by inhuman Murders, and possessed by the most dreadful Tyranny and Proscriptions, and had by this Means amassed incredible Riches, even sufficient to bribe to his Interest many of the young Nobility of Rome, to assist him in recovering the Crown; but the Plot being discovered, the principal Conspirators were apprehended, among whom were two of the Sons of Junius Brutus. It was absolutely necessary that some should be made Examples of, to deter others from attempting the restoring of Tarquius, and destroying the Liberty of Rome. And to effect this it was, that Lucius Junius Brutus, one of the Consuls of Rome, in the Presence of the Roman People, sat Judge, and condemned his own Sons, as Traitors to their Country: And to give the last Proof of his exalted Virtue, and his Love of Liberty, he, with a Firmness of Mind, (only becoming so great a Man) caused their Heads to be struck off in his own Presence; and when he observed that his rigid Virtue occasioned a Sort of Horror among the People, it is observed he only said, "My Fellow-Citizens, do not think that this proceeds from any Want of natural Affection: No, the Death of the Sons of Brutus can affect Brutus only; but the Loss of Liberty will affect my Country." Thus highly was Liberty esteemed in those Days, that a Father could sacrifice his Sons to save his Country. But why do I go to Heathen Rome, to bring Instances of the Love of Liberty? The best Blood in Britain has been shed in the Cause of Liberty; and the Freedom we enjoy at this Day, may be said to be (in a great Measure) owing to the glorious Stand the famous Hampden, and others of our Countrymen, [in the Case of Ship-Money; see his Trial in State Trials, Vol. I. p. 505.] made against the arbitrary Demands, and illegal Impositions, of the Times in which they lived; who, rather than give up the Rights of Englishmen, and submit to pay an illegal Tax of no more, I think, than three Shillings, resolved to undergo, and, for the Liberty of their Country, did undergo the greatest Extremities in that arbitrary and terrible Court of Star-Chamber; to whose arbitrary Proceedings (it being composed of the principal Men of the Realm, and calculated to support arbitrary Government) no Bounds or Limits could be set, nor could any other Hand remove the Evil but a Parliament.

Power may justly be compared to a great River; while kept within its due Bounds, it is both beautiful and useful; but when it overflows its Banks, it is then too impetuous to be stemmed; it bears down all before it, and brings Destruction and Desolation wherever it comes. If then this is the Nature of Power, let us at least do our Duty, and like wise Men (who value Freedom) use our utmost Care to support Liberty, the only Bulwark against lawless Power, which, in all Ages, has sacrificed to its wild Lust, and boundless Ambition, the Blood of the best Men that ever lived.

I hope to be pardoned, Sir, for my Zeal upon this Occasion: It is an old and wise Caution, That when our Neighbour's House is on Fire, we ought to take care of our own. For though, blessed be God, I live in a Government where Liberty is well understood, and freely enjoyed; yet Experience has shewn us all (I'm sure it has to me), that a bad Precedent in one Government, is soon set up for an Authority in another; and therefore I cannot but think it mine, and every honest Man's Duty, that (while we pay all due Obedience to Men in Authority) we ought at the same time to be upon our Guard against Power, wherever we apprehend that it may affect ourselves or our Fellow-Subjects.

I am truly very unequal to such an Undertaking, on many Accounts. And you see I labour under the Weight of many Years, and am borne down with great Infirmities of Body; yet old and weak as I am, I should think it my Duty, if required, to go to the utmost Part of the Land, where my Service could be of any Use, in assisting to quench the Flame of Prosecutions upon Informations, set on Foot by the Government, to deprive a People of the Right of remonstrating, (and complaining too) of the arbitrary Attempts of Men in Power. Men who injure and oppress the People under their Administration, provoke them to cry out and complain; and then make that very Complaint the Foundation for new Oppressions and Prosecutions. I wish I could say there were no Instances of this Kind. But to conclude; the Question before the Court, and you, Gentlemen of the Jury, is not of small nor private Concern; it is not the Cause of a poor Printer, nor of New-York alone, which you are now trying: No! It may, in its Consequence, affect every Freeman that lives under a British Government on the Main of America. It is the best Cause; it is the Cause of Liberty; and I make not doubt but your upright Conduct, this Day, will not only intitle you to the Love and Esteem of your Fellow-Citizens; but every Man, who prefers Freedom to a Life of Slavery, will bless and honour you, as Men who have baffled the Attempt of Tyranny; and, by an impartial and uncorrupt Verdict, have laid a noble Foundation for securing to ourselves, our Posterity, and our Neighbours, that to which Nature and the Laws of our Country have given us a Right—the Liberty—both of exposing and opposing arbitrary Power (in these Parts of the World, at least) by speaking and writing Truth.

Here Mr. Attorney observed, that Mr. Hamilton had gone very much out of the Way, and had made himself and the People very merry; but that he had been citing Cases not at all to the Purpose. He said, there was no such Cause as Mr. Busb's, or Sir Edward Hale's, before the Court; and he could not find out what the Court or Jury had to do with Dispensations, Riots, or unlawful Assemblies: All that the Jury had to consider of, was Mr. Zenger's printing and publishing two scandalous Libels, which very highly reflected on his Excellency, and the principal Men concerned in the Administration of this Government, which is confessed; that is, the Printing and Publishing of the Journals set forth in the Information is confessed. And concluded, that as Mr. Hamilton had confessed the Printing, and there could be no doubt but they were scandalous Papers, highly reflecting upon his Excellency, and the principal Magistrates in the Province; and therefore he made no doubt but the Jury would find the Defendant guilty, and would refer to the Court for their Direction.

Mr. Chief Justice. Gentlemen of the Jury, the great Pains Mr. Hamilton has taken to shew how little Regard Juries are to pay to the Opinion of the Judges, and his insisting so much upon the Conduct of some Judges in Trials of this Kind, is done, no doubt, with a Design that you should take but very little Notice of what I may say upon this Occasion. I shall therefore only observe to you, that, as the Facts or Words in the Information are confessed, the only Thing that can come in question before you is, whether the Words, as set forth in the Information, make a Libel; and that is a Matter of Law, no doubt, and which you may leave to the Court. But I shall trouble you no further with any Thing more of my own; but read to you the Words of a learned and upright Judge, in a Case of the like Nature. [Lord Chief Justice Holt, in Tutchin's Case, State Trials, Vol. V. p. 542.]

'To say that corrupt Officers are appointed to administer Affairs, is certainly a Reflection on the Government. If People should not be called to account for possessing the People with an ill Opinion of the Government, no Government can subsist; for it is necessary for all Governments that the People should have a good Opinion of it; and nothing can be worse to any Government, than to endeavour to procure Animositities. As to the Management of it, this has been always looked upon as a Crime, and no Government can be safe without it be punished.

'Now you are to consider, whether these Words I have read to you do not tend to beget an ill Opinion of the Administration of the Government; to tell us, that those that are employed know nothing of the Matter, and those that do know are not employed. Men are not adapted to Offices, but Offices to Men, out of a particular Regard to their Interest, and not to their Fitness for the Places. This is the Purport of these Papers.'

Mr. Hamilton. I humbly beg your Honour's Pardon; I am very much misapprehended, if you suppose what I said was so designed.

Sir, you know I made an Apology for the Freedom I found myself under a Necessity of using upon this Occasion. I said, there was nothing personal designed; it arose from the Nature of our Defence.

The Jury withdrew, and in a small time returned; and being asked by the Clerk,

Whether they were agreed of their Verdict, and whether John Peter Zenger was guilty of printing and publishing the Libels in the Information mentioned?

They answered, by Thomas Hunt, their Foreman, Not Guilty.

Upon which there were three Huzzas in the Hall, which was crouded with People; and the next Day I was discharged from my Imprisonment.

XXIII. Remarks on the Trial of JOHN PETER ZENGER, Printer of the New-York Weekly Journal who was lately tried and acquitted, for printing and publishing two Libels against the Government of that Province.

S I R,

It has been a common Remark among those who have observed upon the capricious Dispensations of Fortune, that great Events are often produced by Instruments that are not seemingly adequate; nay, that the same apparent Causes have quite contrary Effects; and the Road that leads one Man to Wealth, Honour, and Power, sometimes carries another to Poverty, Infamy, and Ruin. Hence comes that confused Distribution of Axes and Coronets, Halsters and Ribbons, which History displays by numerous shocking Examples; and thus it is, that Fate seems to play at Crofs-purposes with Mankind; or to speak in Scripture-phrase, in this Sense as well as many others, the Wisdom of this World is Foolishness.

I find myself drawn into these grave Reflections, by reading the Trial of John Peter Zenger, at New-York, upon an Information for printing and publishing a Libel. This Piece, it seems, has been lately printed there, and was put into my Hand another Day by a Friend, who has both a general Acquaintance and a Correspondence with the Northern Colonies, as a rare Production, containing many Things new and surprising. And, in truth, I must say it affords a lively Specimen, in Miniature, of the Justness of the foregoing Remarks: I mean that Part of it which is attributed to Andrew Hamilton, Esq. of Philadelphia, Barrister at Law; together with the Sequel, describing the munificent Behaviour of the Citizens, in Common Council assembled, to the learned Gentleman, for his singular Performance on that Occasion.

I must at the same Time assure you, that if Zenger's Trial had been printed by Order of the Court that tried him, or from a Copy taken by a private Hand at the Trial, or by any other Means that excluded Mr. Hamilton's Approbation or Privity, I should have enjoyed my own Opinion, without troubling you or any body else about it, and had the Charity to resolve all the Extravagancies that occur throughout his Declamation, into a right Discernment of the People he talked to, and a Dexterity in captivating them, which had its Effect in the Acquittal of his Client. But when a Gentleman of the Bar takes the Pains to write over a long Discourse (he being the only Lawyer, of either Side, who gave the Printer his Notes), in order to send it abroad through the World, as a Specimen of his Abilities, Sentiments and Principles; as a solemn Argument in the Law, fit to see the Light, and abide the Test in all Places; and, above all, as a Task of Duty, which he thought himself bound to perform, even by going to the utmost Parts of the Land for the Purpose; and all this, without Fee or Reward, under the Weight of many Years, and great Infirmities of Body: When a Barrister, I say, thus becomes a Volunteer for Error, and presumes to obtrude bad Law and false Reasoning upon the Sense of Mankind, because the sage Magistrates of New-York have put their Seal to it; I think myself at Liberty, without using any other Apology, to exercise the judging Privilege of a Reader, since the Gentleman himself has put me into the Possession of it.

In doing this, I shall not in the least gratify a vain Itch of Writing; for there are no extraordinary Talents necessary for refuting gross Absurdities; but I shall have the honest Merit of endeavouring to undeceive such of my Fellow-Subjects in the Plantations as may, from the late uncommon Success of the Doctrine, mistake the Liberty of the Press for a Licence to write and publish infamous Things of their Superiors, and of all others, at their Pleasure, provided they write and publish nothing but what is true. In the next Place, I would preserve, as far as I am able, the Dignity of the Profession of the Law in these remote Parts of the British Dominions; and prevent its learned Professors in England, who probably will see the renowned Piece above mentioned (if we may judge from the Industry used in dispersing it), from suspecting that all their American Brethren use the like Arts to gain Popularity and honourable Rewards. The former, having the Advantage of going daily to the great School of Law at Westminster, are already apt enough to think meanly of the Accomplishments of the latter, who are far removed from Instruction; and their Opinion must be strongly confirmed in this Respect, if such a Rhapsody, as was uttered at New-York, should not only be applauded and rewarded publicly there, but printed and scattered in Reams through the other Colonies, without being followed by a suitable Animadversion.

Neither will it be amiss to take some Notice, in this Place, of the Quackery of the Profession in general, without any particular Application, as it has been practised with vast Success in some of our Colonies. You will often see (if common Fame may be trusted) a self-sufficient enterprising Lawyer, compounded of something between a Politician and a Broker, who, making the Foibles of the Inhabitants his capital Study, and withal taking Advantage of the Weakness of his Judges, the Ignorance of some of his Brethren, the Modesty of others, and the honest Scruples of a third Sort (without having any of his own), becomes insensibly an Oracle in the Courts, and acquires by Degrees a Kind of Dominion over the Minds, as well as the Estates of the People; an Influence never to be obtained but by the Help of Qualities very different from Learning and Integrity. Wherever such a Man is found, the Wonder is not great, if, from a long Habit of advancing what he pleases, and having it received for Law, he comes in Time to fancy that what he pleases to advance is really Law.

I have taken the Pains, during this short Vacation between our monthly Courts, candidly to examine this new System of Libels, lately composed and propagated on the Continent; the Discovery of which cost the good City of New-York five Ounces and a half of Gold, a Scrip of Parchment, and three Latin Sentences. My Intention is to consider Things, not Persons, having no other Knowledge of the Gentleman principally concerned, than what is derived from the Paper now before me; and being wholly a Stranger to the Merit of those Disputes that gave Rise to the Prosecution of this Printer.

Much less shall I turn Advocate for any lawless Power in Government: God forbid I should be guilty of such a Prostitution, who know by Experience of what Stuff they are commonly made; the wrong Impressions they are apt to receive of themselves and others; their Passions, Prejudices, and Pursuits; though, when all reasonable Allowances are made for certain Circumstances that attend their Mission from home, and their Situation abroad, a considerate Person may be tempted to think—it is well they are no worse than they are.

But to come to my Remarks on Mr. Zenger's Trial.

In considering the Defence made for the Defendant (Mr. Zenger) by his Counsel (Mr. Hamilton), upon Not Guilty pleaded to an Information for printing and publishing a Libel, it is not to the Purpose to inquire how far the Matters charged in the Information are in their Nature libellous; nor whether the Innuendoes are properly used, to apply the Matters to Persons, Things and Places. It is only necessary to examine the Truth of the single Proposition, upon which the whole Defence is grounded, and to which the several Parts of it refer; namely, That the several Matters charged in the Information are not, and cannot be libellous, because they are true in fact.

This is the cardinal Point upon which the learned Gentleman's whole Argument turns, and which he lays down, over and over, as the first Principle that governs the Doctrine of Libels; and accordingly he confesses the printing and publishing of the Papers laid in the Information, and puts it upon the King's Counsel to prove the Facts contained in them to be false; alledging, at the same Time, that, unless that were done, the Defendant could not be guilty; but if the same were proved to be false, he would own the Papers containing them to be Libels. To this, it seems, the Attorney General answered, that a Negative is not to be proved; and the other replied in these Words, which I choose to lay down, that I may not be thought to do him wrong—I did expect to hear that a Negative cannot be proved; but every body knows, there are many Exceptions to that general Rule: For if a Man is charged with killing another, or stealing his Neighbour's Horse; if he is innocent in the one Case, he may prove the Man said to be killed to be still alive; and the Horse said to be stolen, never to have been out of his Master's Stable, &c. and this, I think, is proving a Negative. Now, I must think, that it is strange a Gentleman of his Sagacity, who owns he was prepared for the Objection, could not yet hit upon some of these many Exceptions which every body knows; for he does no more than give two Instances of one Affirmative being destroyed by another, that infers a Negative of the first; at which Rate most Negatives may be proved, and then the old Rule may be discarded. Thus, if it is shewn that a Man is alive, it follows clearly that he was not killed; and if a Horse is proved to have been always in his Master's Stable (for this is what must be understood of his being never out of the Stable), it certainly follows that he could not be stolen. So that, according to this new Scheme of Proof, he who is accused of killing a Man, or stealing a Horse, is to be put upon proving that he did not kill or steal, because it is possible that such Proof may be had sometimes; And so, in the principal Case, if a Question arises whether a certain Magistrate has done particular Acts of Injustice or not, the Method is to shew that he did not do such Acts, not that he did them. I have touched upon this, not for its Importance, but as a Specimen of the learned Barrister's Manner of Reasoning, and of the Spirit with which he sets out from the Beginning.

At length, however, he takes the Onus probandi upon himself; and rather than the Thing should go unproved, generously undertakes, at his Client's Peril, to prove the Matters, charged in the Information as libellous, to be true. But I would be glad to know, by the way, how this undertaking Gentleman could have proved the Truth of diverse Facts contained in the Paper which the Defendant published, supposing the Court had been so much overseen as to let him into a Proceeding of this Sort. Could he prove, for Example, that Judges were arbitrarily displaced, and new Courts erected, in the Province of New-York, without Consent of the Legislature? For, I am credibly informed, there never was a Pretence or Surmise of more than

* These Remarks were written by two eminent Lawyers in one of our Colonies in America, immediately after the Publication of the Trial of Mr. Zenger, it seems had been industriously spread over that Part of the World, before it reached England.

As the Doctrines contained in that Trial, or rather in the Speech of Mr. Hamilton, are of so new a Cast, and so absolutely contradictory to all the Resolutions and Judgments that have been settled and established for so many Ages, and by Judges of the highest Reputation, and most unquestionable Characters, for their Integrity, Virtues and Abilities, it could not be imagined so wild and idle an Harangue could have had any Weight, or have met with any Reception here, where the Law relating to Libels have been so often canvassed, and are generally so well understood; and therefore the Person to whom these Remarks were sent, never thought of making any other Use of them than to satisfy his own Curiosity, and that of his Friends.

But seeing, to his great Surprise, that this extraordinary Declaration has been mentioned with an Air of Applause and Triumph in several News-Papers, as that out some new Lights with regard to the Doctrine of Libels; and, upon the Credit of that Recommendation, the whole Trial not only twice printed here, but scattered in Scraps in the publick News-Papers, whereby many well meaning People may be deceived, and led into wrong Notions concerning the Laws of their Country, this Point: He has thought fit to communicate these Remarks to the Publick, in order to remove any Mistakes or Errors that Persons may fall into for want of an adequate Judgment in these Matters; and the rather, because if such false Opinions should happen to influence the Conduct or Practice of any, the Consequences may be very dangerous; it being an established Maxim in our Law, that neither Ignorance nor Mistake is an Excuse to any one who has broke it, from the Penalty of it. Professed to the Remarks.

being displaced, or more than one Court erected; under Mr. Cofby's Administration, both which happened upon one and the same Occasion. Now I would not have this esteemed a captious Exception, when I have to deal with a Man of Law, who must or ought to know, that, if such a Justification as he offered were at all allowable, it ought to be full and express, so as to leave no Room for a Libeller to multiply and exaggerate Facts at his Pleasure, when he is disposed to traduce Persons in Authority; there being a manifest Difference between a single Act of Power without or against Law (from which perhaps few Governments have been free), and an habitual Abuse of Power in repeated instances of the same Species. I would further ask, how he could prove, that the Libel itself was an End, and that Trials by Jury were taken away when a Governor pleased; for, if I mistake not, he was at that Time speaking to a Jury in a regular Court of Law, and in a Prosecution which the Governor had much at Heart (as the Gentleman himself insinuates), and would have been highly pleased to convict his Client; yet would not attempt it, but in the ordinary Course of Trial by a Jury; and then too, could not find a Jury that would convict him. I think I am warranted in putting these Questions; even by the Authority of the Barrister himself, who says, — Truth ought to govern the whole Affair of Libels, and yet the Party accused runs Risque enough even then; for if he fails of proving every Title he has wrote, and to the Satisfaction of the Court and Jury too, he may find to his Cost, &c.

But, for the present, I will suppose Mr. Hamilton was able to prove all these Things; nay, that the Jury knew them all to be true. I will go farther, and allow, that Juries in criminal Cases may determine both Law and Fact, when they are complicated, if they will take such a Decision upon their Consciences (which is almost the only Point in which I can have the Honour of agreeing with him); yet, after all these Concessions, the main Question rests still between us, viz. Whether a Writing can be a Libel, in legal Acceptation, if the Matter contained in it be true? He is pleased, indeed, to express his Dislike of infamous Papers, even when they are true, if levelled against private Vices and Faults; and in this Case he calls them base, unworthy, scandalous, unmanly and unmannerly. But surely it might be expected, when a Point of Law was in question, that he would have told us, whether they were lawful or unlawful; innocent or criminal, since these last are the only Epithets that were relative to his Subject, though the first might have their Weight in a Sermon or moral Essay. But, it is plain, he was aware of the Consequence of being explicit upon this Head; for had he owned such Writings to be lawful, because true, he would have alarmed the common Sense of Mankind, by opening a Door for exposing at Mercy the Frailties, Vices, Defects and Misfortunes of every Person, high and low, which must inevitably destroy the Peace of Families, and beget ill Blood and Disorders. If, on the other Hand, he had acknowledged such Writings to be unlawful, inasmuch as they concerned private Miscarriages and Transactions; but that every Man might write as much Truth as he pleased about the Administration of the Government, not only by pointing out Faults and Mistakes, but by publishing his own Comment and Inferences, in order to fill the Minds of the People with all the Jealousies and Apprehensions his Imagination can form; it must have shocked Men of Understanding to be thus told, that the Law had provided against private Quarrels and Breaches of the Peace, occasioned by virulent Writing; but had taken no care to prevent Sedition and publick Disturbance arising from the same Cause.

His favourite Position, however, was to be maintained at all Events; and therefore, when the Chief-Justice rightly instructed him, that he could not be admitted to give the Truth of a Libel in Evidence, that the Law was clear that he could not justify a Libel; for it is nevertheless a Libel, though it is true; the discerning Gentleman was pleased to understand by the Word justify, a Justification by Plea, as it is in the Case of an Indictment for Murder, or an Assault and Battery: There (says he) the Prisoner cannot justify, but plead Not Guilty; yet in Murder, he may prove it was in Defence of his Life, his House, &c. and in Assault and Battery, he may give in Evidence, that the other Party struck first; and in both these Cases he will be acquitted.

If the Party in either Case is acquitted, the Reason is, I presume, because the Matter given in Evidence amounts to a Justification in Law of the Fact charged on him, and is equivalent to a Confession and Avoidance in pleading. In like manner, if Truth be a sufficient Justification of a Libel, the Defendant will be acquitted upon proving the Contents of his Paper to be true. Now let it be observed, that the Words of the Book which the Chief-Justice relied on are these: — It is far from being a Justification of a Libel, that the Contents thereof are true;—since the greater Appearance there is of Truth in any malicious Invektive, so much the more provoking it is. That this is good Law, I hope I shall be able to shew fully hereafter, as I shall shew, in the mean Time, that it is an express Authority against the well-read Barrister, who declares, he has not in all his reading met with an Authority that says, he cannot be admitted to give the Truth in Evidence, &c.

He seems to take it for granted (and I shall not dispute it with him now) that Matter of Justification cannot, in any Case, be pleaded specially to an Indictment of Assault or Murder; but the Party is to take Advantage of it in Evidence upon Not Guilty pleaded. Let it be so; yet still this Matter must be a sufficient Justification, or the Party can have no Benefit from it any way. In an Action of Assault and Battery, where the first Assault must be pleaded specially; the Matter of Justification is just the same, as in an Indictment for the same Offence, where it must be given in Evidence upon the general Issue. I ask then, Whether the first Assault in a Justification in an Indictment of Assault and Battery? If the Barrister should answer negatively, such Answer is against all Sense, for the Party is acquitted by Virtue of the Justification only. If he should answer affirmatively, he is inconsistent with himself; for he has but just affirmed that when the Book says, Truth is no Justification, it must be understood of a Justification by Plea, by which he must mean that nothing else is a Justification but what is pleaded, or he must mean nothing at all. For the Words of the Book are, — it is far from being a Justification, &c. it is not said, — you are far from being at Liberty to plead it in Bar. In Truth, the Author is not there speaking of the Forms and Rules of Proceedings upon Libels, (1 Hawk. Ch. 73. § 5, 6, 7.) but upon the Substance and Nature of the Crime, what shall and what shall not excuse or justify it.

This is manifest from the Reason subjoined to support his Assertion, viz. since the greater Appearance there is of Truth, &c. which is a solid Reason grounded on the Wisdom of the Law; which punishes Libels even against private Persons, as publick Offences, because they provoke Men to Acts of Revenge and Breaches of the Peace. I hope it will not be said that a Libel is less provoking, because the Truth of it is to be given in Evidence; than if it was to be pleaded in Bar.

But all this is Star-Chamber Doctrine with the Barrister, and the very Mention of that Court serves him for an Answer to every Thing, for which he has no other Answer; because the Memory of that Tribunal is justly detested on Account of many illegal and exorbitant Proceedings. No; this is the Authority of Mr. Serjeant Havokins (though he uses marginal References to some Star-Chamber Cases), whose name is too great to receive any Addition from this Paper, and who, after a long and studious Search in the Crown-Law, laid down this Proposition for Law at the Time he wrote his Book; and I believe it will appear in the Sequel that he was not mistaken. And now I come to join Issue with the Barrister upon this Point, whether Mr. Serjeant or he is in the right; or, in other Words, whether Falsity in Fact be essential to a Libel, so that the Truth of the Fact may be given in Evidence to prove a Writing to be no Libel.

He maintains the Affirmative of the Question, both from what he understands to be the Authorities in the Case, and from the Reason of the Thing. All which shall be considered in their Order.

The Authorities cited by Mr. Hamilton to support the Proposition formerly stated, consist principally of four Cases, which I shall consider in the Order as they were produced.

The first is the Case of John de Northampton, 18 Edw. III. 3 Inst. 174. which he observes does not appear to have been a Case upon an Information, but that he has good Grounds to say it was upon an Indictment. This is what I shall not contest with him; because it is not material, or indeed easy to be determined, without seeing the Record; though I conceive there are Grounds to say it was not upon an Indictment, as was the Case of Adam de Ravensworth, mentioned by Lord Coke in the same Chapter. The Case, however, stands thus: John de Northampton, an Attorney of the King's Bench, wrote a Letter to one Ferrers, one of the King's Council, that neither Sir William Scot, Chief-Justice, nor his Fellows the King's Justices, nor their Clerks, any great Thing would do by the Commandment of our Lord the King, &c. which said John being called, confessed the Letter, &c. Et quia predictus Johannes cognovit dictam litteram per se scriptam Roberto de Ferrers, qui est de concilio Regis; quæ littera continet in se nullam veritatem: Prætextu cuius Dom. Rex erga Curiam & Justiciarios suos habere posset indignationem, quod esset in scandalum Justicie & Curie. Ideo dictus Johannes committitur, &c. Here says the Barrister, by this Judgment it appears the libellous Words were utterly false, and there the Falshood was the Crime, and is the Ground of the Judgment. For my own Part, I can neither see Truth nor Falshood in the Words at the Time they were wrote, for they refer to a future Contingency that might, or might not be as he said; and in this Respect, they were the same as if the Man had said, the Roof of Westminster-Hall would fall upon Sir William Scot and his Fellows. Besides, the Words taken by themselves have no ill Meaning; for I imagine it will be allowed that most of the great Things which Judges do, as Judges, are such as ought neither to be done nor left undone by the King's Commandment. Where then was the Offence in the Record, I think, shews that in the following Words: prætextu cuius Dom. Rex erga Curiam & Justic. suos habere posset indignationem, &c. Ideo dictus Johannes committitur, &c. It is observable, that the Author of this Letter was an Attorney of the Court, and by the Contents thereof he presumes to undertake for the Behaviour of the Judges in some great Matters that concerned their Office. The Letter was addressed to a Person who was of the King's Council, and might possibly communicate the Contents of such a Letter to the King; the Consequence of which might naturally be, that Dom. Rex habere posset indignationem erga Curiam, &c. for great Things were sometimes done, in those Days, by the King's Commandment; and the Judges, besides, held their Posts at Will and Pleasure.

The Words, quæ littera continet in se nullam veritatem, were therefore proper for the Judges to insert, in order to acquit themselves to the King; but they are no more the Ground of the Judgment than these other Words, qui est de Concilio Regis; both being only incidental Clauses that come in by way of Description; for it is not said, Quia littera predicta continet in se nullam veritatem. After all, I would not have this Construction of the Case, plain and natural as it is, pass merely upon my own Credit; for I shall shew that this Case was so understood by one of the greatest Lawyers of his Time, before Lord Coke's 3d Inst. appeared in the World.

21 Jac. B. R. Tanfield v. Hiron. Godbolt 405, 6.

The Plaintiff brought an Action upon the Case against the Defendant, for delivering of a scandalous Writing to the Prince, &c. Now for the Plaintiff cited, 18 Ed. III. a Letter was sent to Ferrers, one of the King's Council, the Effect of which was, that Scot Chief-Justice, and his Companions of the same Bench, would not do a vain Thing at the Command of the King; yet because he sent such a Letter to the King's Council, although he spoke no Ill, yet because it might incense the King against the Judges, he was punished. If no Ill was said, will it be pretended that the Falshood of what was said could be a Reason for punishing a Man? Is it not ridiculous to say, that the Falshood of innocent or insignificant Words can be Criminal? This Book, therefore, follows the Record of Northampton's Case, and says, because it might incense the King against the Judges, he was punished; which is almost a Translation of prætextu cuius, &c. which was the Ground of the Judgment, Ideo committitur.

The next Case which the Barrister called to his Aid, is that of the Seven Bishops. State Trials, Vol. IV. And here he relies on a Flourish of one of the Counsel for the Bishops, and a dubious Expression of one of the Judges, separated from the rest of his Discourse.

Sir Robert Sawyer, tis true, says, Both the Falsity of it (the Libel) and that it was malicious and seditious, are all Matters of Fact, which they (the King's Counsel) have offered to the Jury no Proof of, &c. This, I must confess, proves one Point to which the Barrister adduced it, viz. that he was not the first who insisted that to make a Writing a Libel, it must be false. And when I have allowed this, I may almost venture to say, it is the only Point he does prove from the Beginning to the Ending of his long, elaborate elaborate Speech.—Let me, however, oppose to this the Reply of Sir Thomas Powis, in these Words; Whether a Libel be true or not, as to the Matter of Fact; was it ever yet permitted in any Court of Justice to be made a Question, whether the Party be punishable for it? And therefore I wonder to hear these Gentlemen say, that because it is not a false one, therefore it is not a Libel. Fol. 382.

Mr. Justice Powel also does say, that to make it a Libel, it must be false; it must be malicious; and it must tend to Sedition. Upon which Words of this learned and worthy Judge, I would not presume to offer any Comment, except that which other Words of his own afford, that plainly shew in what Sense he then spoke. His subsequent Words are these: They (the Bishops) tell his Majesty, it is not out of Averseness to pay all due Obedience; nor want of Tenderness to their Dissenting Fellow-Subjects; but because they do conceive the Thing that was commanded them, was against the Law of the Land. They say, they apprehend the Declaration is illegal, because it is founded on a dispensing Power. I do not remember in any Case in all our Law, that there is any such Power in the King; and the Case must turn upon that. In short, if there be no such dispensing Power in the King, then that can be no Libel which they presented to the King, which says that the Declaration, being founded upon such a pretended Power, is illegal. So that the Judge put the whole upon that single Point, whether it be true that the King had such a dispensing Power, or not; which is a Question of Law, and not of Fact; and accordingly the Judge appeals to his own Reading in the Law, not to Witnesses or other Testimony, for a Decision of it. In Truth, the Petition of the Bishops is not capable of having Falshood or Truth applied to it in any other Sense, there being nothing else affirmed or denied in it, but that they thought they could not do what was commanded them, because it was against the Law. This was the Behaviour, these were the Sentiments of that upright Judge, that gained him so much Honour among all good Men, as the Barrister takes notice; not any Opinion of his, that the Contents of a Libel must be false in Fact, to make it a Libel; as he would unfairly insinuate.

Sir Samuel Barnardiston's Case is the third that is touch'd upon; and here too the Gentleman finds nothing that can be strain'd to his Purpose, but the Defendant's Counsel insisting on the Want of Proof to the Malice and seditious Intent of the Author. He seems to have forgot that the same Gentleman insisted also to have it proved, that the Defendant was a Person of a turbulent and unquiet Spirit, because these Words were set forth in the Information; and he takes no manner of Notice how all this was answered, which I must now do for him, in the Words of the Court: Certainly the Law supplies the Proof, if the Thing itself speaks Malice and Sedition. As it is in Murder; we say always in the Indictment, he did it by the Instigation of the Devil: Can the Jury, if they find the Fact, find he did it not by such Instigation? No, that does necessarily attend the very Nature of such an Action or Thing. So in Informations for Offences of this Nature, we say, he did it falsely, maliciously, and seditiously, which are the formal Words; but if the Nature of the Thing be such as necessarily imports Malice, Reproach and Scandal to the Government, there needs no Proof but of the Fact done; the Law supplies the rest. How shall any Man prove another Person's Malice, which is a Thing that lies only in a Man's Mind? How should any Man know that I am malicious against the Government, but by my Actions? These Words, indeed, were pronounced by the Chief Justice Jefferies, who was then the Mouth of the Court; but tho' he was really an intemperate Judge, (or a Monster, as the Barrister, in his Bar-Language, delights to call him) yet I may safely refer it to all Men of Law, whether these Words could have discredited the best Mouth that ever spoke upon that Bench. State-Trials, Vol. III. 939.

An Instance of this Sort may not be impertinent, where a Chief Justice (who was no Monster) addresses himself to a Jury, that was trying a Libel, in this Manner: I will not repeat the Particulars to you, only something to what the Defendant has said, that you may not be misled. He says, it does not appear that he did it maliciously or knowingly. There are some Things that you that are of the Jury are not to expect Evidence for, which it is impossible to know but by the Act itself. Malice is conceived in the Heart; no Man knows it, unless he declares it: As in Murder, I have Malice to a Man; no Man knows it. I meet this Man and kill him; the Law calls this Malice. If a Man speak scandalous Words against a Man in his Calling or Trade, he lays his Action, Malice; though he cannot prove it but by the Words themselves; you may see, there is Malice supposed to a private Person in that Slander, much more to the King and the State. State-Trials, Vol. II. 537.

Tutchin's Case, the Barrister does not properly cite, but endeavours to answer as a Case urged against him by the King's Counsel; and therefore I shall observe upon it in another Place.

But the Case of Cafes is still behind, which he reserved for the last, to make the Point clearer on his Side, than all the rest put together could do. It is Fuller's Case, State-Trials, Vol. V. 441. And it deserves Notice, that although Fuller was charged with writing a Libel, yet that was not the Gift of the Information. He was, in Truth, prosecuted for being a Cheat and Impostor, by Order of the House of Lords, as the King's Counsel declare in the Opening.

The Information accordingly sets forth, 'That W. F. intending the late King William and his Subjects to deceive, and to get several great Sums of Money fraudulently and deceitfully from the said King, concerning a Correspondency between divers Officers and Subjects of the said late King, and the late King James, falsely pretended to be had; did write and print a Libel, intitled, Original Letters, &c. with the Deposition of T. J. and T. F. Esqrs. proving the Corruption lately practised in this Nation; and the said W. F. afterwards did publish, utter, and for Truth affirm, the said several false and scandalous Libels, without any lawful Authority; whereas in Truth, the said T. J. did not depose, upon his Oath, as is contained in the said false and scandalous Libel; but the said scandalous Libels are false, feigned, and altogether contrary to Truth, &c.' Here it is manifest he was accused of a Cheat, in forging the Correspondence and the Depositions just mentioned, with a Design of getting Money by his pretended Discovery. And hence it comes, that the Judge very properly asks him, Have you any Witnesses? If you take upon you to write such Things as you are charged with, it lies upon you to prove them true, at your Peril. How came you to write those Books that are not true? If you have any Witnesses, produce them. Thus said and thus did that great Man, Lord Chief Justice Holt; but not upon a Trial of the like Kind with Mr. Zenger's, as his Counsel would have it thought. For, in this Case, the Cheat and the Libel posture was the Offence, which consisted wholly in the Falshity; that is, in affirming such Things for Realities, when they were nought but Fictions. On the contrary, had he been able to prove those Letters and those Depositions to be authentick, the Discovery would have been valuable, and might intitle him perhaps to Favour and Protection, instead of Punishment, however irregular he was in taking such a Method to publish Matters of that high Consequence. After this, let the learned Barrister, in all his Reading, shew an Information or Indictment for a Libel, where the Falshity is assigned in Form with an ubi re vera, as the Foundation of the Offence, which is done in Fuller's Case; and then I will acknowledge, that the Questions put here by Lord Holt would have been proper, upon the Trial of his Client.

This is the Sum of the Barrister's Law-Cases. And is it not high Time to ask, whether such gross Misrepresentations of the Books can proceed from Ignorance or Disingenuity? Be that as it will, it might certainly be expected, that a Proposition, advanced with so much Assurance, by a Man of Years and Reading, should have been supported by some one Authority in Point, rather than by a Series of low Prevarication and Quibble. Could he not find, in all the Book-Cases and Trials at large, concerning Libels (which are sufficient of themselves to make a large Volume), one Example of Proof being received to the Truth or Falshity contained in a libellous Writing? Indeed, there is nothing like it to be found; though the Occasions have been many, where such Proof might be had, if it were proper; nay, where the Truth of the Thing was notorious to all Men, and yet no Question ever moved concerning it. This shall fully appear in the Sequel.

If any Thing can be necessary further to expose Mr. Hamilton's Doctrine of Libels, after answering his own Cases, it is only to subjoin some others, that will shew how much he is mistaken in almost every Thing he has offered on the Subject. I shall therefore mention a very few, that will bear a particular Application to his crude Notions, without entering into a Multitude of others, to tire the Reader.

16 Car. II. the King v. Pym, 1 Sid. 219. B. R.

Pym was indicted at Exeter for a Libel, which he delivered to a Parson to be published in Church there, and was to this Effect: 'You are de-famed to bewail the Sodomitry, Wickedness, Whoredom, Lewdness, that is of late broken out in this formerly well-governed City; that God would turn their Hearts from committing those Wickednesses which go unpunished by the Magistrates.' Pym confessed the Indictment, and was fined 100*l.* He afterwards brought a Writ of Error, and assigned for Error, that this was no Offence, because though he says, go unpunished by the Magistrates; yet he does not say that the Magistrates knew of it, and Wickedness unknown cannot be punished. It was answered by the Court, that this contains Matter of great Scandal to the Government of the City; for it makes the late Government better than the present, &c. Hide, Twisden, Keelyng, Windham, Just.

I have pitched upon this Case, because the Barrister is fond of comparing the Plantations to large Corporations; and he will find here, that even those are not left to the Mercy of Libellers, altho' they do not put in a Claim to the sacred Rights of Majesty: And that a Misbehaviour of this Kind to the Magistrates of a Corporation is not intirely innocent, because it is not to be judged of, or punished, as a like Undutifulness would be to our Sovereign.

This Case was adjudged about four Years after the Restoration, when the Memory of the preceding Usurpation was fresh in every Body's Mind. It is strange, therefore, Mr. Pym did not put himself on his Trial at Exeter; for it was evident, beyond Contradiction, to the People of that Age, from their own Knowledge, as it is now to us from History, that the Wickedness specified in the Libel was restrained by a stricter Hand before, than after the Restoration. But this notorious Truth, it seems, did not avail Mr. Pym.

22 Car. II. the King v. Saunders. Raym. 201. B. R.

Information for writing a scandalous Libel to H. Rich, who was indebted to him, and kept him out of his Money three Years by obtaining a Protection, and at length getting into the Prison of the King's Bench. Saunders wrote him a Letter, wherein he tells him, That if he had any Honesty, Civility, Sobriety, or Humanity, he would not deal so by him; and that he would one Day be damned, and be in Hell for his Cheating; and cited several Places of Scripture to make good his Allegations. The Defendant was found Guilty, and moved in Arrest of Judgment, that the Substance of the Letter is not scandalous, but impertinent and insignificant, &c. Cur. The Letter is provocative, and tends to the incensing Mr. Rich to break the Peace. The Court adjudged the Letter scandalous, and fined him 40 Marks. Keelyng, Twisden, Rainsford, Moreton, Just.

I would intreat the clear-sighted Barrister to look carefully into the Words of this Libel, and try if he can discover any Truth or Falshood in them that was capable of Proof. And I must remark upon both these Cases, that though they were adjudged in the Reign of K. Charles II. yet neither of them was upon a State-Prosecution, or at a Time when the Spirit of Plots and Factions had infected the Courts of Justice; but they remain unquestionable Authorities at this Day.

State-Trials, Vol. V. The Case of Tutchin is strong against him; a Case adjudged since the Revolution, before that learned and upright Judge Sir John Holt, and plainly shews the Fallacy that runs throughout his whole Argument.

The Points insisted on by this Chief Justice, in his Charge to the Jury, were these: 'To say that corrupt Officers are appointed to administer Affairs, is certainly a Reflection on the Government. If People should not be called to an Account for possessing the People with an ill Opinion of the Government, no Government can subsist: Now you are to consider, whether these Words I have read to you do not tend to beget an ill Opinion of the Administration of the Government; to tell us, that those that are employed know nothing of the Matter, and those that do know are not employed. Men are not adapted to Offices, but Offices to Men, out of a particular Regard to their Interest, and not to their Fitness for the Places. This is the Purport of these Papers.' If this was the Purport of the Papers, and so criminal as hath been just said, it is amazing surely, that Mr. Tutchin did not offer to prove the Truth of these Allegations, and thereby take out their Sting! Could not he possibly think of as many corrupt or incompetent Officers, Ecclesiastical Magistral, Civil, or Military in England, preferred by Interest rather than Merit, as there were Judges displaced and Courts erected in New York? Or if he was restrained, by the hard-hearted Judge, from desporting himself in this pleasant and spacious Field, could he not apply to the private Knowledge which the Jurors (as well as the rest of Mankind) had of these Matters? For I imagine it will be allowed, that if no Instances of this Sort could be shewn at the Time of Tutchin's Trial, it was the only Period within the Memory of Man, or the Reach of History, that wanted the like.

But the Misfortune was, the poor Man was not blessed with such skillful Counsel as is to be had in Philadelphia, to think of these good Things for him; otherwise you might have heard an alert Advocate (after returning Thanks to his Lordship for nothing) address himself to the Jury in this or the like eloquent Strain: 'Then, Gentlemen of the Jury, it is to you we must appeal for Witnesses to the Truth of the Facts we have offered, and are denied the Liberty to prove: The Law supposes you to be summoned out of the Neighbourhood where the Fact is alleged to be committed; and the Reason of your being taken out of the Neighbourhood is, because you are supposed to have the best Knowledge of the Fact that is to be tried. And were you to find a Verdict against my Client, you must take upon you to say, the Papers referred to in the Information, and which are proved to be written and published by us, are false, scandalous, and seditious. You are Citizens of London, honest and lawful Men, and the Facts which we offer to prove were not committed in a Corner; they are notoriously known to be true. And as we are denied the Liberty of giving Evidence to prove the Truth of what we have published, I will beg Leave to lay it down as a standing Rule in such Cases, that the suppressing of Evidence ought always to be taken for the strongest Evidence; and I hope it will have that Weight with you. Lay your Hands upon your Hearts, Gentlemen, and recollect: Do none of you know, nay, do not all of you know, certain Persons, who shall be nameless, that have been lately promoted, by Favour and Interest, to Places of Trust and Profit, both in Church and State, Army and Navy, whom you must know and believe in your Consciences to be ill Men, and no way qualified for such Preferment; as my sagacious Client has most seasonably remonstrated to the Neighbours, by virtue of that Right which every free-born Subject hath of publishing his Complaints, when the Matters so published can be supported with Truth?' But is Lord Holt asleep all this time? Can any reasonable Man, who has but common Notions of Judicature, imagine that this great Judge would suffer such Trash as this to be thrown out in any Court where he sat in Judgment? But what must he have said, if the Libeller before him had offered to prove, that the Law itself was at an end; that Trials by Juries were taken away when a Minister pleased; that no Man could call any Thing his own, or enjoy any Liberty, longer than those in the Administration would condescend to let him do it? Would he have said, that these Things did not tend to possess the People with an ill Opinion of the Government; and that Governments might well subsist, though Men should not be called to an Account for publishing the like? Or would he have said, it was no matter what Opinion the People had of the Government, nor whether it subsisted or not, provided these Assertions were true; and so have discharged the Man as a Publisher of precious and useful Truths, to put the Neighbours on their Guard?

But here also the Barrister lays hold of a random Question, put by one of the King's Counsel to Mr. Montague, who was for the Defendant, and was then touching upon the Affairs of the Navy: Saith the former, Will you say they are true? Now the latter had hinted as much as that these Things were true; but did it with that Caution which a Man of Skill uses, when he would say something in support of a lame Cause, but don't care to press an Impropriety too far. For that learned Gentleman was very sensible, that if he had presumed to insist expressly on the Truth of the Matters contained in his Client's Papers, a severe Reprimand was the best Thing that could have befallen him. His Words are these: Nobody can say, that we never had any Mismanagements in the Royal Navy; and whenever that has happened, the Merchants of England, in all probability, have suffered for it. But does the Judge, in his Charge to the Jury, vouchsafe to give this Matter any Answer, or so much as to mention it? Lord Holt did not usually pass by material Things, that were offered in Defence of Persons tried before him; yet, in this Case, he makes no Question or Scruple about the Truth or Falshood of Tutchin's Papers, although they contained many Things which his Lordship, the Jury, and all the World knew to be false. This candid Judge, however, puts the Merits of the Whole upon the Scandal of the Government, and the evil Tendency of such Writings. And therefore I must once more call upon the Northern Barrister to shew a single Instance, where Witnesses have been produced by Counsel, and admitted by the Court to prove the Truth of a Libel. When he does this, it will deserve Consideration; but till then, he may talk by the Hour without any Meaning.

I could mention some Cases of a more modern Date, that have been adjudged in Westminster-Hall, when this wild Doctrine was not so much as thought of, and when it would not have been altogether useless, had it been practicable; but I have chose to mention such only as are reported, that the Books may speak for themselves, and judge between us.

But this Lawyer seems to be above having his Points of Law decided by the Authorities of the Law; and has something in Reserve, which may serve to overthrow not only what has been offered in this Paper, but even all the Books of the Law. This is what he calls the Reason of the Thing; but is truly and properly a Sketch of his own Politics; which leads me to shew, that the true Reason of the Thing here agrees with the Law, and consequently both these are against this expert Master of Law and Reason.

The Reason of the Thing, as well as it can be collected from a Heap of Particulars huddled together without Order and Method, may be reduced to the three following Heads:

1. The Form of an Information for a Libel, and the Necessity of knowing the Truth or Falshood of its Contents, in order to direct the Judges in awarding arbitrary Punishment.
2. The Right every Man hath of publishing his Complaints, when the Matters so published can be supported with Truth.
3. The Necessity there is of using this Right, in the Plantations especially.

cially, by reason of the Difficulty of obtaining Redress against evil Governors by any other Means:

1. It will not be improper to premise, under the first Head, that a Gentleman of the Law, who takes upon him to pronounce so magisterially as the Northern Barrister has done concerning Libels, ought to have considered well the Nature and Extent of his Subject. It might be expected, that he is not unknowing in any Part of Learning necessary to fix his Idea of a Libel; and yet the present Case would appear to be quite different. This learned Gentleman might have informed himself, by reading some of the ancient Laws before the Conquest, that when the Falsity of virulent Writings and Speeches was taken into the Description of the Crime, there was a specific Penalty annexed, viz. Cutting out the Offender's Tongue, Lamb. Sax. Laws. But this Severity seems to have fallen into Disuse under the Norman Kings; and accordingly Bracton, who wrote in the Reign of Henry III. gives a Description of these Offences, as they were understood in his Days, wherein Falsity is neither expressed nor implied. These are his Words: Fit autem injuria, non solum cum quis pugno percussus fuerit, verberatus, vulneratus, vel fistibus caesus; verum cum ei Convitium dictum fuerit, vel de eo factum Carmen famosum & bujusmodi, Fol. 155. Indeed, here is no mention of Libels against the King, or the State; the Reason of which seems plainly to be, that Offences of this Sort were considered as a Species of Treason, not only in that Age; but in several Ages after, notwithstanding the Statute 25 Ed. III. and though they have by happy degrees dwindled into Misdemeanors, yet nobody, except the Barrister, will say they are come to have a greater Indulgence from the Law, than the like Offences against private Persons. How far, therefore, Bracton's Acceptation of a Libel has prevailed ever since, must be submitted upon what has been offered in the preceding Part of the Remarks.

Here the Barrister throws in a shrewd Question, arising from the Form of the Information, which charges the Libel to be false: This Word false, says he, must have some Meaning, else how come it there? I hope Mr. Attorney will not say he put it there by chance; and, I am of Opinion, his Information would not be good without it. By way of Answer to this, I must take Leave to put a Question or two in the same Strain. Suppose a Man brings an Action of Trespass for violating his Wife, and he fairly sets forth the Truth of the Case, viz. That the Defendant, by amorous Addresses, Letters, Presents, &c. did gain the Consent of the Plaintiff's Wife, and at length debauched her: I would ask, whether an Action of Trespass thus laid can be supported? I fancy not; and yet this is a more just Account of the Matter, than when Vi et Armis, viz. Swords, Staves, Knives, &c. are introduced as Instruments of invading this tender Part of our Neighbour's Property. Suppose further, a Man kills another, whom he never saw or heard of before, and he is accused of murdering him of Malice fore-thought, How come such Words to be put into an Indictment for a Fact so circumstanced? They must have some Meaning; surely they are not put there by Chance; and, I am of Opinion, the Indictment would not be good without them? Why, there is this short Answer to be given to all these childish Questions: There are many Words used in Pleadings of most Kinds, sometimes for Aggravation, sometimes for Comprehension, often in compliance with antient Usage, which are not traversable, and many times are incapable of Proof. The Form of Indictments and Informations follows the Nature of the Fact, and sets it out in its worst Drefs; and if the Fact is made appear to be unlawful, all the hard Names are supplied by Implication of Law.

This is not all, quoth the Counsellor: 'It is said, that Truth makes a Libel the more provoking: Well, let us agree for once, that Truth is a greater Sin than Falshood; yet, as the Offences are not equal, and as the Punishment is arbitrary, is it not absolutely necessary that they should know whether the Libel is true or false, that they may by that means be able to proportion the Punishment? For would it not be a sad Case, if the Judges, for want of a due Information, should chance to give as severe a Judgment against a Man for writing or publishing a Lye, as for writing or publishing a Truth?' Now is it not a sad Case, that he should want to be told, that human Laws don't strictly regard the moral Pravity of Actions, but their Tendency to hurt the Community, whose Peace and Safety are their principal Objects; so that by this Standard only are Punishments measured? If this profound Sophister is of another Opinion, let him give a Reason why it should be a greater Crime in our Law for a Man to counterfeit a Silver Shilling, than to cut his Father's Throat.

2. The Right of remonstrating or publishing just Complaints, the Barrister thinks the Right of all Freemen; and so think I, provided such Remonstrances and Complaints are made in a lawful Way. But when he comes to explain, it is not a Court of Justice, it is not a House of Representatives, it is not a Legislature that is to be troubled (as he phrases it) with these Things. Who then, I pray, is to be troubled with them; for the King, it seems, is out of the Question? Let the Barrister speak for himself: They have a Right (says he) publicly to remonstrate against the Abuses of Power in the strongest Terms, to put their Neighbours upon their Guard, &c. and in another Place, he speaks of it as a Hardship, if a Man must be taken up as a Libeller, for telling his Sufferings to his Neighbour. Now, though I wish and hope, as earnestly as he can do, that a free People may never want the Means of uttering their just Complaints, and of redressing their Wrongs too, when their Complaints are not heard; yet I always thought these Things were better understood than expressed in a Court of Law; and I shall probably remain in that Opinion, till the learned Gentleman can produce something from the Common or Statute Law to shew, that a British Subject has a Right of appealing publicly to his Neighbours (that is, to the Collective Body of the People), when he is injured in his Person, Rights, or Possessions. When I am assured that he can do this, I promise him I shall not grudge a Voyage to that Country, where Liberty is so well understood, and so freely enjoyed, that I may receive the important Discovery from his own instructive Mouth.

I know the Law-Books assert the Right of complaining to the Magistrates and Courts of Justice, to the Parliament, to the King himself; but a Right of complaining to the Neighbours is what has not occurred to me. After all, I would not be thought to derogate, by any Thing I have said, or shall say, from that noble Privilege of a free People, the Liberty of the Press. I think it the Bulwark of all other Liberty, and the surest Defence against Tyranny and Oppression. But still it is a two-edged Weapon, capable of cutting both ways, and is not therefore to be trusted in the hands of every discontented Fool, or designing Knave. Men of Sense and Address (who alone deserve publick Attention) will ever be able to convey proper Ideas to the People; in a Time of Danger, without running counter to all Order and Decency, or crying Fire and Murder through the Streets, if they chance to awake from a frightful Dream. But I must again urge, that these Points are not fit to be discussed in a Court of Justice, whose Jurisdiction is circumscribed by positive and known Laws. Besides, they take place properly in a sovereign State, which has no Superior on Earth; and where an injured People can expect no Relief, but from an Appeal to Heaven. This is far from being the Case of Colonies; and therefore I come to shew, under the third Head, that the Barrister's Reason of the Thing is no other than Reason inverted, which possibly may help the Projects of a Demagogue in America, but can never be reconciled to the Sentiments of a Lawyer, or the Principles of a Patriot, considered as a Subject of Great Britain.

3. I have hitherto been taught to believe, that when a brave and free People have resorted to Measures unauthorized by the ordinary Course of the Laws, such Measures have been justified by the extraordinary Necessity of the Case, which excluded all other Means of Redress: And, as far as I understand the Constitution, and have heard Accounts of the British Colonies, such a Case cannot well happen, and has never yet happened among them. But here the Barrister is ready to ask, how must we behave when we are oppressed by a Governor, in a Country where the Courts of Law are said to have no coercive Power over his Person, and where the Representatives of the People are, by his Intrigues, made Accomplices of his Iniquity? Certainly it can't be a new Discovery to tell this Lawyer, that as the Governor is a Creature of the Crown, so the most natural and easy Course is to look up to the Hand that made him. And I imagine it may be affirmed (without catching an Occasion of offering Incense to Majesty), that if one Half of the Facts contained in Zenger's Papers, and vouched for true by his Counsel, had been fairly represented and proved at home, Mr. Cosby would not have continued much longer in his Government; and then the City of New York might have applied to itself the Inscription of the Gold Box, Demerſe Leges, timeſta Libertas hæc tandem emergunt, with greater Propriety and Security, than could possibly be derived from the impetuous Harangue of any Lawyer whatsoever. I am the more emboldened to say thus much, because though it is my Lot to dwell in a Colony where Liberty has not always been well understood, at least not freely enjoyed, yet I have known a Governor brought to Justice, within these last twenty Years, who was not only supported by a Council and Assembly, besides a numerous Party here, but also by powerful Friends at home; all which Advantages were not able to screen him from Censure, Disgrace, and a Removal from the Trust he had abused.

It is not always necessary, that particular Persons should leave their Affairs and Families in the Plantations to prosecute a Governor in Westminster-Hall, unless their Fortunes are equal to the Expence; for it is seldom seen, that the Violence of a bad Governor terminates in private Injuries, inasmuch as he can't find his Account in any Thing less than what is of a general and publick Nature. And when this is the Case, I hope none of our Colonies are, even at this Time, so destitute, but that they can find the Means of making a regular Application to their Sovereign, either in Person, or in his Courts at Westminster, as their Case may require.

But the wild Inconsistency that shines through most Parts of this Orator's Speech, is peculiarly glaring in that Part of it now before me. The Remedy which he says our Constitution prescribes, for curing or preventing the Diseases of an evil Administration in the Colonies, I shall give in his own Words: 'Has it not been often seen (and I hope it will always be seen), that when the Representatives of a free People are, by just Representations or Remonstrances, made sensible of the Sufferings of their Fellow-Subjects, by the Abuse of Power in the Hands of a Governor, they have declared (and loudly too), that they were not obliged by any Law to support a Governor, who goes about to destroy a Province or Colony, &c. One would imagine, at first sight, that this Man had the same Notion, with the rest of Mankind, of just Representations and Remonstrances to the Representatives of a free People, which has ever been understood to be by way of Petition or Address, directed and presented to them in Form; in which Case it is hoped that they, being moved by the Complaints of the People, will stretch forth their Arms to help them. But, alas! we are all mistaken; for he tells us, in the same Breath, that the right way is by telling our Sufferings to our Neighbours in Gazettes and News-papers; for the Representatives are not to be troubled with every Injury done by a Governor; besides, they are sometimes in the Plot with the Governor, and the injured Party can have no Redress from their Hands; so that the first Complaint (instead of the last Resort) must be to the Neighbours, and so come about to the Representatives through that Channel.

Now I would be very glad to know, what the Neighbours can do towards effecting the desired Reformation, that will be attended with so good Success, and so few ill Consequences, as a regular Application to his Majesty would be. It would be pleasant, doubtless, to hear this Politician speak out and explain himself at large upon this Subject. I confess it surpasses my Comprehension to conceive what the Neighbours, inspired with weekly Revelations from the City Journalist, can do with their Governor and Assembly, unless it be to reform them by those persuasive Arguments which the major vis never wants good Store of. If this be the Patriot's Meaning, his Words may possibly be understood; but without this Meaning they are mere Jargon.

In a word, I shall agree with the Barrister (and so take my Leave of him), that the Liberty of exposing and opposing arbitrary Power is the Right of a free People; and he ought, at the same time, to admit, that the Order of Things, and the Peace of Society, require that extraordinary Means should not be used for this Purpose, till the ordinary have failed in the Experiment. The supreme Magistrate of an independent Kingdom or State, cannot always be controuled by the one, and then the other is justified by that Consideration. But in Colonies, that are from their Creation subordinate to their Mother-Country, there is no Person who is not controul-able by regular and well-known Methods of proceeding; and consequently there can be no absolute Necessity of flying to Extremities, at least in the first Instance. From all which, I conceive, it follows, that local Combinations, upon which the Gentleman lays so great Stress, conclude directly against him; and I hope the Security which the British Constitution affords to every Man's Person, Property, and Reputation, as well as to the publick Tranquillity, is not lessened by any Distance from the Fountain of Power and Justice; but that a Libel is a Libel, and punishable as such in America, as well as in Europe.

I am sensible, there is a Freedom of Expression used in these Papers, of which I should disapprove in the common Cases of Controversy; but I found myself under a Necessity of shewing no Respect to the Performance under Consideration, unless I were to forfeit the little that might be due to the Remarks. For though a Lawyer is free, nay obliged by the Duty of his Profession, to make the most of the Cause he espouses, (his real Sentiments being suspended for that Time, by reason of the Bias under which he acts) yet when he draws his private Opinion into the Debate, and interests his Passions in the Success of it, he then departs from his Character, and becomes a Party, rather than an Advocate. In short, there is an Air of Self-sufficiency and Confidence mixed with the whole Lump, enough to give a Disrelish even to good Sense and good Law; but is nauseous, beyond all bearing, when neither of these is found. Among Lawyers, I was sure this Lawyer deserved no Answer; and yet an Answer seemed indispensable, not only for the Reasons given at my setting out, but also in order to save many well-meaning People from reverencing a Piece of Buffoonery, that had been thrust into the World with so much florid Conceit, and a Gold Box tagged to the End of it: A Piece, where in the whole Common-place of popular Declamation (equally adapted to all popular Occasions) is exhausted, and the Holy Scriptures brought in to season his Jokes. But as this last seems designed only for a Sally of Wit and Humour, I shall not offer to detract from its Merit; considering too, it had so happy an Effect as to set the good People a-laughing, when they heard the Word of God most ingeniously burlesqued in a Christian Court: A Piece that hardly shews the Author to have been serious when he pronounced it, or his wise Benefactors when they rewarded him; but that his solemn Professions of Principle and Duty compel a charitable Mind to suspect his Knowledge rather than his Sincerity; and Citizens are ever thought to be in earnest, when they part with their Gold and shew their Learning.

Sir, I ought to make an Apology to you for trespassing so long upon your Patience, which might have been better employed; but I flatter myself with the Hopes of having some Allowance made for an honest, though weak Attempt to rescue the Profession of the Law, and the Interest of lawful Liberty, from the Disgrace thrown upon both in one of our Sister Colonies. This is the Truth, and let it be my Excuse.

I am yours, &c.

ANGLO-AMERICANUS.

LETTER II.

SIR,

It must be mortifying, no doubt, to a Person who has received peculiar Marks of publick Approbation to be told, that the very Act which procured it was so far from being commendable, that it really deserved a severe Censure; and one would the rather decline such an Office, how just soever the Occasion, because it cannot be done without condemning at the same time the Judgment of those whose Suffrage had been thus unworthily obtained. But when the Laws are openly perverted, and Courts of Justice, with an Air of Gravity, drolled out of their established Rules, by such whose Profession supposes them Ministers of Justice; and when this too shall be dignified with Applause, and made highly meritorious; I conceive neither Good-nature, nor the Solemnity of Publick Seats, should restrain an honest Pen from exploding the Practice, in order as well to stop the Progress of its evil Effects, as to prevent the like Attempts for the future.

Virtue and Merit, it is most certain, ought to be encouraged, especially by all in Authority; but when that which is merely counterfeit shall gain Esteem, stand in the room of what is truly genuine, and be actually loaded with the Rewards thereof, it does not only frustrate the original Intention of such Rewards, but likewise give Countenance to the Impostor, and furnish him with still further Means of vending his false Wares, in prejudice of the Publick. Now this, with all due Submission, I take to be the Case of the Corporation in North America, with regard to the Honours they were lately pleased to confer on a noted Barrister in those Parts, for his supposed Services in the Affair of Zenger the Printer, whose Trial has been so plentifully dispersed here, and in other Places. Aggregate Bodies, we find, may be mistaken, and too often are, as well as private Men; and when they do err, it is of the more dangerous Consequence, on account of the Extent of their Power and Influence. The Province in general of New York, or the City in particular, might, for aught I know, have sufficient Cause of Complaint, in some Respects, against their then Commander in Chief, and his Administration; but it is to be considered, that as there never was one absolutely free from Faults, so it is the great Privilege of the Inhabitants of every British Government, that a proper Channel is chalked out, in all such Events, and a Way open for Relief. The Method, therefore, which the Constitution prescribes ought to be strictly pursued; and any illegal Deviation is not only inconsistent, and unjustifiable in itself, but has, besides, a Tendency to introduce Mischiefs more to be dreaded even than those that were sought to be redressed. It is the Law which must be the Standard of Right and Wrong; and whoever has Recourse to any other Aid, or knowingly advises thereto, in the Case of particular Grievances, cannot act on a true Principle of Publick Spirit, but must be influenced by unworthy Motives, and is always more or less an Enemy to the Community, according to his Situation, and in proportion to the Talents he happens to possess. If Mr. Zenger then will avowedly publish seditious Libels against the Government under which he lives, and his Counsel will offer to support him by Artifices unbecoming the Long Robe, and advancing Propositions manifestly contrary to Law; as the former deserves to be punished by it, so the latter, I humbly presume to say, whatever he may claim from his Client, ought not to be paid his Wages by any Set of Men who owe their Being to the Law, and cannot exist without it.

See A D
caious and I

But I shall not scruple to acknowledge here, and I do it on no superficial Observation, that there can't be a more pernicious Creature, in a distant Colony, than that of a Practitioner of the Law, with much Assurance, little Knowledge, and no Morals; a Character not unheard of in more than one of his Majesty's Plantations, and which yet I would by no Means apply to Mr. Hamilton, any otherwise than may appear to be just, from the Performance he has, it seems, taken so much Pains to publish to the World. The judicious Remarks already made upon it by Anglo-Americanus, will hardly leave Room for any Thing to be added that is very material; and therefore I shall content myself with a few Gleanings only, and make some cursory Reflections thereon, whilst they afford me an Opportunity of bearing my Testimony also against what I think the most indecent Behaviour at least, if it may not be called the boldest Outrage, that ever was exhibited from the Bar, without a suitable Chastisement.

Whoever has enquired into the Doctrine of Libels, and the Reason of their Punishment, will perceive, that they take their Degrees as they affect private Persons, particular Magistrates, or are aimed against the Government itself; and I may venture to say, that no Lawyer of Reputation will deny but what is set forth in the Information against John Peter Zenger was of this last Kind, and that too conceived in the grossest Terms, such as will not admit of a different Construction, or of any other Meaning than what is put upon them by the Prosecutor for the Crown. Now I am sensible, that great Allowances are, with good Reason, made to Counsel in the Heat of Argument, and when supposed to be animated with a laudable Zeal for their Clients. Nor has it been usual to correct them for every harsh and hasty Expression, provided they keep within Bounds, and stick to that which is their Duty, without running into Matters that have no Relation to the Issue, and cannot fairly serve the Side they espouse. Yet, as the Lord Chancellor Nottingham occasionally said, Counsel should not speak as if they would abate the Guilt of their Clients rather than advocate for their Innocency. And since your ingenious Correspondent has clearly evinced, that the Truth of a Libel cannot be given in Evidence, that it is no Justification, on the general Issue, and consequently no proper Defence to a Charge of that Nature (of all which Mr. Hamilton could not, or ought not to have been ignorant), it is worthy of Consideration whether he did not involve himself in his Client's Crime, and partake of his Guilt, by declaring in the most publick Manner, that the Facts published in the News-Papers, and contained in the Information, were true; and offering to prove them to be so before a Court, which had no Power to redress the Grievances complained of, 4 Co. 14. Hob. 166. 7.

Sir Bartolomew Shower, I remember, in his Argument in the Case of the King against Berchet & al. asserts, that 'in all Cases of Contempts to a Court, no Presentment is necessary, no not so much as to convict; for if done in Facie Curie, a Record may be made of it, and a Punishment judicially inflicted, and that executed immediately, Show. Rep. 110.' And agreeable hereto, we find, that in a late Case of the King against Thoregood, Trin. 9. Geor. primi, the Defendant having made an Affidavit in C. B. and appearing on Summons, confessed that he made it, and that it was false; whereupon the Court recorded his Confession, and ordered that he should be taken into Custody and stand in the Pillory, &c. which was executed accordingly the last Day of the Term. Mod. Ca. in Law & Eq. 179. 180. This is the more remarkable, because it was in the Court of Common-Pleas, which has ordinarily no Jurisdiction in Criminal Cases.—May it not from hence be inferred (I hint it with a due Saving to all the just Privileges of the Bar) that the Court at New-York might well have recorded some of the most seditious Expressions in Mr. Hamilton's Rhapsody, and committed him for the same, &c. If they had, I doubt the Blame must have centered in himself, and his own Conduct; of which therefore he might then have had Leisure to repent, as well as of his long Journey to so ill a Purpose.

But it will not be amiss, perhaps for Example Sake, to give an Instance of what has been done on the like Occasion with that before us; and to this End I shall cite a Case in the Court of King's-Bench, many Years after that of the Star-Chamber was at an End, and which, in the Words of Sir Thomas Raymond, was as followeth: 'Memorandum, June 18, 1680, Mr. Nathaniel Reading having been convicted (before Justices of Oyer and Terminer by virtue of a special Commission) for endeavouring to persuade Bedlow, who was a Witness against the Noblemen imprisoned in the Tower of London, to forbear his Prosecution of them; and he the said Mr. Reading having had Judgment executed upon him, by being set in the Pillory, and fined 1000*l.* and imprisoned for the same, but his Fine since pardoned by the King, came this Day into Court, and demanded that an Information, which he there brought in his Hand, might be received by Mr. Astrey against the Commissioners who condemned him, of which my Brother Jones and Brother Dolben were two, and that the Information might be filed. But the Court did declare, that he was in the wrong Way to exhibit any Information in this Manner, and did cause his Words, whereby he did accuse the two Judges of Oppression, to be recorded; and for these Words, and for that he was infamous by having been on the Pillory, the Gentlemen at the Bar did pray that his Gown might be pulled over his Ears, he having been formerly a Practitioner at the Bar, which was ordered and executed in Court; and he was also condemned in Court to pay the King 500*l.* and to lie in Prison till he paid it, Raym. Rep. 376. The Trial of this Gentleman referred to here, may be seen in the State Trials, Vol. II. p. 253. on which Occasion the Lord Chief-Justice North made a Speech aggravating the Defendant's Offence as he was a Counsel, one who ought to be a Man of Knowledge, and a Minister of Justice to assist the Court wherein he pleaded. He said, he thought the Court ought to shew a more than ordinary Severity against such an one; and that 'tis a great Credit and Benefit to the Profession, that the Members of it for such Offences should be dealt with more severely than we should deal in other Cases. Id. p. 374. 5. Far be it from me to make any invidious Comparison here betwixt the present Practitioner in Pennsylvania, and the quondam one in Westminster-Hall, though they are both celebrated, the one in the Trial of Mr. Zenger, and the other in his own. It may however be noted, that the latter was said to be artful and affectedly eloquent, and to have strove to lead the Judges out of the Way, while he was told by the Chief-Justice, that his Defence was artificial, because it was nothing to the Purpose; and by another of the Judges, that he disgraced his Profession by making so weak a Defence. But without adverting to any particular Beauties in the modern Performances, this is certain, that Counsellor Reading lost the Bar-Gown by his Art, and Counsellor Hamilton got a Gold-Box of five Ounces, with the Freedom of the City of New-York, by his. A pregnant Instance of the Capriciousness of Fate, and of the Justness of your late Correspondent's Observation at the Entrance to his excellent Remarks!

The Gentlemen at the Bar (as indeed it might well be expected from their Education, and the Nature of their Business) have been remarkable for observing the Regard that is due to all in Authority with the utmost Delicacy; and in Return have always been used with suitable Respect. But that the Lawyer of Philadelphia may see the Courts of Justice in former Ages, as well as of late Years, did not spare the unruly Members of the Profession any more than others, for much less faulty Behaviour than that of the leading Counsel in Zenger's Trial, I will refer him to a Case which happened Mich. 13. Eliz. Rot. 39. when Henry Blaundford, a Counsellor at Law, was committed to the Fleet, and fined, for falsely reporting the Opinion of the Lord Leicester and Secretary Cecil with these Words, Humanum est errare. And that even Noblemen met with the like Treatment on such Occasions, will appear from the Case of the Lord Stourton, who, 19. Hen. VIII. was committed by the Court, and fined for saying these Words, I am sorry to see Rhetorick rule where Law should.

Before I proceed, I will mention one Case more, purely to shew how dangerous it is to afford any unlawful Helps to Persons on their Trials in Criminal Prosecutions, even though it be merely by Way of private Instructions, when such Instructions are to be publicly made use of, and import Scandal to the Government. It is the Case of the King against Aaron Smith, Mich. 35. Car. II. in B. R. 'This Term (says the Book which has the Allowance of all the Judges) Aaron Smith was brought into Court, being formerly convicted on a Trial at Bar, for delivering to Stephen College, being upon his Trial at Oxford for High-Treason, a Paper of Instructions, full of scandalous Reflections upon the King and Government; as, that they might as well have hanged him at Tyburn as he came by, as brought him thither, only to murder him with a little more Formality. For which the Court gave Judgment, that he should pay a Fine of 500*l.* stand on the Pillory twice, and be of the good Behaviour for a Twelve-month, Skinner's Rep. 124. I shall only observe this Case was on an Information, so much inveighed against by Zenger's Counsel, and yet I never heard it censured at all, as was that of poor College, I own, with too good Reason.

It is now Time to take Notice, that there is, amidst a Heap of Jargon and Absurdities, one obvious Mistake, which runs throughout Mr. Hamilton's ostentatious Harangue, and that is in Relation to the Court of Star-Chamber. He would suggest, that because that Court was abolished by Act of Parliament, on Account of some insufferable Abuses that had crept into it, all the Cases that had been adjudged there, on Informations for Libels, were consequently of no Authority. Whereas the Judgments given there, in Matters properly cognizable before them, which Libelling especially was, are allowed to be good Law at this Day, and are constantly quoted as such in the Court of King's-Bench. Indeed it is said, that the Reason of disallowing the Star-Chamber-Court, was because their Authority was before, and now is, in B. R. and consequently that Court unnecessary, Comb. 36. So the Lord Chief Justice Holt declared, that B. R. possess all the lawful Power the Star-Chamber had, Id. 142. And that the Court of Star-Chamber was taken away, because the Crimes were punishable here, 5 Mod. 464. which is likewise intimated by the Statute itself. Now though I am as well satisfied perhaps with the taking away of the Court of Star-Chamber, considering the Occasion that had been given, as our Northern Barrister can possibly be, and should equally rejoice, I hope, at the redressing any other publick Grievance; yet I cannot, with him, condemn by the Lump, and argue, that because that Court did some things amiss, therefore it did nothing right. At this Rate, every Court that had, or has a Being, may be in Danger of the same Epithets he loves to bestow on that we are speaking of; and it may as well be supposed, that because a certain Set of Citizens, not unknown to Mr. Hamilton, lately did a very silly Thing, they therefore never did a wise one. For which Reason I presume it will not be altogether impertinent to produce the Sentiments of that Oracle of the Law, Sir Edward Coke, concerning the Court of Star-Chamber. 'It is (says he) the most honourable Court, our Parliament excepted, that is in the Christian World, both in respect of the Judges, and of their honourable Proceedings according to their just Jurisdiction, and the ancient and just Orders of the Court. For the Judges of the same are, the Grandees of the Realm, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the King's Council, the Lord Privy Seal, all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and others of the King's most Honourable Privy Council, and the Principal Judges of the Realm, and such other Lords of Parliament as the King shall name. And they judge upon Confession, or Deposition of Witnesses. And the Court cannot sit for hearing of Causes under the Number of eight at the least. And it is truly said, Curia Cameræ Stelata, si vetustatem spectemus, est antiquissima, si dignitatem, honoratissima. This Court, the right Institution and ancient Orders thereof being observed, doth keep all England in Quiet.' (4th Inst. p. 64.) Conformable hereto, a late learned Writer, who was advanced to the highest Posts in the Law in a neighbouring Kingdom to that of our Mother Country, and wherein he died, has a Paragraph, which I believe will give us a truer Account of the Court itself, and the Abolishment of it, than what is to be learned from our Barrister's Speech at New-York, and therefore I will insert it here*. 'The Court of Star-Chamber, whilst kept within due Bounds, was certainly of the greatest Use to preserve the Peace and Security of the Kingdom; and perhaps was the only Court which by its ordinary and proper Jurisdiction, could effectually prevent and punish Riots, Perjuries, and other

* See A Discourse concerning Treasons and Bills of Attainder, p. 94. Printed Anno 1716, wrote by Mr. West, afterwards Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who also wrote an ingenious and learned Treatise, entitled, An Inquiry into the Manner of creating Peers.

• Misdemeanors of the highest Nature. But being made use of by the Court to support Proclamations and Orders of State, and to vindicate illegal Commissions and Monopolies, that Extension of their Power became a Grievance insupportable, and the Nation was never easy till that Court was entirely suppressed by Act of Parliament. The House of Commons were so eager in their Zeal to destroy what they called a Court of Inquisition, that though the Bill was of so great Consequence, yet they sent it up to the Lords, with only once reading it, and without its being ever committed, which was a Thing, perhaps, never before heard of in Parliament. Gla. V. 1. 223.

I need only add on this Head, that the Crime of Libelling is the same now as it was while the Court of the Star-Chamber subsisted, and the Nature of the Offence the same then as now; a Crime that must necessarily be punished as long as there are States and Communities established in the World. And our assuming Barrister will not find an Author that treats of the Crown Law since the Statute of 16 Gha. I. Ch. 10. any more than before, but makes use of the Cases adjudged in the Star-Chamber generally as good Law, and of equal Authority in those Matters with such as were afterwards adjudged in the King's Bench. Some indeed are justly liable to Exception in the former, as we have also known too many in the latter, particularly during the next succeeding Reign of Ch. II. none whereof are, however, God be praised, to be met with, or heard of since the glorious and happy Revolution in 1688, which, I trust, has for ever excluded all Partiality and Oppression from Westminster-Hall.

But the learned Lawyer of Philadelphia declares, That he has not, in all his reading, met with an Authority that says we cannot be admitted to give the Truth in Evidence upon an Information for a Libel. I don't know what this Gentleman's reading may be; but if he had read some of the Cases above-mentioned, which could not well escape him, it might reasonably have been expected he would have taken Warning, been a little more cautious, and not have ventured to incur the Penalties which others before him had so justly suffered. By all his reading, he would insinuate, I suppose, that he had read all: and if that was true, it might well be thought he had read to very little Purpose, who could make so ill an Use of it, or think it a Duty on him to go to the utmost Parts of the Land, to propagate Doctrines and Principles diametrically opposite to, and just the Reverse of what he must have read. We shall soon discover that the Barrister's Reading is not quite so extensive as he would have it imagined. But it is previously to be observed, that if there was no such Authority in terminis as that he calls for, a Man who reads with any tolerable Understanding would of course infer the same Thing, when all the Books on the Subject of Libels lay it down as a Rule, which they unanimously do, that it is not material whether the Libel be true or false. For if that be not material, to what End should the Truth be offered in Evidence? Or, how should it be rejected before it was offered, which undoubtedly is the Reason that there have been no late Instances of that Sort. It might suffice therefore to undertake, as often as this well-read Lawyer produced a Precedent of its being demanded from the Bar to give Evidence of the Truth of a Libel, to shew that it was as often denied by the Court. And though I admit it has been attempted before, on Trials for Libels of the less enormous Kinds, yet he is probably the only one that has done it in any Case within these hundred Years. However, if we would find an Instance of that Sort, we must necessarily have Recourse to the Proceedings of the Court where that Crime was usually punished. The Star-Chamber Reports then may satisfy Mr. Hamilton, that Term Pasc. 7 Car. I. there was the Case of Coston, Gent. v. Hitchen, Mil. Servient. ad legem, as follows: 'The Defendant, the Morning before he went to the Sessions, being a Justice of the Peace, received scandalous and libellous Articles against the Plaintiff, carried them to the Sessions in his Pocket, and, in open Court, in disgrace of the Plaintiff, pulled them out and said, You shall see what a lewd Fellow this is, and not fit to speak in this Place; and then caused the said libellous Articles to be read in the publick Sessions. And the Plaintiff then desiring a Copy of them, and to be tried upon them, the Witnesses to prove them being noted in the Margin, the Defendant did not suffer him to have a Copy, or to be tried thereupon, nor took any Course that he might at the next Sessions, or at any Time after be questioned for them, but took the Articles again out of the Sessions and carried them away. And after, further to disgrace the Plaintiff in his Practice (being an Attorney), sent the said Articles to Mr. Justice Harvey, at the Reference of a Cause to him, which Coston attended; and a Jury having given a Verdict against the Defendant, he sent for the Jurors and questioned them about their Verdict, and told them they were a Company of Fools, and that if there had been but one wise Man among them, their Verdict had not been so. And for these Offences he was committed to the Fleet, and fined 200 l. In this Cause, the Defendant would have had Witnesses to prove the Matter of the said scandalous Articles to be true, but that was disallowed by the Court. Rush. Col. vol. III. p. 36. in Append. This, I presume, the Barrister, when he is serious, will allow to be in point, though it happened not to fall in the Way of his Reading. He cannot object, surely, that it does not appear to be on an Information preferred by the Attorney-General, since it is a much stronger Case than if it had. For if the Court would not receive such Evidence in a Cause depending on the Complaint of a petty Solicitor for being libelled, and this too preferred against a Justice of Peace, a Knight, and a Serjeant at Law; a fortiori, they would never admit it on an Information exhibited, by his Majesty's Attorney-General, against a private Person, for libelling the Government.

There was also, as I have learned, divers Years before, viz. Mich. 2 Jac. the Case of Peter Brereton, Clerk, for writing a scandalous Letter to Loyd, Register of the Bishop of St. Asaph, and sent to himself, who was therein charged with Bribery and Extortion in his Office; for which libellous Letter the Defendant was sentenced, though, as the Book has it, he would have undertaken to prove the Contents of the Letter to be true. Here then are two Precedents of what the Barrister himself had never met with in all his reading; the one in a Case for libelling a practising Attorney, and the other of the Register of a Bishop's Court; but I believe I may defy this Gentleman, if he were to read as many more Years as he has done, to produce a third, where the Offence under Prosecution, being of the highest Degree, and levelled at the Government, like that for which he was so zealous an Advocate, the Counsel for the Defendant dared to offer Evidence of the Truth of it. On the contrary, if he had dipped into the Lord Chief Justice Keele's Reports, fol. 23 (before he left his Chambers) he would have there found it resolved by the whole Court, that though a Counsellor at Law may plead his Client's Cause against the King, yet, if under Colour of that he takes upon him to vent Sedition he is to be punished.

It is no Wonder, indeed, if our Barrister should be unapprized of Brereton's Case, it not being (at least to my Knowledge) in Print; and you perceive I was under no Necessity of mentioning it, being before provided with an Authority to my Purpose. But it is reported, as above, in Sir Thomas Mallet's MS. Treatise of the Court of Star-Chamber, a Copy whereof has fallen into my Hands by the Favour of a Friend. And since I have named this Work, I shall, with his Leave, take a Paragraph out of it, which, I am persuaded, will not be deemed unsuitable to the present Debate, after hinting that the Book seems to be wrote in the Time of James I. when the Doctrine now revived, and so tenaciously advanced by Mr. Hamilton, is said to have been long before exploded as a gross Error. There are (says Sir Thomas) two gross Errors crept into the World concerning Libels; the one, that it is no Libel if the Party put his Hand unto it, and the other, that it is not a Libel if it be true; both which have been long since exploded out of this Court. For the first, the Cause why the Law punisheth Libels is, for that they tend to raise the Breach of the Peace, which may as well be done, and more easily, when the Hand is subscribed, than when it is not. And for the other, it hath been ever agreed, that it is not the Matter but the Manner which is punishable. For libelling against a common Trumpet is as great an Offence as against an honest Woman, and perhaps more dangerous to the Breach of the Peace; for, as the Woman said, she should never grieve to be told of her red Nose, if she had not one indeed. Neither is it a Ground to examine the Truth or Falshood of a Libel, because it is Judice, whether it be a Libel or not; for that takes away Subjectum Questionis, and determines it to be no Libel, by admitting the Defendant to prove the Truth; and the Defendant in that Case ought to plead a Justification and Demur in Law. But if he plead Not Guilty, the Question is gone, whether it be a Libel or not. Thus, according to this Author's Opinion, who, if I mistake not, was one of the Justices of the Court of King's Bench in his Time, Mr. Hamilton, could he really have persuaded himself that the Matters charged in the Information were not libellous, as he insists they are not, would have discovered more Accuracy in his Profession, as well as Candour in his Practice, by advising his Client to demur to it, whereby he would have admitted no more than what was avowed at the Trial on the general Issue. Then, indeed, it would have fairly come before the Court to be considered whether the Papers were libellous or not, and he, as Counsel for the Defendant, might regularly have been heard to it.

He would then have been at Liberty to exert his uncommon Talents, manifest his extraordinary reading, his superior Genius and great Skill in Language, and in explaining the true Import of Words, without so directly flying in the Face of every Authority, and opposing all the Cases that ever were adjudged concerning Libels, before he was born and since. But alas! that would not have answered the Intention of our eloquent Barrister. He would not then have had it in his Power to use his Arts, and play his Game with a dozen honest Men, of as good natural Understandings, perhaps, though not of equal Experience and Cunning with himself. If he had gone that Way to Work, he would have had no Chance for the Prize. Vain had been his Expedition, and lost, entirely lost, all his Labour. In a Word, if the Learning and Integrity of the Bar only were required, he might as well have staid at Home, where, if I am rightly informed, there are Instances in abundance of the blessed Effects of Mr. Hamilton's well-known Principles.

This sagacious Gentleman begs Leave to observe, that Informations for Libels is a Child, if not born, yet nursed up and brought to full Maturity in the Court of Star-Chamber: But what is particularly to be inferred from this shrewd Observation, he does not at present tell us. If the Star-Chamber was the Court where Crimes of this Nature were generally punished, according to its ordinary and proper Jurisdiction, as it certainly was, how should it be otherwise than that Informations for Libels must be met with there? And considering the Antiquity of that Court, is more than probable the Crime was first prosecuted and punished in it. But what then? Is the Legitimacy of the Child (if I may be allowed to carry on the Metaphor) therefore to be called in question; or its Education the less honourable? I might put out witty Barrister in mind, that what I have mentioned is the very Reason why the spurious Brat he is so fond of, which was never brought to full Maturity, nor ever will, first appeared in the Star-Chamber, though it has not been heard of since in any other Court, till very lately, at New-York; I mean that of making Falshood to be essential to a Libel, and claiming a Right to give Evidence of the Truth of it by way of Justification.

He must, however, intend by the foregoing Passage, to impeach the Legality of Informations qua such (which by some Words that drop from him many Pages after, would seem to be what he aims at), or as they relate only to Libels; and in either Case he will again betray the Scantiness of his Reading and Knowledge in the Law. As to Informations in general, it has been incontestibly proved, that this Method of proceeding is no way contrariant to any fundamental Rule of Law, but agreeable to it. That it was the constant Usage, and had the Approbation of the Judges and Lawyers of all Ages, and in all Reigns, Show. Rep. 106, to 125. And in the Cause of the Information against Seventy poor Persons for a Riot in pulling down Fences, &c. 2 W. & M. (which probably may be the same) it was said by Lord Chief Justice Holt, that the Lord Chief Justice Hales complained of the Abuse of Informations, but not that they were unlawful; — That he should not come now and impeach the Judgment of all his Predecessors; — That the Star-Chamber was not set up by the Statute of Hen. VII. but was as Common-Law, and Informations were accordingly brought in that Court and others. And the whole Court were of Opinion, that Informations lay at Common-Law, 5 Mod. 463, 4. Now this I take to be as good an Authority as the extrajudicial Opinions of those anonymous Great Men whom Mr. Hamilton says, have boldly asserted that the Mode of Prosecution

Information is a criminal Grievance, and greatly inconsistent with the Liberties which the Subjects of England enjoy in most other Cases; nor can we without observing, in passing, that he seems much more disposed, where there is no Danger at least, to follow the Example of Seld. than of wise and judicious Men.

This then being a legal Course of proceeding in criminal Cases, and for all publick Offences, it must undeniably be as proper in the Case of Libels as in any other. And Sir B. Shower in reckoning up the several Crimes that were cognizable in the Court of Star-Chamber, includes Libels among the rest, for which he says, There were always Informations in the Star-Chamber and King's-Bench. Show. 119. I am the more free in borrowing what I do from that eminent Practitioner, on the Subject of Informations; because he had studied it well, and taken more than usual Pains therein; and as the Judgment afterwards given by the Court of King's-Bench was pursuant thereto, so it seems to have put a Period in Westminster-Hall to all Cavils against that Mode of Prosecution.

If the Barrister means notwithstanding to suggest moreover, that Informations for Libels are but of modern Date, or little longer standing than about the Time of the Expiration of that Court, where he supposes they had their Origin, let him be further refuted by the above-mentioned Sir Thomas Mallet, who wrote professedly on the Court of Star-Chamber, and may be supposed to be pretty well acquainted with his Subject: He tells us, [Treatise of the Court of Star-Chamber, ubi supra] That 'in all Ages Libels have been severely punished in this Court, but most specially when they began to grow frequent about 42 and 43 Eliz. when Sir Edward Coke was her Attorney General.' And, treating of the Antiquity of that Court, he makes it very probable [Id. 1 Part, 4th Confid.] that it was the most ancient of any Court of Justice, and the Mother-Court of the Kingdom; wherein he does not differ from Sir Edward himself, in his 4th Inst. 64. already quoted. Now it was while this consummate Lawyer, it seems, was Attorney-General to the renowned Queen Elizabeth, that Informations for Libels began to be most frequent, or, in Mr. Hamilton's elegant Stile, when the Child was brought to full Maturity: And it is readily submitted to all who are versed in our History and Constitution, whether that Period will be any Disparagement to the Offspring.

But if Informations for Libels in particular, were one of the Grievances of that Court, may the Chief, as the Barrister would labour to make his Hearers believe, how came they to be practised after the Abolishment of it? Or what will he say to the Case of the King against Darby, which was an Information exhibited against the Defendant, being an Attorney of the Common-Pleas, for defamatory Words only of Sir John Kay, a Justice of Peace, concerning the Exercise of his Office? The Words were, as they are set forth in Comb. 65. Sir John Kay is a Buffe-headed Fellow, (a pretty Thing to be proved in Court!) understands not Law, and is not fit to discourse it with me; he hath not done Justice to my Client. There it was argued for the Defendant on a Demurrer, (and I chuse to recite it because of the Concessions of his Counsel against our Northern Advocate,) That an Information would not lie for scandalous Words spoken only of a particular Person, because he might have an Action on the Case to recompense him in Damages.-----This true, such a Proceeding might be warranted for Libels, or for dispersing defamatory Letters, because by such Means the publick Peace might be disturbed, and Discords fomented amongst Neighbours, which might at last be a publick Injury: But there is no such Thing alledged in this Case, only Words in common Discourse, for which an Action on the Case might lie, but no Information. On the other Side it was insisted, That this Information was founded on sufficient Matter, because the Prosecution is not only as it respects the Person of Sir John Kay, but it relates to him as he is a publick Magistrate, and who is subordinate to the Government, and therefore such defamatory Words are a Reproach to the supreme Governor, by whom Magistrates are intrusted, and from whom they derive their Authority; and it will not be denied, but that Words reflecting on the publick Government are punishable at the Suit of the King by an Information,-----And for this Reason the Court held that an Information would lie, and thereupon gave Judgment against the Defendant, and fined him an hundred Marks, Co. 14. 15.

Mr. Hamilton, who would seem to be more knowing than his Neighbours in many Things, affects to be more ignorant than every body, of what constitutes a Libel; and therefore, although he pretends freely to acknowledge there are such Things as Libels, yet he insists, at the same Time, that what his Client is charged with, is not one; and if it be not, I will as freely acknowledge there can be no such Thing. He desires the Attorney-General to favour them with some standard Definition of a Libel, by which it may be certainly known, whether a Writing be a Libel, yea or no. And what is this for? Why, truly, to shorten the Dispute. But what Dispute does he speak of? The only Point that could admit of Dispute had been given up before by his confounding the Matters in Issue, and the Prosecutor's Witnesses being thereupon discharged. As to what he requires, either there was such a Definition to be met with in the Books, or there was not; if there was, he ought to have known it; if there was not, why should he desire Mr. Attorney to favour him with one? Yet after he had been indulged beyond Measure, and a Definition was produced from a good Author, who besides refers to several others that are unquestionable, all which conclude against his Client; is this loquacious Advocate contented? No; There are two Words to that Bargain, as he had said before. He makes it a Foundation for further Disputes, and according to his wonted Ingenuity and Candour throughout his Reverie, calls the concurrent Sense of our Books Mr. Attorney's Rule, and Mr. Attorney's Doctrine.

But what certain Standard-Rule, quoth he, have the Books laid down, by which we can certainly know whether the Words are malicious? Whether they are defamatory? Whether they tend to a Breach of the Peace? and are a sufficient Ground to provoke a Man, his Family or Friends to Acts of Revenge? &c. Now these Queries methinks do not so well become the Mouth of an Advocate, as they might that of his Client, when abandoned to his own Defence in a desperate Cause. But I answer, no Rules certainly can be of use to those who are determined to act without any, or in Opposition to all Rules, in which Class our Northern Barrister must be placed, if we are to frame a Judgment of him from the Share he bore in this Trial. The Rule laid down in our Books concerning Libels (I speak of Libels in the strict Sense, according to the Definition of Mr. Serjeant Hawkins, referred to in the Trial, and which alone concerns the present Case) is founded on the Reason of the Thing, and is the same which is to be observed in other Matters that depend upon the Construction of Words and Writings, which are Signs only, or Images of Ideas intended to be conveyed to the Understanding of the Reader. There may, indeed, be divers Rules applied, according to the Circumstances of the Case; and this, among the rest, that where Words are capable of two Senses, the one faulty, the other innocent, the latter is to be taken, provided such a Construction may be made without Violence to their natural Import and Meaning. From whence it will follow, that the same Cases may happen that are doubtful, and do not come under any standard Rule, on all which Occasions honest and upright Judges will incline to the favourable Side: There may be others again so clear and evident, that a Man must resign his Reason, or resolve to sacrifice his Conscience, that does not discern, or will not allow them to be libellous. But in none of these Cases can it come properly to be a Question before the Jury, whether a Libel or not, on the Plea of Not Guilty, tho' it might afterwards be so, before the Court, in Arrest of Judgment. By what has been said, there appears to be Latitude enough for a skilful Pen (who notwithstanding must do it at his Peril) to lash publick and private Vices, to caution the People against Measures that may be hurtful to them, or to remonstrate against the evil Practices even of those in Power, without being always exposed to the Penalties of the Law. Such a Liberty of Writing and Printing, under due Restrictions, I own Englishmen ought not, and I hope never will, be deprived of; and where this is dexterously done, it would be ridiculous for private Persons to put the Cap on their own Heads, and no less impolitick for those in high Stations to apply every Thing to their Administration. When such a Work is undertaken by able Hands, and with a generous View of serving the Publick, it is always laudable, and often very useful; but to succeed herein, requires a Capacity and Talents not to be discovered in Mr. Zenger's News-Papers, or his Counsel's Speech.

I perceive my Letter is unawares run to a great Length, by the Quotations that are interspersed, and which yet I am sensible is the least exceptionable Part of it. I shall therefore take Notice but of one Thing more in this matchless Harangue, which indeed ought not to be forgot, because it is made the Basis and Foundation of the Whole; and that is, concerning the Right of Freeman to complain when they are hurt. This our Lawyer often asserts in general Terms, with some Variation only of the Expression. As to which, I would ask, whether by it he means a Right to remonstrate and complain in a legal Way, or a Right in all Cases to appeal to the People by seditious and scandalous Libels? If the former, Nobody ever denied it, and what he said was not ad idem; so that he was fighting with the Air, and quarrelling without an Adversary: If the latter, he dishonoured his Gown, by advancing what is notoriously repugnant to all Laws, human and divine. It was ruled in the Court of B. R. Trin. 16 Car. That although a Bill be preferred in the Star-Chamber against a Judge for Corruption, or any other for any great Misdemeanor, yet if the Plaintiff will tell the Effect of his Bill in a Tavern, or any open Place, and by that Means scandalize the Defendant, the same is punishable in another Court. March Rep. 76. 77. So in the Case of Hole and Mellers, 28 Eliz. in C. B. it was said by the Court, that although the Queen is the Head and Fountain of Justice, and therefore it is lawful for all her Subjects to resort unto her ad faciendam Querritionem; yet if a Subject, after the Bill once exhibited, will divulge the Matter therein comprehended, to the Disgrace and Discredit of the Person intended, it is good Cause of Action, 3 Leach. 138. And to the same Purpose, in a much later Case, viz. that of Lake and King, reported in many of our Books, to which Mr. Serjeant Hawkins refers, it seems agreed, as he observes, that whoever delivers a Paper full of Reflections on any Person, in nature of a Petition to a Committee of Parliament, to any other Person except the Members of Parliament, may be punished as the Publisher of a Libel, in respect of such a dispersing thereof among those who have nothing to do with it. 1 Hawk. Chap. 74. Sect. 12.

But our forward Barrister, aged and infirm as he represents himself (which, compared with his Conduct, is the keenest Satire that could be suggested of him), ought to be further instructed, that even where Complaints are to the King himself, they must be made in a proper and regular Manner; a Decency is to be observed, and a Regard always had to the Characters and Stations of the Persons against whom such Complaints are made. In 13 R. II. Rot. Parliament. N^o. 45. the Commons desired they might not be troubled for any Matter that should be contained in Petitions to the King; and the King answered, Let every Man complain, so it be with Law and Reason. It is lawful therefore, no Doubt, as it has been resolved, for any Subject to petition to the King for Redress, in an humble and modest Manner, where he finds himself aggrieved by a Sentence or Judgment; for Access to the Sovereign must not be shut up, in case of the Subjects Distresses. But, on the other Side, it is not permitted, under Colour of a Petition and Refuge to the King, to rail upon the Judge or his Sentence, and to make himself Judge in his own Cause, by prejudging it before a Re-hearing. Hob. 220. Yet Sir Rowland Flaxing was committed, and deeply fined, for reporting to the King, that he could have no Indifferency before the Lords of the Council, 7 Feb. 18 Hen. VIII. So likewise, in the Time of Hen. VII, Sir Richard Terrets was committed, fined, sent to the Pillory, and adjudged to lose both his Ears, for his slanderous Complaint exhibited to the King, in a written Book, against the Chief-Justice Fitz-James. Which Cases are cited by Chief-Justice Montague, in the Case of Wraynham (who was severely punished for an Offence of the same Nature), as may be seen in State Trials, Vol. VII. p. 102. To these may be added, Jeffe's Case in the King's-Bench, Mich. 5 Car. Jeffe was indicted for exhibiting an infamous Libel, directed to the King, against Sir Edward Coke, late Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and against the said Court, for a Judgment given in the said Court, in the Case of Magdalen-Collage, affirming the said Judgment to be Treason, and calling him therein Traitor, perjured Judge, and scandalizing all the Professors of the Law. He fixed this Libel upon the great Gate at the Entrance of Westminster-Hall, and in divers other Places; and being hereupon arraigned, prayed that Counsel might be assigned him, which was granted; and he had them; but would not be ruled to plead as they advised, but put in a scandalous Plea; and insisting upon it, affirmed he would not plead otherwise. Whereupon it was adjudged he should be committed to the Marshal, and that he should stand upon the Pillory at Westminster and Chancery, with a Paper mentioning the Offence, and with such a Paper be brought to all the Courts of Westminster, and be continued in Prison until he made his Submission in every Court; and that he should be bound with Sureties to be of good Behaviour during his Life, and pay a thousand Pounds Fine to the King. Cro. Car. 175, 6.

What now shall we say, or what must be thought of one, who, while he pretends to great Reading, and a thorough Knowledge of these Things, could yet, in the Face of a Court, and in Defiance of its Authority, and indeed of all Authority, presume to justify the Publication of the most audacious Libels against that very Government under which he was breathing the Sedition? A Person, who, as a Counsellor at Law, boasting at the same Time of having seen the Practices in very great Courts, would dare to call such Publication, addressed to the People, the just Complaints of a Number of Men who suffer under a bad Administration! Some of the Words charged in the Information, and which Mr. Hamilton offered to prove, are, That the Law was at an End. I can't tell what Proof he had to give of this Fact; but surely if his Doctrine were to prevail, it must soon be the Case; and, for my own Part, I will confess, I have not hitherto heard of any Thing, in that Province, which looked so much like it, as that such a Behaviour should not only go unpunished, but be attended with public Munificence and Applause. The Truth is, this Gentleman, tho' styled a Barrister at Law in the Order of the Common-Council of the City of New-York, and which Title, therefore, I have therewith given him, notwithstanding, instead of maintaining that Character in the Trial before us, to be rather possessed with a Fit of Knight-Errantry, and to have sallied out from Philadelphia to the other Province, with a full Resolution to encounter every Thing that was Law, and to level all to the Ground that stood in his Way. Let the Reader then be Judge, upon the Whole, whether he comes within the Description of that mischancous Animal I mentioned towards the Beginning of these Sheets.

After all, I flatter myself it will not be imagined, that I was stimulated to these hasty Animadversions by a Principle of Envy to Mr. Hamilton, or any Disrespect to those who were pleased to patronize his Performances, since they are utter Strangers to me, and probably will ever remain so. On the contrary, they may believe me, when I declare, that if the one had really merited what the others were of Opinion he did, I should with much more Pleasure have signified my Approbation of the Conduct of both, than I now take in shewing my Dislike. 'Tis on this Score, Sir, that I cannot conclude, without publicly returning my Share of the Thanks that are due from the Fraternity to your Friend, the polite Author of the former Letter, who has done Justice to the Bar by his Remarks, which, in my humble Apprehension, are worthy of any Gentleman at it, either here or elsewhere.

I am your's, &c.

INDUS-BRITANNICUS.

XXIV. The Trial of JAMES ANNESLEY* and JOSEPH REDDING, at the Sessions-House, in the Old-Bailey, before the Right Hon. George Heathcote, Esq. Lord Mayor of the City of London, the Hon. Mr. Justice Parker, the Hon. Mr. Justice Wright, Sir John Strange, Knt. Recorder, Mr. Serjeant Urlin, and others of his Majesty's Justices of Oyer and Terminer for the City of London, and Justices of Gaol-Delivery of Newgate, holden for the said City, and County of Middlesex, on Thursday, the 15th of July, 1742, for the Murder of Thomas Egglestone.

ON Friday, the 4th Day of June, 1742, Mr. Annesley (being brought up by the Keeper of New-Prison), and Joseph Redding (having surrendered himself to take his Trial, pursuant to Notice given to the Prosecutor's Solicitor) were, upon Application to the Court, in respect of the Quality claimed by Mr. Annesley, set within the Bar.

Proclamation being made for Silence,

Clerk of the Assizes. James Annesley, hold up your Hand. (Which he did.) Joseph Redding, hold up your Hand. (Which he did.)

You stand indicted in the County of Middlesex, by the Names of James Annesley, late of Staines, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, and Joseph Redding, late of the same, Labourer: For that you, not having God before your Eyes, but being moved and seduced by the Instigation of the Devil, on the first Day of May, in the fifteenth Year of his present Majesty's Reign, with Force and Arms at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, in and upon one Thomas Egglestone, in the Peace of God, and our said Lord the King, then and there being, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did make an Assault; and that you the said James Annesley, with a certain Gun of the Value of five Shillings, then and there, being charged with Powder and Lead Shot, which Gun you the said James then and there had, and held in both your Hands to and against the said Thomas Egglestone, then and there, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did discharge and shoot off; you the said James Annesley, then and there, well knowing the said Gun to have been charged as aforesaid; and you the said James Annesley, with the Lead Shot aforesaid, then and there discharged and shot out of the said Gun, by Force of the Gunpowder as aforesaid, him the said Thomas Egglestone, in and upon the left Side of the Belly of the said Thomas, then and there, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did strike and penetrate, giving to him the said Thomas Egglestone then and there, with the said Lead Shot so as aforesaid discharged and shot, in and upon the left Side of the Belly of the said Thomas Egglestone one mortal Wound, of the Breadth of one Inch, and of the Depth of four Inches, of which said mortal Wound the aforesaid Thomas Egglestone then and there instantly died; and that you the said Joseph Redding, at the Time of committing of the Felony and Murder aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, was present, aiding, abetting, assisting, comforting, and maintaining the said James Annesley to kill and murder the aforesaid Thomas Egglestone in Form aforesaid; and so you the said James Annesley and Joseph Redding, him the aforesaid Thomas Egglestone in Manner and Form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the Peace of our Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

How say you, James Annesley, are you guilty of this Felony and Murder whereof you stand indicted, or Not Guilty?

Mr. Annesley. My Lord, I observe that I am indicted by the Name of James Annesley, Labourer, the lowest Addition my Enemies could possibly make use of; but though I claim to be Earl of Anglesea, and a Peer of this Realm, I submit to plead Not Guilty to this Indictment, and put myself immediately upon my Country, conscious of my own Innocence, and impatient to be acquitted even of the Imputation of a Crime so unbecoming the Dignity I claim.

Clerk. How say you, Joseph Redding, are you Guilty of this Felony and Murder whereof you stand indicted, or Not Guilty?

Joseph Redding. Not Guilty.

Clerk. Culpit, how will you be tried?

Joseph Redding. By God and my Country.

Clerk. James Annesley, Hold up your Hand.

Joseph Redding, hold up your Hand; you stand likewise charged, upon the Coroner's Inquisition, by the Names of James Annesley, late of the Parish of Staines, in the County of Middlesex, Gent. and Joseph Redding, of the Parish and County aforesaid, Yeoman, for that you on the first Day of May, in the Year aforesaid, God not having before your Eyes, but being moved and seduced by the Instigation of the Devil, with Force and Arms, at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, in and upon Thomas Egglestone, in the Peace of God, and our said Lord the King, then and there being, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did make an Assault; and that you the said James Annesley, a certain Gun, of the Value of 5s. then and there charged with Gunpowder and small Lead Shot, at and against the aforesaid Thomas Egglestone, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did discharge and shoot off, and him the said Thomas Egglestone with the said small Lead Shot out of the said Gun, by Force of the said Gunpowder discharged as aforesaid, in and upon the left Side of the Belly of him the said Thomas Egglestone, near the Hip-Bone, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought did strike, giving unto him the said Thomas Egglestone, then and there, with the small Shot aforesaid, so as aforesaid discharged, in and upon the said left Side of the Belly of him the said Thomas Egglestone, near the Hip-Bone, one mortal Wound of the Breadth of two Inches, and the Depth of ten Inches, of which said mortal Wound he the said Thomas Egglestone then and there instantly died; and for that you the said Joseph Redding, at the Time of the Felony and Murder aforesaid, in Form aforesaid, did done and committed, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, was present, aiding, abetting, assisting, comforting, and maintaining the said James Annesley, him the said Thomas Egglestone, in Form aforesaid, to kill and murder; and so you the said James Annesley and Joseph Redding, the said Thomas Egglestone, in Manner and Form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of your Malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the Peace of our said Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

How say you, James Annesley, are you Guilty of this Felony and Murder, or Not Guilty?—James Annesley. Not Guilty.

Clerk. Culpit, how will you be tried?

James Annesley. By God and my Country.

Clerk. How say you, Joseph Redding, are you Guilty of the said Felony and Murder, or Not Guilty?

Joseph Redding. Not Guilty.

Clerk. Culpit, how will you be tried?

Joseph Redding. By God and my Country.

Clerk. James Annesley, hold up your Hand. You stand also indicted in the County of Middlesex, by the Name of James Annesley, late of the Parish of Staines, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer; for that you, not regarding the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, nor the Pains and Penalties therein contained, after the first Day of June, 1723, to wit, the first Day of May, in the fifteenth Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord George the Second, now King of Great-Britain, &c. with Force and Arms at the Parish aforesaid, in the County aforesaid, with a certain Gun loaded with Gunpowder and Lead Shot, which you in both your Hands, then and there had and held, wilfully, maliciously, and feloniously, did shoot at one Thomas Egglestone, against the Form of the Statute in such Case made and provided, and against the Peace of our Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

How say you, James Annesley, are you Guilty of this Felony whereof you stand indicted, or Not Guilty?—James Annesley. Not Guilty.

* This is the Person that claimed the Title and Estate of the Earl of Anglesea; and had the Trial in Ireland, relating to Part of the latter, in November, 1743, and recovered it.

Clark. Culprit, how will you be tried?
Jamesley. By God and my Country.
 Clerk. God send you a good Deliverance.

The Defendants being thus arraigned, the Court thought the Day too far spent to proceed to a Trial of so much Expectation, and therefore ordered it to come on the next Morning; but the Counsel for the Prosecution alledging they could not attend the next Day, and desiring to put off the Trial to this present Sessions, the Court were pleased to indulge them, upon their consenting that the Defendants should be admitted to Bail.

Whereupon Mr. Annesley was ordered to give four Sureties in 250*l.* each, and Joseph Redding four in 50*l.* each; and this being done in Court, they were both immediately set at Liberty.

On Wednesday the 14th Day of July, 1742, the Prosecutor's Counsel moved, that the Trial might come on the next Day, which, by Consent of the Defendant's Solicitor, was ordered accordingly; notwithstanding which, the next Day, when the two Defendants had surrendered themselves, and were ready with their Witnesses, the Prosecutor moved to put the Trial off for another Day; but not alledging any sufficient Reason for the Delay, the Court were pleased to direct the Trial to go on.

Accordingly the Defendants were again arraigned, and pleaded as at the last Sessions, and there being no Challenges to the Jury, The following Gentlemen were impanelled and sworn.

The Names of the Jury.

Walter Lee,	Francis Rawlins,	William Boucher,
John Dischamps,	John Sandwiche,	Edmund Stowell,
John Reynolds,	Robert Harrop,	Thomas Whitehead,
William Lewis,	William Duck,	Francis Tredgold.

Crier. If any one can inform my Lords the King's Justices, &c.
 Clerk. James Annesley, hold up your Hand:
Joseph Redding, hold up your Hand.

You of the Jury, look upon the Prisoners, and hearken to their Charge.

They stand indicted by the Names of James Annesley, late of Staines, in the County of Middlesex, Labourer, and Joseph Redding of the same, Labourer; for that they, &c. (as in the Indictments), and upon these Indictments they have been arraigned, and thereto pleaded Not Guilty; and for their Trial have put themselves upon their Country, which Country you are: Your Charge is to enquire, &c.

Mr. Brown. My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, this is an Indictment for Murder. The Indictment sets forth that James Annesley and Joseph Redding did make an Assault with a Gun on the Body of one Thomas Egglestone; and that the Prisoner Annesley did discharge the said Gun against the left Side of the said Thomas Egglestone, and did make a Wound on the left Side of the Belly of the said Thomas Egglestone, of which he instantly died; and that the said Joseph Redding was aiding and assisting the said James Annesley to murder the said Thomas Egglestone. Gentlemen, if we prove our Charge, I hope you will find the Prisoners guilty.

Mr. Serjeant Gapper. Gentlemen, the Prisoners stand indicted for the Murder of Thomas Egglestone; James Annesley was the Person who killed the said Thomas Egglestone, and Joseph Redding he was aiding, abetting, and assisting in the Murder, and so they are both guilty of Felony and Murder. And, Gentlemen, there is an Act of Parliament made in the ninth Year of his late Majesty King George I. that if any Person does wilfully shoot at another, it is Felony without Benefit of Clergy. Gentlemen, the Case is thus: On Saturday the First of May, Thomas Egglestone, the Deceased, and his Son were going to fish, at a Place called the Moor, near Staines; they had a Casting Net, and there was a String which belongs to the Net, and this String was about the Deceased's right Arm: They were fishing in a Meadow belonging to one Sylvester; and as they were fishing towards the North of the Enclosure, the Deceased, seeing the Prisoners, stopped, and went back again; and as they were going back again, instantly came up the Prisoner, Joseph Redding, and seized the Deceased by the Shoulder, and demanded the Net; but the Deceased cast the Net into the River, which was on his Right-hand; then came up the other Prisoner, Annesley, with a Gun in his Hand, and swore at the Deceased, and said, Damn you, surrender, or you are a dead Man: He pointed the Gun immediately towards his Side, before a Word of Reply, and shot him; the Force of the Powder drove the Shot and some of the Deceased's Coat into his Body; he clapped his Hand to his Side, and said, You Rogue, what have you done? dropped down, and died immediately: Then John Egglestone, the Son, took a Knife out of his Pocket to cut the String of the Net; upon which the Prisoner Annesley turned the Butt End of the Gun; and said to him, You Rogue, I will knock your Head off; to avoid which young Egglestone jumped into the Water, Breast-high, and cut the String of the Net, and dragged it to the other Side of the Water, and cried out his Father was murdered. There were three Persons, Fisher, Bettesworth, and Bowles, who could see what was done; they were on the other Side of the River, about an hundred and sixty Yards from the Place where the Accident happened; they heard a Gun fired, and the young Man cry out that his Father was killed; and when they came to the River-side, he had dragged the Net out of the River; upon this they crossed over, and found the Man dead, or so bad that he could not live, and thereupon directed the Son to go and fetch Mr. Cole, a Surgeon at Staines: He went accordingly to Mr. Cole, and desired him to come along with him, for his Father was shot, and he believed he was dead. Why, says Mr. Cole, he is dead, it does not signify my coming; I can do him no good: So then the young Man went to Mr. Russel, a Constable at Staines. But I should tell you, Gentlemen, that as soon as the Prisoners saw these three Persons, Fisher, Bettesworth, and Bowles, coming towards the River, they ran away. Afterwards Russel, the Constable, and some other Persons coming up, they sought proper to pursue the Murderers: Accordingly they went to Farm-House, where Annesley and Redding used sometimes to lodge, and there they found Annesley, and apprehended him, and sent him to the Round-House at Staines: Redding could never be found; but he has surrendered himself since, in order to take his Trial. The Prisoner Annesley was tried before a Justice of the Peace, I think Sir Thomas Reynell; he was tried to Hounslow, and from thence to Laleham; what that Examination was, I cannot tell. They made Application to this young Man to be favourable, and not to carry on the Prosecution: Says he, Gentlemen, I will not sell my Father's Blood. This, Gentlemen, is the Nature of the Case; and if we prove our Charge, that they have been guilty of Murder, Gentlemen, you will find them Guilty.

(John Egglestone swears.)

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Give an Account of what you know of this Matter, and speak the Truth.

John Egglestone. An't please you, my Lord, on Saturday the First of May

Mr. Serj. Gap. Speak slow and deliberately, that the Court and the Jury may hear you.

John Eggle. An't please you, my Lord, on Saturday the first of May last, I and my Father were going up Staines River, to catch a Dish of Fish in Staines Moor; in the Parish of Staines, with a Casting-Net; we fished all the Way up, till we came to this Ground.

Mr. Serj. Gap. In whose Possession was the Ground?

John Eggle. It was one Mr. Samuel Sylvester's Meadow; we were turning back again, an't please you, my Lord, in order to go Home; my Father, he carried the Net upon his Arm, and the String was fastened to his Arm.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Well, as you were coming back from fishing, what happened then?

John Eggle. By that Time we had got half-way in the Meadow, we saw Joseph Redding and Mr. Annesley running, and Joseph Redding out-run Mr. Annesley, and came up to my Father first.

Mr. Serj. Gap. When they came up, what was the first Thing they did?

John Eggle. Redding took my Father by the Collar, and demanded the Net, and he refused to deliver the Net.

Court. Did you see him take him by the Collar?

John Eggle. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What became of the Net afterwards?

John Eggle. My Father threw it into the River.

Mr. Serj. Gap. How far were you from the River then?

John Eggle. I was about two Yards from the River. After the Net was thrown into the River, Annesley came up with his Gun, and swore, God damn your Blood, deliver your Net, or you are a dead Man; and he fired off before he received any Answer from my Father.

Mr. Serj. Gap. In what Manner did Annesley hold his Gun?

John Eggle. In this Manner. [Pointing the Gun straight forward, holding it about Breast-high, sloping a little.]

Mr. Serj. Gap. How near was the Gun to your Father when he fired it?

John Eggle. It was close to my Father's Side; he put the Gun between Redding and my Father, and shot directly into his left Side, here, [holding his Hand to his Hip] he had a Plate Button there, which was bruised to Pieces; then my Father said, You Rogue, what have you done? I am a dead Man; and dropped immediately.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What did Annesley say before he fired?

John Eggle. He swore, if he did not deliver the Net, he was a dead Man; and then fired immediately.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What did you do after you heard your Father say he was a dead Man?

John Eggle. I took a Knife out of my Pocket, to cut the String of the Net; and Annesley said, You Rogue, I will knock out your Brains; and he held up the Butt End of his Gun; upon that I jumped into the Stream, and cut the String, and drew the Net over to the other Side of the River: Then says Annesley, The Rogue has got the Net, let us go on the other Side after him.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Who did you see when you came on the other Side of the River?

John Eggle. I saw John Bettesworth, John Fisher, and John Bowles; and when Annesley and Redding saw these three Men, they ran away directly.

Mr. Serj. Gap. How near were Bettesworth, Fisher and Bowles to you, the before Annesley and Redding ran away?

John Eggle. As soon as I got on the other Side of the River, they saw these three Men coming, and then they ran away; and Bettesworth, Fisher, and Bowles, came through the River to the Side where my Father lay dead; they came from one Side to the other.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What did you do then?

John Eggle. They bid me get a Surgeon; so I went to one Charles Cole, a Surgeon at Staines.

Mr. Serj. Gap. When you came to Staines, did you meet with Cole?

John Eggle. Yes; and I told him my Father was shot, and I believed he was dead, or dying; but he never came near my Father: Then I went to Russel the Constable, and he took some Towns-men with him, and went to old Mr. Redding's House at Yewney Farm, to search for the Man that killed my Father; we beset the House all round, and found James Annesley hid up in a Corner.

Mr. Serj. Gap. How long were you there before he was found?

John Eggle. I was there about a Quarter of an Hour, or a little more.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Was you present then?

John Eggle. Yes, I was there all the Time: Then, an't please you, my Lord, they pull'd him down.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Where was he hid?

John Eggle. He was hid in a Place which is five or six Foot from the Ground, where they put old Iron, and any Sort of Lumber: 'Tis a boarded Place or Room over the Wash-house; a Place where the Woman makes Medicines for sore Eyes.

Court. Was there a Chimney in it?—John Eggle. I do not know.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Was he standing up or lying down; or how was he, when he was found?

John Eggle. I do not know; for I did not see him till he was pulled down: He was carried in a Chair into the Yard, and sat there about a Quarter of an Hour, and then was put into the Cart that brought up my Father, and was carried to the Round-House at Staines.

Mr. Serj. Gap. This is all you know; is it not?

John Eggle. An't please you, my Lord, I can tell you a great deal more.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Who pulled him down?

John Eggle. I do not know.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Was this Wound the Occasion of your Father's Death?

John

John Egglestone. Yes, it was.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Go on; you say you have other Things to say.

John Eg. He lay in the Round-House all Night; the next Day Annesley, the Prisoner, and I went in a Cart to a Justice at Hanslope; and there was one Mac Ketcher there, who said to me—

Court. What Mac Ketcher said is no Evidence against the Prisoners.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. We will let this alone a little.

Court. Can you prove he was any ways employed as an Agent by the Prisoner?—Mr. Serj. Gapper. I believe we can.

Foreman of the Jury. My Lord, please to ask him, whether there was no Quarrel, Bustle, or Struggling, between Annesley, Redding, and Egglestone, before the Gun went off.

John Eg. There was no Quarrel or Jostling; my Father never gave him an ill Word.

Court. Did your Father make no Resistance?

John Eg. No, no Resistance at all.

Q. Was there no Jostling, nor any Thing else passed?

John Eg. Yes: Redding took my Father by the Collar, and Annesley came up in the mean time.

Court. What happened between your Father and Redding before Annesley came up?—John Eg. He demanded his Net.

Court. I thought you said there was some Jostling?

John Eg. No other Jostling than laying his Hand upon my Father's Collar; but my Father never laid his Hand upon him.

Mr. Brown. How near were you when Redding laid his Hand upon your Father?—John Eg. About a Yard and an half off.

Mr. Brown. You say he shot off the Gun; I ask you what you mean by shooting off the Gun?

John Eg. Why he fired the Gun to shoot my Father.

Mr. Brown. What do you mean by shooting off the Gun?

John Eg. He came up directly, as if he was going to shoot a Dog.

Mr. Brown. Did you see him draw the Trigger of the Gun?

John Eg. No, I did not.

Mr. Brown. Was the Gun cocked before he came up?

John Eg. I do not know.

Q. Did not you say that it was?—John Eg. I do not know that I did.

Mr. Brown. Pray, was Anybody present at the Time?

John Eg. There was Nobody near but Bettesworth, Fisher, and Bowles; nor Nobody came up.

Mr. Brown. Did the Prisoner offer you any Money?

John Eg. Yes, he offered to settle 50 l. a-Year on me.

Mr. Brown. Where was this?

John Eg. When I was at Laleham, the next Day after my Father's Death.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. How came you there?

John Eg. We went to a Justice's at Brentford; but he not being at home, we put up at the Red Lion there; and while we were there, Sir Tho. Reynell came in, and ordered us to go to Laleham; accordingly we went to one Mr. Lee's, into a little Room, and there was Jack Lane, Mrs. Chester, and the Prisoner: Young John Lane offered me 100 l. a-Year; but the Prisoner said he could not settle 100 l. a-Year upon me, for he had more to do for; but he said he would settle 50 l. a-Year on me. This was said in the Presence of the Prisoner.

Mr. Brown. Did he mention what he would give you 50 l. a-Year for?

John Eg. Because I should not come in as an Evidence against him.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. What is the Reason you did not comply with this Offer?

John Eg. I told them, I would not sell my Father's Blood at any Rate. [The Counsel for the Prosecutor having done with this Witness, he was cross-examined as follows.]

Q. Pray, in what manner did Mr. Annesley, Redding, and your Father stand, when this Accident happened?

John Eg. Redding stood between Annesley and my Father, and had him hold by the Collar.

Q. Do you know William Duffel, and had not you some Talk with him about the Manner of your Father's Death?

John Eg. No, I never saw him, nor had any Talk with him.

Q. Had you any Conversation with one John Dalton at Laleham, where you say you was offered that Money?

John Eg. I came out of the Room to ask him, whether I should take the Money or not; for he said I had better take the Money, and not hang the Man.

Q. Then you said nothing at that Time about the Manner in which your Father was killed?—John Eg. No, Sir.

Q. You say you stood by, and saw Mr. Annesley point the Gun to your Father: Did you see him cock the Gun?

John Eg. I did not see him cock it; the Gun was cocked when he came up to my Father.

Q. Do you know one Giffard?—John Eg. Yes.

Q. When did you come to be first acquainted with him; before or since your Father's Death?

John Eg. After my Father was killed.

Q. Did not you meet with him at Staines?

John Eg. Yes, I believe I did.

Q. Did you ever see him there before?—John Eg. No, never.

Q. Did you give him any Orders or Authority to prosecute upon the Account of your Father's Death?—John Eg. No.

Q. Do you know one Williams?—John Eg. Yes.

Q. Where does he live?

John Eg. He keeps the White Horse in Piccadilly.

Q. How did you come acquainted with him?

John Eg. He came to Staines; and sent for me.

Q. What did he want with you, when he sent for you?

John Eg. I don't know; I went to live with him as a Servant.

Q. What Business was you of, when your Father died?

John Eg. I worked with my Father as a Carpenter.

Q. If you was brought up a Carpenter, how came Williams to send you out for a Servant?—John Eg. I can't tell.

Q. How long have you lived with him?

John Eg. Ever since my Father's Death, and I live with him now.

Q. Have you not seen my Lord Angles at Williams's?

[Here the Court interrupted, and said the Question was improper.]

Q. You say you are Williams's Servant; have you not dined with him at his Table?—John Eg. Yes.

Q. Do you dine at his Table now?—John Eg. No, I am his Servant.

Q. Do you know the Reason why you were sent from dining at his Table to draw Beer?—John Eg. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know one Paul Keating?—John Eg. Yes.

Q. Do you know any Thing of a Note he drew for you at the Oxford Arms?—John Eg. He did draw something of a Note, but I tore it.

Q. What made you tear the Note?

John Eg. Because I did not like his Proceedings.

Q. What were the Proceedings that you did not like?

John Eg. I do not know; I did not understand them.

Q. Why, did not you read the Note before you tore it?

John Eg. No, I did not.

Q. How came the Note to be wrote? Did he say nothing to you about writing of a Note before he wrote it?

John Eg. Nothing at all; but he desired me to copy it.

Q. What did he say to you when he desired you to copy the Note?

John Eg. Nothing; it lay upon the Table, and I tore it.

Q. What did you tear it for, if you had not read it?

John Eg. Because it was about Things that I did not know what they were.

Q. Did not he desire you to copy the Note?—John Eg. Yes.

Q. What did he say then?—John Eg. I cannot tell what he said.

Q. Was you ever at New Prison to see Mr. Annesley?

John Eg. Yes.

Q. What did you go for?—John Eg. I cannot tell.

Q. I ask you what you went for?

John Eg. I went for my own Fancy.

Q. Did you not send up Word to him, you was sure he would be glad to see you?—John Eg. I believe I might.

Q. What was the Reason for which you thought Mr. Annesley would be glad to see you?

John Eg. I cannot tell; I was willing to see him.

Q. Did you never, in speaking of your Father's Death, say that it was done accidentally?

John Eg. I do not know that I did.

Q. Did you never say to Keating, that you were to have 200 l. or had a Promise, or that you were to have Security, and from whom?

John Eg. No, Sir, I never did.

Q. Did you give the same Account, with respect to the holding of the Gun, as you do now, before the Coroner's Inquest, and before the Justice?—John Eg. Yes, I am sure I did.

Q. Did not you give two Accounts before the Coroner's Inquest; first at one time, and went out, and the Remainder when you came in again?

John Eg. No.

Q. Did you never say that the Butt End of the Gun was up to his Shoulder, and the Muzzle pointed downward?

John Eg. No, I did not.

Q. Did you never say any Thing to Anybody of the Manner of Mr. Annesley's drawing one of his Feet back?

John Eg. No, never.

Q. Can you tell which of his Legs he drew back?

John Eg. No, I cannot tell which he drew back.

Q. Did you never say which?—John Eg. No.

Q. To Nobody?—John Eg. No; never.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You said you went to the Oxford Arms with Keating, and there was something talked of relating to a Note; was there any Offer made to you there?

John Eg. No, Sir.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You talked of a Paper that was tore; do you know the Contents of it?—John Eg. No, Sir, I do not.

[John Bettesworth sworn.]

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Tell us what you know of this Matter, and when you were when you heard a Gun fired on the First of May?

Bettesworth. Thomas Egglestone and his Son were a-fishing; I was 10 Yards some odd Inches from the River, as near as I could measure.

Q. What Ground was it in?

Bettesworth. They were in the Ground called Mr. Sylvester's Rents.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Are there many Hedges on the Side of the River where the Deceased was?

Bettesworth. There were a pretty many Willows, but any Body might see through them.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. What did you see?

Bettesworth. I saw Joseph Redding and Mr. Annesley come over the Hedge.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. What Hedge?

Bettesworth. The Hedge that parted Mr. Sylvester's Ground from Mr. Redding's Ground; I do not know whether one of them did not come over the Stile; then they both ran after Egglestone and his Son; young Redding came up first.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Did he lay hold of Egglestone?

Bettesworth. Whether he laid his Hand upon his Collar, or what, I cannot tell; but the Boy ran away.

Q. Who was it laid hold of the Shoulder or Collar of the Deceased?

Bettesworth. Redding; I saw his Hand upon the Shoulder or Collar of the Deceased, but I cannot say positively whether he had him by the Shoulder or Collar.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. How long was it after that, that Annesley came up?

Bettesworth. The Boy was gone but a little way from his Father, when Mr. Annesley came up to his Father, he came back again.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. How near was he to his Father when this Accident happened?

Buttsworth. I cannot say how near he was to his Father, I believe two or three Yards off. — Annesley and Redding came up almost together, but Annesley came up after him, the Gun went off after he came up: I saw the Smoke and heard the Fire.

Mr. Serj. Gap. As you were 169 Yards off, how came you to come up?

Buttsworth. The Boy called to us, and said his Father was killed.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Who came along with you?

Buttsworth. John Bowles, and John Fisher, we came to the River just against the Place where Mr. Egglestone lay, and we could not get over there without being up thus high; (putting his Hand to his Middle) but we went over in a shallower Place a little farther.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Were Annesley and Redding there when you came over?

Buttsworth. No, they ran away before that.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Was Egglestone dead or alive when you came up?

Buttsworth. He was not dead, but he could not speak. I desired the Boy to go for a Surgeon, and he went away directly.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Who came first to the River? — Buttsworth. I do not know.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Did you all three come away together?

Buttsworth. Yes, I was coming rather before the Boy cried out, for I saw the Man drop, I could not see the Boy for a good while, for he was in the River, and he cut the Net from his Father's Arm, as he says, I did not see that; but I saw the Boy come cross the River, and when I came up, I saw that the Net was brought cross the River.

Mr. Serj. Gap. How did Egglestone lie?

Buttsworth. He lay upon his Face; I lifted up his Head, he groaned pretty much, but he could not speak: I sent the Boy for a Surgeon, but no Surgeon came.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Was you at the apprehending of the Prisoner?

Buttsworth. Yes, I was.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What Place was it that the Prisoner was in when he was taken?

Buttsworth. It was a Sort of a Wash-house, a Back-house: He was in a Place where they throw up Hoops and Iron, and any Sort of old Lumber; I saw him lie upon his Face.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Who took him down?

Buttsworth. I do not know.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What did they do with him then?

Buttsworth. They carried him to the Round-house at Staines.

Court. When you came to the Place where you say he had hid himself, did he come down of his own Accord? — Buttsworth. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Brown. When you heard the Gun go off, whose Hand was it in?

Buttsworth. Mr. Annesley's.

Mr. Brown. Do you know the Position of the Gun when it went off?

Buttsworth. No, I do not.

Mr. Brown. Did you observe any Struggle between Annesley, Redding, and the Deceased?

Buttsworth. No other than their striving to take the Net away.

Q. Do you remember any thing that passed in the Round-House? —

Buttsworth. Did the Prisoner say any thing there?

Buttsworth. Yes, the Prisoner said he desired to be killed out of the Way, for being accessory to such an innocent Man's Death.

Mr. Brown. What did he tell you besides?

Buttsworth. He said he would have gone Home for more Men, but Joseph Redding would not let him.

Mr. Brown. What did he want more Men for?

Buttsworth. To take away the Net.

Q. What Answer did he say Redding made him to that?

Buttsworth. I believe it was, that he said we can do it well enough.

[The Prosecutor's Counsel having done with this Witness, he was cross-examined as follows.]

Q. Did you see Mr. Annesley and Redding before they came up to the Deceased? — Buttsworth. Yes, I did.

Q. Did you observe Mr. Annesley making any Use of his Gun before he came up? — Buttsworth. I saw him offer to shoot at a Crow.

Court. How long was that before this Accident happened?

Buttsworth. I believe about half an Hour.

Q. Was the Crow flying or sitting? — Buttsworth. Flying.

Q. Did you observe whether he did shoot at the Crow?

Buttsworth. Not then, he did not.

Q. How far was you off then?

Buttsworth. About as far, I think, as when I saw the Man killed.

Q. What was the Position of the Gun when you saw him come up running?

Buttsworth. It was in this Manner, [holds it as if the Gun was with the Muzzle pointing a little slanting towards the Ground.]

Mr. Brown. You say you saw Annesley and Redding in the other Ground, before they came into that Ground which belongs to Sylvester — what were they doing there; were they standing, sitting, or what?

Buttsworth. They were sitting or lying under the Hedge, I cannot tell which.

Q. For what Purpose do you imagine they were sitting or lying there?

Buttsworth. I cannot say that, I may imagine they came to take the Net away, cannot imagine any thing else.

Q. Did you see the Boy go into the River?

Buttsworth. Yes, and it was just after his Father was shot.

[John Fisher sworn.]

Mr. Brown. Do you know the Prisoners at the Bar?

Fisher. I know Mr. Redding.

Q. Do you believe this to be the Person who was along with Mr. Redding at the Time that Mr. Egglestone was killed? — Look at Mr. Annesley's Face, and see whether that is the Man.

Fisher. I see Mr. Annesley, but I cannot say that he is the Man; I saw no Men lie under the Hedge a considerable Time, and saw a Piece in one of their Hands.

Mr. Brown. In which Ground were they?

Fisher. I believe in Mr. Redding's Ground.

Mr. Brown. In what Ground was Egglestone?

Fisher. He was in Sylvester's Ground. Bettesworth called to me, and there is Redding running after Egglestone, and Redding laid hold of Egglestone, the Deceased, and then came up the other with a Piece; I cannot say whether he touched him or no.

Vol. IX.

Court. In what Manner did Redding lay hold of him?

Fisher. I cannot say, I was at such a Distance; but I thought he laid hold of his Shoulder.

Mr. Brown. Did Egglestone make away from him?

Fisher. Yes; for he knew he was out of the Bounds that he ought to have been fishing in; and there was a Sort of a Struggle to take away the Net; and I thought that Redding and the other Person did both snatch at the Net, and then the Gun went off.

Mr. Brown. In whose Hand was the Gun?

Fisher. Not in Redding's Hand, but in the Hand of the other Person.

Mr. Brown. Was not you attentive at that Time, to see in what Manner he carried the Gun?

Fisher. It may be this Way, or this Way, I cannot say whether he had the Gun against his Shoulder or no.

Mr. Brown. How near was he to the Deceased?

Fisher. Very nigh, I believe not above the Length of a Gun.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Did you see John Egglestone by, when you first came up? — Fisher. He was near the River.

Mr. Brown. Did you hear the Boy cry out?

Fisher. Yes, he said his Father was killed; — he saw me, and called me by my Name, and said, My Father is killed, and I came directly cross the River.

Mr. Brown. What then became of Annesley and the other?

Fisher. They ran away; we hallooed after them, but I did not think the Man was shot, tho' I saw the Smoke and Fire of the Gun.

Q. Who went over the River first?

Fisher. We were all three together almost. I cannot tell who was over first, but I believe I was.

Q. What was said to the Boy then?

Fisher. Nothing; only to go and get a Surgeon.

Q. Who bid him go?

Fisher. Somebody did, I did not. I believe it was Bettesworth, and the Boy run away directly.

Q. Was there any Surgeon brought there? — Fisher. No.

Q. Who came there afterwards?

Fisher. Mr. Sylvester; he saw the Deceased lying upon the Ground, but he was not there when the Murder was committed.

Q. Was you in the House when he was taken? — Fisher. No.

Q. Was you with him before the Justice of Peace?

Fisher. I was examined, but I was not present when the other Witnesses were examined.

Mr. Brown. What Distance was there between you and the Deceased when the Gun went off?

Fisher. One Hundred and Sixty-nine Yards.

Q. Do you include the Breadth of the River? — Fisher. Yes, I do.

[Cross-examined.]

Q. You say you think that both Redding and Annesley snatch'd at the Net?

Fisher. I think they did.

Q. Do you think it was possible for you to hear what passed between them?

Fisher. I could not hear one Word.

Q. I would ask you, whether young Egglestone, before he was examined by Sir Thomas Reynell, did not say to you he believed the Gun did go off by Accident?

Fisher. He said he believed it was not done wilfully. I was called into a Room with Chester and Lane: He had Money offered him, in my hearing, by John Lane; he offered him 100l. a Year. — Mr. Annesley said, He could not give him 100l. but he would give him 50l. for he had others to do for: Then, said the Boy, I do not care to sell my Father's Blood; but I will do as my Friends direct me; I believe he was in Liquor.

Q. What did you say to him?

Fisher. I said, Your Father is dead; the Money will do you good; do not swear any thing against him, if you think it was done accidentally; he said, The Money will do me good if I had it; and then said, I believe the Gentleman did not do it wilfully.

Q. Had you not some Conversation together after his Examination before the Justice?

Fisher. I asked him, after he was examined, what he had done; and how he could swear against him, when he had said so and so to me; said he, I did not know what I said.

Q. That he did not know what he said, to who?

Fisher. I asked him, how he could swear against him when he knew what he said to me; said he, I do not know any Thing of the Matter; he did not remember what he had said to me.

Q. Do you know Mr. Williams the Clergyman? — Fisher. Yes.

Q. Did not you make a Declaration of this to him?

Fisher. Yes; and I told him what I now say, I mean what passed between us at the Time he went before the Justice: I said to Mr. Williams, that Egglestone told me he really believed that the Gentleman did not do it wilfully.

Q. Repeat all that you said to Mr. Williams.

Fisher. That the Boy said to me, Mr. Annesley had offered him 50l. a Year, that the Money would do him good if he had it, and that he believed the Gentleman did not do it wilfully.

Mr. Brown. Did not he say it was wilfully done, as you were going along to the Justice's?

Fisher. All the Way he went, he said he believed he did it wilfully, but after the Prisoner had been talking with him, he said he believed it was not done wilfully.

[Samuel Sylvester sworn.]

Mr. Serj. Gap. Did you see the Deceased after he was dead?

Sylvester. He lay dead on the Ground that I rent near the River Side, I think about the Middle of the Ground.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Do you know how he came by his Death?

Sylvester. I was going up to look after my Ground, to see if there was any Cattle in it, or any thing amiss. — I called at the Cock, and drank two Pints of Beer, and when I came within two hundred Yards, or thereabouts, of my Ground, I met three Men, who told me old Egglestone was killed; I did not believe it; they then pointed to my Ground, and said, There he lies; I saw several People there, upon which I thought there was something more than common, and so I went up, and saw Tom Egglestone lie dead in my Ground.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Do you know where the Prisoner Annesley was taken?

Sylvester.

T t

Sylvester. He was taken in a back Building belonging to Mr. Redding's House; I was searching the Rooms myself, and heard the People say, Here he is; and I saw Mr. Annesley, who is the Gentleman there, come down out of the Place.

Mr. Brown. What Sort of a Place was it he was found in?

Syl. It was a Place to put odd Things in: It was not boarded up to the Top.

Q. Did he come down voluntarily, or was he pulled down?

Syl. I do not know whether they pulled him down, or helped him down.

Mr. Brown. Did you hear him say any Thing at that Time?

Syl. I did not hear him say any Thing; I believe he was in a Fit, for he trembled and fell down behind the Door.

Mr. Brown. Did you see him at the Round-House?

Syl. No, I did not, for I was gone to search after the other Prisoner, Redding.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Was you at Laleham before the Justice?

Syl. Yes, I was.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Had not the Boy been drinking, and did he not sleep before he went in to the Justice?

Syl. I believe he did, for about three Quarters of an Hour; I do believe he had been in Liquor, but he was refreshed afterwards.

[Upon the Cross-Examination.]

Q. Have you not received Money to pay the Witnesses for attending here on this Cause the last Sessions, and from whom?

Syl. Yes, I paid some of them, I think it was by Mr. Giffard's Direction, who subpoena'd me up; I asked him who was to pay me; he said, I should be paid Half a Crown a Day for my Time, which was as much as he thought I could earn at my Business.

Q. What Business is this Giffard's of?

Syl. He is a Stranger to me.

Q. Do you know who he said he was employed by?

Syl. He said he was concerned for the King.

Q. Did you send Notice of this Accident to any Body as soon as the Man was killed?—Syl. No.

Q. Do you know Mr. Williams?

Syl. Yes, I know him, but I never was in his Company upon this Occasion.

Q. What Business does young Egglestone follow?

Syl. I cannot say what Business he follows, I believe he draws Beer now.

Q. How long have you known him?

Syl. I have known him five or six Years.

Q. What Business was he bred to?

Syl. Sometimes he would be out at Service, and sometimes he would be with his Father in the Business of a Carpenter.

Q. Where does he draw Beer now?

Syl. I think it is at Mr. Williams's, at the White-Horse, in Piccadilly. But this is not the Williams I was speaking of before.

Q. Have you never been in Company with this Gentleman, and had some Conversation with him about this Affair?

Syl. I have been at the Gentleman's House in Piccadilly since this Business has been in hand, but never before; and I have been in Company with the Gentleman there, but never had any Talk with him about this Trial.

Q. Was not this Williams down before the Justice?—Syl. I do not know.

Q. Did you ever see him at Staines?

Syl. I saw him in the Town of Staines, I believe, about a Week after the Accident happened.

Q. Have you seen the Boy, Egglestone, there since?

Syl. I never saw him at Staines afterwards.

Q. What, he has lived with Williams ever since?—Syl. I cannot tell.

Q. I ask you whether you have not seen him at Williams's House every Time you have been there?—Syl. Yes, I believe I did.

Mr. Serj. Gapper then said, they would rest it here; and having observed upon the Evidence, concluded with saying, he hoped it had fully made out the Charge against the Prisoners; that the Ground where the Man was killed being the Property of Sylvester, the Prisoners were Trespassers by coming into it, and therefore answerable for the Consequences. That as to Mr. Annesley, there was not only implied, but express Malice proved upon him, for that after he had killed the Father, he was for beating out the Son's Brains, only because they would not let him and the other Prisoner run away with their Net.

Court. Mr. Annesley, you are indicted in a very unhappy Case, what have you to say for yourself?

Mr. Annesley. My Lord, I am very unable to make a proper Defence, having by the Cruelty of those, whose Duty it was to protect me, been deprived of the Advantages of an Education I was entitled to by my Birth.

All I know of the melancholy Accident in Question is, that on the unfortunate Day mentioned in the Indictment, I went out with my Gun, in Company with my innocent Fellow-Prisoner, to shoot Sparrows, as I usually did. As we were going along, Mr. Redding, who is Game-Keeper to the Lord of the Manour, saw some People a-poaching within the Royalty, upon which he proposed to go and seize their Nets. I followed him, the Deceased threw the Net into the River, and the Boy jumped in to pull it across, to prevent which I stooped to lay hold of one of the Ropes that trailed upon the Ground, and at the same Instant, the fatal Instrument I had in my other Hand, hanging by my Side, went off without my Knowledge, and to my great Grief as well as Surprise. My Behaviour, immediately after the Accident, was, I hope, inconsistent with a Temper that could murder a Man I had never seen before, without one Word of Provocation.

Whatever may be the Determination of your Lordship and the Jury, great as the Misfortunes of my Life have been, I shall always consider this unfortunate Accident as the greatest of them all.

Court. Mr. Redding, what have you to say for yourself?

Joseph Redding. My Lord, I am Game-Keeper to Sir John Dolben, Lord of the Manour of Yeoveney. On the first of May last, in the Afternoon, Mr. Annesley and I went out a-walking; we saw a Crow, and Mr. Annesley made an Offer to shoot at her, but I called to him not to fire, for that she was too far off: Soon after I saw Egglestone and his Son fishing with a Casting-Net, upon which I said to Mr. Annesley, I would go and endeavour to take their Net away, as it was my Duty to do; accordingly I went up to the Deceased, and demanded the Net, which he refused to deliver to me, and threw it into the River, one End of the String being about his Arm; I then laid hold of the String, and pulled, whilst the Boy endeavoured to draw it across the River, and presently I heard the Gun go off (my Back being towards Mr. Annesley), and saw the Man fall down. I said to Mr. Annesley, I hoped he had not shot the Man; he said No, but turning up the Flap of his Coat, we saw he was shot; upon which Mr. Annesley cried out, What shall I do! and expressed so much Concern, that I am sure it was quite an accidental Thing.

Mr. Hume Campbell, of Counsel for the Prisoners, said, that although he knew by the Course of the Court at the Old-Bailey, he was not at Liberty to observe upon the Prosecutor's Evidence, yet he apprehended, that for the Ease of the Court, he might just open the Nature of the Defence, without making any Observations upon it.

That the Defence which the Prisoners insisted upon was, that the Gun went off merely by Accident; that Redding was Game-Keeper to Sir John Dolben, Lord of the Manour of Yeoveney, and had a proper and legal Deputation for seizing of Nets and other Engines, for destroying of Game. That the Deceased and his Son were poaching with a Casting-Net within the Manour; that Mr. Annesley went in Aid of the Game-Keeper; and therefore the Prisoners being about a lawful Act, were not so much as Trespassers, and the Death that was the accidental Consequence of that Act, would, in Point of Law, make Mr. Annesley guilty only of Chance-Medley.

[Mr. Thomas Staples sworn.]

Q. Do you know the Manour of Yeoveney?

Mr. Staples. Yes: I am Deputy to my Father, who is Steward to Sir John Dolben, as Lord of the Manour under the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

Mr. Serj. Gap. How do you know this to be a Manour?

Mr. Staples. I have the Grant of the Manour from the Dean and Chapter in my Pocket.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Are there any Copy-Holders?

Mr. Staples. Yes, I have admitted some Copy-Holders; I know it to be a Manour, because I have held one Court there for my Father, and have seen him hold several.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Is there any Mansion-House belonging to this Manour?

Mr. Staples. There is a Mansion-house belonging to it, which I think is the House that Mr. Redding lives in.

Mr. Serj. Gap. What Court was it you held there?

Mr. Staples. A Court Baron.

[Mr. Thomas Burlingson sworn.]

Q. Mr. Burlingson, look upon this Deputation. Are you a subscribing Witness to it? If you are, did you see this executed, and by whom?

Mr. Bur. Yes, Sir, that is my Name; I saw Sir John Dolben execute it; this is his Hand and Seal.

Court. Was it executed at the Time it bears Date?

Mr. Bur. Yes; I believe on the very Day.

[Mr. James Edmonds sworn.]

Q. Mr. Edmonds, look upon that Endorsement, do you know whose Hand that is?

Mr. Edmonds. My Lord, I went to the Clerk of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, and heard him acknowledge this to be his Hand, and that it was entered according to the Act of Parliament.

Mr. Serj. Gap. Did you see any Entry of it?

Mr. Edmonds. He said it was entered, and acknowledged this to be his Hand, and told me that was sufficient.

Q. My Lord, we pray the Deputation may be read; we will send for the Clerk of the Peace to bring the Book itself where it is entered.

The Clerk reads. Signed J. Dolben, dated the 2d of July, 1741.

K NOW all Men by these Presents, that I Sir John Dolben, of Thingdon al. Findon in the County of Northampton, Baronet and Doctor of Divinity, Lord of the Manour of Yeoveney, in the Parish of Staines, in the County of Middlesex, by Virtue of the several Acts of Parliament lately made, for the Preservation of the Game, have made, nominated, authorized, constituted, and appointed, and by these Presents do make, nominate, authorize, constitute, and appoint, Joseph Redding, the Younger, of Yeoveney aforesaid, in the said Parish of Staines and County of Middlesex, Husbandman, to be my Game-Keeper of and within my Manour of Yeoveney aforesaid, of all and all Manner of Game, of what Kind or Nature soever, which now is, or hereafter shall be, upon or within the Bounds, Limits, or Precincts of the same, with full Power and Authority, according to the Directions of the Statute in that behalf made and provided, to kill any Hares, Partridges, Pheasants, Fish, or other Game whatsoever, upon or within my said Manour, and the Bounds, Limits, and Precincts of the same: And also to take and seize all such Guns, Grey-Hounds, Setting-Dogs, and other Dogs, Hare-pipes, Snares, Low-Bells, Ferrets, Tramels, Hays, Tunnels, or other Nets or Engines, for the taking, killing, or destroying of Hares, Partridges, Pheasants, Fish, or other Game, within my said Manour, and the Precincts thereof, that shall be kept or used by any Person or Persons, not legally qualified to do the same: And further to act and do all and every Thing and Things which belongs to the Office of a Game-Keeper, pursuant to the Directions of the said Act of Parliament. And lastly, I do direct that the Name of the said Joseph Redding be entered as such Game-Keeper of my said Manour, with the Clerk of the Peace for the said County of Middlesex, pursuant or according to the Act or Acts of Parliament in that behalf made and provided. In Witness whereof, I have hereunto set my Hand and Seal, the second Day of July, in the Year of our Lord 1741.

Sealed and Delivered, being first duly stamped, in the Presence of

JAMES AFFLICK,

THO. BURLINGSON.

Middlesex. These are to certify, that the Name of the within mentioned Joseph Redding is this Day entered in my Office, pursuant to the Statute in such Case made and provided. Dated this 2d Day of January, 1741.

P. WALTER, Clerk of the Peace, Middlesex.

[Joseph Redding the Elder sworn.]

Q. Do you know the Place where this unhappy Case happened?

Redding. Yes.

Q. Give an Account of what you know.

Red. I was in the next Field, called Chantry Mead. This, where the Accident happened, is called the Hare Mead.

Q. What Manour is it in?

Red. It is in Yew-ney Manour, which belongs to Sir John Dolben.

Q. Where were you when this happened?

Red. I was in Chantry Mead.

Q. How far were you off then?

Red. As near as I can guess, it is about forty Pole.

Q. What did you observe there?

Red. I saw my Son and Mr. Annesley coming up.—I did not know who they were till they came up.

Q. Did you see them immediately after the Accident happened?

Red. Yes, presently.

Q. How did they behave upon this Occasion?

Red. They were so troubled they could hardly wag or speak: My Son said he was afraid the Man was killed; and he said to Mr. Annesley, How did you do it? Mr. Annesley said, I did not think of the Gun's going off.

Q. You say you saw them coming up; did you observe them when the Accident happened?

Red. Yes, I looked at them all the while.

Q. How was the Gun carried when it went off?

Red. Just as I may hold this Sword. [Holding it in his Right Hand, hanging down near the Pocket a few Inches from his Body, almost upon a Level.] He had it in one Hand, as I have the Sword now.

Q. Did he express himself concerned?

Red. He was so concerned, that he did not run ten Pole before he fell down, and beat himself thus upon the Belly, and said, What have I done?

Q. Did you ever hear of any Quarrel between him and this Man?

Red. Never.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. [on the Cross-Examination.] Where did you stand when the Accident happened?—Redding. In Chantry Mead.Q. Is there not a Hedge between Chantry Mead and Hare Mead?

Red. Yes, I believe there is.

Q. How could you see through the Hedge?

Red. It is a new Hedge not above a Yard high, and I could see any Thing that was doing there as clear as I can see you.

Q. Was Annesley with his Face or his Back towards you?

Red. He was Side-ways to me.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Why Chantry Mead is North of Hare Mead; then his Face could not be towards you?

Red. No, I say his Side was towards me.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You were speaking as to this being a Manour; how do you know it to be a Manour?

Red. Because there have been Courts kept there.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. By whom?—Redding. By Sir John Dolben.

Q. What is Sylvester?—Redding. He occupies this Ground: I lett the Farm to Sanders, and Sanders lets it to him.Q. On which Side of Hare Mead does the River lie? Is it East, West, North, or South?—Redding. It is about South.

Q. Does not this River belong to another Person?—Redding. No.

Q. Has not Sir John granted the Fishery to any Body?

Red. I rent the Fishery; the Fishery belongs to me.

Q. Do you depute your Son to look after this?

Red. No, Sir John Dolben deposes him.

Q. How came Sir John Dolben to appoint your Son to be Game-keeper?

Red. Because they robbed me daily.

Q. Have you assigned that Fishery to any Body?

Red. No, I have not.

Q. Who owns the Land on the other Side?

Red. I believe my Lord Dunmore is the Landlord.

Q. Was you standing up when the Gun went off, or sitting?

Red. I was standing up.

[William Duffell sworn.]

Q. Do you know John Egglestone, the Son of Thomas Egglestone?

Duf. Yes.

Q. Have you ever had any Conversation with him about this Matter?

Duf. Yes: On this Occasion he was at my House; I desired him to tell the Truth: He said he would; and then told me, that as he and his Father were fishing, they saw the Prisoner, Redding, coming up; that he desired his Father to give him the Net; and he would run away with it, but his Father would not let him; that then Redding came up and demanded the Net; that Thomas Egglestone said he should not have it, and then threw the Net into the River; and in the mean time the other Gentleman came up, and shot him; that John Egglestone jumped into the River, and cut the Line of the Net, to pull it out on the other Side; and that when the Gun went off, and his Father dropped down, Mr. Redding said to the other Gentleman, Lord, Sir, what have you done! and then they both run home. Mr. Abraham Egglestone, who was present, asked him, if he saw Mr. Annesley pull the Trigger of the Gun; and John Egglestone answered, that he could not tell. I asked him, if there was any Quarrel or Words that had passed between them, and he said No.—I said it was very surprising to me, that this Gentleman should come and shoot his Father, and nothing more pass between them: I then asked him, in what manner he held the Gun; he had a Stick in his Hand, and shewed in what manner the Gun was held in his Hand, thus (in his Right-hand, the Arm hanging down near the Pocket, some Inches from his Body, and near upon a Level; which was the same Manner that old Redding said the Gun was held). I asked, if he thought he did it wilfully; he said he could not tell.

Q. How long was this Discourse after this Accident happened?

Duf. About four Hours.

Q. Did you ever see this John Egglestone before, for he says he knows nothing of you?

Duf. I have known him these eight Years, and he has been frequently at my House.

Q. What Character has he?—Duffell. I cannot say much in his Behalf; his Father could not manage him at all.

Q. What Business did he follow?

Duf. His Father was a Carpenter, and he worked with him.

Q. When did he leave Staines?

Duf. Soon after this Accident happened.

Q. Where has he been ever since?

Duf. I have seen him at the White Horse in Piccadilly; and I heard at Staines that he was sent for to London.Q. Did the Man at the White Horse come down for him to Staines?

Duf. I did not see him there.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You say he was at your House; who gave you Directions about advising him to speak the Truth?

Duf. Nobody: Mr. Abraham Egglestone advised him the same Thing.

Q. Who was there?

Duf. Nobody but Mr. Abraham Egglestone and myself; I was desired to go and see how the Man came to be killed, and John Egglestone came to me about Eight o'Clock.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You say he could not say it was wilfully done; so he did not say it was accidentally done.

Duf. No, he did not say it was.

Mr. Brown. Do you apprehend he had hold of the Gun by the Barrel, near the Lock?

Duf. I understood by Egglestone's manner of holding the Stick, that he meant that Mr. Annesley had hold of the Gun about the Middle of the Barrel.

[John Dalton sworn.]

Q. What Discourse had you with young Egglestone?Dalton. On the Sunday, when the Prisoner at the Bar was carried to Laleham, to be examined, I went there: The Company dined at the Grey Hound at Laleham; I staid and drank half a Pint of Wine there, and immediately afterwards John Egglestone came to the Door, and called me out of the Room, and said he wanted to speak with me. When I came out, he said he wanted to ask my Advice concerning this Accident: I said, I wonder you should ask my Advice, when you have Relations to advise with; he said, I thought fit to ask you, as you are my Master. While we were talking, Samuel Sylvester came out, and said I was persuading the Boy to sell his Father's Blood: The Boy said, What do you mean, you Fool you? My Master is persuading me to no such Thing. I then asked him, whether he thought it was accidentally done or not; he said, he believed it was accidental, rather than any other thing. I said to him, Well, if you think so, you will be examined when you come before Sir Thomas Reynell, I desire you would not forswear yourself, but be very careful what you say.

Q. What Character has the Boy?

Dalton. He was very irregular, and used to lie out.

Q. How do you know that?—Dalton. He was my Servant.

Q. What Trade are you?—Dalton. I am a Butcher.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You say he has a bad Character; do you think he would forswear himself?

Dalton. I can say nothing to that.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. When was it you had this Discourse with him?

Dalton. On the Sunday, at the Grey Hound at Laleham.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Was there any Talk of Money then?

Dalton. Yes, the Boy said he had been offered Money.

Q. But you say, he said he would not sell his Father's Blood?

Dalton. No; I said Samuel Sylvester came and said I was persuading him to sell his Father's Blood; and the Boy said, My Master did not persuade me to any such Thing.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Are you sure that this is true?

Dalton. Yes, I am; I think I am in my Senses.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. What did you say to him afterwards?

Dalton. I told him, he had lost his Father, and had no Friend to take care of him, and he knew best what he had to do.

Q. Did not you say it was better to take Money, than hang the Man?

Dalton. No; I said, I thought, by what he told me, that the Man was in no danger of being hanged; and therefore he had better take Money than endeavour to hang a Man, that he thought did not do it designedly.

(Mr. Higgs, belonging to the Clerk of the Peace, being sworn, produced the Book wherein all the Game-keepers of all the Manours in the County of Middlesex are entered; (Reads) Sir John Dolben, of Northamptonshire, Baronet, to Joseph Redding the Younger, dated 2 July, 1741. Entered 29 January, 1741.)

[Mr. Richard Chester sworn.]

Q. Give us an Account of what you know of this Matter.

Chester. I drove the Chaise from my own House to the Red Lyon at Brentford, and then to the Grey Hound at Laleham; I went up to young Egglestone, and asked him, how this unfortunate Thing happened; whether it was done designedly, or happened by Accident.

Q. Where was this?

Chester. This was at Laleham: He said he believed it was accidental; for he did not believe any Gentleman in cool Blood would do any such Thing wilfully.

Q. Do you know any Thing with respect to the Net?

Chester. I think he said Mr. Annesley was stooping to the Net, in order to take it, and the Gun went off.Q. Did he say any Thing how Mr. Annesley held the Gun?Chester. I had the Chaise-whip in my Hand, and desired him to shew me how Mr. Annesley held the Gun; he took the Whip in his Hand, and held it so, (which was much the same Position as Redding and Duffell said he held it in) I think it was rather nearer the Handle than the Middle of the Whip that he held it.

Mr. Brown. Did you see the Wound? Where was the Wound?

Chester. I understood it was somewhere about the Hip.

Mr. Brown. I ask you, whether you think he could have shot him in the Hip, if he had held the Gun that Way?

Chester,

Chester. I think he could not have shot him there, if he had held it any other Way.

Mr. Brown. Pray do you know of any Money being offered by any Person in your Presence to young Egglestone? — Chester. No.

Mr. Brown. Nor any Reward of any Sort?

Chester. No. — My Lord, I had forgot to mention one Thing. After this, Egglestone spoke to Mr. Annesley the Prisoner, and shook Hands with him; and Egglestone said, he was very sorry for what had happened; but said, he did not think he did it designedly; and then drank a Glass of Wine to him.

Court. Did they shake Hands, or drink the Wine first?

Chester. Both at the same Time, as near as could be.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Did you see this? — Chester. I did see it.

Mr. Brown. I ask you, whether the Prisoner at the Bar is not married to your Daughter-in-Law?

Chester. My Lord, if your Lordship thinks I ought to answer this Question, I will.

Court. The Relation is very small; but if they insist on their Question, you must answer it.

Chester. The Prisoner is married to my Daughter-in-Law.

Q. They ask this Question in hopes of its being of Service to them in another Affair, for it cannot be of any in this; though I hope he has got a very good Wife.

(John Paterfon sworn.)

Q. Mr. Paterfon, I think you did attend the Coroner's Inquest upon this Occasion; please to give an Account how Egglestone behaved then, and what he said.

Mr. Paterfon. My Lord, I will; but first beg Leave to make an Apology for appearing as a Witness on behalf of the unhappy Gentleman, for whom I am concerned as an Attorney: I do it because in an Affair of so great Consequence to him, I think he has a Right to my Evidence; and I do it with less Scruple, as I am his Attorney without Fee or Reward. My Lord, on the 4th of May I went to Staines, to attend the Coroner's Jury; though, as I had not Time to enquire into the Fact, and prepare for Mr. Annesley's Defence, I could do him but little Service, more than by cross-examining the Witnesses for the Crown, and making Observations on their Evidence; one of the Witnesses was John Egglestone, who has been examined here. —

Court. As to any Thing in his Behaviour, you may give Evidence; but not of any Thing that was reduced into Writing.

Mr. Paterfon. I can only speak as to what he said before the Coroner; and I admit the Depositions, taken at that Time, were reduced into Writing by the Coroner or his Clerk.

[Mr. King, the Coroner, sworn, who produced his Minutes of the Depositions made before him.]

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Were these drawn up when Egglestone was examined, or afterwards?

Mr. King. They were not drawn up afterwards; they were drawn up at the same Time.

Q. Read them as far as they relate to John Egglestone.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Did Egglestone sign his Deposition?

Mr. King. He did not.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. As this Gentleman is Coroner, what he has taken down ought to be signed by the Deponent; and if it is not, I humbly apprehend it cannot be read.

Counsel for the Prisoner. The Gentlemen may chuse whether they will have the Minutes read, or whether we shall give parole Evidence, to prove what Egglestone said at that Time.

[The Counsel for the Prosecutor preferring the Minutes, they were read, and are as follows:]

May 4, 1742.

[Depositions relating to the Death of Thomas Egglestone, who was shot in the Parish of Staines, in the County of Middlesex.]

John Egglestone, Son of the Deceased, living at Staines, faith, That on Saturday, the 1st of May, he and his Father went a-fishing in one Sylvester's Grounds; and says, that one Joseph Redding came up, and laid hold of his Father, and demanded his Net; upon which his Father said he should not have it; then the Prisoner, James Annesley, came up, and said, Damn your Blood, surrender your Net, or you are a dead Man; and, upon his Refusal, the Prisoner held up his Piece to his Shoulder, and presented his Piece to the said Egglestone, near to the middle Part of his Body, on his Left Side, and shot the said Egglestone, who died presently after. Says, the Gun was cocked before he came, and that the Piece went off before his Father's Refusal to deliver the Net. He says, the Deceased clapped his Hand to his Side, and said, You Rogue, you have shot me, I am a dead Man. That after the Discharge of the Piece, his Father dropped instantly. Says, that when he saw his Father shot, he took his Knife and cut the String of the Net, and jumped into the River; upon which the Prisoner said, He has got the Net, and went to strike at him with the Butt End of the Gun; and said, Let us go on the other Side of the River, and fetch it. Says, That Redding had hold of the Deceased by the Collar, when the Piece went off. Says, he was not offered any Money by any Body.

Counsel for the Prisoner. This is the 4th of May, and he now says, that on the 2d of May he was offered Money at Laleham.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. Are these all the Minutes that you took?

Mr. King. My Clerk was there; these were all that he mentioned that he took: If I may say any Thing more from my Memory, I will do it.

Q. Then we will go upon the parole Evidence.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. When an Officer has taken Things down in Writing, it is of dangerous Consequence to admit parole Evidence to be given of the same Things.

Q. We do not insist upon it.

(The Reverend Mr. Eusebius Williams sworn.)

Q. Sir, do you know John Fisher? — Williams. Yes.

Q. Had you any Talk with him about Egglestone's being killed?

Williams. I happened to be at Laleham, and heard the Depositions that were made before Sir Thomas Reynell: Fisher said, if he was examined before the Justice, he would declare what Egglestone had said to him.

Q. What was that?

Williams. Fisher told me, that Egglestone said he did not believe the Gentleman killed his Father designedly; but that it was an Accident.

Q. Do you know how this young Man Egglestone came from Staines to London, and who has had the Keeping of him since?

Williams. I know nothing but by Hear-say.

Q. Was you never at the White Horse in Piccadilly?

Williams. I never was there since this Accident.

[Mr. Bethune called.]

Mr. Serj. Gapper. My Lord, this is another Person that is brought to contradict the Evidence of Egglestone, in what he said with respect to the Position of the Gun.

Prisoner's Counsel. Egglestone said the Gun was pointed downward. Now we shall shew you, from the Nature of the Wound, that it was morally impossible it should be so; for the Wound is slanting upwards.

[James Bethune sworn.]

Q. Sir, you are, I think, a Surgeon at Brentford: Did you see the Body of this Egglestone that was killed at Staines?

Mr. Bethune. On Sunday, after the Accident, my Lord, I happened to be at Laleham, and Sir Thomas Reynell gave me Leave to come in and hear the Depositions: I was afterwards sent for by Mr. Perkins, a Surgeon at Staines, to attend at the opening of the Body before the Coroner; there were several of the Coroner's Jury in the Room. I found the Wound on the Left Side, about an Inch and an Half below the Ridge of the Hip-bone: The Wound I apprehend to be about an Inch and an Half wide; I found it went into the Cavity of the Belly.

Q. Did the Wound go upwards or downwards into the Belly?

Bethune. When I found it went into the Cavity of the Belly, I remembered in what Manner Egglestone held the Gun when he was before Sir Thomas Reynell, to shew how Mr. Annesley held it when he fired: I remember very well he held it to his Shoulder, slanting downwards; I attempted to put my Probe into the Wound, in the same Direction as he described the Gun; but there was no Passage for it in that Position; it would not go in downwards: Then I put it in, in this Manner, cross the Belly, and it went in without Obstruction, and then upwards, and it went in with the same Ease, in this Manner. I observed several large Blisters, full of black Serum on the Right Side, opposite to the Place where the Shot went in; the Blisters, which were on the opposite Side, were three or four Inches higher than where the Wound was—the Wound was on the Left Side, and the Blisters on the Right: When I found this was so plain to me, I desired it might be as plain to the Jury, and every one there, as it was to myself, because this was a Matter of Fact, and not of Judgment; and I desired the Foreman to come and put the Probe in, and try; he did so, and found the Wound as I have described it: I was the more careful in this, because I had observed the Evidence that the Boy gave on the Sunday, and there was some Variation between that and the Nature of the Wound; therefore I desired them to take the more Notice of it; and said, Gentlemen, I shall have Occasion to speak to this by and bye, and therefore I desire you would mind what I say to you.

Q. What do you think those Blisters on the other Side were occasioned by?

Bethune. I apprehend they were occasioned by the Force of the Powder; and that if the Shot had gone through, it must have come out three or four Inches higher on the other Side than it went in.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. According to your Account, could he, holding the Muzzle of the Gun upwards, have made this Wound?

Bethune. He could not have made it with the Muzzle downward.

Q. Did you observe how the Wound was upon the Bone, and whether there were any Shot remaining in the Wound?

Bethune. No, Sir; but I found some Shot in the Cavity of the Belly.

Mr. Brown. Now the Question is, Whether the Shot, coming upon this Bone, might not be thrown upwards?

Bethune. No; for the Shot went through the Bone, so that the Gun must have been held obliquely, pointing upwards: The Shot could not have gone through in that Direction, if the Muzzle of the Gun had pointed downwards. This is not Matter of Judgment, but I have given you Demonstration of it.

Mr. Serj. Gapper. You say the Wound went from the Left Side to the Right, and that if the Muzzle of the Gun was downwards, the Wound would be in the same Manner?

Bethune. Certainly, Sir; if the Muzzle of the Gun is held downward, the Shot cannot go upward.

Foreman of the Jury. He makes it appear, that the Prisoner could not hold the Gun to his Shoulder, but that it was held horizontally; and that it was impossible for him to wound him in the Manner the Boy has described, if the Muzzle of the Gun had been pointed downward.

Bethune. I beg Leave to speak a few Words more to your Lordship. While I was giving in this Evidence before the Coroner and his Jury, if your Lordship remembers, I said I had shewed them how the Wound was; therefore I desired them to consider, how consistent it was with the Evidence that Mr. Egglestone had given: I believe I proved it to the Coroner's Jury, and others that were there, that it was impossible it could be done in that Manner, if the Gun was held, as he said, to his Shoulder; upon that he comes up again, and, says he, The Gentleman stooped when he did it.

Counsel for the Prisoner. This shews how he departed from what he had said; for he said first, that Mr. Annesley stood upright when he fired; and then that he stooped, in order to make his Evidence correspond with the Wound.

[John Perkins, Surgeon, sworn.]

Q. Did you see the Body of Thomas Egglestone?
